Dr. Cox. I find in Scripture, of such things as we use to call Sacraments. First, Of Baptism manifestly. Of Eucharistia manifestly. Of Pennance manifestly. Of Matrimony manifestly. Of Ordering, per manus Impositionem & Orationem manifestly. It is also manifest, that the Apostles laid their hands upon them that were Christened. Of the Unction of the sick with Prayer manifestly.

Dr. Day. Albeit the seven Sacraments be not found in Scripture expressed by name, yet the thing it self, that is, the Matter, Nature, Effect and Vertue of of them is found there. Of Baptiſm in divers places; of the moſt Holy Communion; of Matrimony; of Abſolution; of Biſhops, Prieſts, and Deacons, how they were ordained per Manuum Impoſitionem cum Oratione; Of laying the Apoſtles Hands on them that were Chriſtened, which is a part of Confirmation; of Unction of them that were ſick, with Prayer joined withal.

As it appeareth in the Articles which be drawn of the ſaid ſeven Sacraments. Dr. Redmayn.

In Scripture we find of the Form of the Sacraments, as the words Sacramental; and the Matter, as the Element, Oil, Chriſm; and the Patient receiving the Sacrament; and of Grace and encreaſe of Vertue given by them, as the Effects. Dr. Edgeworth

The things are contained in Scripture, as Baptiſm, Confirmation, Euchariſtia, Pœnitentia, Extrema Unctio, Ordo, altho they have not there this name Sacramentum as Matrimony hath; and every one of them hath his Matter, Nature, Effect and Vertue. Dr. Symmons.

I think the Thing, the Matter, the Nature, the Effect, and Vertue of them all be in the Scripture, and all there inſtituted by Gods Authority; for I think that no one Man, neither the whole Church hath power to inſtitute a Sacrament, but that ſuch Inſtitution pertaineth only to God. Dr. Treſham.

To the ſeventh, I ſay, That we may evidently find in Scripture, the ſubſtance of every one of the ſeven Sacraments, the Nature, Effect, and Vertue of the ſame; as of Baptiſm, Confirmation, Pennance, Matrimony, and ſo forth of the reſt. Dr. Leyghton.

Of the Matter, Nature, Vertue, and Effect, of ſuch as we call Sacraments, Scripture maketh mention: Of Baptiſm manifeſtly; of the moſt Holy Communion manifeſtly; of Abſolution manifeſtly; of Matrimony manifeſtly; of Biſhops, Prieſts, and Deacons, Scripture ſpeaketh manifeſtly, for they were ordered, per Impoſitiones Manuum Presbyterii cum Oratione & Jejunio. Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt præter Menevenſ. naturam ſeptem Sacramentorum nobis tradi in Scripturis. Eboracenſ. effectus ſingulorum enumerat, item Carliolenſ. Con.

Londinenſ. non reſpondet Queſtioni. Treſhamus ait ideo ê Scripturis tradi nobis Sacramenta, quoniam tota Eccleſia non habet Authoritatem Inſtituendi Sacramenta. Agreem.

In the ſeventh they do agree, ſaving this, That the Biſhop of St. Davids ſays, That the Nature, Effect, and Vertue of theſe ſeven Sacraments, only Baptiſm, the Sacrament of the Altar, Matrimony, Pennance, are contained tained in the Scripture. The other ſay, That the Nature and the Vertue of all the ſeven, be contained in the Scripture.

8. Queſtion.

Whether Confirmation, cum Chriſmate, of them that be Baptized, be found in Scripture?

Anſwers.

Canterbury OF Confirmation with Chriſm, without which it is counted no Sacrament, there is no mention in the Scripture.

York. To the eighth; We find Confirmation, cum Impoſitione Manuum in Scripture, as before; cum Chriſmate we find not in the Scripture, but yet we find Chriſmation with Oil uſed even from the time of the Apoſtles, and ſo taken as a Tradition Apoſtolick.

London. To the eighth; I find in Scripture in many places, de impoſitione Manuum, which I think (conſidering the uſage commonly and ſo long withal uſed) to be Confirmation; and that with Chriſm, to ſupply the viſible appearance of the Holy Ghoſt, which Holy Ghoſt was ſo viſibly ſeen in the Primitive Church; nevertheleſs for the perfect declaration of the verity hereof, I refer it to the judgment of Men of higher knowledg in this Faculty.

Rocheſter. Altho Confirmation be found in the Scripture, by Example, as I ſaid before, yet there is nothing written de Chriſmate.

Carlile. The Impoſition of Hands, the Holy Doctors take for the ſame which we call Confirmation, done upon them which were chriſtened before, whereof is written in the Acts. And as for Chriſma, it ſhould ſeem by Cyprian, both as touching the confection and uſage thereof, that it hath a great ground to be derived out of Scripture, tho it be not manifeſtly therein ſpoken of.

Dr. Robertſon. Res & Effectus Confirmationis continentur in Scriptura, nempe, Impoſitio Manuum per Apoſtolos Baptizatis, per quam dabatur Spiritus Sanctus. De Chriſmate nihil illic legimus, quia per id tempus Spiritus Sanctus ſigno viſibili deſcenderit in Baptizatos. Quod ubi fieri deſierit, Eccleſia Chriſmate ſigni externi loco uti cœpit.

Dr. Cox. I find not in Scripture that the Apoſtles laying their Hands upon them that were baptized, did anoint them Chriſmate.

Dr. Day. Confirmation cum Chriſmate I read not in Scripture, but Impoſitionem Manuum ſuper Baptizatos, I find there is, which ancient Authors call Confirmation; and Inunction with Chriſma hath been uſed from the Primitive Church.

De

De impoſitione manuum cum Oratione, expreſſa mentio eſt in Scripturis, quæ nunc uſitato nomine, a Doctoribus dicitur, Confirmatio. Sacrum Chriſma, Traditio eſt Apoſtolica, ut ex veteribus liquet. Dr. Ogleſthorpe.

The Queſtion is not ſimple, but as if it were asked, Whether Euchariſtia in infermentato, be in the Scripture, or baptiſmus cum ſale. Impoſition of the Apoſtles hands, in which was conferred the Holy Ghoſt for Confirmation of them who were baptized, is found in Scripture. Chriſma is a Tradition deduced from the Apoſtles, as may be gathered by Scripture, and by the Old Authors, and the Myſtery thereof is not to be deſpiſed. Dr. Redmayn.

This Sacrament is one, unitate integritatis, as ſome others be: Therefore it hath two parts; of which one, that is, Impoſitio Manuum, is taken, Heb. 6. & Act. 8. The other part, that is, Chriſme, is taken of the Tradition of the Fathers, and ſo uſed from the Primitive Church. Vid. Cyp. Epiſt. lib. 1. Ep. 12. Dr. Edgworth.

Confirmation is found in Scripture, and Confirmation cum Chriſmate is gathered from the Old Authors. Dr. Symmons.

I ſay, Confirmation is found in Scripture, but this additament, cum Chriſmate, is not of the Scripture, yet it is a very ancient Tradition, as appeareth by Cyp. de Unct. Chriſm. Dr. Treſham.

To the eighth Queſtion, I ſay, That Confirmation of them that be baptized, is found in Scripture, but cum Chriſmate it is not found in Scripture, but it was uſed cum Chriſmate in the Church ſoon after the Apoſtles Time, as it may evidently appear by the cited Authors. Dr. Leyghton.

The laving of the Biſhops hands upon them that be chriſtened, which is a part of Confirmation, is plainly in Scripture; and the Unction with Chriſme, which is another part, hath been obſerved from the Primitive Church, and is called of St. Auſtin, Sacramentum Chriſmatis. Unction of the Sick with Oil, and the Prayer is grounded expreſly in Scripture. Dr. Coren.

Conveniunt omnes Confirmationem cum Chriſmate non haberi in Scripturis. Eboracenſ. Treſham, Coren, Day, Ogelthorpe, Edgworth, Leighton, Simmons, Redman, Robinſonus, Confirmationem in Scripturis eſſe contendunt; cæterum Chriſma eſſe traditionem Apoſtolicam: addit Robertſonus, & ubi fieri deſierat miraculum Conſecrandi Spiritus Sancti, Eccleſia Chriſmate ſigni externi loco uti cæpit; Convenit illi Londinenſ.
Carliolenſ. putat uſum Chriſmatis ex Scripturis peti poſſe; Putant omnes tum in hoc Articulo, tum ſuperiori, Impoſitionem Manuum eſſe Confirmationem. Con.

In the eighth they do agree all, except it be the Biſhop of Carliſle, That Confirmatio cum Chriſmate is not found in Scripture, but only Confirmatio cum Manuum Impoſitione. And that alſo my Lord of St. Davids denieth Agreem.

denieth to be in Scripture, as we call it a Sacrament. My Lord of Carliſle ſaith, That Chriſma, as touching the confection and uſage thereof, hath a ground to be derived out of Scripture. The other ſay, That it is but a Tradition.

9. Queſtion.

Whether the Apoſtles lacking a higher Power, as in not having a Chriſtian King among them, made Biſhops by that neceſſity, or by Authority given by God?

Anſwers.

Canterbury ALL Chriſtian Princes have committed unto them immediately of God the whole Cure of all their Subjects, as well concerning the Adminiſtration of God's Word, for the cure of Souls, as concerning the Miniſtration of things Political and Civil Governance: And in both theſe Miniſtrations, they muſt have ſundry Miniſters under them to ſupply that, which is appointed to their ſeveral Offices. The Civil Miniſters under the King's Majeſty, in this Realm of England, be thoſe whom it ſhall pleaſe his Highneſs for the time to put in Authority under him: As for Example; The Lord Chancellor, Lord Treaſurer, Lord Great Maſter, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Admiral, Majors, Sheriffs, &c. The Miniſters of God's Word, under his Majeſty, be the Biſhops, Parſons, Vicars, and ſuch other Prieſts as be appointed by his Highneſs to that Miniſtration: As for Example, the Biſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhop of Dureſme, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Parſon of Winwick, &c. All the ſaid Officers and Miniſters, as well of that ſort as the other, be appointed, aſſigned, and elected, and in every place, by the Laws and Orders of Kings and Princes. In the admiſſion of many of theſe Officers, be divers comely Ceremonies and Solemnities uſed, which be not of neceſſity, but only for a good order and ſeemly faſhion; for if ſuch Offices and Miniſtrations were committed without ſuch ſolemnity, they were nevertheleſs truly committed: And there is no more Promiſe of God, that Grace is given in the committing of the Eccleſiaſtical Office, than it is in the committing of the Civil Office. In the Apoſtles time, when there was no Chriſtian Princes, by whoſe Authority Miniſters of God's Word might be appointed, nor ſins by the ſword corrected, there was no Remedy then for the correction of Vice, or appointing of Miniſters, but only the conſent of Chriſtian Multitudes among themſelves, by an uniform conſent, to follow the advice and perſwaſion of ſuch Perſons whom God had moſt endued with the Spirit of Counſel and Wiſdom: And at that time, foraſmuch as the Chriſtian People had no Sword, nor Governour amongſt them, they were conſtrained of neceſſity to take ſuch Curats and Prieſts, as either they knew themſelves to be meet thereunto, or elſe as were commended unto them by others that were ſo replete with the Spirit of God, with ſuch knowledg in the profeſſion of Chriſt, ſuch Wiſdom, ſuch Converſation and Counſel, ſel, that they ought even of very Conſcience to give credit unto them, and to accept ſuch as by them were preſented: and ſo ſometimes the Apoſtles and others, unto whom God had given abundantly his Spirit, ſent or appointed Miniſters of God's Word; ſometimes the people did chuſe ſuch as they thought meet thereunto; and when any were appointed or ſent by the Apoſtles or others, the people of their own voluntary Will with thanks did accept them: not for the Supremity, Empire, or Dominion, that the Apoſtles had over them to command, as their Princes and Maſters, but as good people ready to obey the Advice of good Counſellors, and to accept any thing that was neceſſary for their edification and benefit.

To the ninth; We find in Scripture, that the Apoſtles uſed the power to make Biſhops, Prieſts, and Deacons; which power may be grounded upon theſe words; Sicut miſit me vivens Pater, ſic ego mitto vos, &c. And we verily think, that they durſt not have uſed ſo high power, unleſs they had had Authority from Chriſt; but that their power to ordain Biſhops, Prieſts, or Deacons, by Impoſition of Hands, requireth any other Authority, than Authority of God, we neither read in Scripture, nor out of Scripture. York.

To the ninth; I think the Apoſtles made Biſhops by the Law of God, becauſe, Acts 22. it is ſaid, In quo vos Spiritus Sanctus poſuit: Nevertheleſs, I think if Chriſtian Princes had been then, they ſhould have named by Right, and appointed the ſaid Biſhops to their Rooms and Places. London.

I think that the Apoſtles made Biſhops by Authority given them from God. Rocheſter.

That Chriſt made his Apoſtles, Prieſts, and Biſhops, and that he gave them power to make others like, it ſeemeth to be the very Trade of Scripture. Carlile.

Opinor Apoſtolos Authoritate Divina creaſſe Epiſcopos & Presbyteros, ubi Publicus Magiſtratus permittit. Dr. Roberiſon.

Altho the Apoſtles had no authority to force any Man to be Prieſt, yet (they moved by the Holy Ghoſt) had authority of God to exhort and induce Men to ſet forth God's Honour, and ſo to make them Prieſts. Dr. Cox.

The Apoſtles made, that is to ſay, ordained Biſhops by authority given them by God; Joh. 20. Sicut miſit me vivens Pater, ita & ego mitto vos. Item Joan. ult. & Act. 20. and 1 Tim. 4. Paulus ordinavit Timotheum & Titum, & præſcribit quales illi debeant ordinare. 1 Tim. 1. Tit. 1. Dr. Day.

Chriſt

Dr. Redmayn. Christ gave his Apostles authority to make other Bishops and Ministers in his Church, as he had received authority of the Father to make them Bishops; but if any Christian Prince had then been, the Apostles had been, and ought to have been obedient Subjects, and would nothing have attempted, but under the permission and assent of their Earthly Governors: yet was it meet that they which were special and most Elect Servants of our Saviour Christ, and were sent by him to convert the World; and having most abundantly the Holy Ghost in them, should have special ordering of such Ministry as pertained to the planting and encreasing of the Faith; whereunto I doubt not, but a Christian Prince, of his godly Mind, would most lovingly have condescended. And it is to be considered, that in this Question, with other like, this word, making of a Bishop, or Priest, may be taken two ways: for understanding the Word, to ordain or Consecrate, so it is a thing which pertaineth to the Apostles and their Successors only; but if by this word (Making) be understood the appointing or naming to the Office; so, it pertaineth specially to the Supream Heads and Governours of the Church, which be Princes.

Dr. Edgworth. The Apostles made Bishops and Priests by authority given them of God, and not for lack of any higher power: Notwithstanding where there is a christened King or Prince, the Election, Deputation and Assignation of them, that shall be Priests or Bishops, belongeth to the King or Prince, so that he may forbid any Bishop within his Kingdom, that he give no Orders, for Considerations moving him, and may assign him a time when he shall give Orders, and to whom: Example of King David, 1 Chron. 24. dividing the Levites into 24 Orders, deputing over every Order one chief Bishop, prescribing an Ordinal and Rule how they should do their Duties, their Courses; and what Sacrifices, Rights, and Ceremonies, they should use every day, as the day and time required. And his Son, King Solomon, diligently executed, and commanded the same Usages to be observed in the Temple, after he had erected and finished it, 2 Chron. 8.

Dr. Symmons. The Apstles made Bishops and Priests, by authority given them of God.

Dr. Tresham. I say, That the Apstles had authority of God to make Bishops; yet if there had been a Christian King in any place where they made Bishops, they would, and ought, to have desired authority also of him, for the executing of such their godly Acts, which no Christian King would have denied.

Dr. Leyghton. To the ninth, I say, That the Apostles (as I suppose) made Bishops by authority given unto them of Christ: Howbeit I think they would and should have required the Christian Princes consent and license thereto, if there had been any Christian Kings or Princes.

Dr. Coren. The Apostles made Bishops and Priests by authority given them of God: Notwithstanding if there had been a Christian King at that time, it it had been their Duties, to have had his Licenſe and Permiſſion to do the ſame.

Omnes Conveniunt Apoſtolos Divinitus accepiſſe Poteſtatem creandi Epiſcopos; Eboracenſ. addit, non opus fuiſſe alia authoritate Apoſtolis quam divina: Sic Thirleby & Edgworth, Redmanus diſtinguit de Inſtitutione Presbyteri, Ordinationem & Conſecrationem tribuit tantum Apoſtolicis & eorum Succeſſoribus, nominationem & electionem Magiſtratibus: Sic Londinenſ. Leightonus, Redman, Treſham, Curren, aiunt petendam fuiſſe Poteſtatem a Magiſtratu Chriſtiano, ſi tum fuiſſet. Robertſonus non reſpondet Quæſtioni, concedit enim datam eſſe Apoſtolis Poteſtatem creandi Epiſcopos ubi Magiſtratus permittit. Oglethorpus putat eos impetraſſe poteſtatem a principibus: Carliolenſ. Roffenſ. Dayus, non reſpondent ultimæ Parti. Con.

In the ninth, touching the Authority of the Apoſtles in making Prieſts, the Biſhop of York, the Elect of Weſtminſter, Dr. Edgworth, ſay, That the Apoſtles made Prieſts by their own Power, given them by God, and that they had no need of any other Power. The Biſhop of St. Davids ſaith, That becauſe they lacked a Chriſtian Prince, by that neceſſity they Ordained other Biſhops. Dr. Leighton, Curren, Treſham, and Redmayn, ſuppoſe, That they ought to have asked licenſe of their Chriſtian Governors, if then there had been any. Agreem.

10. Queſtion,

Whether Biſhops or Prieſts were firſt? and if the Prieſts were firſt, then the Prieſt made the Biſhop.

Anſwers.

THe Biſhops and Prieſts were at one time, and were no two things, but both one Office in the beginning of Chriſt's Religion. Canterbury

To the tenth; We think that the Apoſtles were Prieſts before they were Biſhops; and that the Divine Power which made them Prieſts, made them alſo Biſhops; and altho their Ordination was not by all ſuch Courſe as the Church now uſeth, yet that they had both Viſible and Inviſible Sanctification, we may gather of the Goſpel, where it is written, Sicut miſit me Pater vivens, & ego mitto vos: & cum hæc dixit, inſufflavit in eos & dixit, accipite Spiritum Sanctum: Quorum remiſeritis, &c. And we may well think, that then they were made Biſhops, when they had not only a Flock, but alſo Shepherds appointed to them to overlook, and a Governance committed to them by the Holy Ghoſt to overſee both; for the name of a Biſhop, is not properly a name of Order, but a name of Office, ſignifying an Overſeer. And altho the inferior Shepherds have alſo Cure to overſee their Flock, yet foraſmuch as the Biſhops York.

Biſhops Charge is alſo to overſee the Shepherds, the name of Overſeer is given to the Biſhops, and not to the other; and as they be in degree higher, ſo in their Conſecration we find difference even from the Primitive Church.

London. To the tenth; I think the Biſhops were firſt, and yet I think it is not of importance, whether the Prieſt then made the Biſhop, or elſe the Biſhop the Prieſt; conſidering (after the Sentence of St. Jerome) that in the beginning of the Church there was none (or if it were, very ſmall) difference between a Biſhop and a Prieſt, eſpecially touching the ſignification.

Rocheſter. I find in Scripture, that Chriſt being both a Prieſt and a Biſhop, ordained his Apoſtles, who were both Prieſts and Biſhops; and the ſame Apoſtles did afterwards ordain Biſhops, and commanded them to ordain others.

Carlile. Chriſt made his Apoſtles Exorciſts, as it appeareth in the 10. Mat. Deacons, Prieſts, and Biſhops, as partly there, and after, in the 20 of St. John, Quorum Remiſeritis, &c. and where he ſaid, Hoc facite in meam Commemorationem. In the Acts, Cæterorum nemo audebat ſe conjungere illis. So that they were all theſe together; and ſo being according to the Ordinance of Chriſt, who had made after them 72 other Prieſts, as it appeareth in the 10th of St. Luke, they made and ordaind alſo others the ſeven principal Deacons, as it is ſhewed in the 6th of the Acts; where it is ſaid, That they praying laid their hands upon them. In the 13 of the Acts, certain there named at the commandment of the Holy Ghoſt, ſevered Saul and Barnabas to that God had taken them, Faſting, Praying, and laying their hands upon them; the which Saul, Ananias the Diſciple had baptized, laying his hand upon him, that he might be repleniſhed with the Holy Ghoſt. And Paul ſo made, ordained Timothy and Tite, willing them to do likewiſe as he had done, and appointed to be done from City to City. James was ordained the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, by Peter, John, and James. So that Example otherwiſe we read not.

Dr. Rolertſon. Incertus ſum utri fuere priores, at ſi Apoſtoli in prima profectione Ordinati erant, apparet Epiſcopos fuiſſe priores, nempe Apoſtolos, nam poſtea deſignavit Chriſtus alios ſeptuaginta duos. Nec opinor abſurdum eſſe, ut Sacerdos Epiſcopum Conſecret, ſi Epiſcopus haberi non poteſt.

Dr. Cox. Although by Scripture (as St. Hierome ſaith) Prieſts and Biſhops be one, and therefore the one not before the other: Yet Biſhops, as they be now, were after Prieſts, and therefore made of Prieſts.

Dr. Day. The Apoſtles were both Biſhops and Prieſts, and they made Biſhops and Prieſts, as Titus and Timotheus made Prieſts. Epiſcopatum ejus accipiat alter, Act. 1. Presbyteros qui in vobis ſunt, obſecro & ego Compresbyter, 1 Pet. 5. And in the beginning of the Church, as well that word Epiſcopus as Presbyter, was common and attributed both to Biſhops and Prieſts.

Utrique

They be of like beginning, and at the beginning were both one, as St. Hierome and other old Authors ſhew by the Scripture, wherefore one made another indifferently. Dr. Redmayn.

Chriſt our Chief-Prieſt and Biſhop, made his Apoſtles Prieſts and Biſhops all at once; and they did likewiſe make others, ſome Prieſts, and ſome Biſhops; and that the Prieſts in the Primitive Church made Biſhops, I chink no inconvenience; (as Jerome ſaith) in an Epiſt. ad Evagrium. Even like as Souldiers ſhould chuſe one among themſelves to be their Captain: So did Prieſts chuſe one of themſelves to be their Biſhop, for conſideration of his learning, gravity, and good living, &c. and alſo for to avoid Schiſms among themſelves by them, that ſome might not draw the people one way, and others another way, if they lacked one Head among them. Dr. Edgworth.

Chriſt was and is the great High Biſhop, and made all his Apoſtles Biſhops; and they made Biſhops and Prieſts after him, and ſo hath it evermore continued hitherto. Dr. Symmons.

I ſay, Chriſt made the Apoſtles firſt Prieſts; and then Biſhops, and they by this Authority made both Prieſts and Biſhops, but where there had been a Chriſtian Prince, they would have deſired his Authority to the ſame. Dr. Treſham.

To the tenth.—— Dr. Leyghton.

The Apoſtles were made of Chriſt Biſhops and Prieſts, both at the firſt; and after them, Septuaginta duo Diſcipuli, were made Prieſts. Dr. Coren Menevenſ: Thirleby, Redmanus, Coxus, aſſerunt in initio eoſdem fuiſſe Epiſcopos & Presbyteros. Londinenſ. Carliolenſ. Symmons, putant Apoſtolos fuiſſe inſtitutos Epiſcopos a Chriſto, & eos poſtea inſtituiſſe alios Epiſcopos & Presbyteros, & 72 Presbyteros poſtea fuiſſe Ordinatos: Sic Oglethorpus, Eboracenſ. & Treſham aiunt Apoſtolos primo fuiſſe Presbyteros, deinde Epiſcopos, cum aliorum Presbyterorum credita eſſet illis cura. Robertſonus incertus eſt utri fuere priores, non abſurdum tamen eſſe opinatur, ut Sacerdos conſecret Epiſcopum, ſi Epiſcopus haberi non poteſt. Sic Londinenſ. Edgworth, Dayus, putant etiam Epiſcopos, ut vulgo de Epiſcopis loquimur, fuiſſe ante Presbyteros. Leightonus nihil Reſpondet. Con.

In the tenth; Where it is asked, Whether Biſhops or Prieſts were firſt? The Biſhop of St. Davids, my Lord Elect of Weſtminſter, Dr. Cox, Dr. Redman, ſay, That at the beginning they were all one. The Biſhops of Agreem.

York, London, Rocheſter, Carliſle; Drs. Day, Treſham, Symmons, Oglethorp, be in other contrary Opinions. The Biſhop of York, and Doctor Treſham, think, That the Apoſtles firſt were Prieſts, and after were made Biſhops, when the overſeeing of other Prieſts was committed to them. My Lords of Dureſme, London, Carliſle, Rocheſter, Dr. Symmons and Craſford, think, That the Apoſtles firſt were Biſhops, and they after made other Biſhops and Prieſts. Dr. Coren and Oglethorp, ſay, That the Apoſtles were made Biſhops, and the 72 were after made Prieſts. Dr. Day thinks, That Biſhops as they be now-a-days called, were before Prieſts. My Lord of London, Drs. Edgworth and Robertſon, think it no inconvenience, if a Prieſt made a Biſhop in that time.

11. Queſtion.

Whether a Biſhop hath Authority to make a Prieſt by the Scripture, or no? And whether any other but only a Biſhop may make a Prieſt?

Anſwers.

Canterbury A Biſhop may make a Prieſt by the Scripture, and ſo may Princes and Governors alſo, and that by the Authority of God committed to them, and the People alſo by their Election; for as we read that Biſhops have done it, ſo Chriſtian Emperors and Princes uſually have done it, and the people before Chriſtian Princes were, commonly did Elect their Biſhops and Prieſts.

York. To the eleventh; That a Biſhop may make a Prieſt, may be deduced of Scripture; for ſo much as they have all Authority neceſſary for the ordering of Chriſt's Church, derived from the Apoſtles, who made Biſhops and Prieſts, and not without Authority, as we have ſaid before to the ninth Queſtion; and that any other than Biſhops or Prieſts may make a Prieſt, we neither find in Scripture, nor out of Scripture.

London. To the eleventh, I think, That a Biſhop duly appointed hath Authority, by Scripture, to make a Biſhop, and alſo a Prieſt: becauſe Chriſt being a Biſhop did ſo make himſelf; and becauſe alive, his Apoſtles did the like.

Rocheſter. The Scripture ſheweth by example, that a Biſhop hath Authority to make a Prieſt; albeit no Biſhop being ſubject to a Chriſtian Prince, may either give Orders to Excommunicate, or uſe any manner of Juriſdiction, or any part of his Authority, without Commiſſion from the King who is Supream Head of that Church whereof he is a Member; but that any other Man may do it beſides a Biſhop, I find no example, either in Scripture, or in Doctors.

Carlile. By what is ſaid before, it appeareth, that a Biſhop by Scripture may make Deacons and Prieſts, and that we have no example otherwiſe.

Opinor

Opinor Epiſcopum habere Authoritatem creandi Sacerdotem, modo id Magiſtratus publici permiſſu fiat. An vero ab alio quam Epiſcopo id rite fieri poſſit, haud ſcio, quamvis ab alio factum non memini me legiſſe. Ordin. conferr. gratiam, vid. Eck. Homil. 60. Dr. Robertſon.

Biſhops have Authority, as is aforeſaid, of the Apoſtles, in the tenth Queſtion, to make Prieſts, except in caſes of great neceſſity. Dr. Cox.

Biſhops have authority by Scripture, to ordain Biſhops and Prieſts; Joh. 20. Hujus rei gratia reliqui te Cretæ ut conſtituas oppidatim Presbyteros, Tit. 1. Act. 14. Dr. Day.

Autoritas ordinandi Presbyteros data eſt Epiſcopis per verbum, multiſq; aliis quos lego. Dr. Ogleſthorpe.

To the firſt part, I anſwer, Yea; for ſo it appeareth Tit. 1. and 1 Tim. 5. with other places of Scripture. But whether any other but only a Biſhop may make a Prieſt, I have not read, but by ſingular priviledg of God, as when Moſes (whom divers Authors ſay was not a Prieſt) made Aaron a Prieſt. Truth it is, that the Office of a Godly Prince is to overſee the Church, and the Miniſters thereof; and to cauſe them do their duty, and alſo to appoint them ſpecial Charges and Offices in the Church, as may be moſt for the Glory of God, and edifying of the People: and thus we read of the good Kings in the Old Teſtament, David, Joas, Ezekias, Joſias. But as for Making, that is to ſay, Ordaining and Conſecrating of Prieſts, I think it ſpecially belongeth to the Office of a Biſhop, as far as can be ſhewed by Scripture, or any Example, as I ſuppoſe from the beginning. Dr. Redmayn.

A Biſhop hath authority by Scripture to make a Prieſt, and that any other ever made a Prieſt ſince Chriſt's time I read not. Albeit Moſes who was not anointed Prieſt, made Aaron Prieſt and Biſhop, by a ſpecial Commiſſion or Revelation from God, without which he would never ſo have done. Dr. Edgeworth

A Biſhop placed by the Higher Powers, and admitted to miniſter, may make a Prieſt; and I have not read of any other that ever made Prieſts. Dr. Symmons.

I ſay, a Biſhop hath authority by Scripture to make a Prieſt, and other than a Biſhop, hath not power therein, but only in caſe of neceſſity. Dr. Treſham.

To the eleventh; I ſuppoſe that a Biſhop hath authority of God, as his Miniſter, by Scripture to make a Prieſt; bnt he ought not to admit any Man to be Prieſt, and conſecrate him, or to appoint him unto any miniſtry in the Church, without the Princes Licenſe and Conſent, in a Chriſtian Region. And that any other Man hath authority to make a Prieſt by Scripture, I have not read, nor any example thereof. Dr. Leyghton.

Dr. Coren. A Biſhop being licenſed by his Prince and ſupream Governour, hath authority to make a Prieſt by the Law of God. I do not read that any Prieſt hath been oedered by any other than a Biſhop.

Agreem. In the eleventh; To the former part of the Queſtion, the Biſhop of St. Davids doth anſwer, That Biſhops have no Authority to make Prieſts without they be authorized of the Chriſtian Prince. The others, all of them do ſay, That they be authorized of God. Yet ſome of them, as the Biſhop of Rocheſter, Dr. Curren, Leighton, Robertſon, add, That they cannot uſe this Authority without their Chriſtian Prince doth permit them. To the ſecond part the Anſwer of the Biſhop of St. Davids is, That Laymen have other-whiles made Prieſts. So doth Dr. Edgworth and Redman ſay, That Moſes, by a Priviledg given him of God, made Aaron his Brother Prieſt. Dr. Treſham, Crayford, and Cox ſay, That Laymen may make Prieſts in time of Neceſſity. The Biſhops of York, Dureſme, Rocheſter, Carliſle, Elect of Weſtminſter, Dr. Curren, Leighton, Symmons, ſeem to deny this thing; for they ſay, They find not, nor read not any ſuch example.

12. Queſtion.

Whether in the New Teſtament be required any Conſecration of a Biſhop and Prieſt, or only appointing to the Office be ſufficient?

Anſwers.

Canterbury IN the New Teſtament, he that is appointed to be a Biſhop, or a Prieſt, needeth not Conſecration by the Scripture, for election or appointing thereto is ſufficient.

York. To the twelfth Queſtion; The Apoſtles ordained Prieſts by Impoſition of the Hand with Faſting and Prayer; and ſo following their ſteps we muſt needs think, that all the foreſaid things be neceſſarily to be uſed by their Succeſſors: and therefore we do alſo think, that Appointment only without viſible Conſecration and Invocation for the aſſiſtance and power of the Holy Ghoſt, is neither convenient nor ſufficient; for without without the ſaid Invocation, it beſeemeth no Man to appoint to our Lord Miniſters, as of his own Authority: whereof we have example in the Acts of the Apoſtles; where we find, that when they were gathered to chuſe one in the place of Judas, they appointed two of the Diſciples, and commended the Election to our Lord, that he would chuſe which of them it pleaſed him, ſaying and praying, Lord, thou that knoweſt the hearts of all Men, ſhew whether of theſe two thou doſt chuſe to ſucceed in the place of Judas. And to this purpoſe in the Acts, we read Dixit Spiritus Sanctus ſegregate mihi Barnabam, &c. And again, Quos poſuit Spiritus Sanctus regere Eccleſiam Dei. And it appeareth alſo that in the Old Teſtament, in the ordering of Prieſts, there was both Viſible and Inviſible Sanctification; and therefore in the New Teſtament, where the Prieſthood is above compariſon higher than in the Old, we may not think that only Appointment ſufficeth without Sanctification, either Viſible or Inviſible.

To the twelfth; I think Conſecration of a Biſhop and Prieſt be required, for that in the Old Law (being yet but a ſhadow and figure of the New) the Conſecration was required, as appears Levit. 8. yet the truth of this I leave to thoſe of higher Judgments. London.

The Scripture ſpeaketh, de Impoſitione Manus & de Oratione: and of other manner of Conſecrations, I find no mention in the New Teſtament expreſly; but the Old Authors make mention alſo of Inunctions. Rocheſter.

Upon this Text of Paul to Timothy; Noli negligere gratium quæ in te eſt, quæ data eſt tibi per Prophetam cum Impoſitione Manuum Presbyterii; St. Anſelm ſaith, This Grace to be the Gift of the Biſhops Office, to the which God of his meer goodneſs had called and preferred him. The Propheſy (he ſaith) was the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, by the which he knew what he had to do therein. The Impoſition of the hands is that by the which he was ordained and received that Office: And therefore (ſaith St. Paul) God is my Witneſs, that I have diſcharged my ſelf, ſhowing you as I ought to have done Now look you we Lupon it whom that ye take to Orders, leſt ye loſe your ſelf thereby. Let Biſhops therefore, who (as ſaith St. Hierome) hath power to make Prieſts, conſider well under what Law the order of Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitution is bounden; and let them not think thoſe words of the Apoſtle to be his, but rather the words of Chriſt himſelf. Carlile.

Opinor requiri Conſecrationem quandam, hoc eſt, impoſitionem manuum, Orationem, Jejunium, &c. tamen nuſquam hoc munere fungi poſſe, niſi, ubi Magiſtratus inviter, jubeat, aut permittat. Dr. Robertſon.

By Scripture there is no Conſecration of Biſhops and Prieſts required, but only the appointing to the Office of a Prieſt, cum Impoſitione Manuum. Dr. Cox.

Conſecration of Biſhops and Prieſts I read not in the New Teſtament, but Ordinatio per Manuum Impoſitionem cum Oratione is read there, as in the places above; and the only appointment, as I think, is not ſufficient. Dr. Day.

Præter

Dr. Oglethorpe Præter vocationem, ceu designationem externam, quæ vel a Principe fit, vel a populo per electionem & suffragia, requiritur Ordinatio alia per manuum impositionem, idque per Verbum Dei.

Dr. Redmayn. Besides the appointing to the Office, it appeareth that in the Primitive Church, the Apostles used certain Consecration of the Ministers of the Church, by imposition of hands and Prayer, Acts 6. and with Fasting, Acts 14, &c. The Office of Priesthood is too dangerous to set upon, when one is but appointed only: Therefore for the confirmation of their Faith, who take in hand such charge, and for the obtaining of farther Grace requisite in the same, Consecration was ordained by the Holy Ghost, and hath been always used from the beginning.

Dr. Edgworth. Deputation to the Office, is not sufficient to make a Priest or a Bishop, as appeareth by David and Solomon, who deputed the 24 abovementioned to their Offices, yet they made none of them Priests, nor any other.

Dr. Symmons The appointing to the Office per Manuum Impositionem, is in Scripture, and the Consecration of them hath of long time continued in the Church.

Dr. Tresham. There is a certain kind of Consecration required, which is Imposition of the Bishops hands with Prayer, and the appointing only is not sufficient.

Dr. Leyghton. To the twelfth; I suppose that there is a Consecration required, as by Imposition of Hands; for so we be taught by the ensample of the Apostles.

Dr. Coren. In the New Testament is required to the making of a Bishop, Impositio Manuum cum Oratione, which I take for Consecration, and Appointment unto the Office is not sufficient; for King David, 1 Chron. 24. did appoint 24 to be Bishops, who after were consecrated; so that both the Appoinment and the Consecration be requisite.

Con. Respondent Eboracens. Londinens. Carliolens. Leighton, Tresham, Robersonus, Edgworth, Curren, Dayus, Oglethorp, Consecrationem esse requisitam. Agreem. In the twelfth Question, where it is asked, Whether in the New Testament be required any Consecration of a Bishop, or only appointing to the Office be sufficient? The Bishop of St. Davids saith, That only the Appointing. Dr. Cox, That only Appointing, cum Manuum Impositione, is ſufficient without Conſecration. The Biſhops of York, London, Dureſm, Carliſle, Drs. Day, Curren, Leighton, Treſham, Edgworth, Ogletborp, ſay, That Conſecration is requiſite. Dr. Redmayn ſaith, That Conſecration hath been received from the Apoſtles Time, and inſtitute of the Holy Ghoſt to confer Grace. My Lord of Rocheſter, Dr. Day, and Symmons, ſay, That Prieſthood is given per manuum impoſitionem, and that by Scripture; and that Conſecration hath of long time been received in the Church.

13. Queſtion.

Whether (if it fortuned a Chriſtian Prince Learned, to conquer certain Dominions of Infidels, having none but temporal learned Men with him) if it be defended by God's Law, that he and they ſhould Preach and Teach the word of God there, or no? And alſo make and conſtitute Prieſts, or no?

Anſwers.

IT is not againſt God's Law, but contrary they ought indeed ſo to do; and there be Hiſtories that witneſſeth, that ſome Chriſtian Princes, and other Laymen unconſecrate have done the ſame. Canterbury

To the thirteenth; To the firſt part of this Queſtion touching Teaching and Preaching the Word of God in caſe of ſuch need; we think that Laymen not ordered, not only may, but muſt preach Chriſt and his Faith to Infidels, as they ſhall ſee opportunity to do the ſame, and muſt endeavour themſelves to win the Miſcreants to the Kingdom of God, if that they can; for as the Wiſe Man ſaith, God hath given charge to every Man of his Neighbour; and the Scripture of God chargeth every Man to do all the good that he can to all Men: And ſurely this is the higheſt Alms to draw Men from the Devil the Uſurper, and bring them to God the very owner. Wherefore in this caſe every Man and Woman may be an Evangeliſt, and of this alſo we have example. But touching the ſecond part, for caſe of Neceſſity; As we neither find Scripture, nor Example, that will bear, that any Man, being himſelf no Prieſt, may make, that is to ſay, may give the Order of Prieſthood to another, and Authority therewith to miniſter in the ſaid Order, and to uſe ſuch Powers and Offices, as appertaineth to Prieſthood grounded in the Goſpel. So we find in ſuch caſe of need, what hath been done in one of the Ancient Writers; altho this Authority to Ordain, after form afore-mentioned, be not to Laymen expreſly prohibited in Scripture; yet ſuch a prohibition is implied, in that there is no ſuch Authority given to them, either in Scripture or otherways; for ſo much as no Man may uſe this or any other Authority which cometh from the Holy Ghoſt, unleſs he hath either Commiſſion grounded in Scripture, or elſe Authority by Tradition, and ancient uſe of Chriſt's Church univerſally received over all. York.

To

London. To the thirteenth and fourteenth following; I think that neceſſity herein, might either be a ſufficient Rule and Warrant to determine and order ſuch Caſes, conſidering that tempore neceſſitatis mulier baptizat, & Lacius idem facit, & audit confeſſionem: or elſe that God would inſpire in the Princes Heart, to provide the beſt and moſt handſome Remedy therein: And hard were it peradventure to find ſuch great neceſſity, but either in the Train of the ſaid Prince, or in the Regions adjoining thereunto, there might be had ſome Prieſts for the ſaid purpoſes; or finally, That the Prince himſelf, godlily inſpired in that behalf, might, for ſo good purpoſes and intents, ſet forth the Act indeed, referring yet this thing to the better judgment of others.

Rocheſter. To the thirteenth and fourteenth following; I never read theſe caſes, neither in Scripture, nor in the Doctors, and therefore I cannot anſwer unto them by Learning, but think this to be a good Anſwer for all ſuch Queſtions, viz. Neceſſitas non habet Legem.

Carlile. It is to be thought, that Chriſt may call, as it pleaſeth him, inwardly, outwardly, or by both together: So that if no Prieſt might be had, it cannot be thought, but that a Chriſtian Prince, with others learned, inwardly moved and called, might moſt charitably and godlily proſecute that ſame their Calling in the moſt acceptable Work, which is to bring people from the Devil to God, from Infidelity to true Faith, by whatſoever means God ſhall inſpire.

Dr. Robertſon. In hoc caſu exiſtimarem accerſendos Verbi & Sacramentorum Miniſtros, ſi qui forent vicini; quin ſi nulli invenirentur, Principem illum Chriſtianum haberemus pro Apoſtolo, tanquam miſſum a Deo, licet externo Sacramento non eſſet commendatus, quum Deus Sacramentis ſuis non ſit alligatus.

Dr. Cox. To the Thirteenth, and Fourteenth following; it is not againſt God's Law, that the Prince, and his learned temporal Men, may Preach and Teach, and in theſe caſes of extream Neceſſity, make and inſtitute Miniſters.

Dr. Day. In this caſe (as I think) the Prince and other temporal learned Men with him, may by God's Law, Teach and Preach the Word of God, and Baptize; and alſo (the ſame Neceſſity ſtanding) elect and appoint Men to thoſe Offices.

Dr. Oglethorp. In ſumma neceſſitate Baptizare & prædicare poſſunt & debent, hæc etenim duo, neceſſaria ſunt media ad ſalutem; at ordinare (ut conjectura ducor) non debent, ſed aliunde Sacrificos accerſire, quos ſi habere nequeant, Deus ipſe (cujus negotium agitur,) vel oraculo admonebit, quid faciendum erit, vel neceſſitas ipſa (quæ ſibi ipſi eſt Lex) modum Ordinandi ſuggeret ac ſuppeditabit.

Dr. Redmayn. I think they might, in ſuch caſe of Neceſſity; for in this caſe the Laymen made the whole Church there, and the Authority of preaching and miniſtring the Sacraments, is given immediately to the Church; and the

the Church may appoint Miniſters, as is thought convenient. There be two Stories good to be conſidered for this Queſtion, which be written in the 10*th* Book of the Hiſtory Eccleſiaſtick; the one of Frumentius, who preached in India, and was after made Prieſt and Biſhop by Athanaſius. And the other Story is of the King of the Iberians, of whom Ruffine the Writer of the Story ſaith thus: Et nondum initiatus Sacris ſit ſuæ gentis Apoſtolus. Yet nevertheleſs it is written there, That an Ambaſſade was ſent to Conſtantine the Emperor, that he would ſend them Prieſts for the further eſtabliſhment of the Faith there.

The Prince and his temporal learned Men, might and ought, in that neceſſity, to inſtruct the People in the Faith of Chriſt, and to baptize them, ut idem rex ſit, & ſuæ gentis Apoſtolus, and theſe be ſufficient for the Salvation of his Subjects. But as concerning other Sacraments, he ought to abide and look for a ſpecial Commiſſion from Almighty God, as Moſes had, or elſe to ſend unto other Regions where Prieſts or Biſhops may be had, and elſe not to meddle. Examples in Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 10. cap. 1. de Frumentio. & cap. 2. de Ancilla captiva quæ convertit gentem Hiberorum cujus captivæ monitis ad Imperatorem Conſtantinum totius gentis legatio mittitur, res geſta exponitur, Sacerdotes mittere exorantur qui cæptum erga ſe Dei munus implerent, &c. Dr. Edgworth.

I think that in ſuch a neceſſity, a learned Chriſtian Prince, and alſo temporal Men learned, be bound to preach and miniſter either Sacraments, ſo that the ſame Miniſters be orderly aſſigned by the High Power, and the Congregation. Dr. Symons.

I ſay, to the firſt part, That ſuch a King, and his temporal learned Men, not only might, but were alſo bound to preach God's Word in this caſe. And as to the ſecond part, I ſay, That if there could no Biſhop be had to Inſtitute, the Prince might in that of neceſſity do it. Dr. Treſham.

To the thirteenth; I ſuppoſe the Affirmative thereof to be true; Quamvis poteſtas clavium reſidet præcipue in Eccleſia. Dr. Leyghton.

In ſuch a caſe, I do believe that God would illuminate the Prince; ſo that either he himſelf ſhould be made a Biſhop, by internal working of God (as Paul was) or ſome of his Subjects, or elſe God would ſend him Biſhops from other parts. And as for preaching of the Word of God, the Prince might do it himſelf, and other of his learned Subjects, altho they were no Prieſts. Dr. Coren.

In prima parte Quæſtionis Conveniunt omnes, etiam Laicos, tali rerum ſtatu, non ſolum poſſe ſed debere docere. Menevenſ. Thirlebeus, Leightonus, Coxus, Symmons, Treſham, Redmaynus, Robertſonus, etiam poteſtatem Miniſtrandi Sacramenta, & Ordinandi Miniſtros, concedunt illis. Eboracenſ. hanc prorſus poteſtatem denegat. Coren credit Principem Divinitus illuminandum & conſecrandum fore in Epiſcopum interne, aut aliquem ex ſuis, Pauli exemplo. Simile habet Herefordenſis & Carliolenſis. Con.

Dayus nihil reſpondet de Ordinandis Presbyteris in hac neceſſitate.

Agreem. In the thirteenth; Concerning the firſt part, Whether Laymen may Preach and Teach God's Word? They do all agree, in ſuch a caſe, That not only they may, but they ought to teach. But in the ſecond part, touching the Conſtituting of Prieſts of Laymen, my Lord of York, and Doctor Edgworth, doth not agree with the other; they ſay, That Laymen in no wiſe can make Prieſts, or have ſuch Authority. The Biſhops of Dureſme, St. Davids, Weſtminſter, Drs. Treſham, Cox, Leighton, Crayford, Symmons, Redmayn, Robertſon, ſay, That Laymen in ſuch caſe have Authority to miniſter the Sacraments, and to make Prieſts. My Lords of London, Carliſle, and Hereford, and Dr. Coren, think, That God in ſuch a caſe would give the Prince Authority, call him inwardly, and illuminate him or ſome of his, as he did St. Paul.

14. Queſtion.

Whether it be forefended by God's Law that (if it ſo fortune that all the Biſhops and Prieſts of a Region were dead, and that the Word of God ſhould remain there unpreached, and the Sacrament of Baptiſm, and others unminiſtred) that the King of that Region ſhould make Biſhops and Preiſts to ſupply the ſame, or no?

Anſwers.

Canterbury IT is not forbidden by God's Law.

York. To the fourteenth; In this caſe, as we have ſaid in the next Article afore, Teaching of the Word of God may be uſed by any that can and would uſe it, to the Glory of God; and in this caſe alſo the Sacrament of Baptiſm may be miniſtred by thoſe that be no Prieſts; which things altho we have not of Scripture, yet the univerſal Tradition, and Practice of the Church, doth teach us: And peradventure contract of Matrimony might alſo be made, the Solemnization thereof being only ordained by Law poſitive, and not by any ground, either of Scripture, or of Tradition; altho for very urgent cauſes, the ſaid Solemnization is to be obſerved when it may be obſerved; but that the Princes may not Make, that is, may not Order Prieſts nor Biſhops, not before Ordered to miniſter the other Sacraments, the miniſtry whereof in Scripture is committed only to the Apoſtles, and from them derived to their Succeſſors, even from the Primitive Church, hitherto, and by none other uſed, we have anſwered in the thirteenth Article.

To the fourteenth; I ſuppoſe the Affirmative to be true, in caſe that there can no Biſhops nor Prieſts be had forth of other Countries, conveniently. Dr. Leyghton.

In this caſe I make anſwer as before, That God will never ſuffer his Servants to lack that thing that is neceſſary; for there ſhould, either from other parts, Prieſts and Biſhops be called thither, or elſe God would call inwardly ſome of them that be in that Region to be Biſhops and Prieſts. Agreem. In the fourteenth they agree for the most part as they did before, That Laymen in this case may teach and minister the Sacraments. My Lord of York, Dr. Symmons, and Oglethorp say, They can make no Priests, altho Symmons said they might minister all Sacraments, in the Question before. Yet my Lord of York, and Edgworth, do grant, That they may Christen. The Bishops of London, Rochester, and Dr. Crayford, say, That in such a case, Necessitas non habet Legem.

15. Question.

Whether a Man be bound by Authority of this Scripture, (Quorum Remiseritis) and such-like, to confess his secret deadly Sins to a Priest, if he may have him, or no?

Answers.

Canterbury A Man is not bound, by the Authority of this Scripture, Quorum Remiseritis, and such-like, to confess his secret deadly Sins to a Priest, altho he may have him.

York. To the fifteenth; This Scripture is indifferent to secret and open Sins; nor the Authority given in the same is appointed or limited, either to the one, or to the other, but is given commonly to both: And therefore seeing that the Sinner is in no other place of Scripture discharged of the confession of his secret Sins, we think, that this place chargeth him to confess the secret Sins, as well as the open.

London. To the fifteenth; I think that as the Sinner is bound by this authority to confess his open Sins, so also is he bound to confess his secret Sins, because the special end is, to wit, Absolutionem a peccato cujus fecit se servum, is all one in both cases: And that all Sins as touching God are open, and in no wise secret or hid.

Rochester. I think that Confession of secret deadly sins is necessary for to attain absolution of them; but whether every Man that hath secretly committed deadly Sin, is bound by these words to ask Absolution of the Priest therefore, it is an hard Question, and of much controversy amongst learned Men, and I am not able to define betwixt them; but I think it is the surest way, to say that a Man is bound to Confess, &c.

Carlile. I think that by the mind of most Ancient Authors, and most holy Expositors, this Text, Quorum Remiseritis peccata, &c. with other-like serveth well to this intent; That Christian Folk should confess their secret deadly Sins to a Priest there to be assoiled, without which Mean, there can be none other like Assurance.

Opinor

Opinor obligare, modo aliter conſcientiæ illius ſatisfieri nequeat. Dr. Robertſon.

I cannot find that a Man is bound by Scripture to confeſs his ſecret deadly Sins to a Prieſt, unleſs he be ſo troubled in his Conſcience, that he cannot be quieted without Godly Inſtruction. Dr. Cox.

The Matter being in controverſy among learned Men, and very doubtful, yet I think rather the truth is, That by Authority of this Scripture, Quorum Remiſeritis, &c. and ſuch-like, a Man is bound to confeſs his ſecret deadly Sins, which grieve his Conſcience, to a Prieſt, if he may conveniently have him. Foraſmuch as it is an ordinary way ordained by Chriſt in the Goſpel, by Abſolution to remit Sins; which Abſolution I never read to be given, ſine Confeſſione previâ. Dr. Day.

Confitenda ſunt opinor, etiam peccata abdita ac ſecreta propter Abſolutionem ac conſcientiæ tranquillitatem, & præcipue pro vitanda deſperatione, ad quam plerumq; adiguntur multi in extremis, dum ſibi ipſis de remiſſione peccatorum nimium blandiuntur, nullius (dum ſani ſunt) cenſuram ſubeuntes niſi propriam. Dr. Oglethorp.

I think, that altho in theſe words Confeſſion of privy Sins, is not expreſly commanded; yet it is inſinuated and ſhewed in theſe words, as a neceſſary Medicine or Remedy, which all Men that fall into deadly ſin ought, for the quieting of their Conſciences ſeek, if they may conveniently have ſuch a Prieſt as is meet to hear their Confeſſion. Dr. Redmayn.

Where there be two ways to obtain remiſſion of Sin, and to recover Grace, a Man is bound by the Law of Nature to take the ſurer way, or elſe he ſhould ſeem to contemn his own Health, which is unnatural. Alſo becauſe we be bound to love God above all things, we ought by the ſame Bond to labour for his Grace and Favour: So that becauſe we be bound to love God, and to love our ſelves in an Order to God, we be bound to ſeek the beſt and ſureſt Remedy to recover Grace for our ſelves. Contrition is one way; but becauſe a Man cannot be well aſſured, whether his Contrition, Attrition, or Diſpleaſure for his Sin be ſufficient to ſatisfy or content Almighty God, and able or worthy to get his Grace: Therefore it is neceſſary to take that way that will not fail, and by which thou mayeſt be ſure, and that is Abſolution of the Prieſt, which by Chriſt's Promiſe will not deceive thee, ſo that thou put no ſtep or bar in the way; as, if thou do not then actually ſin inwardly nor outwardly, but intend to receive that the Church intendeth to give thee by that Abſolution, having the efficacity of Chriſt's Promiſe, Quorum Remiſeritis, &c. Now the Prieſt can give thee no Abſolution from that Sin that he knoweth not: therefore thou art bound, for the cauſes aforeſaid, to confeſs thy Sin. Dr. Edgworth.

This Scripture, as Ancient Doctors expound it, bindeth all Men to confeſs their ſecret deadly Sins. Dr. Symmons.

Dr. Tresham. I say, That such Confession is a thing most consonant to the Law of God, and it is a wise point, and a wholsome thing so for to do, and God provoketh and allureth us thereto, in giving the Active Power to Priests to assoil in the words, Quorum Remiseritis. It is also a safer way for Salvation to confess, if we may have a Priest: Yet I think that Confession is not necessarily deduced of Scripture, nor commanded as a necessary Precept of Scripture, and yet it is much consonant to the Law of God, as a thing willed, not commanded.

Dr. Leyghton. To the fifteenth; I think that only such as have not the knowledg of the Scripture, whereby they may quiet their Consciences, be bound to confess their secret deadly sins unto a Priest: Howbeit no Man ought to contemn such Auricular Confession, for I suppose it to be a Tradition Apostolical, necessary for the unlearned Multitude.

Dr Coren. A Man whose Conscience is grieved with mortal secret sins, is bound by these words, Quorum Remiseritis, &c. to confess his Sin to a Priest, if he may have him conveniently.

Con. Eboracens. Londinens. Dayus, Oglethorpus, Coren, Redmayn, asserunt obligari. Coxus, Tresham, & Robertsonus dicunt non obligari, si aliter Conscientiæ illorum satisfieri queat; Menevens. nullo modo obligari. Carliolens. & Symmons aiunt, secundum veterum interpretationem, hac Scriptura quemvis obligari peccatorem. Roffens. Herefordens. & Thirleby non respondent, sed dubitant. Leightonus solum indoctos obligari ad Confessionem. Edgworth tradit duplicem modum remissionis peccatorum, per Contritionem sive Attritionem, & per Absolutionem: & quia nemo potest certus esse, num attritio & dolor pro peccato sufficiat ad satisfaciendum Deo & obtinendam gratiam, ideo tutissimam viam deligendam, scilicet, Absolutionem a Sacerdote, quæ per promissionem Christi est certa; Absolvere non potest nisi cognoscat peccata; Ergo peccata per Confessionem sunt illi revelanda.

Agreement. In the eleventh; Concerning Confession of our secret deadly Sins. The Bishops of York, Duresme, London, Drs. Day, Coren, Oglethorp, Redmayn, Crayford, say, That Men be bound to confess them of their secret Sins. Drs. Cox, Tresham, Robertson, say, They be not bound, if they may quiet their Consciences otherwise. The Bishop of St. Davids also saith, That this Text bindeth no Man. Dr. Leighton saith, That it bindeth only such as have not the knowledg of Scripture. The Bishop of Carlisle and Symmons say, That by ancient Doctors exposition, Men be bound, by this Text, to confess their deadly sins.

16. Question

16. Queſtion.

Whether a Biſhop or a Prieſt may Excommunicate, and for what Crimes? And whether they only may Excommunicate by God's Law?

Anſwers.

A Biſhop or a Prieſt by the Scripture is neither commanded nor forbidden to Excommunicate, but where the Laws of any Region giveth him authority to Excommunicate, there they ought to uſe the ſame in ſuch Crimes, as the Laws have ſuch authority in; and where the Laws of the Region forbiddeth them, there they have no authority at all; and they that be no Prieſts may alſo Excommunicate, if the Law allow thereunto. Canterbury

To the ſixteenth; The power to Excommunicate, that is, to diſſever the Sinner from the communion of all Chriſtian People, and ſo put them out of the Unity of the Myſtical Body for the time, donec reſipiſcat, is only given to the Apoſtles, and their Succeſſors in the Goſpel, but for what Crimes, altho in the Goſpel doth not appear, ſaving only for diſobedience againſt the Commandment of the Church, yet we find example of Excommunication uſed by the Apoſtles in other caſes: As of the Fornicator by Paul, of Hymeneus and Alexander for their Blaſphemy by the ſame; and yet of other Crimes mentioned in the Epiſtle of the ſaid Paul writing to the Corinthians. And again of them that were diſobedient to his Doctrine, 2 Theſſ. 3. We find alſo charge given to us, by the Apoſtle St. John, that we ſhall not commune with them, nor ſo much as ſalute him with Ave, that would not receive his Doctrine. By which it may appear that Excommunication may be uſed for many great Crimes, and yet the Church at this day doth not uſe it, but only for manifeſt diſobedience. And this kind of Excommunication, whereby Man is put out of the Church, and diſſevered from the Unity of Chriſts Myſtical Body, which Excommunication toucheth alſo the Soul, no Man may uſe, but they only, to whom it is given by Chriſt. York.

To the ſixteenth; I think that a Biſhop may excommunicate, taking example of St. Paul with the Corinthian; and alſo of that he did to Alexander and Hymeneus. And with the Lawyers it hath been a thing out of Queſtion, That to Excommunicate ſolemnly, appertaineth to a Biſhop, altho otherwiſe, both inferior Prelates and other Officers, yea and Prieſts too in notorious Crimes, after divers Mens Opinions, may Excommunicate ſemblably, as all others that be appointed Governors and Rulers over any Multitude, or Spiritual Congregation. London.

I anſwer affirmatively to the firſt part, in open and manifeſt Crimes, meaning of ſuch Prieſts and Biſhops as be by the Church authorized to uſe that power. To the ſecond part I anſwer, That it is an hard Queſtion, wherein I had rather hear other Men ſpeak, than ſay my own Sentence, Rocheſter.

Sentence; for I find not in Scripture, nor in the Old Doctors, that any Man hath given Sentence of Excommunication, ſave only Prieſts; but yet I think, that it is not againſt the Law of God, that a Layman ſhould have Authority to do it.

Carlile. Divers Texts of Scripture ſeemeth, by the Interpretation of Ancient Authors, to ſhew, that a Biſhop or a Prieſt may Excommunicate open deadly Sinners continuing in obſtinacy with contempt. I have read in Hiſtories, alſo, that a Prince hath done the ſame.

Dr. Robertſon. Opinor Epiſcopum aut Presbyterum Excommunicare poſſe, tanquam miniſtrum & os Eccleſiæ, ab eadem mandatum habens. Utrum veroid juris nulli niſi Sacerdotibus in mandatis dari poſſit, non ſatis ſcio. Excommunicandum eſſe opinor pro hujuſcemodi criminibus, qualia recenſet Paulus, 1 Cor 5. ſi, is qui frater nominatur, eſt fornicator, aut avarus, aut idolis ſerviens, aut maledicus, aut ebrioſus, aut rapax, cum hujuſmodi ne cibum ſumere, &c.

Dr. Cox. A Biſhop or a Prieſt, as a publick Perſon appointed to that Office, may excommunicate for all publick Crimes: And yet it is not againſt God's Law, for others than Biſhops or Prieſts to Excommunicate.

Dr. Day. A Biſhop or a Prieſt may Excommunicate by God's Law for manifeſt and open Crimes: Alſo others appointed by the Church, tho they be no Prieſts, may exerciſe the power of Excommunication.

Dr. Ogleſthorpe. Non ſolum Epiſcopus Excommunicare poteſt, ſed etiam tota Congregatio, idq; pro lethalibus criminibus ac publicis, ê quibus ſcandalum Eccleſiæ provenire poteſt. Non tamen pro re pecuniaria uti olim ſolebant.

Dr. Redmyn. They may Excommunicate, as appeareth 1 Cor. 5. 1 Tim. 1. and that for open and great Crimes, whereby the Church is offended; and for ſuch Crimes as the Prince and Governours determine, and thinketh expedient, Men to be Excommunicate for, as appeareth in nonnullis Conſtitutionibus Juſtiniani. Whether any other may pronounce the Sentence but a Biſhop or a Prieſt, I am uncertain.

Dr. Edgworth. A Biſhop, or a Prieſt only, may Excommunicate a notorious and grievous Sinner, or obſtinate Perſon from the Communion of Chriſtian People, becauſe it pertaineth to the Juriſdiction which is given to Prieſts, Joh. 26. Quorum Remiſeritis, &c. Et Quorum retinetis, &c. There is one manner of Excommunication ſpoken of, 1 Cor. 5. which private Perſons may uſe. Si is qui frater nominatur inter vos eſt fornicator, aut avarus, aut idolis ſerviens, &c. cum hujuſmodi ne cibum quidem capiatis. Excluding filthy perſons, covetous perſons, Brawlers and Quarrellers out of their Company, and neither to eat nor drink with them.

Dr. Symmons. Whoſoever hath a place under the Higher Power, and is aſſigned by the ſame to execute his Miniſtry given of God, he may Excommunicate for for any Crime, as it ſhall be ſeen to the High Power, if the ſame Crime be publick.

A Biſhop and Prieſt may Excommunicate by Scripture: as touching for what Crimes? I ſay, for every open deadly ſin and diſobedience. And as touching, Whether only the Prieſt may Excommunicate? I ſay, not he only, but ſuch as the Church authorizes ſo to do. Dr. Treſham.

To the ſixteenth, I ſay, That a Biſhop or a Prieſt having Licenſe and Authority of the Prince of the Realm, may Excommunicate every obſtinate and inobedient Perſon, for every notable and deadly Sin. And further, I ſay, That not only Biſhops and Prieſts may Excommunicate, but any other Man appointed by the Church, or ſuch as have Authority to appoint Men to that Office, may Excommunicate. Dr. Leyghton.

A Biſhop or a Prieſt may Excommunicate an obſtinate Perſon for publick Sins. Forſomuch as the Keys be given to the whole Church, the whole Congregation may Excommunicate; which Excommunication may be pronounced by ſuch a one as the Congregation does appoint, altho he be neither Biſhop nor Prieſt. Dr. Coren.

Menevenſ. Herefordenſ. Thirleby, Dayus, Leightonus, Coxus, Symmons, Coren, concedunt Authoritatem excommunicandi etiam Laicis, modo a Magiſtratu deputentur. Eboracenſ. & Edgworth prorſus negant datum Laicis, ſed Apoſtolis & eorum Succeſſoribus tantum. Roffenſis, Redmaynus, & Robertſonus ambigunt, num detur Laicis. Londinenſ. non reſpondet Quæſtioni: Oglethorpus & Thirleby aiunt, Eccleſiæ datam eſſe poteſtatem excommunicandi; Idem Treſhamus. Con.

In the ſixteenth, of Excommunication, they do not agree. The Biſhops of York, Dureſme, and Dr. Edgworth ſay, That Lay-men have not the Authority to Excommunicate, but that it was given only unto the Apoſtles and their Succeſſors. The Biſhops of Hereford, St. Davids, Weſtminſter; Doctors, Day, Coren, Leighton, Cox, Symmons, ſay, That Laymen may Excommunicate, if they be appointed by the High Ruler. My Lord Elect of Weſtminſter, Dr. Treſham, and Dr. Oglethop, ſay further, That the Power of Excommunication was given to the Church, and to ſuch as the Church ſhall inſtitute. Agreement.

17. Queſtion.

Whether Unction of the Sick with Oil, to remit Venial Sins, as it is now uſed, be ſpoken of in the Scripture, or in any Ancient Authors?

Anſwers.

Canterbury UNction of the Sick with Oil, to remit Venial Sins, as it is now uſed, is not ſpoken of in the Scripture, nor in any Ancient Authors.

T. Cantuarien. This is mine Opinion and Sentence at this preſent, which I do not temeariouſly define, but do remit the judgment thereof wholly unto your Majeſty.

These are the Subſcriptions which are at the end of every Man's Paper.

York. To the ſeventeenth; Of Unction of the Sick with Oil, and that Sins thereby be remitted, St. James doth teach us; but of the Holy Prayers, and like Ceremonies uſed in the time of the Unction, we find no ſpecial mention in Scripture, albeit the ſaid St. James maketh alſo mention of Prayer to be uſed in the Miniſtry of the ſame.

Edward Ebor.

London. To the ſeventeenth; I think that albeit it appeareth not clearly in Scripture, whether the uſage in extream Unction now, be all one with that which was in the beginning of the Church: Yet of the Unction in time of Sickneſs, and the Oil alſo with Prayers and Ceremonies, the ſame is ſet forth in the Epiſtle of St. James, which place commonly is alledged, and ſo hath been received, to prove the Sacrament of extream Unction.

Ita mihi Edmundo Londinenſi Epiſcopo pro hoc tempore dicendum videtur, ſalvo judicio melius ſentientis, cui me prompte & humiliter ſubjicio.

Rocheſter. Inunction of them that be Sick with Oil, and praying for them for remiſſion of Sins, is plainly ſpoken of in the Epiſtle of St. James, but after what form or faſhion the ſaid Inunction was then uſed, the Scripture telleth not.

Written on the back of the Paper,
The Biſhop of Rocheſter's Book.

Carlile. Extream Unction is plainly ſet out by St. James, with the which maketh alſo that is written in the 6th of St. Mark, after the mind of right good ancient Doctors.

Owinus Oglethorpus.

Unction with Oil, adjoined with Prayer, and having promiſe of Remiſſion of Sins, is ſpoken of in St. James, and Ancient Authors; as for the uſe which now is, if any thing be amiſs, it would be amended. Dr. Redmayn.

Unction with Oil is grounded in the Scripture, and expreſly ſpoken of; but with this Additament (as it is now uſed) it is not ſpecified in Scripture, for the Ceremonies now uſed in Unction, I think meer Traditions of Man. Dr. Treſham.

William Treſham.

To the ſeventeenth, I ſay, That Unction of the Sick with Oil and Prayer to remit Sins, is manifeſtly ſpoken of in St. James's Epiſtle and Ancient Authors, but not with all the Rites and Ceremonies as be now commonly uſed. Dr. Leyghton.

BE it known to all Men, That I Robert Barnes, Doctor of Divinity, have as well in Writing, as in Preaching, overſhot my ſelf, and been deceived, by truſting too much to mine own heady Sentence, and giving judgment in and touching the Articles hereafter enſuing; whereas being convented, and called before the Perſon of my moſt gracious Sovereign Lord King Henry the Eighth of England and of France, Defenſor of the Faith, Lord of Ireland, and in Earth ſupream Head, immediately under God of the Church of England; It pleaſed his Highneſs, of his great clemency and goodneſs, being aſſiſted with ſundry of his moſt diſcreet and learned Clergy, to enter ſuch Diſputation and Argument with me upon the Points of my over ſight, as by the ſame was fully and perfectly confuted by Scriptures, and enforced only for Truths ſake, and for want of defence of Scriptures to ſerve for the maintenance of my part, to yield, confeſs, and knowledg my ignorance, and with my moſt humble ſubmiſſion, do promiſe for ever from henceforth to abſtain and beware of ſuch raſhneſs: And for my further declaration therein, not only to abide ſuch order for my doings paſſed, as his Grace ſhall appoint and aſſign unto me, but alſo with my heart to advance and ſet forth the ſaid Articles enſuing, which I knowledg and confeſs to be moſt Catholick, and Chriſtian, and neceſſary to be received, obſerved, and followed of all good Chriſtian People. Tho it ſo be, that Chriſt by the Will of his Father, is he only which hath ſuffered Paſſion and Death for redemption of all ſuch as will and ſhall come unto him, by perfect Faith and Baptiſm; and that alſo he hath taken upon him gratis the burden of all their ſins, which as afore will, hath, or ſhall come to him, paying ſufficient Ranſom for all their ſins, and ſo is becomed their only Redeemer and Juſtifier; of the which number I truſt and doubt not but that many of us now a days be of: yet I in heart do confeſs, that after, by the foreſaid Means we become right Chriſtian Folks, yet then by not following our Maſters Commandments and Laws, we do loſe the

the benefits and fruition of the ſame, which in this caſe is irrecuperable, but by true Penance, the only Remedy left unto us by our Saviour for the ſame; wherefore I think it more than convenient and neceſſary, that whenſoever Juſtification ſhall be preached of, that this Deed be joined with all the fore-part, to the intent that it may teach all true Chriſtian People a right knowledg of their Juſtification.

By me Robert Barnes.

Alſo I confeſs with my heart, That Almighty God is in no wiſe Author, cauſer of Sin, or any Evil; and therefore whereas Scripture ſaith, Induravit Dominus Cor Faraonis, &c. and ſuch other Texts of like ſence, they ought to underſtand them, quod Dominus permiſit eum indurari, and not otherwiſe; which doth accord with many of the Ancient Interpreters alſo.

By me Robert Barnes.

Further I do confeſs with my heart, That whenſoever I have offended my Neighbour, I muſt firſt reconcile my ſelf unto him, e're I ſhall get remiſſion of my ſins; and in caſe he offend me, I muſt forgive him, e're that I can be forgiven; for this doth the Pater Noſter, and other places of Scripture teach me.

By me Robert Barnes.

I do alſo confeſs with my heart, That good Works limited by Scripture, and done by a penitent and true reconciled Chriſtian Man, be profitable and allowable unto him, as allowed of God for his benefit, and helping to his Salvation.

By me Robert Barnes.

Alſo do confeſs with my heart, That Laws and Ordinances made by Chriſtian Rulers, ought to be obeyed by the Inferiors and Subjects, not only for fear, but alſo for Conſcience; for whoſo breaketh them, breaketh God's Commandments.

By me Robert Barnes.

All and ſingular the which Articles before written, I the foreſaid Robert Barnes do approve and confeſs to be moſt true and Catholick, and promiſe with my heart, by God's Grace, hereafter to maintain, preach, and ſet forth the ſame to the People, to the uttermoſt of my power, wit, and cunning.

XXIV.

A Proclamation ordained by the King's Majesty, with the advice of his Honourable Council, for the Bible of the largest and greatest Volume to be had in every Church; devised the sixth of May, the 33 Year of the King's most gracious Reign.

Regist. Bonner. Fol. 21.

WHereby Injunctions heretofore set forth by the Authority of the King's Royal Majesty, Supream Head of the Church of this his Realm of England, it was ordained, and commanded, amongst other things, That in all and singular Parish-Churches, there should be provided, by a certain day now expired, at the costs of the Curats and Parishioners, Bibles containing the Old and New Testament in the English Tongue, to be fixed and set up openly in every of the said Parish Churches; the which godly Commandment and Injunction, was to the only intent that every of the King's Majesty's loving Subjects, minding to read therein, might, by occasion thereof, not only consider and perceive the great and ineffable Omnipotent Power, Promise, Justice, Mercy and Goodness of Almighty God, but also to learn thereby to observe God's Commandments, and to obey their Soveraign Lord, and High Powers, and to exercise Godly Charity, and to use themselves according to their Vocations, in a pure and sincere Christian Life, without murmur or grudging: By the which Injunctions, the King's Royal Majesty intended that his loving Subjects should have and use the commodities of the reading of the said Bibles, for the purpose above rehearsed. humbly, meekly, reverently, and obediently, and not that any, of them should read the said Bibles with high and loud Voices, in time of the celebration of the Holy Mass, and other Divine Services used in the Church; or that any his Lay Subjects reading the same, should presume to take upon them any commmon Disputation, Argument, or Exposition of the Mysteries therein contained; but that every such Layman should, humbly, meekly, and reverently, read the same for his own instruction, edification, and amendment of his Life, according to God's Holy Word therein mentioned. And notwithstanding the King's said most godly and gracious Commandment and Injunction, in form as is aforesaid, his Royal Majesty is informed, That divers and many Towns and Parishes within this his Realm, have neglected their Duties in the accomplishment thereof; whereof his Highness marvelleth not a little; and minding the execution of his said former most godly and gracious Injunctions, doth straitly charge and command, That the Curats and Parishioners of every Town and Parish within this his Realm of England, not having already Bibles provided within their Parish Churches, shall on this side the Feast of All-Saints next coming, buy and provide Bibles of the largest and greatest Volume, and cause the same to be set and fixed in every of the said Parish Churches, there to be used as is aforesaid, according to the said former Injunctions, upon pain that the Curat and Inhabitants of the Parishes and Towns, shall lose and forfeit to the King's Majesty, for every month that they shall lack and want the said Bibles, after the same feast of All-Saints, 40 s. the one half of the same Forfeit to be to the King's Majesty, and the other half to him or of them which ſhall firſt find and preſent the ſame to the King's Majeſties Council. And finally, the King's Royal Majeſty doth declare and ſignify to all and ſingular his loving Subjects, that to the intent they may have the ſaid Bibles of the greateſt Volume, at equal and reaſonable prices, his Highneſs, by the Advice of his Council, hath ordained and taxed, That the Sellers thereof ſhall not take for any of the ſaid Bibles unbound, above the price of ten Shillings; and for every of the ſaid Bibles well and ſufficiently Bound, trimmed and claſped, not above twelve Shillings, upon pain the Seller to loſe, for every Bible ſold contrary to his Highneſs's Proclamation, four Shillings the one Moiety thereof to the King's Majeſty, and the other Moiety to the finder and preſenter of the Defaulter, as is aforeſaid. And his Highneſs ſtraitly chargeth and commandeth, That all and ſingular Ordinaries, having Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction within this his Church and Realm of England, and Dominion of Wales, that they, and every of them, ſhall put their effectual endeavours, that the Curats and Pariſhioners ſhall obey and accompliſh this his Majeſty's Proclamation and Commandment, as they tender the advancement of the King's moſt gracious and godly Purpoſe in that behalf, and as they will anſwer to his Highneſs for the ſame.

God ſave the KING.

XXV. An Admonition and Advertiſement given by the Biſhop of London, to all Readers of this Bible in the Engliſh Tongue.

TO the intent that a good and wholſome thing, godly and vertuouſly, for honeſt intents and purpoſes, ſet forth for many, be not hindred or maligned at, for the abuſe, default, and evil behaviour of a few, who for lack of diſcretion, and good adviſement, commonly without reſpect of time, or other due Circumſtances, proceed raſhly and unadviſedly therein; and by reaſon thereof, rather hinder than ſet forward the thing that is good of it ſelf: It ſhall therefore be very expedient, that whoſoever repaireth hither to read this Book, or any ſuch like, in any other place, he prepare himſelf chiefly and principally with all devotion, humility, and quietneſs, to be edified and made the better thereby; adjoining thereto his perfect and moſt bounden duty of obedience to the King's Majeſty, our moſt gracious and dread Soveraign Lord, and Supream Head, eſpecially in accompliſhing his Graces moſt honourable Injunctions and Commandments, given and made in that behalf. And right expedient, yea neceſſary it ſhall be alſo, that leaving behind him vain Glory, Hypocriſy, and all other carnal and corrupt Affections, he bringing with him diſcretion, honeſt intent, charity, reverence, and quiet behaviour, to and for the edification of his own Soul, without the hindrance, lett, or diſturbance of any other his Chriſtian Brother; evermore foreſeeing that no number of People be ſpecially congregate therefore to make a multitude: and that no Expoſition be made thereupon otherwiſe than it is declared in the Book it ſelf; and that eſpecially regard be had, no reading thereof be uſed, allowed, and with noiſe in the time of any Divine Service, or Sermon; or that in the ſame be uſed any Diſputation, Contention, or any other miſdemeanour; or finally that any Man juſtly may reckon himſelf to be offended thereby, or take occaſion to grudg or malign thereat.

God ſave the KING.

Regiſt. Bonner. Fol. 38.

INjunctions made by the conſent and authority of me Edmund Bonner Biſhop of London, in the Year of our Lord God 1542, and in the 34 Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord Henry the Eighth, by the Grace of God, King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of Faith, and Supream Head here in Earth, next under God, of the Church of England and Ireland. All which and ſingular Injunctions, by the Authority given to me of God, and by our ſaid Soveraign Lord the King's Majeſty, I exhort, require, and alſo command, all and ſingular Parſons, Vicars, Curats, and Chantry Prieſts, with other of the Clergy, whatſoever they be, of my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction of London, to obſerve, keep, and perform, according as it concerneth every of them, in vertue of their Obedience, and alſo upon Pains expreſſed in all ſuch Laws, Statutes, and Ordinances of this Realm, as they may incur, and be objected againſt them, now, or at any time hereafter, for breaking and violating of the ſame, or any of them.

Firſt; That you and every of you, ſhall, with all diligence, and faithful obedience, obſerve and keep, and cauſe to be obſerved and kept, to the uttermoſt of your Powers, all and ſingular the Contents of the King's Highneſs moſt gracious and godly Ordinances and Injunctions given and ſet forth by his Graces Authority; and that ye, and every of you, for the better performance thereof, ſhall provide to have a Copy of the ſame in writing, or imprinted, and ſo to declare them accordingly.

Item; That every Parſon, Vicar, and Curat, ſhall read over and diligently ſtudy every day one Chapter of the Bible, and that with the gloſs ordinary, or ſome other Doctor or Expoſitor, approved and allowed in this Church of England, proceeding from Chapter to Chapter, from the begining of the Goſpel of Matthew, to the end of the New Teſtament; and the ſame ſo diligently ſtudied to keep ſtill and retain in memory, and to come to the rehearſal and recital thereof, at all ſuch time and times as they, or any of them, ſhall be commanded thereunto by me, or any of my Officers or Deputies.

Item; That every of you do procure and provide of your own, a Book called, The Inſtitution of a Chriſtian Man, otherwiſe called the Biſhops Book; and that ye, and every of you, do exerciſe your ſelves in the ſame, according to ſuch Precepts as hath been given heretofore or hereafter to be given.

Item;

Item; That ye being abſent from your Benefices, incaſes lawfully permitted by the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, do ſuffer no Prieſt to keep your Cure, unleſs he being firſt by you preſented, and by me or my Officers thereunto abled and admitted. And for the more and better aſſurance and performance thereof to be had, by theſe Preſents I warn and moniſh peremptorily, all and ſingular Benificed Parſons having Benefices with Cure, within my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction, that they and every of them, ſhall either be perſonally reſident upon their Benefices and Cures, before the Feaſt of St. Michael the Arch-Angel now next enſuing; or elſe preſent, before the ſaid Feaſt, to me the ſaid Biſhop, my Vicar-General, or other my Officers deputed in that behalf, ſuch Curats as upon examination made by me, or my ſaid Officers, may be found able and ſufficient to ſerve and diſcharge their Cures in their abſence; and alſo at the ſaid Feaſt, or before, ſhall bring in and exhibit before my ſaid Officers their ſufficient Diſpenſations authorized by the King's Majeſty, as well for Non-reſidence, as for keeping of more Benefices with Cure than one.

Item; That every Parſon, Vicar, and other Curats, once in every quarter, ſhall openly in the Pulpit exhort and charge his Pariſhioners, that they in no wiſe do make any privy or ſecret contract of Matrimony between themſelves, but that they utterly defer it until ſuch time as they may conveniently have the Father and Mother, or ſome other Kinsfolks or Friends of the Perſon that ſhall make ſuch Contract of Matrimony; or elſe two or three honeſt Perſons to be preſent, and to hear and record the words and manner of their Contract, as they will avoid the extream pains of the Law provided in that behalf, if they preſumptuouſly do or attempt the contrary.

Item; That in the avoiding of divers and grievous Offences and Enormities, and ſpecially the moſt deteſtable Sin of Adultery, which oftimes hath hapned by the negligence of Curats in marrying Perſons together which had been married before, and making no due proof of the death of their other Husbands and Wives at the time of ſuch Marriages, I require and command you, and moniſh peremptorily by theſe Preſents, all manner of Parſons, Vicars, and Curats, with other Prieſts, being of my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction, that they, nor any of them from henceforth do preſume to ſolemnizate Matrimony in their Churches, Chappels, or elſewhere, between any perſons that have been married before, unleſs the ſaid Parſon, Vicar, Curat, or Prieſt, be firſt plainly, fully, and ſufficienty informed and certified of the Deceaſe of the Wife or Husband of him or her, or of both, that he ſhall marry, and that in writing, under the Ordinaries Seal of the Dioceſs, or place where he or ſhe inhabited or dwelt before, under pain of Excommunication, and otherwiſe to be puniſhed for doing the contrary, according to the Laws provided and made in that behalf.

Item; That ye, and every of you that be Parſons, Vicars, Curats, and alſo Chauntry-Prieſts and Stipendiaries, do inſtruct, teach, and bring up in Learning the beſt ye can, all ſuch Children of your Pariſhioners as ſhall come to you for the ſame; or at the leaſt, to teach them to read Engliſh, taking moderately therefore of their Friends that be able to pay, ſo that thereby they may the better learn and know how to Believe, how to Pray, how to live to God's Pleaſure.

Item;

Item; That every Curat do at all times his beſt diligence to ſtir, move and reduce ſuch as be at Diſcord, to Peace, Concord, Love, Charity, and one to remit and forgive one another, as often and howſoever they ſhall be grieved or offended: And that the Curat ſhew and give example thereof, when and as often as any variance or diſcord ſhall happen to be between him and any of his Cure.

Item; Where ſome froward Perſons, partly for malice, hatred, diſpleaſure, and diſdain, neglect, contemn, and deſpiſe their Curats, and ſuch as have the Cure and Charge of their Souls; and partly to hide and cloak their leud and naughty living, as they have uſed all the Year before, uſe at length to be confeſſed of other Prieſts which have not the Cure of their Souls: Wherefore I will and require you to declare, and ſhow to your Pariſhioners, That no Teſtimonials brought from any of them, ſhall ſtand in any effect; nor that any ſuch Perſons ſhall be admitted to God's Board, or receive their Communion, until they have ſubmitted themſelves to be confeſſed of their own Curats. (Strangers only except) or elſe upon arduous and urgent Cauſes and Conſiderations, they be otherwiſe diſpenſed with in that behalf, either by me, or by my Officers aforeſaid.

Item; That whereupon a deteſtable and abominable practice univerſally reigning in your Pariſhes, the young People, and other ill-diſpoſed Perſons doth uſe upon the Sundays and Holy-days, in time of Divine Service, and preaching the Word of God, to reſort to Ale-houſes, and there exerciſeth unlawful Games, with great Swearing, Blaſphemy, Drunkenneſs, and other Enormities, ſo that good and devout Perſons be much offended therewith: Wherefore I require and command you, to declare to ſuch as keepeth Ale-houſes, or Taverns, within your Pariſhes, that at ſuch times from henceforth, they ſhall not ſuffer in their Houſes any ſuch unlawful and ungodly Aſſemblies; neither receive ſuch Perſons to Bowling and Drinking at ſuch Seaſons, into their Houſes, under pain of Excommunication, and otherwiſe to be puniſhed for their ſo doing, according to the Laws in that behalf.

Item; That all Curats ſhall declare openly in the Pulpit, twice every Quarter, to their Pariſhioners, the ſeven deadly Sins, and the Ten Commandments, ſo that the people thereby may not only learn how to obey, honour, and ſerve God, their Prince, Superiours, and Parents, but alſo to avoid and eſchew Sin and Vice, and to live vertuouſly, following God's Commandments and his Laws.

Item; That where I am credibly informed, that certain Prieſts of my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction, doth uſe to go in an unſeemly and unprieſtly Habit aud Apparel, with unlawful Tonſures, carrying and having upon them alſo Armour and Weapons, contrary to all wholſome and godly Laws and Ordinances, more like Perſons of the Lay, than of the Clergy, which may and doth miniſter occaſion to light Perſons, and to Perſons unknown, where ſuch Perſons come in place, to be more licentious both of their Communication, and alſo of their Acts, to the great ſlander of the Clergy: Wherefore in the avoiding of ſuch ſlander and obloquy hereafter, I admoniſh and command all and ſingular Parſons, Vicars, Curats, and all other Prieſts whatſoever they be, dwelling, or inhabiting, or hereafter ſhall dwell and inhabit within my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction, That from henceforth they, and every of them, do uſe and wear wear meet, convenient, and decent Apparel, with their Truſſures accordingly, whereby they may be known at all times from Lay-people, and to be of the Clergy, as they intend to avoid and eſchew the Penalty of the Laws ordained in that behalf.

Item; That no Parſon, Vicar, or other Beneficed Men, having Cure within my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction, do ſuffer any Prieſt to ſay Maſs, or to have any Service within their Cure, unleſs they firſt give knowledg, and preſent them with the Letters of their Orders to me as Ordinary, or to my Officers deputed in that behalf; and the ſaid Prieſt ſo preſented, ſhall be by me, or my ſaid Officers, found able and ſufficient thereunto.

Item; That every Curat, not only in his Preachings, open Sermons, and Collations made to the People, but alſo at all other times neceſſary, do perſwade, exhort, and moniſh the People, being of his Cure, whatſoever they be, to beware and abſtain from ſwearing and blaſpheming of the Holy Name of God, or any part of Chriſt's moſt precious Body or Blood. And likewiſe to beware, and abſtain from Curſing, Banning, Chiding, Scolding, Backbiting, Slandering, and Lying. And alſo from talking and jangling in the Church, eſpecially in time of Divine Service or Sermon-time. And ſemblably to abſtain from Adultery, Fornication, Gluttony, and Drunkenneſs: And if they, or any of them, be found notoriouſly faulty or infamed upon any of the ſaid Crimes and Offences, then to detect them at every Viſitation, or ſooner, as the Caſe ſhall require, ſo that the ſaid Offenders may be corrected and reformed to the example of others.

Item; That no Prieſt from henceforth do uſe any unlawful Games, or frequently uſe any Ale-houſes, Taverns, or any ſuſpect place at any unlawful Times, or any light Company, but only for their Neceſſaries, as they, and any of them, will avoid the danger that may enſue thereupon.

Item; That in the Plague-time, no dead Bodies or Corpſes be brought into the Church, except it be brought ſtraight to the Grave, and immediately buried, whereby the People may the rather avoid infection.

Item; That no Parſons, Vicars, nor Curats, permit or ſuffer any manner of common Plays, Games, or Interludes, to be played, ſet forth, or declared, within their Churches or Chappels, contrary to this our forbidding and Commandment; and then you, or either of you, in whoſe Churches or Chappels any ſuch Games, Plays, or Interludes ſhall be ſo uſed, ſhall immediately thereupon make relation of the Names of the Perſon or Perſons ſo obſtinately and diſobediently uſing themſelves, unto Me, my Chancellor, or other my Officers, to the intent that they may be therefore reformed and puniſhed according to the Laws.

Item; That all Prieſts ſhall take this order when they Preach; firſt, They ſhall not rehearſe no Sermons made by other Men within this 200 or 300 Years; but when they ſhall preach, they ſhall take the Goſpel or Epiſtle of the day, which they ſhall recite and declare to the People plainly, diſtinctly, and ſincerely, from the beginning to the end thereof, and then to deſire the People to pray with them for Grace, after the uſage of the Church of England now uſed: And that done, we will that every Preacher ſhall declare the ſame Goſpel or Epiſtle, or both, even from from the beginning, not after his own Mind, but after the Mind of ſome Catholick Doctor allowed in this Church of England, and in no wiſe to affirm any thing, but that which he ſhall be ready always to ſhew in ſome Ancient Writer; and in no wiſe to make rehearſal of any Opinion not allowed, for the intent to reprove the ſame, but to leave that for thoſe that are and ſhall be admitted to preach by the King's Majeſty, or by me the Biſhop of London, your Ordinary, or by mine Authority. In the which Epiſtle and Goſpel, ye ſhall note and conſider diligently, certain godly and devout places, which may incenſe and ſtir the Hearers to obedience of good Works and Prayers: And in caſe any notable Ceremony uſed to be obſerved in the Church, ſhall happen that day when any preaching ſhall be appointed, it ſhall be meet and convenient that the Preacher declare and ſet forth to the People the true meaning of the ſame, in ſuch ſort that the People may perceive thereby, what is meant and ſignified by ſuch Ceremony, and alſo know how to uſe and accept it to their own edifying. Furthermore, That no Preacher ſhall rage or rail in his Sermon, but coldly, diſcreetly, and charitably, open, declare and ſet forth the excellency of Vertue, and to ſuppreſs the abomination of Sin and Vice; every Preacher ſhall, if time and occaſion will ſerve, inſtruct and teach his Audience, what Prayer is uſed in the Church that day, and for what thing the Church prayeth, ſpecially that day, to the intent that all the People may pray together with one Heart for the ſame; and as occaſion will ſerve, to ſhew and declare to the People what the Sacraments ſignifieth, what ſtrength and efficacy they be of, how every Man ſhould uſe them reverently and devoutly at the receiving them. And to declare wherefore the Maſs is ſo highly to be eſteemed and honoured, with all the Circumſtances appertaining to the ſame. Let every Preacher beware that he do not feed his Audience with any Fable, or other Hiſtories, other than he can avouch and juſtify to be written by ſome allowed Writer. And when he hath done all that he will ſay and utter for that time, he ſhall then in few words recite again the Pith and Effect of his whole Sermon, and add thereunto as he ſhall think good.

Item; That no Parſon, Vicar, Curat, or other Prieſt, having Cure of Souls within my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction, ſhall from henceforth permit, ſuffer, or admit any manner of Perſon, of whatſoever eſtate or condition he be, under the degree of a Biſhop, to preach, or make any Sermon or Collation openly to the People within their Churches, Chappels, or elſewhere within their Cures, unleſs he that ſhall ſo preach have obtained before ſpecial Licenſe in that behalf, of our Soveraign Lord the King, or of me Edmund Biſhop of London, your Ordinary; And the ſame Licenſe ſo obtained, ſhall then and there really bring forth in writing under Seal, and ſhew the ſame to the ſaid Parſon, Vicar, Curat, or Prieſt, before the beginning of his Sermon, as they will avoid the extream Penalties of the Laws, Statutes, and Ordinances, provided and eſtabliſhed in that behalf, if they preſumptuouſly do or attempt any thing to the contrary.

Item; I deſire, require, exhort, and command you, and every of you, in the Name of God, That ye firmly, faithfully, and diligently, to the uttermoſt of your powers, do obſerve, fulfil, and keep all and ſingular theſe mine Injunctions. And that ye, and every of you, being Prieſts, Prieſts, and having cure, or not cure, as well Benefice as not Benificed, within my Dioceſs and Juriſdiction, do procure to have a copy of the ſame Injunctions, to the intent ye may the better obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved the contents thereof.

XXVIII. A Mandate for publiſhing and uſing the Prayers in the Engliſh Tongue.

Mandatum Domino Epiſcopo London. direct: pro publicatione Regiarum Injunctionum.

Regiſter, Bonner. Fol. 48.

MOſt Reverend Father in God, right truſty and right well beloved, we greet you well, and let you wit, That calling to our remembrance the miſerable State of all Chriſtendom, being at this preſent, beſides all other troubles, ſo plagued with moſt cruel Wars, Hatred, and Diſſentions, as no place of the ſame almoſt (being the whole reduced to a very narrow Corner) remaineth in good Peace, Agreement, and Concord; the Help and Remedy whereof far exceeding the Power of any Man, muſt be called for of him who only is able to grant our Petitions, and never forſaketh nor repealeth any that firmly believe, and faithfully call on him; unto whom alſo the example of Scripture encourageth us, in all theſe and other our Troubles and Neceſſities, to fly and to cry for Aid and Succour; being therefore reſolved to have continually from henceforth general Proceſſions, in all Cities, Towns, Churches, and Pariſhes of this our Realm, ſaid and ſung, with ſuch reverence and devotion as appertaineth. Foraſmuch as heretofore the People, partly for lack of good Inſtruction and Calling, and partly for that they underſtood no part of ſuch Prayers or Suffrages as were uſed to be ſung and ſaid, have uſed to come very ſlackly to the Proceſſion, when the ſame have been commanded heretofore; We have ſet forth certain godly Prayers and Suffrages in our Native Engliſh Tongue, which we ſend you herewith, ſignifying unto you, That for the ſpecial truſt and confidence we have of your godly mind, and earneſt deſire, to the ſetting forward of the Glory of God, and the true worſhipping of his moſt Holy Name, within that Province committed by us unto you, we have ſent unto you theſe Suffrages, not to be for a month or two obſerved, and after ſlenderly conſidered, as other our Injunctions have to our no little marvel, been uſed; but to the intent that as well the ſame, as other our Injunctions, may be earneſtly ſet forth by preaching good Exhortations and otherwiſe to the People, in ſuch ſort as they feeling the godly taſt thereof, may godly and joyouſly, with thanks, receive, embrace, and frequent the ſame, as appertaineth. Wherefore we will and command you, as you will anſwer unto us for the contrary, not only to cauſe theſe Prayers and Suffrages aforeſaid to be publiſhed, frequented, and openly uſed in all Towns, Churches, Villages, and Pariſhes of your own Dioceſs, but alſo to ſignify this our Pleaſure, unto all other Biſhops of your Province, willing and commanding them in our Name, and by virtue hereof, to do and execute the ſame accordingly. Unto whoſe Proceedings, in the execution of this our Commandment, we will that you have a ſpecial reſpect, and make report unto us, if any ſhall not with good dexterity accompliſh the ſame; not failing, as our ſpecial truſt is in you.

At St. James's, Junii—Regni 36. Directed to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury.

XXIX. The Articles acknowledged by Shaxton, late Bp. of Sarum.

THe Firſt; Almighty God by the Power of his Word, pronounced by the Prieſt at Maſs in the Conſecration, turneth the Bread and Wine, into the natural Body and Blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; ſo that after the Conſecration, there remaineth no Subſtance of Bread and Wine, but only the Subſtance of Chriſt, God and Man. Regiſt. Bonner. Fol. 100.

The Second; The ſaid Bleſſed Sacrament, being once Conſecrate, is and remaineth ſtill the very Body and Blood of our Saviour Chriſt, although it be reſerved, and not preſently diſtributed.

The Third; The ſame Bleſſed Sacrament being conſecrate, is and ought to be worſhipped and adored with godly honour wherſoever it is, foraſmuch as it is the Body of Chriſt inſeparably united to the Deity.

The Fourth; The Church, by the Miniſtration of the Prieſt, offereth daily at the Maſs for a Sacrifice to Almighty God, the ſelf ſame Body and Blood of our Saviour Chriſt, under the form of Bread and Wine, in the remembrance and repreſentation of Chriſt's Death and Paſſion.

The Fifth; The ſame Body and Blood which is offered in the Maſs, is the very propitiation and ſatisfaction for the ſins of the World; foraſmuch as it is the ſelf-ſame in Subſtance which was offered upon the Croſs for our Redemption: And the Oblation and Action of the Prieſt is alſo a Sacrifice of Praiſe and Thankſgiving unto God for his Benefits, and not the satisfaction for the Sins of the World, for that is only to be attributed to Christ's Passion.

The Sixth; The said Oblation, or Sacrifice, so by the Priest offered in the Mass, is available and profitable both for the Quick and the Dead, altho it lieth not in the power of Man to limit how much, or in what measure the same doth avail.

The Seventh; It is not a thing of necessity, that the Sacrament of the Altar should be ministred unto the People under both kinds of Bread and Wine: and it is none abuse that the same be ministred to the People under the one kind; forasmuch as in every of both the kinds, whole Christ, both Body and Blood is contained.

The Eighth; It is no derogation to the vertue of the Mass, altho the Priest do receive the Sacrament alone, and none other receive it with him.

The Ninth; The Mass used in this Realm of England, is agreable to the institution of Christ; and we have in this Church of England, the very true Sacrament, which is the very Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ, under the form of Bread and Wine.

The Tenth; The Church of Christ hath, doth, and may lawfully order some Priests to be Ministers of the Sacraments, altho the same do not preach, nor be not admitted thereunto.

The Eleventh; Priests being once dedicated unto God by the Order of Priesthood, and all such Men and Women as have advisedly made Vows unto God of Chastity or Widowhood, may not lawfully marry, after their said Orders received, or Vows made.

The Twelfth; Secret auricular Confession is expedient and necessary to be retained, continued, and frequented in the Church of Christ.

The Thirteenth; The Prescience and Predestination of Almighty God, altho in it self it be infallible, induceth no necessity to the Action of Man, but that he may freely use the Power of his own Will or Choice, the said Prescience or Predestination notwithstanding.

I Nicholas Shaxton, with my Heart, do believe, and with my Mouth do confess all these Articles above-written to be true in every part.

Ne despicias hominem avertentem se a peccato, neque improperes ei: memento quoniam omnes in corruptione sumus, Eccles. 8.

XXX. Leth-

XXX. A Letter written by Lethington the Secretary of Scotland, to Sir William Cecil, the Queen of England's Secretary, touching the Title of the Queen of Scots to the Crown of England : By which it appears that K. Henry's Will was not ſigned by him.

I Cannot be ignorant that ſome do object as to her Majeſty's Forreign Birth, and hereby think to make her incapable of the Inheritance of England. To that you know for Anſwer what may be ſaid by an Engliſh Patron of my Miſtriſs's Cauſe, altho I being a Scot will not affirm the ſame, that there ariſeth amongſt you a Queſtion, Whether the Realm of Scotland be forth of the Homage and Leageance of England? And therefore you have in ſundry Proclamations preceding your Wars making, and in ſundry Books at ſundry times, laboured much to prove the Homage and Fealty of Scotland to England. Your Stories alſo be not void of this intent. What the judgment of the Fathers of your Law is, and what commonly is thought in this Matter, you know better than I, and may have better intelligence than I, the Argument being fitter for your Aſſertion than mine. Ex M. SS. D. G. Peryt.

Another Queſtion there is alſo upon this Objection of Forreign Birth; that is to ſay, Whether Princes inheritable to the Crown, be in caſe of the Crown, exempted or concluded as private Perſons, being Strangers born forth of the Allegiance of England. You know in this caſe, as divers others, the State of the Crown: the Perſons inheritable to the Crown at the time of their Capacity, have divers differences and prerogatives from other Perſons; many Laws made for other Perſons take no hold in caſe of the Prince, and they have ſuch Priviledges as other perſons enjoy not; as in caſes of Attainders, and other Penal Laws: Examples, Hen. 7. who being a Subject, was attainted; and Ed. 4. and his Father Richard Plantagenet were both attainted; all which notwithſtanding their Attainders had right to the Crown, and two of them attained the ſame. Amongſt many Reaſons to be ſhewed, both for the differences, and that Forreign Birth doth not take place in the caſe of the Crown, as in common perſons, the many experiences before the Conqueſt, and ſince, of your King's, do plainly teſtify. 2. Of purpoſe I will name unto you, Hen. 2d. Maud the Empreſs Son, and Richard of Bourdeaux the Black Princes Son, the rather for that neither of the two was the King of England's Son, and ſo not Enfant du Roy, if the word be taken in this ſtrict ſignification. And for the better proof, that it was always the common Law of your Realm, that in the caſe of the Crown, Forreign Birth was no Bar; You do remember the words of the Stat. 25 Ed. 3. where it is ſaid, the Law was ever ſo: Whereupon if you can remember it, you and I fell out at a reaſoning in my Lord of Leiceſter's Chamber, by the occaſion of the Abridgment of Raſtal, wherein I did ſhew you ſomewhat to this purpoſe; alſo theſe words, Infant and Anceſtors be in Prædicamento ad aliquid, and ſo Correlatives in ſuch ſort, as the meaning of the Law was not to reſtrain the underſtanding of this word Infant, ſo ſtrict as only to the Children of the King's Body, but to others inheritable in remainder; and if ſome Sophiſters will needs cavil about the preciſe underſtanding of Infant, let them be anſwered with the ſcope of this word Anceſtors in all Proviſions, for Filii, Nepotes and Liberi, you may ſee there was no difference betwixt the firſt degree, and theſe that come after by the Civil Law. Liberorum appellatione comprehenduntur non ſolum Filii, verum etiam Nepotes, Pronepotes, Abnepotes, &c. If you examine the Reaſon why Forreign Birth is excluded, you may ſee that it was not ſo needful in Princes caſes, as in common Perſons. Moreover, I know that England hath oftentime married with Daughters, and married with the greateſt Forreign Princes of Europe. And ſo I do alſo underſtand, that they all did repute the Children of them, and of the Daughters of England, inheritable in Succeſſion to that Crown, notwithſtanding the Forreign birth of their Iſſue: And in this caſe I do appeal to all Chronicles, to their Contracts of Marriages, and to the opinion of all the Princes of Chriſtendom. For tho England be a noble and puiſſant Country, the reſpect of the Alliance only, and the Dowry, hath not moved the great Princes to match ſo often in marriage, but the poſſibility of the Crown in ſucceſſion. I cannot be ignorant altogether in this Matter, conſidering that I ſerve my Sovereign in the room that you ſerve yours. The Contract of Marriage is extant betwixt the King, my Miſtris's Grandfather, and Queen Margaret, Daughter to King Henry the 7th, by whoſe Perſon the Title is devolved on my Sovereign; what her Father's meaning was in beſtowing of her, the World knoweth, by that which is contained in the Chronicles written by Polidorus Virgilius, before (as I think) either you or I was born; at leaſt when it was little thought that this Matter ſhould come in queſtion. There is another Exception alſo laid againſt my Soveraign, which ſeems at the firſt to be of ſome weight, grounded upon ſome Statutes made in King Hen. 8. time, (viz.) of the 28th & 35th of his Reign, whereby full Power and Authority was given him the ſaid King Henry, to give, diſpoſe, appoint, aſſign, declare, and limit, by his Letters Patents under his Great Seal, or elſe by his laſt Will made in writing, and ſigned with his hand at his pleaſure, from time to time thereafter the Imperial Crown of that Realm, &c. Which Imperial Crown is by ſome alledged and conſtantly affirmed to have been limited and diſpoſed, by the laſt Will and Teſtament of the ſaid King Hen. 8. ſigned with his Hand before his Death unto the Children of the Lady Francis; and Elenor, Daughter to Mary the French Queen, Younger Daughter of Hen. 7. and of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk; ſo as it is thought the Queen, my Soveraign, and all others, by courſe of Inheritance, be by theſe Circumſtances excluded, and fore cloſed: So as it does well become all Subjects, ſuch as I am, ſo my liking is, to ſpeak of Princes, of their Reigns and Proceedings modeſtly, and with reſpect; yet I cannot abſtain to ſay, that the Chronicles and Hiſtories of that Age, and your own printed Statutes being extant, do contaminate and diſgrace greatly the Reign of that King in that Time. But to come to our purpoſe, what equity and juſtice was that to diſinherit a Race of Forreign Princes of their poſſibility, and maternal right, by a municipal Law or Statute made in that, which ſome would term abrupt time, and ſay, that that would rule the Roaſt, yea, and to exclude the right Heirs from their Title, without calling them to anſwer, or any for them: well, it may be ſaid, that the injury of the time, and the indirect dealing is not to be allowed; but ſince it is done it cannot be avoided, unleſs ſome Circumſtances material do annihilate the ſaid limitation and diſpoſition of the Crown.

Now let us examine the manner and circumſtances how King Hen.8. was by Statute inabled to diſpoſe the Crown. There is a form in two ſorts preſcribed him, which he may not tranſgreſs, that is to ſay, either by his Letter Patents, ſealed with his Great Seal, or by his laſt Will, ſigned with his Hand: for in this extraordinary caſe he was held to an ordinary and preciſe form; which being not obſerved, the Letters Patents, or Will, cannot work the intent or effect ſuppoſed. And to diſprove, that the Will was ſigned with his own Hand; You know, that long before his death he never uſed his own ſigning with his own Hand; and in the time of his Sickneſs, being divers times preſſed to put his Hand to the Will written, he refuſed to do it. And it ſeemed God would not ſuffer him to proceed in an Act ſo injurious and prejudical to the right Heir of the Crown, being his Niece. Then his death approaching, ſome as well known to you as to me, cauſed William Clarke, ſometimes Servant to Thomas Henneage, to ſign the ſuppoſed Will with a ſtamp, (for otherwiſe ſigned it was never); and yet notwithſtanding ſome reſpecting more the ſatisfaction of their Ambition, and others their private Commodity, than juſt and upright dealing, procured divers honeſt Gentlemen, attending in divers ſeveral Rooms about the King's Perſon, to teſtify with their Hand writings the Contents of the ſaid pretended Will, ſurmiſed to be ſigned with the King's own Hand. To prove this diſſembled and forged ſigned Teſtament, I do refer you to ſuch Trials as be yet left. Firſt; The Atteſtation of the late Lord Paget, publiſhed in the Parliament in Queen Mary's Time, for the reſtitution of the Duke of Norfolk. Next, I pray you, on my Soveraign's behalf, that the Depoſitions may be taken in this Matter of the Marqueſs of Wincheſter, Lord Treaſurer of England; the Marqueſs of Northampton, the Earl of Pembroke, Sir William Petre then one of King Henry's Secretaries, Sir Henry Nevell, Sir Maurice Barkley, Doctor Buts, Edmond Harman Baker, John Osborn Groom of the Chamber, Sir Anthony Dennis, if he be living, Terris the Chirurgion, and ſuch as have heard David Vincent and others ſpeak in this caſe; and that their Atteſtations may be enrolled in the Chancery, and in the Arches, In perpetuam rei memoriam.

Thirdly; I do refer you to the Original Will ſurmiſed to be ſigned with the King's own Hand, that thereby it may moſt clearly and evidently appear by ſome differences, how the ſame was not ſigned with the King's Hand, but ſtamped as aforeſaid. And albeit it is uſed both as an Argument and Calumniation againſt my Sovereign to ſome, that the ſaid Original hath been embezelled in Queen Mary's Time, I truſt God will and hath reſerved the ſame to be an Inſtrument to relieve the Truth, and to confound falſe Surmiſes, that thereby the Right may take place, notwithſtanding the many Exemplifications and Tranſcripts, which being ſealed with the great Seal, do run abroad in England, and do carry away many Mens minds, as great preſumptions of great verity and validity. But, Sir, you know in caſes of leſs importance, that the whole Realm of England, Tranſcripts and Exemplifications be not of ſo great force in Law to ſerve for the recovery of any thing, either real or perſonal: And in as much as my Soveraign's Title in this caſe ſhall be little advanced; advanced, by taking exceptions to others pretended and craſted Titles, conſidering her precedency, I will leave it to ſuch as are to claim after the iſſue of Hen. the 7th, to lay in Bar the Poligamy of Charles Brandon the Duke of Suffolk; and alſo the vitiated and clandeſtine Contract, (if it may be ſo called) having no witneſs nor ſolemnization of Chriſtian Matrimony, nor any lawful matching of the Earl of Hartford and the Lady Katharine. Laſtly; The ſemblably compelling of Mr. Kay, and the Lady Mary Siſter to the Lady Katherine.

And now, Sir, I have, to anſwer your deſire, ſaid ſomewhat briefly to the Matter, which indeed is very little, where ſo much may be ſaid; for to ſpeak truly, the Cauſe ſpeaketh for it ſelf. I have ſo long forborn to deal in this Matter, that I have almoſt forgotten many things which may be ſaid for Roboration of her Right, which I can ſhortly reduce to my Remembrance, being at Edinburgh where my Notes are: So that if you be not by this ſatisfied, upon knowledg from you of any other Objection, I hope to ſatisfy you unto all things may be ſaid againſt her. In the mean time I pray you ſo counſel the Queen, your Soveraign, as ſome effectual reparation may follow without delay, of the many and ſundry traverſes and diſfavourings committed againſt the Queen, my Soveraign: as the publiſhing of ſo many exemplifications of King Henry's ſuppoſed Will, the ſecret embracing of John Halles Books, the Books printed and not avowed the laſt Summer, one of the which my Miſtreſs hath ſent by Henry Killigrew to the Queen your Soveraign; The Diſputes and Proceedings of Lincolns-Inn, where the Caſe was ruled againſt the Queen my Soveraign; the Speeches of ſundry in this laſt Seſſion of Parliament, tending all to my Soveraign's derision, and nothing ſaid to the contrary by any Man, but the Matter ſhut up with ſilence, moſt to her prejudice; and by ſo much the more as every Man is gone home ſetled and confirmed in his Error. And, laſtly, The Queen, your Soveraign's Reſolution to defend now by Proclamations, all Books and Writings containing any diſcuſſion of Titles when the whole Realm hath engendred by theſe fond Proceedings, and other favoured Practiſes, a ſetled Opinion againſt my Soveraigns, to the advancement of my Lady Katherine's Title. I might alſo ſpeak of another Book lately printed and ſet abroad in this laſt Seſſion, containing many Untruths and weak Reaſons, which Mr. Wailing deſired might be anſwered before the Defence were made by Proclamation. I truſt you will ſo hold hand to the Reformation of all theſe things, as the Queen my Soveraign, may have effectual occaſion to eſteem you her Friend; which doing, you ſhall never offend the Queen your Miſtreſs, your Country, nor Conſcience, but be a favourer of the Truth againſt Errors, and yet deſerve well of a Princeſs, who hath a good heart to recognize any good turn, when it is done her, and may hereafter have means to do you pleaſure. For my particular, as I have always honoured you as my Father, ſo do I ſtill remain of the ſame mind, as one, whom in all things not touching the State, you may direct, as your Son Thomas Cecil, and with my hearty commendations to you, and my Lady, both, I take my leave. Concerning some of the

Errors and Falshoods

OF THE English Schism.

An Appendix.

THoſe who intend to write Romances, or Plays, do commonly take their Plot from ſome true Piece of Hiſtory; in which they faſten ſuch Characters to Perſons and Things, and mix ſuch Circumſtances and ſecret Paſſages, with thoſe publick Tranſactions and Changes, that are in other Hiſtories; as may more artificially raiſe thoſe Paſſions and Affections in their Readers minds, which they intend to move, than could poſſibly be done, if the whole Story were a meer Fiction and Contrivance: and tho all Men know thoſe tender Paſſages to flow only from the Invention and Fancy of the Poet; yet, by I know not what Charm, the greateſt part that read or hear their Poems, are ſoftned and ſenſibly touched.

Some ſuch Deſign Sanders ſeems to have had in his Book, which he very wiſely kept up as long as he lived: He intended to repreſent the Reformation in the fouleſt ſhape that was poſſible, to defame Queen Elizabeth, to ſtain her Blood, and thereby to bring her Title to the Crown in queſtion; and to magnify the Authority of the See of Rome, and celebrate Monaſtick Orders, with all the praiſes and high characters he could deviſe: And therefore after he had writ ſeveral Books on theſe Subjects, without any conſiderable ſucceſs; they being all rather filled with foul Calumnies and detracting Malice, than good Arguments, or ſtrong ſence, he reſolved to try his skill another way; ſo he intended to tell a doleful Tale, which ſhould raiſe a deteſtation of Hereſy, an ill Opinion of the Queen, caſt a ſtain on her Blood, and diſparage her Title, and advance the honour of the Papacy. A Tragedy was fitter for theſe ends, ſince it left the deepeſt impreſſions on the graver and better affections of the Mind; the Scene muſt be laid in England and King Henry the Eighth and his three Children, with the Changes that were in their Times, ſeemed to afford very plentiful Matter for a Man of Wit and Fancy, who knew where he could dextrouſly ſhew his Art; and had boldneſs enough to do it without ſhame, or the reverence due, either to crowned Heads, or to Perſons that were dead. Yet becauſe he knew not how he could hold up his Face to the World, after theſe Diſcoveries were made, which he had reaſon to expect, this was concealed as long as he lived: and after he had died for his Faith (that is, in Rebellion, which I ſhall ſhew is the Faith in his Stile) this Work of his was publiſhed. The ſtile is generally clean, and things are told in an eaſy and pleaſant way; only he could not uſe his Art ſo decently, as to reſtrain that Malice which boiled in his Breaſt, and often fermented out too palpably in his Pen.

The Book ſerved many Ends well, and ſo was generally much cried up, by Men who had been long accuſtomed to commend any thing that was uſeful to them, without troubling themſelves with thoſe impertinent Queſtions, whether they were true or falſe; yet Riſhton, and others ſince that time, took the Pencil again in their hands, and finding there were many Touches wanting, which would give much life to the whole Piece, have ſo changed it, that it was afterwards reprinted, not only with a large Continuation, that was writ by a much more unskilful Poet, but with ſo many and great Additions, ſcattered through the whole Work, whereby it ſeemed ſo changed in the vamping, that it looked new.

If any will give themſelves the trouble, to compare his Fable with the Hiſtory that I have written, and the certain undoubted Authorities I bring in confirmation of what I aſſert, with the ſlender, and (for the moſt part) no Authorities, he brings, they will ſoon be able to diſcern where the Truth lies: But becauſe all People have not the leiſure or opportunities for laying things ſo critically together, I was adviſed, by thoſe whoſe Counſels directed me in this whole Work, to ſum up, in an Appendix, the moſt conſiderable Falſhoods and Miſtakes of that Book, with the Evidences upon which I rejected them. Therefore I have drawn out the following Extraction, which conſiſts of Errors of two ſorts. The one is, of thoſe in which there is indeed no malice, yet they ſhew the Writer had no true information of our Affairs, but commits many Faults, which tho they leave not ſuch foul immputations on the Author, yet tend very much to diſparage and diſcredit his Work. But the others are of an higher guilt, being deſigned Forgeries to ſerve partial Ends; not only without any Authority, but manifeſtly contrary to Truth, and to ſuch Records as (in ſpite of all the care they took in Q. Mary's Time by deſtroying them, to condemn Poſterity to Ignorance in theſe Matters) are yet reſerved, and ſerve to diſcover the falſhood of thoſe Calumnies in which they have traded ſo long. I ſhall purſue theſe Errors in the ſeries in which they are delivered in Sanders his Book, according to the Impreſſion at Colen 1628, which is that I have. I firſt ſet down his Errors, and then a ſhort confutation of them, referring the Reader for fuller information to the foregoing Hiſtory.

Page 2. 1. Sanders ſays; 'That when Prince Arthur and his Princeſs were 'bedded, King Henry the 7*th* ordered a grave Matron to lie in the Bed, 'that ſo they might not conſummate their Marriage.

This is the ground-work of the whole Fable; and ſhould have been ſome-way or other proved. But if we do not take ſo ſmall a Circumſtance upon his word, we treat him rudely; and who will write Hiſtories, if they be bound to ſay nothing but Truth! But little thought our Author that there were three Depoſitions upon Record, point blank againſt this: for the Dutcheſs of Norfolk, the Viſcount of Fitzwater and his Lady, depoſed they ſaw them bedded together, and the Bed bleſſed after they two were put in it; beſides that ſuch an extravagant thing was never known done in any place.

Ibid. 2. Sanders ſays; 'Prince Arthur was not then fifteen Years of Age, 'and was ſick of a lingring Diſeaſe.

The Plot goes on but ſcurvily, when the next thing that is brought to confirm it, is contradicted by Records. Prince Arthur was born the 20*th* of September, in the Year 1486, and ſo was 15 Years old and two months months passed at the 14*th* of November 1501, in which he was married to the Princess, and was then of a lively and good Complexion, and did not begin to decay till the Shrovetide following, which was imputed to his Excesses in the Bed, as the Witnesses depose.

3. He says; 'Upon the motion for the marrying of his Brother Ibid. 'Henry to the Princess, it was agreed to by all, that the thing was lawful.

It was perhaps agreed on at Rome, where Mony and other political Arts sway their Counsels; but it was not agreed to in England: for which we have no meaner Authority, than Warham Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who, when examined upon Oath, deposed that himself then thought the Marriage was not honourable, nor well-pleasing to God, and that he had thereupon opposed it much, and that the People murmured at it.

4. He says; 'There was not one Man in any Nation under Heaven, Page 3. 'or in the whole Church, that spake against it.

The common Stile of the Roman Church, calling the See of Rome the Catholick Church, must be applyed to this, to bring off our Author; otherwise I know not how to save his Reputation. Therefore by all the Nations under Heaven must be understood only the Divines at Rome, tho when it came to be examined, they could scarce find any who would justify it: all the most famous Universities, Divines, and Canonists, condemned it, and Warham's Testimony contradicts this plainly, besides the other great Authorities that were brought against it, for which see lib. 2. from pag. 91. to pag. 103.

5. 'The King once said, He would not marry the Queen.

Here is a pretty Essay of our Author's Art, who would make us think Page 4. it was only in a transient Discourse, that the King said he would not marry Queen Katherine; but this was more maturely done, by a solemn Protestation, which he read himself before the Bishop of Winchester, that he would never marry her, and that he revoked his consent given under Age. This was done when he came to be of Age, see pag. 36. it is also confessed by Sanders himself.

6. He says; 'The Queen bore him three Sons and two Daughters. Ibid.

All the Books of that time speak only of two Sons, and one Daughter; but this is a flourish of his Pen to represent her a fruitful Mother.

7. He says; 'The King had sometimes two, sometimes three Con- Page 5. 'cubines at once.

It does not appear he had ever any but Elizabeth Blunt; and if we judge of his Life, by the Letters the Popes wrote to him, and many printed Elogies that were published then, he was a Prince of great Piety and Religion all that while.

8. He says; 'The Lady Mary was first desired in marriage by James Page 6. 'the 5*th* of Scotland, then by Charles the 5*th* the Emperor; and then 'Francis asked her, first for the Dolphin, then for the Duke of Orleance, 'and last of all for himself.

But all this is wrong placed, for she was first contracted to the Dolphin, then to the Emperor, and then treated about to the King of Scotland; after that it was left to Francis his choice, whether she should be married to himself, or his second Son the Duke of Orleance: So little did our Poet know the publick Transactions of that Time.

Ibid. 9. He says; 'She was in the end contracted to the Dolphin: From 'whence he concludes, that all Forreign Princes were satisfied with the 'lawfulness of the Marriage.

She was first of all contracted to the Dolphin. Forreign Princes were so little satisfied of the lawfulness of the Marriage, that tho she being Heir to the Crown of England, was a Match of great Advantage; yet their Counsellors excepted to it, on that very account, that the Marriage was not good. This was done in Spain, and she was rejected, as a Writer who lived in that time informs us; and Sanders confesses it was done by the French Ambassador.

Page 7. 10. He says; 'Wolsey was first Bishop of Lincoln, then of Duresme, 'after that of Winchester, and last of all Arch-Bishop of York; after 'that he was made Chancellor, then Cardinal and Legate.

The order of these Preferments is quite reversed; for Wolsey soon after he was made Bishop of Lincoln, upon Cardinal Bembridge his Death, was not only promoted to the See of York, but advanced to be a Cardinal in the 7th Year of the King's Reign: And some months after that he was made Lord Chancellor; and seven Years after that, he got the Bishoprick of Duresme, which six Years after he exchanged for Winchester. He had heard perhaps that he enjoyed all these Preferments; but knowing nothing of our Affairs beyond hearsay, he resolved to make him rise as Poets order their Heroes, by degrees, and therefore ranks his Advancement not according to Truth, but in the method he liked best himself.

Page 8. 11. He says; 'Wolsey first designed the Divorce, and made Longland 'that was the King's Confessor, second his motion for it.

The King not only denied this in publick, saying, That he himself had first moved it to Longland in Confession; and that Wolsey had opposed it all he could: but in private discourse with Grinæus, told him, he had laboured under these Scruples for seven Years; Septem perpetuis Annis trepidatio. Which reckoning from the Year 1531, in which Grinæus wrote this to one of his Friends, will fall back to the Year 1524, long before Wolsey had any provocation to tempt him to it.

Page 9. 12. He says; 'In the Year 1529, in which the King was first made 'to doubt of his Marriage, he was resolved then whom to marry when 'he was once divorced.

But by his other Story, Ann Boleyn was then but fifteen Years old, and went to France at that Age, where she staied a considerable Time before she came to the Court of England.

Ibid. 13. He says; 'The King spent a Year in a private search, to see what 'could be found, either in the Scriptures, or the Popes Bull, to be made

'use

'uſe of againſt his Marriage; but they could find nothing.

In that time all the Biſhops of England, except Fiſher, declared under their Hands and Seals, that they thought the Marriage unlawful; for which ſee pag. 38. and upon what Reaſons this was rounded, has been clearly opened, pag. 97.

14. He ſays; 'If there were any ambiguities in the Pope's firſt Let- Ibid.
'ters (meaning the Bull, for diſpenſing with the Marriage) they were 'cleared by other Letters, which Ferdinand of Spain had afterwards
'procured.

Theſe other Letters (by which he means the Breve) bear date the ſame day with the Bull; and ſo were not procured afterwards. There were indeed violent preſumptions of their being forged long after, even after the Proceſs had been almoſt a Year in agitation. But tho they helped the matter in ſome leſſer Particulars, yet in the main Buſineſs, Whether Prince Arthur did know his Princeſs, they did it a great prejudice; for whereas the Bull bore, that by the Queens Petition her former Marriage was perhaps conſummated, the Breve bears that in her Petition, the Marriage was ſaid to be conſummated, without any perhaps.

15. He ſays; 'The King having ſeen theſe ſecond Letters, both he Ibid.
'and his Council reſolved to move no more in it.

The Proceſs was carried on, almoſt a Year, before the Breve was heard of: and the Forgery of it ſoon appeared, ſo they went on notwithſtanding it.

16. He ſays; 'The Biſhop of Tarby being come from France, to con- Page 10.
'clude the Match for the Lady Mary, was ſet on by the King and the 'Cardinal, to move exception to the Lawfulneſs of the Marriage.

There is no reaſon to believe this; for that Biſhop, tho afterwards made a Cardinal, never publiſhed this: which both he ought to have done as a good Catholick, and certainly would have done as a true Cardinal, when he ſaw what followed upon it, and perceived that he was trepanned to be the firſt mover of a thing, which ended ſo fatally for the intereſts of Rome.

17. He ſays; 'The Biſhop of Tarby, in a Speech before the King in Page 11.
'Council, ſaid, That not he alone, but almoſt all learned Men, thought
'the King's Marriage unlawful and null: ſo that he was freed from the 'Bond of it, and that it was againſt the Rules of the Goſpel; and that 'all Forreign Nations had ever ſpoken very freely of it, lamenting that
'the King was drawn into it in his Youth.

It is not ordinary for Ambaſſadors to make Speeches in King's Councils: But if this be true, it agrees ill with what this Author delivers in his third Page, That there was not a Man in the whole Church, nor under Heaven, that ſpoke againſt it, otherwiſe the Biſhop of Tarby was both an impudent and a fooliſh Man.

18. He ſays; 'Upon the Pope's Captivity, Wolſey was ſent over to Page 13.
'France with 300000 Crowns to procure the Pope's liberty.

Hall,

Hall, Hollingshead and Stow say, He carried over 240000 pounds Sterlin, which is more than thrice that sum.

Ibid. 19. He says; 'Two Colleagues were sent in this Ambassy with the 'Cardinal.

His greatness was above that, and none are mentioned in the Records.

Ibid. 20. He says; 'Orders followed him to Callais, not to move any 'thing about the King's Marriage with the French King's Sister, the 'King having then resolved to marry Ann Boleyn.

This agrees ill with what he said pag. 9. that a Year before the King was resolved whom to marry.

Ibid. 21. He says; 'King Henry, that he might have freer access to Sir Tho- 'mas Boleyn's Lady, sent him to France; where after he had stayed two 'Years, his Lady was with Child of Ann Boleyn by the King.

This Story was already confuted, see pag. 41, 42. And in it there are more than one or two lies.

1. Sir Thomas Boleyn went not Ambassador to France till the 7th Year of the King's Reign: And if two Years after that, Ann was born, which was the 9th of his Reign, she must then have been but ten Years old at this time.

2. Tho he had sent him upon his first coming to the Crown, this could not be true; for two Years after, admit her to be born, that is Anno 1511, then a Year before this, which was Anno 1526, she was fifteen Years old; in which Age, Sanders says, she was corrupted in her Fathers House, and sent over to France, where she staid long. But all this is false: For,

3. She was born two Years before the King came to the Crown, in the Year 1507. and if her Father was sent to France two Years before, it was in the Year 1505.

4. The King being then Prince, was but fourteen Years old, for he was born the 28th of June, in the Year 1491: in which Age there is no reason to think he was so forward as to be corrupting other Mens Wives, for they will not allow his Brother, when almost two Years elder, to have known his own Wife.

As for the other pieces of this Story, that Sir Thomas Boleyn did sue his Lady in the Spiritual Court; that upon the King's sending him word that she was with Child by him, he passed it over; that the King had also known her Sister, and that she had owned it to the Queen, that at the fifteenth Year of Ann's Age, she had prostituted her self both to her Fathers Butler, and Chaplain; that then she was sent to France, where she was at first for some time concealed, then brought to Court, where she was so notoriously lewd, that she was called an Hackney; that she afterwards was kept by the French King; that when she came over into England, Sir Thomas Wiat was admitted to base Privacies with her, and offered to the King and his Council, that he himself should with his own Eyes see it: And in fine, that she was ugly, mishaped, and monstrous, are such an heap of impudent Lyes, that none but a Fool, as well as a Knave, would venture on such a recital. And for all this, this, he cites no other Authority but Raſtal's Life of Sir Thomas More, a Book that was ſeen by none but himſelf; and he gives no other evidence that there was any ſuch Book, but his own Authority. Nor is it likely that Raſtal ever writ More's Life, ſince he did not ſet it out with his Works which he publiſhed in one Volume, Anno 1556. It is true, More's Son-in-Law, Roper, writ his Life, which is ſince printed, but there is no ſuch Story in it. The whole is ſuch a piece of lying, as if he who forged it, had reſolved to out-do all who had ever gone before him: for can it be ſo much as imagined, that a King could purſue a Deſign for ſeven Years together, of marrying a Woman of ſo ſcandalous a Life, and ſo diſagreeable a Perſon; and that he who was always in the other extream of Jealouſy, did never try out theſe Reports, and would not ſo much as ſee what Wiat informed? Nor were theſe things publiſhed in the Libels that were printed at that time, either in the Emperor's Court, or at Rome. All which ſhew that this was a deſperate Contrivance of Malicious Traitors, againſt their Soveraign Queen Elizabeth, to defame and diſgrace her. And this I take to be the true reaſon why none made any full anſwer to this Book all her Time. It was not thought for the Queen's Honour to let ſuch Stuff be ſo much conſidered as to merit an Anſwer. So that the 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18, pages, are one continued Lye.

22. He ſays; 'Sir Thomas Boleyn hearing the King intended to marry 'his ſuppoſed Daughter, came over in all haſte from France, to put 'him in mind that ſhe was his own Child; and that the King bade him 'hold his peace for a Fool, for an hundred had lien with his Wife as well 'as he, but whoſe ſoever Daughter ſhe was, ſhe ſhould be his Wife: 'and upon that Sir Thomas inſtructed his Daugther how ſhe ſhould hold 'the King in her toils. Page 16.

Sir Thomas muſt have thought the King had an ill Memory, if he had forgot ſuch a Story: but the one part of this makes him afraid that the King ſhould marry his Daughter, and the other part makes him afraid they ſhould miſs their hopes in it: Not to mention how little likely it is that a King of ſuch high vanity, would have done that which the privateſt Perſon has an averſion to, I mean, the marrying the Daughter of one whom they know to be a common Proſtitute.

23. He ſays; 'Wolſey before his return from France, ſent Gambara to 'the Pope, deſiring him to name himſelf Vicar of the Papacy, during 'his captivity. Page 19.

This was not done till almoſt a Year after this: and the motion was ſent by Staphileus Dean of the Rota, for which ſee pag. 50.

24. He ſays; 'None but ill Men and ignorant Perſons wrote againſt 'the Marriage, but all learned and good Men wrote for it. Page 20.

The whole Doctors of the Church, in all Ages, were againſt it; and no Doctor, ancienter than Cajetan, could ever be found to have writ for it.

25. He ſays; 'That tho great endeavours were uſed to perſwade 'Sir Tho. More of the unlawfulneſs of the Marriage, all was in vain. Ibid.

Is

Is it probable that the King would have made him Lord Chancellor, when he was so earnest in this Business, if he had not known that he would have gone along with him in it? By one of his Letters to Cromwel out of the Tower, it appears, that he approved the Divorce, and had great hopes of success in it, as long as it was prosecuted at Rome, and founded on the defects in the Bull. And in the 22*d* Year of the King's Reign, when the Opinions of the Universities, and the Books of Learned Men were brought to England against the Marriage, he carried them down to the House of Commons, and made read them there; after which he desired they would report in their Country what they had heard and seen; and then all Men would openly perceive that the King had not attempted this Matter of his Will and Pleasure, but only for the discharge of his Conscience. More was a Man of greater Integrity than to have said this, if he had thought the Marriage good; so that he has either afterwards changed his mind, or did at this Time dissemble too artificially with the King.

Page 22. 26. After a long flourish about the King's secret fears and apprehensions, and the perplexities the Cardinal was in, which must pass for a piece of his Wit, that is to say, Lying, for he knew none of their thoughts; He says, 'That Gardiner and Sir Francis Brian were sent to 'the Pope together, Gardiner being then Secretary of State.

In this there are only three gross mistakes. First, Gardiner was not sent with the first Message to the Pope, Secretary Knight carried it.

2. Sir Francis Brian went never to Rome with Gardiner: It is true, a Year after the commencing the Suit, Sir Francis Brian was sent to Rome, and about a month after him Gardiner was also sent; so tho they were both together at Rome, yet they were not sent thither together.

3. Gardiner was not Secretary of State, but was Wolsey's Secretary when he went first to Rome, and was made a Privy Counsellor when he was sent thither the second time; and was not Secretary of State till some months after his return from his Journey the last time.

Page 23. 27. He says; 'They made the Pope believe that the Queen would 'willingly retire into a Monastery.

This was on the contrary a contrivance of the Popes, who thought it the easiest way to bring the Matter to a good issue; but in England they had no hopes of it, and so always diverted the motion when it was proposed by the Pope.

Ibid. 28. He says; 'The Pope said he would consult with some Cardinals 'and Divines, and do all that he could lawfully do to give the King 'satisfaction.'

Upon the first motion of it, the Pope frankly granted the King's desire; and gave a Bull with a Commission upon it: And only consulted some Cardinals about the methods of doing it. And did assure the King, that he would not only do every thing that could be granted in law or Justice, but whatsoever he could grant out of the fulness of his Power. It is true, afterwards when the Pope changed his Measures, and resolved to agree with the Emperor, he pretended he understood not these things himself, but would needs turn it over upon the Cardinals and Divines.

29. He

29. He says; 'All the Cardinals were of a mind that the Marriage Page 24.
'was good.

Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor, by the force of that mighty Argument of 4000 Crowns, changed his mind. All the other Cardinals were forward in granting the King's Desires, for which he wrote them a Letter of Thanks.

30. He says; 'The Pope granted the Commission to the two Le- Page 26.
'gats, not doubting but it was true that had been told him of the 'Queen's readiness to go into a Monastery.

The Pope knew she would not yield to any such thing; but when he granted that Commission, he sent with Campegio a Decretal Bull, annulling the Marriage: and sent afterwards a Promise never to avocate the Process, but to confirm what Sentence the Legats should give; tho soon after he broke his Promise most signally. And since he had often dispenced with others for breaking their Faith, he might think that it was hard to deny him the same priviledg for himself.

31. He says; 'The Pope understanding that the Queen did not con- Ibid.
'sent to the Propositions that were made, and that he had been abused,
'sent after Campegio, when he was on his Journey, that he should not
'proceed to a Sentence without a new Order.

The Pope sent Campana to England after Campegio, to assure the King he would do every thing for him that he could do out of the fulness of his Power: And ordered the same Person to charge Cardinal Campegio to burn the Decretal Bull, which he had sent by him: In all which the Pope, as appears by the Original Letters, was only governed by politick Maxims, and considered nothing but the Dangers himself was like to fall in; tho Sanders would perswade us, he was ready to run the hazard of all these.

32. He says; 'The King by his Letters to the Pope, did, at the same Page 30.
'time that he was moving Scruples about his own Marriage, transact
'about a Dispensation for a Marriage betwixt his own Natural Son
'the Duke of Richmond, and his Daughter the Lady Mary.

Tho the whole Dispatches at that time, both to and from Rome, be most happily preserved, there is not the least mention of any such design: and can any Body think, that if any such motion had been made the Pope would not have taken great Advantages from it, and that these Letters would not have been afterwards published? But this Sanders thought was a pretty embellishmeut of his Fable; and of a piece with this is his next.

33. He says; 'The King did under his own hand confess, he had Ibid.
'known Ann Boleyn's Sister Mary, and desired the Pope would dispence
'with his marrying Ann notwithstanding that.

The falshood of this appears from the recital of it: And how came it, that these Letters were not published? Nor is there any mention of this in all the Dispatches I have seen. And it is not possible, that in so many Conferences which the English Ambassadors had with the Pope, these two things should never have been discoursed of. And can it be thought credible, that at the same time when the King pretended such Scruples and Troubles of Conscience, he could be guilty of so much folly and impudence, as to put himself thus in the Pope's Mercy, by two such Demands? This was a Forgery of Cardinal Pole's, which Sanders greedily catched to dress up the Scene.

Page 34. 34. From page 34. to 42, there is a trifling account given of the Reasons brought against the Marriage, which Sanders answers ma fully, and fights couragiously against the Man of Straw he had set up. But if that be compared with what has been opened in the History, it will appear how lame and defective his Account is.

Page 42. 35. He says; 'Clarke Bishop of Bath and Wells, Tonstal Bishop of 'London, and West Bishop of Ely, writ for the lawfulness of the King's 'Marriage.

All the Bishops, except Fisher, had a Year before this, given it under their Hands and Seals, that the King's Marriage was unlawful: and in all the Memorials of that Time, Fisher is the only Bishop I find mentioned to have writ for it. Tonstal was also soon after Translated to Duresme, which none that have considered that Kings Temper, will think could have been done, if he had interposed in so tender a Point, against what the King so vehemently desired.

Ibid. 36. He says; 'That Abell, Powel, Fetherston, and Ridly, also writ 'for the Marriage.

This is not likely of the second and third, for they being afterwards attainted of Treason, no such Books were objected to them; but the Crime charged on them, was only that they said, the King's Marriage with Q. Katherine was good.

Page 43. 37. He says; 'All things appeared clear in the Trial before the Le- 'gats, in behalf of the Marriage, so that they could give no Sentence 'against such full Evidence as was brought for it.

This is said without any regard to Truth; for all the Matter of Fact that had been alledged, was clearly proved for the contrary side. It was proved that Prince Arthur married the Queen: violent presumptions appeared of his consummating the Marriage: It was also proved, that the King was under Age when the Bull was obtained, and that the Petitions given in his Name, upon which the Bull was granted, were false: That the King had not desired it, but when he came of Age he had protested against it: And that there was no hazard of a War between Spain and England, the preventing which, was the chief Reason set down in the Bull that permitted it. So that all that had been informed at Rome, as to Matter of Fact, was fully proved before the Legats, by clear Instruments, and many and noble Witnesses.

Ibid. 38. He puts a long bold Speech in Campegio's Mouth, who was far from assuming such freedom; but lived licentiously in England, in all manner of Disorders, of which both he and his Bastard Son were guilty. And by dissembling, and other Arts, perswaded the King to delay the Process, Proceſs, from day to day, giving him full aſſurances, that in concluſion he ſhould obtain what he deſired: and by ſuch means he gain'd Time, and drew out the Trial, till the Pope had ended his Treaty with the Emperor, and then he ſerved him an Italian Trick, by adjourning the Court.

39. He ſays; 'Some Doctors being corrupted with the King's Mony, 'declared for him; but thoſe were none of the moſt learned. Page 48.

The King ordered thoſe he ſent, not to give or promiſe any thing to any Perſon, till they had delivered their Opinion freely: Upon which ſome of them wrote to him, that they would anſwer upon their Heads, that they had followed his Orders in that particular.

40. He ſays; 'Theſe Determinations were publiſhed in the Names 'of the Univerſities, to deceive the World by a falſe repreſentation of 'ſo great Authorities. Ibid.

Were the publick Seals of the Univerſities, put to their determinations, after a long debate, all being required to deliver their Conſciences upon Oath, and done with the unanimous conſent of the whole Faculty in ſome places, falſe repreſentations? This was done in Italy, in Padua, Bononia, Ferrara, and Millan, under the Pope and the Emperor's Eye, and within their Dominions.

41. He ſays; 'Endeavours were uſed to corrupt the Univerſity of 'Colen, and ſome others in Germany, for which great Sums were offered, 'and that the King was at a vaſt expence in it. Page 50.

Crooks Accompts ſhew that his Expence in Italy was very inconſiderable. And who can imagine that when Paris, Padua, and Bononia, had declared for the King, he would be much concerned for Colen, or any other Univerſity in Germany? Thoſe who will believe Sanders, and ſuch Authors as he quotes, Cochleus, and an unknown Biſhop of Braſile, may if they will.

42. He ſays; 'In Oxford the King not being able to obtain a ſatisfa- 'ctory Anſwer in that Matter, eight Students of the Univerſity broke 'into the place where the Seal was laid, and put it to an Anſwer, which 'paſſed for the Determination of the Univerſity. Page 51.

The Lord Herbert ſays, There was an Original Inſtrument paſſed, which he ſaw; by which the Univerſity did appoint a Committee of 33 Doctors and Batchelors of Divinity, to examine the Queſtions propoſed by the King, and to ſet the Seal of the Univerſity to any Anſwer that they ſhould agree on: and theſe did afterwards give a Reſolution againſt the lawfulneſs of the Marriage.

43. 'He tells a long Story of the King's endeavours to gain Reginald 'Pole, and that he came over to England; and being much preſſed 'by his Kindred to comply with the King, he went to him, fully pur- 'poſed to have done it: but could not ſpeak a word to him, till he re- 'ſolved to talk to him in another ſtile; and then he found his Tongue, 'and ſpake very freely to the King, who put his hands ſometimes to his 'Ponyard, intending to have killed him; but was overcome with the Page 52.

'ſimplicity and humility of his Diſcourſe: and ſo the King continued 'his Penſion to him, and gave him leave to go back to Padua.

This is another pretty adventure of one of the Hero's of the Romance, but has this misfortune in it, that it is all without any proof: for as none of the Books of that Time ever mention it, ſo neither did Pole himſelf pretend to have carried ſo, in his Book, tho written with the moſt provoking inſolence that was poſſible. In it he mentions his going over to England, but not one word of any ſuch diſcourſe with the King. And King Henry was not a Man of ſuch a temper, as to permit one of Pole's quality to go out of England, and live among his Enemies, and continue his Penſions to him, if he had to his face oppoſed him in a Matter he laid ſo much to heart.

Page 53. 44. He ſays; 'Fiſher of Rocheſter, and Holman Biſhop of Briſtol, 'wrote for the Marriage.

There was no Biſhoprick, nor Biſhop of Briſtol at that time, nor thirteen Years after.

Ibid. 45. 'Many are reckoned up who wrote for the Marriage in all Na- 'tions.

Theſe are neither to be compared in number, nor authority, to thoſe who wrote againſt it; an hundred Books were ſhewed in Parliament, written by Divines, and Lawyers beyond Sea, beſides the determinations of twelve of the moſt celebrated Univerſities in Europe. The Emperor did indeed give ſo great Rewards, and ſuch good Benefices, to thoſe who wrote againſt the King, that it is a wonder there were not more Writers of his ſide.

Page 56. 46. He ſays; 'That upon Warham Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury's death, 'the Earl of Wiltſhire told the King that he had a Chaplain, who was 'at his Houſe, that would certainly ſerve the King in the matter of his 'Divorce; upon which Cranmer was promoted.

Cranmer was no ſtranger to the King at this time: he was firſt recommended by the King to the Earl of Wiltſhire, to be kept in his Houſe; but was in Germany when Warham died, and made no haſte over, but delayed his Journey ſome months. It is true, he was of the mind that the King ought to be divorced; but this was not out of ſervile compliance; for when the King preſſed him in other things that were againſt his Conſcience, he expreſſed all the courage and conſtancy of mind which became ſo great a Prelate.

Ibid. 47. He ſays; 'That Cranmer being to ſwear the Oath of Obedience 'to the Pope, before he was conſecrated, did proteſt to a publick Nota- 'ry, that he took it againſt his Will; and that he had no mind to keep 'his Faith to the Pope, in prejudice to the King's Authority.

He did not proteſt that he did it unwillingly, nor was it only to a Notary, but twice at the High Altar he repeated the Proteſtation that he made; which was to this effect, That he intended not thereby to oblige himſelf to any thing, contrary to the Law of God, the King's Prerogative, or the Laws of the Land; nor to be reſtrained from ſpeaking, adviſing, or conſenting to any thing that ſhould concern the Reformation formation of the Christian Faith, the Government of the Church of England, and the Prerogative of the Crown and Kingdom.

48. He says; 'Cranmer did in all things so comply with the King's 'Lusts, that the King was wont to say he was the only Man that had ne- 'ver contradicted him in any thing he had a mind to. Page 57.

Cranmer was both a good Subject, and a modest and discreet Man, and so would obey and submit as far as he might, without sin: yet when his Conscience charged him to appear against any thing that the King press- sed him to, as in the Matter of the six Articles, he did it with much re- solution and boldness.

49. He says; 'The King going over to Calais, carried Ann Boleyn 'secretly with him. Page 58.

He carried her over in great state, having made her Marchioness of Pembroke; and in the publick Interview between him and Francis, she appeared with all possible splendor.

50. He says; 'After the King's return from France, he brought the 'Action of Premunire against all the Clergy. Page 59.

This is an Error of two Years; for so long before this Voyage to France was that Action begun: and the Clergy about 18 months be- fore had made their Submission; and obtained their Pardon in March 1531, which appears by the printed Statutes, and the King went over to France in September 1532; so that it is clear Sanders never looked for any verification of what he wrote.

51. He says; 'The King, by an unheard-of Tyranny, and a new 'Calumny, brought this Charge against the Clergy. Ibid.

These Laws upon which the Charge was founded, had been oft re- newed; they were first made under Edward the First, by reason of the Papal Encroachments that gave the rise to them; they were oft confir- med by Edward the Third, Richard the Second, Henry the Fourth, and Henry the Fifth, with the Concurrence of their Parliaments; so the Charge was neither new or Tyrannical.

52. He says; 'The Clergy submitted to the King, being betrayed by 'their Metropolitans, Cranmer and Lee. Ibid.

The submission was made two Years before Cranmer was Arch-Bishop in March 1531, and Cranmer was Consecrated in March 1533. but at that time Warham sate in Canterbury; as for Lee, he opposed it for some time.

53. He says; 'The whole Clergy petitioned the King, to forgive 'their Crime, according to that Supreme Power which he had over all 'the Clergy and Laity, within his Kingdom; from whence the King's 'Counsellors took occasion afterwards to call him Supream Head. Ibid.

The Clergy did, in the Title of their Submission, call the King in for- mal Terms, Supream Head of the Church and Clergie of England, as far as by the Law of Christ is lawful; to which Fisher, with the rest of the Con- vocation, subscribed. And all this was done when More was Chancellor.

54. He

Page 62. 54. He says; 'When the King went to marry Ann Boleyn, he per'swaded Rowland Lee, made soon after Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, 'to officiate in it, assuring him he had obtain'd a Bull for it from 'Rome, which was then lying in his Cabinet. Upon which Lee giving 'credit to what he had, did marry them.

This is another trial of Sanders's wit, to excuse Lee, who tho at this time he complied absolutely with the King, yet did afterwards turn over to the Popish Party; therefore to make him look a little clean, this Story must be forged. But at that time all the World saw that the Pope and the Emperor were so linked together, that Lee could not but know that no such thing was possible. And he was so obsequious to the King, that such Arts were needless to perswade him to any thing the King had a mind to.

Page 67. 55. For five pages he runs out in repetition of all those foul Lyes concerning Ann Boleyn, by which he designed both to disgrace the Reformers, who were supported by her, and to defame her Daughter Queen Elizabeth, which have been before confuted: After that he says, 'Queen Katherine, with three Maids and a small Family, retired into 'the Country.

She had both the respect of a Princess Dowager, and all the Jointure contracted to her by Prince Arthur; so she could not be driven to that straitness; but this must go for an Ornament in the Fable.

Page. 71. 56. He says; 'It was concluded, that Cranmer might be more free to 'pass Sentence, that there should be an Oath imposed on the Clergy, for 'paying the same Obedience to the King that they had paid the Pope: Upon which he tells a long formal Story, for two pages, That 'it was 'resolved to draw Fisher into it, to swear Obedience to the King in all 'Ecclesiastical Causes, with that exception, as far as is lawful, according 'to the Word of God, which he did, and perswaded others to do it; 'and upon this Cranmer taking the New Oath, went and pronounced 'Judgment for Divorce.

There is not one tittle of this true, for there was no Oath sworn about the King's Supremacy at this time. The Story of Fisher, is that which was done by the Convocation two Years before Cranmer's preferment, nor was there any Oath taken then, or at this time. It is true, two Years after this, Gardiner, Stokesley, and many other Bishops, did of their own accord take such an Oath; but there was no Law for it till the 28*th* Year of the King's Reign.

Page 72. 57. He says; 'One Richard Risey (or Rouse, according to the Re'cords) was hired by An Boleyn to poison Fisher.

Rouse was boiled alive for poisoning the Bishop's Family, but did not discover any that set him on it: Which none can think but he would have done, if the Queen had hired him to it, and had then deserted him, to perish in so horrid a manner.

Page 73. 58. He says; 'Cranmer being by Authority of Parliament freed from 'his Oath to the Pope, and bound by a new one to the King, went 'now confidently to pronounce Sentence.

The

The Parliament did not put down the Pope's Authority for eight months after this, and appointed no new Oath till three Years after; For Cranmer ſat in Judgment as Primate of England, and Legate of the Apoſtolick See.

59. He ſays; 'Cranmer carried ſome Biſhops with him, and having 'cited the Queen, without hearing her, he gave Sentence againſt the 'Marriage. Ibid.

Gardiner, Stokeſly, Clark, and Longland, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, London, Bath, and Lincoln, went with him. He could not hear the Queen, when ſhe would not appear; but he examined all the Inſtruments and Evidences that had been brought in the whole Proceſs.

60. He ſays; 'The Pope would not proceed againſt the King, till 'he met with the French King at Marſeilles: but that the Engliſh Am- 'baſſadors did there carry ſo inſolently, that Francis was aſhamed of 'their behaviour; and deſired the Pope to proceed againſt the King 'as he thought fit, and that he ſhould never defend him more, but 'ſhould be againſt him. Page 75.

Here the Romance goes on too groſly, for the Pope and the French King agreed at Marſeilles to bring this matter to an iſſue: the Pope declared he thought the King's Cauſe was juſt and right; and promiſed, if the King would ſend a full Submiſſion to Rome, he would give Sentence in his Favour. Upon which the French King ſent over the Biſhop of Paris, who prevailed with the King to do it; tho this afterwards came to nothing. It is true, Bonner who was always officious and forward when there was any thing to be got by it, being ſent to Marſeilles by the King to deliver an Appeal in the King's Name to the Pope, to the next General Council; and perhaps knowing nothing of the private Tranſactions between the Pope and the French King, it being a Secret of too great importance to be communicated to ſuch a hot-brain'd Man, did deliver his Meſſage to the Pope in ſuch provoking Language, that the Pope talked of throwing him into a boiling Cauldron; and he was fain to fly for it.

61. He ſays; 'The Pope returning to Italy, after he had again moſt 'carefully reviewed the whole Cauſe, gave ſentence. Page 76.

This was ſo precipitated, that they would not ſtay ſix days beyond the time which they prefixed, for the return of the Meſſenger that was ſent to England, but diſpatched that, which by the forms of their Court ſhould have been done in three Conſiſtories, all in one day.

62. He ſays; 'Upon this Sentence, the King being enraged, did 'command Queen Katherine to be only called Princeſs, and declared 'her Daughter the Lady Mary a Baſtard. Page 78.

Both theſe were done five months before the Pope's Sentence, and ſoon after, the Sentence was pronounced by Cranmer. And theſe were the natural conſequences of it; for the Marriage being annulled, neither could ſhe be longer a Queen, nor her Daughter Princeſs any more.

63. He ſays; 'The King impriſoned F. Foreſt a Franciſcan Ob- 'ſervant, a moſt holy and learned Man, for contradicting Latimer, Ibid.

'when he was enveighing againſt the Pope's Authority.

Concerning this Foreſt, I have ſeen an Original Letter of one Liſt, a Friar of the ſame Houſe, a Year after this, that ſays, Foreſt was a great ſcandal to their Houſe, and was very ignorant; and that tho he had been much againſt the King in his Marriage, yet he had then inſinuated himſelf into his favour, of which many of the Houſe, who were for the King's Cauſe, had great apprehenſions. In the ſame Letter he writes, how cruel they were againſt any of their Brethren, who they thought diſcovered any thing that was done among them; and that one Rainſcroft, a Brother, whom they ſuſpected to have informed what paſſed among them, was cruelly uſed, and kept in Priſon till he died; which he chiefly imputes to Foreſt. This Friar ſwore the King's Supremacy, and yet at the ſame time was perſwading others not to do it; and being queſtioned upon it, ſaid, He took the Oath only with his Outward, but not with his Inward Man; and for that, and his denying the Goſpel, he was burnt as an obſtinate Heretick.

Page 79. 64. He ſays; 'Abell, Powel, and Fetherſton, were put in Priſon becauſe 'they conſulted with the Maid of Kent.

This is only charged upon the former of theſe, but the two latter are not accuſed of any ſuch thing.

Ibid. 65. He ſays; 'Elizabeth being born the 8*th* of September, but five 'months after the King had publickly married her Mother, could not 'be the lawful Iſſue of that Marriage.

This is a malicious Lye, for himſelf confeſſed that the King was married to her Mother the 14*th* of November the former Year; between which and the 8*th* of September there were ten months; nor was the King ever after that married publickly to the Queen. For what he calls a publick Marriage, was only the ſhewing her openly as Queen. But the deſign of this Lye is ſo viſible, that it needs not be opened.

Ibid. 66. He ſays; 'The King's Daughter Mary, who was then preſent, 'could never be induced to think ſhe was the King's Child.

In the former page he ſaid, Mary was ſent to her Mother; and now forgetting himſelf too ſoon, he ſays, ſhe was preſent when Elizabeth was born. What Mary's thoughts were, none can tell, but ſhe publickly acknowledged her to be her Siſter, tho ſhe did not uſe her as one.

Page 80. 67. He ſays; Elizabeth Barton, who was famed for her Sanctity, and 'ſix with her, who thought ſhe was inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, were 'accuſed in Parliament.

Thoſe ſix knew that ſhe was not inſpired; and that all that was given out about her, was a contrivance of theirs, who had inſtructed her to play ſuch Tricks; as was proved by their own Confeſſions, and other Evidences.

Ibid. 68. He ſays; 'They all died very conſtantly: and on the Margent 'calls them ſeven Martyrs.

The Nun her ſelf acknowledged the Impoſture at her Death, and laid the heavieſt weight of it on the Prieſts that ſuffered with her, who had had taught her the Cheat: ſo that they both died for Treaſon and Impoſture. And this being Sanders's Faith, as appeared by his Works, they were indeed Martyrs for it.

69. He ſays; 'More and Fiſher having examined her, could ſee no 'ground to think ſhe was acted by a Fanatical Spirit, as it was given 'out. Ibid.

It was not given out that ſhe was acted by a Fanatical Spirit, for that had been more honeſt; but her Spirit was cheating and knavery. More clear'd himſelf, and looked on her as a weak Woman, and commonly called her the Silly Maid: But Fiſher did diſown her, when the Cheat was diſcovered, though he had given her too much encouragement before.

70. He ſays; 'The thing ſhe propheſied came to paſs; which was 'that Mary ſhould be Queen of England. Page 81.

The thing for which ſhe and her Complices were attainted of Treaſon, was, that ſhe ſaid, If the King married Ann Boleyn, he ſhould not be a King a month longer, and not an hour longer in the ſight of God, and ſhould die a Villains Death. But it did not ſerve Sanders's ends to tell this.

71. He ſays; 'The day ſhe ſuffered, many of the Nobility came 'and ſwore to the Succeſſion of the Iſſue of the King's Marriage with 'Queen Ann before the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Chan-'cellor, and Cromwel. Ibid.

Both Houſes of Parliament, did in the Houſe of Lords take that Oath, on the day of their Prorogation, which was the 30*th* of March, as appears by the ſecond Act of the next Seſſion: and the Nun, with her Complices, did not ſuffer till the 21. of April after.

72. He ſays; 'The Franciſcans of the Obſervance, chiefly two Fa-'thers in London, Elſton and Payton, did, both in their Sermons and 'publick Diſputes, juſtify the King's Marriage with Q. Katherine. Ibid.

Elſton and Payton, were not of London but of Greenwich. They compared the King to Achab, and ſaid, in the Pulpit, to his face, The Dogs ſhall lick his Blood; with many other ſuch virulent Expreſſions. But to rail at a Prince with the moſt ſpiteful Reproaches that could be, was a part of Sanders's Faith: and ſo no wonder thoſe paſs for Confeſſors, when Elizabeth Barton and her Complices are reckoned Martyrs.

73 He ſays; 'Tonſtal Biſhop of Dureſme, was ordered by the King's 'Meſſengers, not to come to the Seſſion of Parliament 26 Regni, in 'which the King's Supremacy was eſtabliſhed. Page 82.

In this he is ſafer than in ſome other Stories; for the Journals of that Seſſion are loſt, ſo the falſhood of this cannot be demonſtrated: yet it is not at all likely, that he who juſtified all that was done in the former Seſſion, in which the Pope's Power was put down, the nomination of Biſhops annexed to the Crown, a Reformation of Eccleſiaſtical Laws appointed to be made, in defence of all which he wrote afterwards, was now ſo ſcrupulous as to be ordered to ſtay at home. But Tonſtal ſuffering imprisonment in Edward the Sixth's time, it was fit to use some art to shew that he was unwillingly brought to comply with the King.

Ibid. 74. 'He, to shew God's Judgments on the chief Instruments that 'served the King, says, That the Duke of Norfolk was by the King 'condemned to perpetual Imprisonment.

This bewrays palpable Ignorance, since he was attainted of High-Treason the very day before the King's Death, and should have suffered the next day, if the King's Death had not prevented it. But since he will descant on the Providence of God, he should rather have concluded, that his escaping so narrowly was a sign of God's great care of him.

Ibid. 75. In the Session of Parliament that met the third of November (as he describes it, which was the 26*th* Year of the King's Reign) he says, 'Mary the King's Daughter was illegitimated, and all her Honours were 'transferred on Elizabeth, and the Popes Power put down.

This shews he never looked on our publick Statutes; otherwise he had seen that these Acts passed in the former Session.

Page 84. 76. He says; 'When the King sent his Ambassadors to the French 'Court, Francis would not so much as hear them give a Justification of 'the King's proceedings.

How true this can be, the World may judg, since these two Kings continued in a firm Alliance eight years after this. And Francis did often treat, both with him and the Princes of Germany, about these things, and was inclined to do almost all that he did.

Ibid. 77. He says; 'The Lutherans did so abominate the Grounds of his 'Separation from Rome, that they could never be induced to approve 'it; for which he cites Cochleus, an Author of his own Kidney.

They did condemn the King's first Marriage as unlawful, and thought the Pope's Dispensation had no force: and so far they approved it. But they had this singular Opinion, that he should have continued unmarried as long as Q. Katharine lived. Yet in that they were so modest, that they only desired to be excused, as to the second Marriage: which considering that Queen Ann favoured their Doctrine, and that by an absolute compliance with what the King had done, they might have secured his Protection to themselves, whom otherwise they provoked highly, is an evidence of a strict adhering to what their Consciences dictated, that cannot be sufficiently commended.

Page 85. 78. He says; 'The King made many write Apologies for what he 'did; which some did willingly, being tainted with Heresy, others 'unwillingly, and for fear, as Gardiner and Tonstall.

In this he shews how little judgment he had of the Nature of things when he thinks to excuse their Writing for the King, as extorted by force: To have done it through Error and Mistake, was much the softer Excuse; but to make them Men of such prostituted Consciences, as not only to subscribe and swear, but to write with Learning and Zeal, and yet against their Consciences, represents them guilty of unexpressible baseness. Indeed Gardiner was a Man like enough to write any thing that that might pleaſe the King; but Tonſtal was a Man of greater probity, than to have done ſo unworthy a thing upon any account whatſoever. But ſince he mentioned Writers, he ſhould have named Longland Biſhop of Lincoln, Stokeſly Biſhop of London, and above all, Bonner, who did officiouſly thruſt himſelf into the Debate, by writing a Preface to Gardiner's Book, with the greateſt vehemence that could be. But the Blood he ſhed afterwards did ſo endear him to this Author, that all paſt Faults were forgiven, and to be clean forgotten.

79. He ſays; 'Five Martyrs ſuffered, becauſe they would not ſwear 'the King's Supremacy, according to the Law that was then paſſed. Page 86.

There was no ſuch Law made at that time, nor could any ſuch Oath be then put to them. The only Oath which the Parliament had enacted, was the Oath of the Succeſſion, and the refuſing it, was only miſpriſion of Treaſon, and was not puniſhable by Death. But it was for denying the King's Supremacy, and for writing and ſpeaking both againſt it, and his Marriage, that they ſuffered according to Law.

80. He ſays; Cromwel threatned the Jury, in the King's Name, with 'certain Death, if they did not bring them in Guilty. Page 87.

Every Body that knows the Law of England, will ſoon conclude this to be a Lye: for no ſuch Threatnings were ever made in Trials in this Nation: Nor was there any need at this time: for the Law was ſo plain, and their Facts ſo clearly proved, that the Jury could not refuſe to bring them in Guilty.

81. He ſays; The three Carthuſians that ſuffered, were made ſtand upright, and in one place, fourteen days together, with Irons about their Necks, Arms, and Legs, before they died; and then with great pomp he deſcribes their Death in all its parts, as if it had been a new-deviſed Cruelty, it being the Death which the Law appoints for Traitors. He tells, that Cromwel lamented that others of them had died in their Cells, and ſo prevented his Cruelty. He alſo adds a long ſtory of the ſeverities againſt the Franciſcans. Pa. 88, 89.

All this he drew from his learning in the Legend. The Engliſh Nation knows none of theſe Cruelties, in which the Spaniſh Inquiſitors are very expert. I find, by ſome Original Letters, that the Carthuſians, who were ſhut up in their Cells, lived about a Year after this; ſo if Cromwel had deſigned to take away their lives, he wanted not opportunities; but it appears from what More writ in his Impriſoument, that Cromwel was not a cruel Man, but on the contrary, merciful and gentle. And for the Franciſcans, tho they had offended the King highly, two of them railing ſpitefully at him to his Face, in his Chappel at Greenwich: Yet that was paſſed over with a Reproof, from which it appears that he was not eaſily provoked againſt them. So all that Relation which he gives, being without any Authority, muſt paſs for a part of the Poem.

82. He ſays; 'The Biſhop of Rocheſter was condemned, becauſe 'he would not acknowledg the King's Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtial Mat- 'ters.. Page 91.

He was never preſſed to acknowledg it, but was condemned for denying it, and ſpeaking againſt it: for had he kept his Opinion to himſelf, he could not have been queſtioned. But the denying the King's Titles, of which his being Supream Head was one, was by the Law Treaſon; ſo he was tried for ſpeaking againſt it, and not for his not acknowledging it.

Page 93. 83. 'He runs out in an high commendation of Fiſher, and among 'other things, mentions his Epiſcopal and Apoſtolical Charity.

His Charity was burning indeed. He was a mercileſs Proſecutor of Hereticks, ſo that the rigor of the Law, under which he fell, was the ſame meaſure that he had meaſured out to others.

Page 100. 84. Sanders will let the World ſee how carefully he had read the Legend, and how skilfully he could write after that Copy, in a pretty Fabulous Story concerning More's Death; to whom I will deny none of the Praiſes due to his Memory, for his great Learning, and ſingular Probity: nor had he any blemiſh, but what flowed from the Leaven of that cruel Religion, which carried him to great Severities againſt thoſe that preached for a Reformation. His Daughter Roper was a Woman of great Vertue, and worthy of ſuch a Father, who needed none of Sanders's Art to repreſent her well to the World. His Story is; 'That the 'morning her Father died, ſhe went about diſtributing all the Money 'ſhe had, in Alms to the Poor: And at laſt was at her Prayers in a 'Church, when of a ſudden ſhe remembred that ſhe had forgot to pro-'vide a Winding-ſheet for his Body; but having no more Mony left, 'and not being well known in that place, ſhe apprehended they would 'not give her credit: Yet ſhe went to a Linnen-Drapers Shop, and cal-'ling for ſo much Cloth, ſhe put her hand in her Pocket, knowing ſhe 'had nothing in it, but intending to make an excuſe, and try if they 'would truſt her. But by a Miracle ſhe found the price of the Sheet, 'and neither more nor leſs, was conveighed into her Pocket.

This is ſuch a lively eſſay of the Man's Spirit that invented it, that I leave it without any further Commentary.

Page 105. 85. He ſays; 'Lee that was not in Orders, was ſent to viſit the Mo-'naſteries, who ſollicited the Chaſtity of the Nuns.

He does not mention Leighton and London, the two chief Viſitors, for Leighton brought in Lee: but they were of the Popiſh party, and Lee was Cranmer's Friend, therefore all muſt be laid on him. He was in Orders, and ſoon after was made Dean of York. I have ſeen Complaints of Dr. London's ſolliciting the Nuns, yet I do not find Lee complained of. But ſince London was a perſecutor of Hereticks, ſuch a ſmall kindneſs, as the concealing his Name, and the turning the blame over on Lee, was not to be ſtood on among Friends, eſpecially by a Man of Sanders's ingenuity.

Page 107. 86. For the correſpondence between Q. Katherine and Father Foreſt, and the Letters that paſt; ſince Sanders tells us not a word how he came by them, we are to look on them as a piece of the Romance.

87. He

87. He ſays; 'Ann Boleyn bore a monſtrous and a miſhaped Lump Page 114.
'of Fleſh, when the time of her bearing another Child came.
She bore a dead Child before the time, ſays Hall; but there was no great reproach in that, unleſs made up by Sanders's wit.

88. He lays out the Buſineſs of Ann Boleyn with ſo much ſpite and Page 115.
malice, that we may eaſily ſee againſt whom he chiefly deſigned this part of his Work. He ſays; 'She was found guilty of Adultery and 'Inceſt.
There was no Evidence againſt her, but only a hear-ſay from the Lady Wingfield: We neither know the credit of that Lady, nor of the Perſon who related it in her Name. It is true, Mark Smeton did confeſs his Adultery with the Queen, but it was generally thought he was drawn into it by ſome Promiſes that were made to him, and ſo cheated out of his Life; but for the Queen, and the other four, they atteſted their Innocency to the laſt: nor would any of thoſe unfortunate Perſons redeem their Lives at ſo ignominious a rate, as to charge the Queen, whom they declared they knew to be innocent; ſo that all the Evidence againſt her, was an hear ſay of a Woman that was dead, the Confeſſion of a poor Muſician, and ſome idle words her ſelf ſpake of the Diſcourſes that had paſſed between her and ſome of thoſe Gentlemen.

89. He ſays; 'Foreigners did generally rejoice at her fall: and to Page 116.
'prove this, he cites Cochleus's words, that only ſhew that Author's ill
'Opinion of her.
The Germans had ſo great a value of her, that all their Correſpondence with the King fell to the ground with her: but he may well cite Cochleus, an Author of the ſame honeſty with himſelf, from whoſe Writings we may with the like ſecurity make a Judgment of Foreign Matters, as we may upon Sanders's Teſtimony believe the Account he gives of Engliſh Affairs.

90. He tells us, among other things done by the King, and picks it Page 117. out as the only Inſtance he mentions of the King's Injunction, 'That 'the People ſhould be taught in Churches the Lord's Prayer, the Ave,
'the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in Engliſh.
It ſeems this Author thought the giving theſe Elements of Religion to the People in the vulgar Tongue, a very heinous Crime, when this is ſingled out from all the reſt.

91. 'That being done, he ſays, there was next a Book publiſhed, Ibid.
'called Articles, appointed by the King's Majeſty, which were the Six 'Articles.
This ſhews that he either had no information of Engliſh Affairs, or was ſleeping when he wrote this: for the Six Articles were not publiſhed ſoon after the Injunctions, as he makes it, by the ſame Parliament and Convocation, but three Years after, by another Parliament: They were never put in a Book, nor publiſhed in the King's Name; they were Enacted in Parliament, and are neither more nor leſs than 25 lines lines in the first Impression of that Act; so far short come they of a Book.

Page 119. 92. He reckons up very defectively the Differences between the Church of Rome; and the Doctrine set forth by the King's Authority: but in one Point he shews his ordinary wit; for in the sixth particular, he says, 'He retained the Sacrament of Order, but appointed a new 'Form of Consecrating of Bishops.

This he put in out of Malice, that he might annul the Ordinations of that Time; but the thing is false: for except that the Bishops, instead of their Oaths of Obedience to the Pope, which they formerly swore, did not swear to the King, there was no other Change made; and that to be sure, is no part of the Form of Consecration.

Page 120. 93. He resolved once to speak what he thought was Truth, tho it be treasonable and impious: and says, 'Upon these Changes, many in Lin- 'colnshire, and the Northern parts, did rise for Religion, and the Faith 'of Christ.

This was indeed the Motive by which their seditious Priests misled them; yet he is mistaken in the Time, for it was not after the six Articles were published, but almost three Years before it. Nor was it for the Faith of Christ, which teaches us to be humble, subject, and obedient; but because the King was removing some of the Corruptions of that Faith, which their false Teachers did impiously call the Faith of Christ.

Ibid. 94. He says; 'The King did promise most faithfully, that all these 'things of which they complained, should be amended.

This is so evidently false, that it is plain Sanders resolved dextrously to avoid the speaking of any sort of Truth: for the King did fully and formally tell them, he would not be directed nor counselled by them in these Points they complained of, and did only offer them an Amnesty for what was past.

Page 121. 95. 'Then he reckons up 32 that died for the Defence of the 'Faith.

They were attainted of Treason, for being in actual Rebellion against the King: and thus it appears that Rebellion was the Faith in his sense; and himself died for it, or rather in it, having been starved to death in a Wood, to which he fled after one of his rebellious Attempts on his Soveraign, in which he was the Pope's Nuncio.

Page 122. 96. He says; 'The King killed the Earl of Kildare, and five of his 'Uncles.

By this strange way of expressing a legal Attainder, and the execution of a Sentence for manifest Treason and Rebellion, he would insinuate on the Reader, a fancy, that one of Bonner's cruel Fits had taken the King, and that he had killed those with his own hand. The Lord Herbert has fully opened that part of the History, from the Records that he saw; and shews that a more resolved Rebellion could not be, than that was, of which the Earl of Kildare and his Uncles were Guilty.

But

But becauſe they ſent to the Pope and Emperor for Aſſiſtance, the Earl 'deſiring to hold the Kingdom of Ireland of the Pope, ſince the King by his Hereſy had fallen from his Right to it, Sanders muſt needs have a great kindneſs for their Memory, who thus ſuffered for his Faith.

97. He ſays; 'Queen Jane Seymour being in hard labour of Prince Ibid. 'Edward, the King ordered her Body to be ſo opened by Surgeons, 'that ſhe died ſoon after.'

All this is falſe, for ſhe had a good Delivery, as many Original Letters written by her Council (that have been ſince printed) do ſhew, but ſhe died two days after of a Diſtemper incident to her Sex.

98. He ſets down ſome Paſſages of Cardinal Pole's Heroical Conſtancy; which being proved by no Evidence, and not being told by any other Writer, (whom I ever ſaw) are to be look'd on as the flouriſhes of the Poet to ſet off his Hero. Page 124.

99. He would perſwade the World, that the Marqueſs of Exeter, the Lord Montacute, and the reſt that ſuffered at that Time, died, becauſe they were believed to diſlike the King's Wicked Proceedings; and that the Counteſs of Sarum was beheaded on this ſingle account, that ſhe was the Mother of ſuch a Son, and was ſincerely addicted to the Catholick Faith; and that ſhe was condemned becauſe ſhe wrote to her Son, and for wearing in her Breaſt, the Picture of the five Wounds of Chriſt. Page 125.

The Marqueſs of Exeter pretended he was well ſatisfied with the King's Proceedings, and was Lord Stewart when the Lords Darcy and Huſſie were tried, and he gave Judgment againſt them. But it being diſcovered that he and other Perſons approved of Cardinal Pole's Proceedings, who endeavoured to engage all Chriſtian Princes in a League againſt the King, purſuant to which they had expreſſed themſelves, on ſeveral Occaſions, reſolved, when a fit opportunity offered it ſelf, to rebel; it was no wonder if the King proceeded againſt them according to Law. And for the Counteſs of Sarum, tho the legality of that Sentence paſſed againſt her cannot be defended, yet ſhe had given great offence; not only by her correſpondence with her Son, but by the Bulls ſhe had received from Rome, and by her oppoſing the King's Injunctions, hindring all her Tenants to read the New Teſtament, or any other Book ſet out by the King's Order. And for the Picture, which was found among her Cloaths, it having been the Standard of the Rebellion, and the Arms of England being found on the other ſide of it, there was juſt ground to ſuſpect an ill Deſign in it.

100. He ſays; 'The Images which the King deſtroyed, were by Page 129. 'many wonderful Works of God, recommended to the Devotion of 'the Nation.

All the wonder in theſe Works, was the knavery of ſome jugling Impoſtors, and the ſimplicity of a credulous multitude, of which ſee page 224 which being ſo openly diſcovered, nothing that had ſhame in it, could ſpeak of them as our Author does.

101. He

Page 131. 101. He ſays; 'Six and twenty Carts drawn with Oxen, were loaded 'with the Riches taken from Thomas Becket's Shrine; whom he makes 'a moſt glorious Martyr, that died for the defence of the Faith, and 'was honoured by many Miracles after his death.

Other Writers have ſufficiently ſhewed what a perfidious, ingrateful, and turbulent Prieſt he was. All theſe were Vertues in our Author's Opinion, and Ingredients in his Faith. But he has in this Accompt of the Riches of the Shrine, gone beyond himſelf, having by a figure of Speech very familiar to him, (called Lying) increaſed two Cheſts (ſee page 224.) to 26 Cart Loads.

Page 132. 102. He ſays; 'The Sentence which P. Paul gave out againſt the 'King, was affixed in ſome Towns, both in France, Flanders, and 'Scotland: from which he infers, that both the Emperor, the French, 'and Scotch King, did conſent to that Sentence.

In this he deſigned an eminent piece of Service to the Apoſtolick See, to leave on Record an Evidence, that three Soveraign Princes had acknowledged the Pope's Power of depoſing Kings. But he did ill to name the Proofs of his Aſſertion, and had done better to have ſaid ſimply that it was ſo, than to have founded it on ſo ill grounds: as if the affixing Papal Bulls in a place, were an evidence that the Princes in whoſe Dominions it was done, conſented to it. He might with the ſame reaſon have concluded, that Q. Elizabeth conſented to the Sentence againſt her ſelf; which it is very like will not be eaſily believed, tho the Bull was affixed in London. But all thoſe very Princes whom he names, continuing to keep up their correſpondence with the King, as well after as before this Sentence, is a much clearer demonſtration that they deſpiſed the Pope's Sentence.

Page 134. 103. He ſays; 'The King, by his own Authority, threw all the 'Begging Orders out of their Houſes.

The falſhood of this hath appeared already, for they reſigned their Houſes to the King: and of theſe Reſignations, tho many were deſtroyed, yet near an hundred are ſtill extant.

Ibid. 104. He ſays; 'The Parliament, in the Year 1539, gave the King 'all the great Monaſteries.

The Parliament paſſed no ſuch Act; all that they did, was only to confirm the Grants made, or to be made by theſe Houſes to the King. It was their Surrenders that cloathed the King with the Right to them. All the Tragical Stories he tells us that followed upon this, are founded on a falſe Foundation.

Page 135. 105. He ſets down a Form of a Reſignation, which he ſays, 'All the 'Abbots, and many Religious Perſons, were made to ſign and ſet their 'Seals to it.

Among all the Reſignations which are yet extant, there is not one in this Form; for which ſee page 238.

106. He

106. He ſays; The King's Commiſſioners, who went about getting Page 136.
'Hands to that Form, made them believe, in every Houſe, that all the 'reſt had ſigned it; and ſo by that, and other perſwaſions, 'prevailed 'with many to ſet their Hands to it.

If all the Subſcriptions had been procured about the ſame time, ſuch Arts might be ſuſpected; but in a Thing that was three Years a-doing, theſe tricks could not have ſerved their turn.

107. He ſays; 'They told the Monks, that tho the King might, by Ibid.
'virtue of the Act of Parliamet, ſeize on their Houſes and Rents, yet 'he deſired rather to do it with their good-will.

In this there are two Errors; Firſt, Moſt of theſe Houſes were reſigned to the King before the Act of Parliament, ſee pag. 235. And next, the Act of Parliament only confirmed their Deeds, but did not give their Houſes to the King.

108. He ſays; 'The Abbots of Glaſſenbury, Colcheſter, and Reading, Page 137.
'ſuffered Martyrdom, becauſe they refuſed to ſet their Hands to that 'Writing.

There was no ſuch Writing ever offered to them, nor was there any Law to force them to reſign: ſo they could not ſuffer on that account; but they were Martyrs for Sanders's Faith, for they were attainted by a leagal Trial of High Treaſon.

109. 'He tells a long Story of Whitting Abbot of Glaſſenbury's being Page 138.
'brought up to London, to be prevailed with to ſet his hand to the Sur-'render. Which he ſtill refuſing to do, was ſent back; and tho a 'Book againſt the King's Divorce was found among his Papers, which 'was laid there by thoſe who ſearched for it; yet that was paſt over in a 'chiding: but as he went home, hearing there was a meeting of the 'County at Wells, he went thither; and as he was going up to his place 'on the Bench, he was called to the Bar to anſwer ſome things that were 'to be objected to him: He was amazed at it, and asked what the mat-'ter was? But one told him, he needed fear nothing, for ſomewhat 'was only to be done for form to terrify others: Upon which he was 'condemned and ſent away to his Abbey, little thinking he was ſo near 'his end; but when he came near it, a Prieſt was ſent to him to take 'his Confeſſion, for they told him he muſt die immediately; he begg'd 'a day or two's reſpite, but in vain: ſo they hang'd him up in his Ha-'bit, on the top of the Hill near his Abbey, and quartered him; and 'all this was done in one day.

This Book came out in Forreign Parts, and was printed at Rome, in the Reign of Sixtus the Fifth, who took great pleaſure in ſuch Executions, as he deſcribes this to have been; which may fall oft out, where the lives of the Subjects are wholly at the Princes Mercy: But to tell ſuch Tales of England, which is ſo famed over the World for the ſafety and ſecurity the Subjects enjoy, and for the regular and legal proceedings in all Trials, eſpecially of Life and Death, was a great Error in the Poet; for the decorum of the Laws and Cuſtoms of a place muſt be obſerved, when any Nation is made the Scene of a Fable. But as nothing like this can be done by the Law of England, so there was nothing of it in this Case: The Jury that sate on him, were men of great credit in the Country: when he died, he acknowledged his Offences; and with appearance of repentance, begged God's Pardon, and the King's: see pag. 239.

Page 145. 110. After many bitter Invectives against Cromwel, for which I could never see good Evidence, tho I cannot disprove them by any convincing Arguments, he says, 'That he advised the King to make a Law, that 'Persons might be Convented and Condemned in absence, and with-'out being heard: and that this Law first of all fell upon him-'self.

There was no such Law ever made, only the Parliament by their Supream Authority, did Attaint some in that manner, but no other Court might do it. Nor was this first applied to Cromwel; for a Year before his Attainder, the Countess of Sarum, with a great many more, were so attainted, tho she did not suffer till a Year after him.

Ibid. 111. He tells many Reasons why the King had a mind to put away Ann of Cleve: But in this, as in other things, he betrays a profound ignorance of that Time; for every Body knew, that the King, from the first time he saw her, disliked her, and that he never consummated the Marriage.

This is a Subject not fit to be long dwelt on; but if any will compare the Account I give of this Matter from the Records, with Sanders's Tale, they will see that he wrote at random, and did not so much as know Publick Transactions.

Page 146. 112. He says; The King had promised to the Emperor, That he 'would no longer continue in the Smalcaldick League; but Cromwel 'counterfeited the King's Hand, to a new confirmation of it; which 'coming to the Emperor's knowledg, he challenged the King of it; 'and sent him over a Copy of it; upon which the King disowned it, 'and cast it on Cromwel; and that this was the cause of his fall.

This I believe is one of Sanders's Dreams; there is not one word of it in Cromwel's Attainder; nor do I find the least shadow of this in some Original Letters which he wrote to the King for his Pardon, in which he answers many of the things laid to his Charge. Nor is it likely he would adventure on so bold a thing, with such a King; nor could the Emperor have that Writing in his power, as long as the King lived; for it is not to be imagined how he could come by it, till he had taken the Duke of Saxony Prisoner, which was after this King's Death.

Page 148. 113. He says; 'When Cromwel was put to death, the King proceed-'ed to the Divorce of Ann of Cleve.

The Divorce was judged by the Convocation, eight days before Cromwel's Death, and confirmed in Parliament, which was dissolved before he suffered.

114. He says; 'The King sent to her, to tell her, he had a mind to 'be separated from her; and tho he could proceed more severely

'against

'against her, since he knew she was an Heretick; yet for her Families 'sake, he left it to her self to devise any Reason for their Divorce; 'Upon which she came next day to the Senate, (which may be either 'the King's Council, or the Parliament) and confessed she had been 'married to another before she was married to the King; and there- 'upon, by the Authority of Parliament, he was divorced, and within 'eight days married Katherine Howard.

There are but six gross Errors in this Period. 1. The King sent not any Message to her, nor came there any Answer from her, till the Sentence of Divorce was quite passed. 2. In the Original Letter with those he sent to her, wrote to him from Richmond, it appears that they used no threatnings to her, but barely told her what was done; to which she acquiesced. 3. She never came from Richmond in all that Process, and so made no such declaration in the Senate. 4 She did not say that she was married to another, but only that she had been contracted to the Prince of Lorrain when she was under Age. 5. The Parliament did not dissolve the Marriage, but only confirmed the Sentence of the Convocation. 6. The King did not marry Katherine Howard before the 8*th* of August, and the Divorce was Judged the 10*th* of July, a month wanting two days.

115. He says; 'The King had consummated the Marriage for seven 'months together. Page 149.

There were but six months between his Marriage and the Divorce; and in all that while, as they bedded but seldom, so there were very clear Evidences brought, that it was not consummated.

116. He says; 'The King sent the Bishop of Winchester, and Sir Hen- 'ry Knevet, to the Diet of the Empire; who were ordered to propose 'to the Emperor, that the King might be again reconciled to the See 'of Rome; to which, he adds, his Conscience did drive him: but since 'the King would not confess his past Crimes, nor do penance for them, 'nor restore the Goods of the Church, it came to nothing. Page 151.

This is another Ornament of the Fable, to shew the Poet's wit; but is as void of Truth, as any passage in Plautus or Terence is. For the King was all his Life so intractable in that Point, that the Popish Party had no other way to maintain their Interest with him, but to comply, not without affectation in that Matter: and when an Information was given against Gardiner for his holding some correspondence with the Pope's Legate at the Diet, he got the Man who had innocently discovered it, to be put in Prison; and said, it was a Plot against him to ruin him, which he needed not be so sollicitous about, if his Instructions from the King had allowed him to enter on such a Treaty.

117. He runs out in a long digression, upon the King's assuming the Title of King of Ireland; to shew that the Kings of England only hold Ireland by the Pope's Donation. Page 153.

In this Sanders shews his Art, he being to carry the Standard of Rebellion in that Kingdom, to blast the King's Right to it. He acknowledges the Crown of England had the Dominion of Ireland, with the Title of Lord of Ireland, about 400 Years; And certainly if so long a possession does not give a good Title, and a preſcription againſt all other Pretenders, moſt of the Royal Families in Chriſtendom will be to ſeek for their Rights. But he ſays, It was given by the Pope to King Henry the Second; and yet he confeſſes that he had conquered ſome parts of it, before that Grant was ſent him by Hadrian the Fourth. Certainly King Henry the Second had as good a right to take it, as Pope Hadrian had to give it: Nor was the King's accepting the Pope's Donation, any prejudice to his Title: for things extorted or allowed upon a publick Error, can have no force, when that is openly diſcovered. If then the Superſtition of thoſe Ages, made, that the Pope's Donation was a great help to any Pretender, it was no wonder that Kings made uſe of it; but it were a wonder indeed if they ſhould acknowledg it, after the Trick is known and ſeen by all.

Page 162. 118. After this, and a Satyr againſt Queen Elizabeth for aſſuming the Title, Defender of the Faith, and a long enumeration of the exactions in the laſt Years of this Reign; in which tho there is matter enough for ſevere Complaints, yet many of the Particulars he mentions are without any proof, and muſt reſt on the Author's credit; which by this time, the Reader will acknowledg is not very great. Another long diſcourſe of ſome length follows, of the Misfortunes of the Duke of Norfolk, and of all that ſerved the King in his Divorce, and in the following Actions of his Life: from which he infers, that theſe were effects of a Curſe from Heaven upon all that he did, and on all thoſe that aſſiſted him: But as the Inference is bad, ſo he forgot to mention thoſe Noble Families that were raiſed in his Time, and have continued ſince in great Honour; as the Seymours, from whom the Dukes of Somerſet are deſcended; the Paulets, from whom the Marqueſs of Wincheſter derives; the Ruſſels, Wriothſlies, Herberts, Riches, and Cromwells, from whom the Earls of Bedford, Southampton, Pembroke, Eſſex, and Ardglaſs have deſcended; and the Browns, the Petres, the Pagets, the Norths, and the Montagues, from whom the Vice-Count Mountague, the Barons Petre, Paget, North, and Mountague, are deſcended. Theſe Families have now flouriſhed in great Wealth and Honour an Age and a half; and only one of them has, and that but very lately determined in the Male Line: but the Illuſtrious Female Branches of it are intermixed with other Noble Families. So that the Obſervation is falſe, and the Inference is weak.

Page 164. 119. He ſays; 'When the King found his ſtrength declining, he had 'again ſome thoughts of reconciling himſelf to the Church of Rome; 'which when it was propoſed to one of the Biſhops, he made a flat- 'tering Anſwer. But Gardiner moved that a Parliament might be cal- 'led for doing it: and that the King for the quiet of his own Conſci- 'ence, would vow to do it; of which God would accept in that extremi- 'ty, when more was not poſſible to be done. But ſome of his Cour- 'tiers coming about him, who were very apprehenſive of ſuch a Re- 'conciliation, leſt they ſhould have been made reſtore the Goods of 'the Church, diverted the King from it: And from this our Author 'infers, that what the King had done, was againſt his Conſcience, and 'that ſo he ſinned the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt.

I ſhall not examine this Theological Definition of the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt; for my Quarrel is not at preſent with his Divinity, but with his Hiſtory, tho it were eaſy to ſhew that he is alike at both. But for this Story, it is a pure Dream; for not only there is no Evidence for it, nor did Gardiner in the Reign of Queen Mary ever own any ſuch thing, tho it had been then much for the credit of their Cauſe, eſpecially he being often upbraided with his compliances to this King, for which the mention of his Repentance had furniſhed him with a good Anſwer: But as the Tale is told, the Fiction appears too plainly, for a Parliament was actually ſitting during the Kings Sickneſs, which was diſſolved by his Death, and no ſuch Propoſition was made in it. The King on the contrary deſtroyed the chief hopes of the Popiſh Party, which were founded on the Duke of Norfolk's greatneſs, by the Attainder which was paſſed a day before he died. And yet Sanders makes this Diſcourſe to have been between the King and Gardiner after his fall, and his Sons Death, between which, and the King's Death, there were only nine days: but beſides all this, Gardiner had loſt the King's Favour a conſiderable time before his Death.

120. He ſays; 'The King, that he might not ſeem never to have Page 166.
'done any good Work in his whole Life, as he was dying, founded
'Chriſt's Church Hoſpital in London; which was all the Reſtitution he 'ever made for the Monaſteries and Churches he had robbed and ſpoi-
'led.

If it had not already appeared, in many Inſtances, that our Author had as little ſhame as honeſty, here is a ſufficient proof of it. I will not undertake to juſtify the King, as if he had done what he ought to have done, in his new Foundations: But it is the height of impudence to deny things that all England knows. He founded ſix Biſhopricks; he endowed Deans and Prebendaries, with all the other Offices belonging to a Cathedral, in fourteen ſeveral Sees, Canterbury, Wincheſter, Dureſme, Ely, Norwich, Rocheſter, Worceſter, and Carliſle; together with Weſtminſter, Cheſter, Oxford, Gloceſter, Peterborough, and Briſtol, where he endowed Biſhopricks likewiſe. He founded many Grammar Schools, as Burton, Canterbury, Coventry, Worceſter, &c. He founded and endowed Trinity Colledg in Cambridg, which is one of the nobleſt Foundations in Chriſtendom. He alſo founded Profeſſors in both Univerſities, for Greek, Hebrew, Law, Phyſick, and Divinity. What cenſure then deſerves our Author, for ſaying, That the Hoſpital of Chriſt's Church was all the Reſtitution he ever made of the Church-Lands?

121. He gives a Character of the King, which ſuits very well with his Ibid.
Hiſtory, his Malice in it being extravagantly ridiculous. Among other things, he ſays, 'The King promoted always learned Biſhops, Cranmer
'only being excepted, whom he advanced to ſerve his Luſts.

Cranmer was a Man of greater Learning than any that ever ſate in that See before him, as appears in every thing that he writ: Tonſtal was a learned Man, and Gardiner was much eſteemed for Learning; yet if any will compare Cranmer's Books of the Sacrament, with thoſe the other two writ on the ſame ſubject; there is ſo great a difference between tween the learning and ſolidity of the one and the other, that no Man of common ingenuity can read them, but he muſt confeſs it.

Page 170. 122. He ſays; 'When the King found himſelf expiring, he called 'for a Boul of White-Wine, and ſaid to one that was near him, We 'have loſt all: and was often heard repeating Monks, Monks, and ſo 'he died.

This was to make the Fable end as it had gone on, and it is forged without any authority or appearance of Truth. The manner of his Death was already told, ſo it needs not be repeated.

Page 172. 123. He ſays; 'The King by his Will appointed the Crown to go 'to his Righteous Heirs after his three Children, and commanded his 'Son to be bred a true Catholick: but his Will was changed, and ano-'ther was forged, by which the Line of Scotland was excluded, and 'they bred his Son a Heretick.

There was no ſuch Will ever heard of; and in all the Debates that were managed in Queen Elizabeth's Reign about the Succeſſion, thoſe that pleaded for the Scotiſh Line, never alledged this; which had it been true, did put an end to the whole Controverſy. It was indeed ſaid, that the Will which was given out as the King's Will, was not ſigned by his Hand, nor ſealed by his Order, but it was never pretended that there was any other Will: ſo this is one of our Author's Forgeries.

The Concluſion.

THus I have traced him in this Hiſtory, and hope I have ſaid much more than was neceſſary to prove him a Writer of no credit, and that his Book ought to have no Authority; ſince he was not only a ſtranger to the Publick Tranſactions, Printed Statutes, and the other Authentick Regiſters of that Time, but was a bold and impudent Aſſerter of the groſſeſt and moſt malicious Lies, that ever were contrived. I have not examined all the Errors of his Chronology, for there is ſcarce any thing told in its right order, and due place; nor have I inſiſted on all the Paſſages he tells, without any proof, or appearance of truth; for as I could only deny theſe without any other evidence but what was negative, ſo there are ſo many of them, that I muſt have tranſcribed the greateſt part of his Book, if I had conſidered them all. I have therefore only ſingled out theſe Paſſages, which I had in the former Hiſtory demonſtrated to be falſe: and theſe are both ſo many and ſo important, that I am ſure, enough is ſaid to deſtroy the Credit of that Author, and of his Book, which has too long deceived the World. And what is performed in this firſt Part, will I hope diſpoſſeſs the Reader of any ill Impreſſions the following Parts of that Work have made on him, concerning the ſucceeding Reigns, of which an Account ſhall be given, as ſoon as it poſſibly can be made ready.

I

I ſhall eſteem my Time, to have been well employed, and my pains rightly placed, if my Endeavours have ſo good an effect, as to take off the unjuſt Prejudices which ſome may have conceived at the Charges that were then made in Religion, or at the beginnings of them; which being repreſented by this Author, and upon his Teſtimony by many other Writers, in ſuch odious Characters to the World, are generally ſo ill looked on.

The Work it ſelf was ſo good, done upon ſo much Reaſon, managed with ſuch Care, directed by ſuch Wiſdom, and tempered with ſo great Moderation, that thoſe who intended to blaſt it, did very wiſely to load it with ſome ſuch Prejudices: for if without theſe, the thing it ſelf be examined by Men of a candid temper and ſolid Judgment, the Oppoſers of it know well where the Truth lies; and on whoſe ſide, both the Scriptures, and the beſt Ages of the Primitive Church have declared. But it was not fit to put a Queſtion of ſuch importance, on ſo doubtful and ſo dangerous an iſſue: therefore it was well conſidered by them, that ſome popular and eaſily underſtood Calumnies, to diſgrace the beginnings of it, and the Perſons that were moſt imployed in it, were to be faſtned on them: and if theſe could be once generally received, then Men might be alienated from it by a ſhorter way, than could be done by the dull and unſucceſsful methods of Reaſon. Therefore as the Cauſe of our Church hath been often vindicated, by the learned Books that have been publiſhed in it; and never with more ſucceſs, and a clearer victory, than of late, in the elaborate Writings (which are never to be mentioned but with honour) of the renowned Dr. Stillingfleet; ſo I judged it might not be an unuſeful and unacceptable Work (which tho it be of a lower form, and ſo moſt ſuitable to my Genius, yet will be of general uſe) to employ the leiſure I enjoy, and the ſmall Talent committed to me, in examining and opening the Tranſactions of thoſe Times: And if thoſe who read it, are diſpoſſeſſed of their Prejudices, and inclined to conſider things as they are now ſet before them, in a truer light, I have gained my end in it.

The Truths of Religion need no ſupport from the Father of Lyes. A Religion made up of Falſhoods and Impoſtures, muſt be maintained by Means ſuitable to it ſelf: So Sanders's Book might well ſerve the ends of that Church, which has all along raiſed its greatneſs by publick Cheats and Forgeries; ſuch as the Donation of Conſtantine, and the Book of the Decretals; Beſides the vaſt number of Miracles and Viſions that were for many Ages made uſe of by them; of which even the moſt diſingenuous of their own Writers begin to be now aſhamed. But the Reformation of Religion was a Work of Light, and needs none of the Arts of Darkneſs to juſtify it by. A full and diſtinct Narrative of what was then done, will be its Apology, as well as its Hiſtory. There is no need of Artifice, but only of Induſtry, and Sincerity, to gather together all the remains of that Time, and put them in good order.

I am now beginning to look towards the next, and indeed the beſt part of this Work: Where, in the firſt Reign, we ſhall obſerve the active endeavours endeavours of thoſe Reſtorers of Religion. The next Reign affords a ſadder proſpect of that Work laid in Ruins, and the Authors of it in Aſhes; but the Fires that conſumed them, did rather ſpread than extinguiſh that Light which they had kindled. And what is fabled of the Phœnix, will be found true of our Church, That ſhe roſe new out of theſe Aſhes, into which ſhe ſeemed conſumed.

Towards the perfecting this Hiſtory, I hope all that love the Subject of it, will contribute their Endeavours, and furniſh everything that is in their power, which may make it fuller or clearer: So I end with that deſire which I made in the Preface, that any who have in their Hands any Papers relating to theſe Times, will be pleaſed to communicate them; and what-ever aſſiſtance they give to it, ſhall be moſt thankfully owned and acknowledged.

Numb. I. ARTICLES about Religion, ſet out by the Convocation, and publiſhed by the Kings Authority.

AN ORIGINAL.

HENRY the Eight, by the Grace of God, King of England, and of France, Defender of the Faith, and Lord of Ireland, and in Earth Supream Head of the Church of England, to all and ſingular our moſt loving, faithful and obedient Subjects, greeting. Amongſt other Cures committed unto this our Princely Office, whereunto it hath pleaſed God of his infinite mercy and goodneſs to call us, we have always eſteemed and thought (as we alſo yet eſteem and think) this to be moſt chief, moſt ponderous, and of moſt weight, that his Holy Word and Commandments may ſincerely without let or hindrance, be of our Subjects truly believed, and reverently kept and obſerved; and that Unity and Concord in Opinions, namely in ſuch things as does concern our Religion, may encreaſe and go furthward, and all occaſion of Diſſent and Diſcord touching the ſame be repreſſed, and uterly extinguiſhed; for the which cauſe we being of late, to our great regret, credibly advertiſed of ſuch diverſity in Opinions, as have grown and ſprongen in this our Realm, as well concerning certain Articles neceſſary to our Salvation, as alſo touching certain honeſt and commendable Ceremonies, Rites, and Uſages in our ſaid Church, for an honeſt policy, and decent order heretofore of long time uſed and accuſtomed; minding to have that unity and agreement eſtabliſhed through our ſaid Church concerning the premiſſes: and being very deſirous to eſchew not only the dangers of Souls, but alſo the outward inquietneſs which by occaſion of the ſaid diverſity in Opinions (if remedy had not been provided) might perchance have enſued; have not only in our own perſon many times taken great pain, ſtudy, labour and travails, but alſo have cauſed our Biſhops and other the moſt diſcreet and beſt learned men of our Clergy of this our whole Realm to be aſſembled in our Convocation, for the full debatement and quiet determination of the ſame: where after long and mature deliberation and diſputations, had of and upon the premiſſes, finally they have concluded and agreed upon the ſaid matters, as well thoſe which be commanded of God, and are neceſſary to our Salvation, as alſo the other touching the honeſt Ceremonies, and good and politick Order, as is aforeſaid; which their determination, debatement, and agreement, forasmuch as we think to have proceeded of a good, right and true judgment, and to be agreeable to the Laws and Ordinances of God, and much profitable for the eſtabliſhment of that charitable concord and unity in our Church of England, which we moſt deſire, we have cauſed the ſame to be publiſhed, willing, requiring and commanding you to accept, repute, and take them accordingly; moſt heartily deſiring and praying Almighty God, that it may pleaſe him ſo to illumin your hearts, that you, and every of you, may have no leſs deſire, zeal, and love to the ſaid Unity and Concord, in reading, divulging, and following the ſame, then we have had and have, cauſing them to be thus deviſed, ſet forth and publiſhed. And for becauſe we would the ſaid Articles, and every of them, to be taken and underſtanden of you after ſuch ſort, order, and degree as appertaineth accordingly; We have cauſed by the like aſſent and agreement of our ſaid Biſhops and other Learned Men, the ſaid Articles to be divided into two ſorts, that is to ſay, ſuch as are commanded expreſly by God, and are neceſſary to our Salvation, and ſuch other, as although they be not expreſly commanded of God, nor neceſſary to our Salvation; yet being of a long continuance for a decent order and honeſt policy, prudently inſtituted, are for that ſame purpoſe and end to be obſerved in like manner; which ye following, after ſuch ſort as we have preſcribed unto you, ſhall not only attain that moſt charitable Unity and loving Concord, whereof ſhall enſue your incomparable commodity, profit, and lucre, as well ſpiritual as other; but alſo ye conforming your ſelves, and uſing theſe our ſaid Articles as is aforeſaid, ſhall not a little encourage us to take further travel, pains and labours for your commodities in all ſuch other matters, as in time to come may happen to occur, and as it ſhall be moſt to the honour of God and ours, the profit, tranquillity, and quietneſs of all you our moſt loving Subjects.

The Articles of our Faith.

F*Irſt*, As touching the chief and principal Articles of our Faith, ſith it is thus agreed as hereafter followeth by the whole Clergy of this our Realm, we will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People, by us committed to their Spiritual Charge, that they ought and muſt moſt conſtantly believe and defend all thoſe things to be true, which be comprehended in the whole body and Canon of the Bible, and alſo in the three Creeds or Symbols, whereof one was made by the Apoſtles, and is the common Creed which every man uſeth; the ſecond was made in the Holy Council of Nice, and is ſaid daily in the Maſs; and the third was made by Athanaſius, and is comprehended in the Pſalm Quicunque vult; and that they ought and muſt take and interpret all the ſame things according to the ſelf-ſame ſentence and interpretation, which the words of the ſelf-ſame Creeds or Symbols do purport, and the Holy approved Doctors of the Church do intreat and defend the ſame.

Item, That they ought and muſt repute, hold and take all the ſame things for the moſt Holy, moſt ſure, and moſt certain, and infallible words of God, and ſuch as neither ought, ne can be altered or convelled by any contrary Opinion or Authority.

Item,

Item, That they ought and muſt believe, repute and take all the Articles of our Faith contained in the ſaid Creeds to be ſo neceſſary to be believed for man's Salvation, that whoſoever being taught will not believe them as is aforeſaid, or will obſtinately affirm the contrary of them, he or they cannot be the very members of Chriſt and his Spouſe the Church, but be very Infidels or Hereticks, and members of the Devil, with whom they ſhall perpetually be Damned.

Item, That they ought and muſt moſt reverently and religiouſly obſerve and keep the ſelf ſame words, according to the very ſame form and manner of ſpeaking, as the Articles of our Faith be already conceived and expreſſed in the ſaid Creeds, without altering in any wiſe or varying from the ſame.

Item, That they ought and muſt utterly refuſe and condemn all theſe opinions contrary to the ſaid Articles, which were of long time paſt condemned in the four Holy Councils, that is to ſay, in the Council of Nice, Conſtantinople, Epheſus, and Chalcidonenſe, and all other ſith that time in any point conſonant to the ſame.

The Sacrament of Baptiſm.

Secondly, As touching the Holy Sacrament of Baptiſm, we will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our people committed by us unto their Spiritual Charge, that they ought and muſt of neceſſity believe certainly all thoſe things, which hath been always by the whole conſent of the Church approved, received and uſed in the Sacrament of Baptiſm; that is to ſay, that the Sacrament of Baptiſm was inſtituted and ordained in the New Teſtament by our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, as a thing neceſſary for the attaining of everlaſting life according to the ſaying of Chriſt, Niſi quis renatus fuerit ex Aqua & Spiritu Sancto, non poteſt intrare in Regnum cœlorum.

Item, That it is offered unto all men, as well Infants as ſuch as have the uſe of Reaſon, that by Baptiſm they ſhall have remiſſion of Sins, and the grace and favour of God, according to the ſaying of St. John, Qui crediderit & Baptizatus fuerit Salvus erit.

Item, That the promiſe of Grace and everlaſting Life, which promiſe is adjoyned unto the Sacrament of Baptiſm, pertaineth not only unto ſuch as have the uſe of Reaſon, but alſo to Infants, Innocents, and Children; and they ought therefore and muſt needs be Baptiſed: and that by the Sacrament of Baptiſm they do alſo obtain remiſſion of their Sins, the grace and favour of God, and be made thereby the very Sons and Children of God, inſomuch as Infants and Children dying in their Infancy ſhall undoubtedly be ſaved thereby, or elſe not.

Item, That Infants muſt needs be Chriſtened becauſe they be born in Original Sin, which Sin muſt needs be remitted; which cannot be done but by the Sacrament of Baptiſm, whereby they receive the Holy Ghoſt which exerciseth his Grace and Efficacy in them, and cleanseth and purifieth them from Sin by his most secret vertue and operation.

Item, That Children or Men once Baptized, can, ne ought ever to be Baptized again.

Item, That they ought to repute, and take all the Anabaptists and the Pelagians opinions contrary to the premisses, and every other Mans opinion agreeable unto the said Anabaptists or the Pelagians opinions in this behalf, for detestable Heresies, and utterly to be condemned.

Item, That Men or Children having the use of Reason, and willing and desiring to be Baptized, shall by the virtue of that holy Sacrament obtain the grace and remission of all their Sins, if they shall come thereunto perfectly and truly repentant and contrite of all their Sins before committed, and also perfectly and constantly confessing and believing all the Articles of our Faith, according as it was mentioned in the Article before, or else not.

And finally, if they shall also have firm credence and trust in the promise of God adjoyned to the said Sacrament, that is to say, that in and by this said Sacrament, which they shall receive, God the Father giveth unto them for his Son Jesus Christs sake, remission of all their Sins, and the Grace of the Holy Ghost, whereby they be newly regenerated and made the very Children of God, according to the saying of Christ and his Apostle St. Peter, Pœnitentiam agite & Baptizetur unusquisqu vestrum in nomine Jesu Christi in remissionem peccatorum, & accipietis donum Spiritus Sancti, and according also to the saying of St. Paul ad Titum 3 non ex operibus justitiæ quæ fecimus nos, sed secundum suam misericordiam, salvos nos fecit per lavacrum regenerationis & renovationis Spiritus Sancti, quem effudit in nos opilenter per Jesum Christum servatorem nostrum, ut justificati illius gratia hæredes efficiamur juxta spem vitæ eternæ.

The Sacrament of Penance.

Thirdly, Concerning the Sacrament of Penance, We will that all Bishops and Preachers shall instruct and teach our People committed by us unto their Spiritual Charge, that they ought and must most constantly believe, that that Sacrament was instituted of Christ in the New Testament as a thing so necessary for mans Salvation, that no man which after his Baptism is fallen again and hath committed deadly Sin, can without the same be saved, or obtain everlasting Life.

Item, That like as such men which after Baptism do fall again into Sin, if they do not Pennance in this Life, shall undoubtedly be damned; even so whensoever the same men shall convert themselves from the said naughty Life, and do such Pennance for the same as Christ requireth of them, they shall without doubt attain remission of their Sins and shall be saved.

Item, That this Sacrament of perfect Penance which Christ requireth eth of ſuch manner of perſons, conſiſteth of three parts, that is to ſay, Contrition, Confeſſion, with the amendment of the former Life, and a new obedient reconciliation unto the Laws and Will of God, that is to ſay, exteriour Acts in works of Charity according as they be commanded of God, which be called in Scripture, fructus digni pœnitentia.

Furthermore, as touching Contrition, which is the firſt part, We will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us unto their Spiritual Charge, that the ſaid Contrition conſiſteth in two ſpecial parts, which muſt always be conjoined together and cannot be diſlevered; that is to ſay, the penitent and contrite man muſt firſt knowledg the filthineſs and abomination of his own Sin, whereunto he is brought by hearing and conſidering of the Will of God declared in his Laws, and feeling and perceiving in his own conſcience that God is angry and diſpleaſed with him for the ſame; he muſt alſo conceive not only great ſorrow and inward ſhame that he hath ſo grievouſly offended God, but alſo great fear of Gods diſpleaſure towards him, conſidering he hath no works or merits of his own which he may worthily lay before God as ſufficient ſatisfaction for his Sins; which done, then afterwards with this fear, ſhame and ſorrow muſt needs ſucceed and be conjoyned, The ſecond part, viz. a certain faith, truſt and confidence of the mercy and goodneſs of God, whereby the penitent muſt conceive certain hope and faith that God will forgive him his Sins, and repute him juſtified and of the number of his Elect Children, not for the worthineſs of any merit or work done by the penitent, but for the only merits of the blood and paſſion of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

Item, That this certain faith and hope is gotten and alſo confirmed, and made more ſtrong by the applying of Chriſts words and promiſe, of his grace and favour contained in his Goſpel, and the Sacraments inſtituted by him in the New Teſtament; and therefore to attain this certain faith, the ſecond part of Penance is neceſſary, that is to ſay, Confeſſion to a Prieſt if it may be had; for the Abſolution given by the Prieſt was inſtituted of Chriſt to apply the promiſes of God's grace and favours to the Penitent.

Wherefore as touching Confeſſion, We will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us to their Spiritual Charge, that they ought and muſt certainly believe that the words of Abſolution pronounced by the Prieſt, be ſpoken by the Authority given to him by Chriſt in the Goſpel.

Item, That they ought and muſt give no leſs faith and credance to the ſame words of Abſolution ſo pronounced by the Miniſters of the Church, than they would give unto the very words and voyce of God himſelf if he ſhould ſpeak unto us out of Heaven, according to the ſaying of Chriſt, Quorum remiſeritis peccata, &c. & qui vos audit me audit.

Item, That in no ways they do contemn this Auricular Confeſſion which is made unto the Miniſters of the Church, but that they ought to to repute the ſame a very expedient and neceſſary mean, whereby they may require and ask this Abſolution at the Prieſts hands, at ſuch time as they ſhall find their Conſciences grieved with mortal Sin, and have occaſion ſo to do, to the intent they may thereby attain certain comfort and conſolation of their Conſciences.

As touching the third part of Penance, We will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us to their ſpiritual charge, that although Chriſt and his death be the ſufficient Oblation, Sacrifice, Satisfaction, and Recompence, for the which God the Father forgiveth and remitteth to all ſinners not only their ſin, but alſo Eternal Pain due for the ſame; yet all men truly penitent, contrite and confeſſed, muſt needs alſo bring forth the fruits of Penance, that is to ſay, Prayer, Faſting, Almſdeeds, and muſt make Reſtitution or Satisfaction in will and deed to their Neighbour, in ſuch things as they have done them wrong and injury in, and alſo muſt do all other good works of mercy and charity, and expreſs their obedient will in the executing and fulfilling of God's Commandments outwardly, when time, power and occaſion ſhall be Miniſtred unto them, or elſe they ſhall never be ſaved; for this is the expreſs Precept and Commandment of God, Agite fructus dignos pœnitentiæ; and St. Paul ſaith, Debitores ſumus, and in another place he ſaith, Caſtigo corpus meum & in ſervitutem redigo.

Item, That theſe precepts and works of Charity be neceſſary works to our Salvation, and God neceſſarily requireth that every penitent man ſhall perform the ſame, whenſoever time, power, and occaſion ſhall be miniſtred unto him ſo to do.

Item, That by Penance and ſuch good works of the ſame, we ſhall not only obtain everlaſting Life; but alſo we ſhall deſerve remiſſion or mitigation of theſe preſent pains and afflictions in this World, according to the ſaying of St. Paul, Si nos ipſi judicaremus, non judicaremur, a Domino; & Zacharias, Convertimini ad me & ego convertar ad vos; & Eſajas 58. frange eſurienti panem tuum &c. tunc uris velut hortos irriguus. Hæc ſunt inculcanda eccleſiis & ut exercitentur ad bene operandum, & in his ipſis operibus exerceant & confirment fidem, petentes & expectantes a Deo mitigationem præſentium calamitatum.

The Sacrament of the Altar.

FOurthly, As touching the Sacrament of the Altar, We will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us unto their ſpiritual charge, that they ought and muſt conſtantly believe that under the form and figure of Bread and Wine, which we there preſently do ſee and perceive by our outwand ſenſes, is verily, ſubſtantially, and really contained and comprehended, the very ſelf-ſame body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt which was born of the Virgin Mary and ſuffered upon the croſs of our Redemption, and that under the ſame form and figure of Bread and Wine, the very ſelf-ſame body and blood of Chriſt is corporally, really, and in the very ſubſtance exhibited, diſtributed and received of all them which receive the ſaid ſaid Sacrament; and that therefore the ſaid Sacrament is to be uſed with all due reverence and honour, and that every man ought firſt to prove and examine himſelf, and religiouſly to try and ſearch his own Conſcience, before he ſhall receive the ſame; according to the ſaying of St. Paul, Quiſquis ederit panem hunc aut biberit de poculo Domini indigne, reus erit corporis & ſanguinis Domini: probet autem ſeipſum homo, & ſic de pane illo edat & de poculo illo bibat: nam qui edit aut bibit indigne, judicium ſibiipſi manducat & bibit, non dijudicans corpus Domini.

Juſtification.

FIfthly, As touching the order and cauſe of our Juſtification, we will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us unto their ſpiritual charge, that this word Juſtification ſignifieth remiſſion of our Sins, and our acceptation or reconciliation into the grace and favour of God, that is to ſay, our perfect renovation in Chriſt.

Item, That ſinners attain this Juſtification by Contrition and Faith joyned with Charity, after ſuch ſort and manner as we before mentioned and declared; not as though our Contrition, or Faith, or any works proceeding thereof, can worthily merit or deſerve to attain the ſaid Juſtification; for the only mercy and grace of the Father, promiſed freely unto us for his Sons ſake Jeſus Chriſt, and the merits of his blood and paſſion be the only ſufficient and worthy cauſes thereof; and yet that notwithſtanding, to the attaining of the ſaid Juſtification, God requireth to be in us not only inward Contrition, perfect Faith, and Charity, certain hope and confidence, with all other ſpiritual graces and motions, which, as we ſaid before, muſt neceſſarily concur in remiſſion of our Sins, that is to ſay, our Juſtification: but alſo he requireth and commandeth us, that after we be juſtified we muſt alſo have good works of charity, and obedience towards God, in the obſerving and fulfilling outwardly of his Laws and Commandments: for although acceptation to everlaſting Life be conjoyned with Juſtification, yet our good works be neceſſarily required to the attaining of everlaſting Life; and we being juſtified, be neceſſarily bound, and it is our neceſſary duty to do good works, according to the ſaying of St. Paul, Debitores ſumus non carni ut ſecundum carnem vivamus, nam ſi ſecundum carnem vixerimus moriemur, ſin autem ſpiritu facta corporis, mortificaverimus, vivemus; etenim quicunque ſpiritu Dei ducuntur hi ſunt filii Dei: and Chriſt ſaith, ſi vis ad vitam ingredi ſerva mandata: and St. Paul ſaith, de malis operibus, qui talia agunt Regnum Dei non poſſidebunt. Wherefore we will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us unto their ſpiritual charge, that God neceſſarily requireth of us to do good works commanded by him; and that not only outward and civil works, but alſo the inward ſpiritual motions and graces of the Holy Ghoſt; that is to ſay, to dread and fear God, to love God, to have firm confidence and truſt in God, to invocate and call upon God, to have patience in all adverſities, to hate Sin, and to have certain purpoſe and will not to ſin again, and ſuch other like motions, and vertues: for Chriſt ſaith, Niſi abundaverit rit justitia vestra plusquam Scribarum & Pharisæorum, non intrabitis in Regnum Cœlorum; That is to say, we must not only do outward civil good works, but also we must have these foresaid inward spiritual motions consenting and agreeable to the Law of God.

Of Images.

AS touching Images, truth it is that the same have been used in the old Testament, and also for the greater abuses of them sometimes destroyed and put down; and in the new Testament they have been also allowed, as good Authors do declare. Wherefore we will that all Bishops and Preachers shall instruct and teach our People, committed by us to their spiritual charge, how they ought and may use them. And First, That this may be attributed unto them, that they be representers of vertue and good example, and that they also be by occasion the kindlers and stirers of Mens minds, and make Men often remember and lament their Sins and Offences, especially the Images of Christ and our Lady; and that therefore it is meet that they should stand in the Churches, and none otherwise to be esteemed: And to the intent the rude people should not from henceforth take such superstition, as in time past it is thought that the same hath used to do, we will that our Bishops and Preachers diligently shall teach them, and according to this Doctrine reform their abuses; for else there might fortune Idolatry to ensue, which God forbid. And as for Censing of them, and kneeling and offering unto them, with other like worshippings, although the same hath entred by devotion, and fallen to custome; yet the people ought to be diligently taught, that they in no ways do it, nor think it meet to be done to the same Images, but only to be done to God, and in his Honour, although it be done before the Images, whether it be of Christ, of the Cross, or of our Lady, or of any other Saint beside.

Of Honouring of Saints.

AS touching the Honouring of Saints, we will that all Bishops and Preachers shall instruct and teach Our People, committed by Us unto their Spiritual Charge, that Saints now being with Christ in Heaven, be to be honoured of Christian People on Earth; but not with that confidence and honour which are only due unto God, trusting to attain at their hands that which must be had only of God, but that they be thus to be honoured, because they be known the Elect Persons of Christ, because they be passed in Godly Life out of this transitory World, because they already do Reign in Glory with Christ: and most specially to laud and praise Christ in them for their excellent vertues which he planted in them, for example, of and by them to such as are yet in this World to live in Vertue and Goodness, and also not to fear to dye for Christ and his Cause, as some of them did; and finally to take them, in that they may, to be the advancers of our prayers and demands unto Christ. By these ways and such like be Saints to be honoured and had in reverence, and by none other.

Of Praying to Saints.

AS touching Praying to Saints, We will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us unto their Spiritual Charge, that albeit Grace, remiſſion of Sin and Salvation, cannot be obtained but of God only by the Mediation of our Saviour Chriſt, which is only ſufficient Mediator for our Sins; yet it is very laudable to pray to Saints in Heaven everlaſtingly living, whoſe Charity is ever permanent, to be interceſſors, and to pray for us and with us, unto Almighty God after this manner: All holy Angels and Saints in Heaven pray for us and with us unto the Father, that for his dear Son Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, we may have Grace of him, and remiſſion of our Sins, with an earneſt purpoſe, not wanting Ghoſtly Strength, to obſerve and keep his holy Commandments, and never to decline from the ſame again unto our lives end: And in this manner we may pray to our Bleſſed Lady, to St. John Baptiſt, to all and every of the Apoſtles or any other Saint particularly, as our Devotion doth ſerve us; ſo that it be done without any vain Superſtition, as to think that any Saint is more merciful, or will hear us ſooner than Chriſt, or that any Saint doth ſerve for one thing more than another, or is Patron of the ſame. And likewiſe we muſt keep Holy-days unto God, in memory of him and his Saints, upon ſuch days as the Church hath ordained their Memories to be celebrated; except they be mitigated and moderated by the aſſent or commandment of the Supream Head, to the Ordinaries, and then the Subjects ought to obey it.

Of Rites and Ceremonies.

AS concerning the Rites and Ceremonies of Chriſt's Church, as to have ſuch Veſtments in doing God ſervice as be and have been moſt part uſed, as Sprinkling of Holy-water to put us in remembrance of our Baptiſm, and the Blood of Chriſt ſprinkled for our Redemption upon the Croſs; Giving of holy Bread to put us in remembrance of the Sacrament of the Altar, that all Chriſten Men be one Body Myſtical of Chriſt, as the Bread is made of many grains, and yet but one Loaf, and to put us in remembrance of the receiving the holy Sacrament and Body of Chriſt, the which we ought to receive in right Charity; which in the beginning of Chriſts Church, Men did more often receive than they uſe now a days to do; bearing of Candles on Candlemas-day, in memory of Chriſt the ſpiritual Light, of whom Simeon did propheſie as is read in the Church that day; Giving of Aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, to put in remembrance every Chriſten Man in the beginning of Lent and Penance, that he is but Aſhes and Earth, and thereto ſhall return; which is right neceſſary to be uttered from henceforth in our Mother-tongue always on the ſame day; Bearing of Palms on Palm-Sunday, in memory of receiving of Chriſt into Jeruſalem a little before his death, that we may have the ſame deſire to receive him into our Hearts; creeping to the Croſs, and humbling our ſelves to Chriſt on Good-Friday before the Croſs, and offering thereunto Chriſt before the ſame, and kiſſing of it in memory of our Redemption by Chriſt made upon the Croſs; Setting up the Sepulcher of Chriſt, whoſe body after his death was buried; the Hallowing of the Font, and other like Exorciſms and Benedictions by the Miniſters of Chriſts Church: and all other like laudable Cuſtoms, Rights, and Ceremonies be not to be contemned and caſt away, but to be uſed and continued as things good and laudable, to put us in remembrance of thoſe ſpiritual things that they do ſignifie, not ſuffering them to be forgotten, or to be put in Oblivion, but renewing them in our Memories from time to time; but none of theſe Ceremonies have Power to remit Sin, but only to ſtir and lift up our minds unto God, by whom only our Sins be forgiven.

Of Purgatory.

FOraſmuch as due order of Charity requireth, and the Book of Maccabees, and divers ancient Doctors plainly ſhewing, that it is a very good and charitable deed to pray for Souls departed, and foraſmuch alſo as ſuch uſage hath continued in the Church ſo many years even from the beginning, We will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People, committed by us unto their Spiritual Charge, that no Man ought to be grieved with the continuance of the ſame, and that it ſtandeth with the very due Order of Charity, for a Chriſten Man to pray for Souls departed, and to commit them in our Prayers to Gods mercy, and alſo to cauſe others to pray for them in Maſſes, and Exequies, and to give Alms to others to pray for them, whereby they may be relieved, holpen, of ſome part of their pain: But foraſmuch as the place where they be, the name thereof, and kind of pains there, alſo be to us uncertain by Scripture; therefore this with all other things we remit to God Almighty, unto whoſe mercy it is meet and convenient for us to commend them, truſting that God accepteth our Prayers for them, referring the reſt wholly to God, to whom is known their eſtate and condition; wherefore it is much neceſſary that ſuch Abuſes be clearly put away, which under the name of Purgatory hath been advanced, as to make Men believe that through the Biſhop of Romes Pardon, Souls might clearly be delivered out of Purgatory, and all the pains of it, or that Maſſes ſaid at Scala Cœli, or otherwhere, in any place, or before any Image, might likewiſe deliver them from all their pain, and ſend them ſtreight to Heaven, and other like Abuſes.

Some Obſervations on the former Subſcriptions.

A The Abbots of Gloſſenbury and Reading ſubſcribe with the reſt: by which it appears that they complied in the changes that were made, as readily as others did.

B The Abbots writ generally ſo ill that it is very hard to read their Subſcriptions: Some of them I could by no means know what to make of.

C There are of 50 of the lower houſe of Convocation: of thoſe there are 25 Archdeacons, 4 Deans of Cathedrals, 3 Deans of Collegial Churches, 17 Procurators for the Clergy, and one Maſter of a Colledge.

Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.

Firſt, What Cauſes, Reaſons, or Conſiderations hath or might move any man to deſire to have the Biſhop of Rome reſtored in any point to his pretended Monarchy, or to repugn againſt the Laws and Statutes of this Realm made for the ſetting forth of the Kings Title of Supream Head?

2. Item, Whether a Man offending deadly after he is Baptized, may obtain remiſſion of Sins, by any other way than by Contrition, through Grace?

3. Item, If the Clergy know that the common ſort of Men have them in a higher eſtimation, becauſe they are perſwaded, that it lyeth in the Will and Power of Prieſts to remit, or not remit Sins at their pleaſure, whether in ſuch caſe the ſaid Clergy offend if they wink at this, and voluntarily ſuffer the People to continue in this Opinion?

4. Item, Whether a Sinner being ſorry and contrite for his Sins, and forthwith dying, ſhall have as high a place in Heaven, as if he had never offended?

5. Item, Whether any, and what difference may be Aſſigned betwixt two Men, whereof the one being very ſorry and contrite for his Sins dieth without Abſolution of the Prieſt, and the other which being contrite is alſo abſolved by the Prieſt and ſo dieth?

Item,

Item, If it may appear that the common people have a greater affiance or truſt in outward Rites or Ceremonies than they ought to have, and that they eſteem more vertue in Images and adorning of them, kiſſing their feet, or offering Candles unto them, than they ſhould eſteem, and that yet the Curats knowing the ſame, and fearing the loſs of their offerings, and ſuch other temporal commodities, do rather encourage the People to continue after this ſort, than teach them the Truth in the premiſes according to Scripture; what the Kings Highneſs and his Parliament may do, and what they are bound in Conſcience to do in ſuch caſe? 6.

Item, Whether now in time of the new Law the Tithes or Tenth be due to Curats by the Laws of God, or of Man; and if the ſame be due by the Laws of Man, what Mans Laws they be? 7.

Item, Whether the Clergy only, and none but they ought to have voices in general Councils? 8.

Item, Whether the 19*th* Canon in the Council of Chalcedon, wherein is contained that one Clerk may not ſue another before any ſecular Judge, but only before his Biſhop, and ſuch other Canons of like effect, have been generally received or not? and whether the ſame be contrary to the Kings Prerogative and Laws of this Realm, and whether it be expedient that it were declared by the Parliament that the ſaid Canons being at no time received, eſpecially within this Realm, be void and of none effect? 9.

Item, Of the 24*th* Canon of the ſaid Council, wherein is contained that Monaſteries once conſecrated, by the Biſhop, may not after be made dwelling houſes for Laymen, whether that Canon have been received and obſerved, and whether the ſame be againſt the Power of the King and Authority of his Parliament? 10.

Item, If it may appear that the Biſhops have not, ne yet do maturely examine and diligently inquire of the Converſation, and Learning of ſuch as be ordered or admitted to Cures by them, but rather without examination or inquiſition indiſtinctly admit perſons unable, whereof enſueth great peril of Souls, and innumerable inconveniences otherways, what the Kings Highneſs or his Parliament ought to do, or may do for reformation in the Premiſſes? 11.

Item, If ſuch as have Deanries, Arch-Deaconries, Chanterſhips, and other Offices or Promotions of the Clergy, uſe not themſelves in their own perſons after ſuch ſort as the primary inſtitution of theſe Offices of Promotions require, and according to the Wills of them that endowed them, what the King and his Parliament may do or ought to do in this caſe? 12.

Item, For what cauſes and to what ends and purpoſes ſuch Offices and Promotions of the Clergy were firſt inſtituted? 13.

Item, If Curates having Benefices with cure, for their more bodily eaſe, refuſe to dwell upon any of their ſaid Cures, and remain in idleneſs continually in Cathedral or Collegial Churches upon their Prebends, whether it be in this caſe expedient, that the Kings Highneſs or his Parliament take any Order for the redreſs of the ſame? 14.

Item,

15. Item, Of the Sacraments of Confirmation, Order, Matrimony, and extream Unction, what the external Signs and inward Graces be in every of the ſaid Sacraments, what promiſes be made to the receivers of them by God, and of what efficacy they be of and energy of themſelves?

WHether Confirmation be Inſtituted by Chriſt?

Reſpon. There is no place in Scripture that declareth this Sacrament to be inſtituted of Chriſt.

Firſt, For the places alledged for the ſame, be no Inſtitutions but Acts and Deeds of the Apoſtles.

Secondly, Theſe Acts were done by a ſpecial Gift given to the Apoſtles for the confirmation of God's Word at that time.

Thirdly, The ſaid ſpecial Gift doth not now remain with the Succeſſors of the Apoſtles.

What is the External?

The Church uſeth Chriſma for the exterior Sign, but the Scripture maketh no mention thereof.

What is the Efficacy of this Sacrament?

The Biſhop in the name of the Church doth invocate the Holy Ghoſt to give Strength and conſtancy, with other ſpiritual Gifts, unto the perſon confirmed: ſo that the efficacy of this Sacrament is of ſuch value, as is the Prayer of the Biſhop made in the name of the Church.

I Answer, That the facts and deeds that be expressed in the Books of the Apostles, with the effects ensuing, by the imposition of their Hands, upon them that before had received Remission of their Sins, joyned with the promises of Christ, made to his Church, and the continual belief of the University of the same Catholick Church from the time of the Apostles hitherto, without contradiction of any Man (ignorants and suspects of Heresie only excepted) maketh us, and in my opinion, without prejudice of other Mens opinion, ought to suffice, to make all Men that hath promised to believe the Catholick Church, assuredly to think that God hath made the promises of the said Grace.

IV. Some Considerations offered to the King by Cranmer, to Induce him to proceed to a further Reformation.

PLeaseth it your Highness graciously to consider, deeply to ponder and weigh by your high Wisdom these Considerations following. Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 4.

First, How no great thing is to be determined, principally matters of Christs Religion, without long, great, and mature deliberation.

Secondly, How evil it hath succeeded when in Provincial, yea or yet in General Councils, Men have gone about to set forth any thing as in the force of Gods Law, without the manifest Word of God, or else without apparent Reasons infallibly deduced out of the Word of God.

Thirdly, How all Christened Regions are now full of Learned Men in the Scripture, which can well espie out and judge how things that be, or shall be set forth, are agreeable with Scripture or not.

Fourthly, Of what Audacity Men be of now adays, which will not spare to write against high Princes, as well as against private persons, without any respect to their high Estates, only weighing the equity or the iniquity of the Cause.

Fifthly, How not only Men of the New Learning (as they be called) but also the very Papistical Authors, do allow that by the Word of God, Priests be not forbidden to Marry, although they were not ignorant that many expounders of Scripture were of the contrary judgment.

Sixthly, How that it is not possible that all Learned Men should be of

of one mind, ſentence, and opinion, as long as the cockle is mingled with the wheat, the Godly with the Ungodly, which certainly ſhall be as long as the World endureth.

Seventhly, How variety of Opinions have been occaſion of the opening of many Verities heretofore taken for Hereſie, yea and yet ſo eſteemed and taken of many, in other Regions; as namely the uſurped Authority of the Biſhop of Rome, hath by that occaſion come into Light, with the effuſion of the blood not of a few, ſuch as were the firſt ſtirrers up thereof.

Laſtly, There be alſo other Opinions not ſpoken of, which have made, and yet will make as much variance in your Graces Realm as any of them treated of, namely, Whether the Holy Scripture teacheth any Purgatory to us after this Life or not? Whether the ſame Scripture teacheth the Invocation of dead Saints? Whether there be any unwritten Verities neceſſary to be believed not written in Scripture, nor deducted by infallible Arguments out of the open places of Scripture? Whether there be any ſatisfactions beſide the ſatisfaction of Chriſt? Whether Free-Will by its own ſtrength may diſpoſe it ſelf to Grace of a conveniency (as it is ſaid) de congruo? Whether it be againſt Scripture to kiſs the Image of Chriſt in the Honour of him? And generally whether Images may be uſed any other way than your Grace ſetteth forth in your Injunctions?

Whether in conſideration of the Premiſſes it may pleaſe your Highneſs to ſuſpend your judgment for a time, and not to determine the Marriage of Prieſts to be againſt Scripture, but rather to put both parts to ſilence, commanding them neither to preach, diſpute, nor openly to talk thereof under pain of, &c. And in caſe theſe Premiſſes do not move your Highneſs to ſtay, that then it may pleaſe the ſame to grant that the Article of Prieſts Marriage may be openly diſputed in both Univerſities, under indifferent Judges, before it be determined. All the Arguments of the contrary Party firſt to be delivered in writing to the Defenders twelve days before the Diſputation; to the intent they may the more maturely and deliberately make anſwer to the ſame; and they that ſhall enter as Defenders into this diſputation, to do it under this condition, that if their Judges decern them to be overcome, they be right well contented to ſuffer death, therefore: And if their Adverſaries cannot prove their purpoſe, their deſire is no more but that it may pleaſe your Highneſs to leave your moſt humble Subjects to the liberty that Gods Word permitteth them in that behalf; and your ſaid humble Subjects ſhall pray unto Almighty God for the preſervation of your moſt Royal Eſtate long to continue to Gods Glory and Honour.

V. A Declaration made of the Functions and Divine Inſtitution of Biſhops and Prieſts.

AN ORIGINAL.

AS touching the Sacrament of Holy Orders, we will that all Biſhops and Preachers ſhall inſtruct and teach our People committed by us unto their Spiritual Charge.

Firſt, How that Chriſt and his Apoſtles did inſtitute and ordain in the New Teſtament, that beſides the Civil Powers and Governance of Kings and Princes, which is called in Scripture, Poteſtas gladij, the Power of the Sword, there ſhould be alſo continually in the Church Militant, certain other Miniſters or Officers, which ſhould have Spiritual Power, Authority and Commiſſion under Chriſt, to preach and teach the Word of God, unto his People, and to diſpence and adminiſter the Sacraments of God unto them; and by the ſame to confer and give the Grace of the Holy Ghoſt, to conſecrate the bleſſed body of Chriſt in the Sacrament of the Altar, to looſe and abſoil from Sin, all Perſons which be duly penitent and ſorry for the ſame; to bind and excommunicate ſuch as be guilty in manifeſt Crimes and Sins, and will not amend their Defaults; to order and conſecrate others in the ſame Room, Order and Office, whereunto they be called and admitted themſelves; and finally to feed Chriſts People like good Paſtors and Rectors, as the Apoſtles calleth them, with their wholſome doctrine, and by their continual exhortations and monitions to reduce them from Sin and Iniquity, ſo much as in them lyeth, and to bring them unto the perfect knowledg, the perfect love and dread of God, and unto the perfect charity of their Neighbours. Cott: Libr. Cleop. E. 5.

Item, That this Office, this Miniſtration, this Power and Authority is no tyrannical Power, having no certain Laws or Limits, within the which it ought to be contained, nor yet none abſolute Power, but it is a moderate Power, ſubject, determined, and reſtrained unto thoſe certain Limits and Ends for the which the ſame was appointed by Gods Ordinance; which, as was ſaid before, is only to adminiſter and diſtribute unto the members of Chriſts Myſtical Body, ſpiritual and everlaſting things; that is to ſay, the pure and heavenly doctrine of Chriſts Goſpel, and the Graces conferred in his Sacraments: And therefore this ſaid Power and Adminiſtration is called in ſome places of Scripture Donum & Gratia, a Gift and a Grace; in ſome places it is called Claves ſive poteſtas Clavium, that is to ſay, the Keys, or the Power of the Keys, whereby is ſignified a certain limited Office reſtrained unto the execution of a ſpecial Function or Miniſtration, according to the ſaying of St. Paul in his first Chap. of his Epistle to the Romans, and in the fourth Chap. of his Epistle to Timothy, and also in the fourth Chap. of his Epistle to the Ephes. Where he writes in this Sentence; Quum ascendisset Christus in altum, captivam duxit captivitatem, & dedit Dona hominibus, dedit autem, alios quidem Apostolos, alios vero Prophetas, alios vero Evangelistas, alios autem Pastores ac Doctores, ad instaurationem sanctorum, in opus Administrationis, in ædificationem corporis Christi, donec perveniamus omnis in unitatem Fidei & agnitionis Filii Dei, in virum perfectum, in mensuram ætatis plene adultæ Christi. That is to say, "when Christ ascended into Heaven, he subdued and vanquished very Captivity herself, and led or made her thrall and captive, and distributed and gave divers heavenly Gifts and Graces unto Men here on Earth; and among all, he made some the Apostles, some Priests, some Evangelists, some Pastors and Doctores, to the intent they should execute the work and office of their Administration, to the instauration, instruction, and edifying of the Members of Christs Mystical Body: And that they should also not cease from the Execution of their said Office, until all the said Members were not only reduced and brought unto Unity of the Faith, and the knowledg of the Son of God, but also that they were come unto a perfect State, and full Age therein, that is to say, until they were so established and confirmed in the same, that they could no more afterwards be wavering therein, and be led or carried like children, in any contrary Doctrine or Opinion, by the craft or subtile Perswasion of the false Pastors and Teachers, which go about by craft, to bring them into erroneous Opinions, but that they should constantly follow the true Doctrine of Christs Gospel, growing and encreasing continually by Charity unto a perfect Member of that Body, whereof Christ is the very Head, in whom if the whole Body, that is to say, If every part and member be grown and come unto his perfect Estate, not all in like, but every one according to the Gift and Quality which is deputed unto it, and so to be compacted, united, and corporated together in the said Body, no doubt but that whole Body and every part thereof shall thereby be made the more perfect and the more strong, by reason of that natural Love and Charity, which one Member so united in the Body hath unto the other. By which words it appeareth evidently not only that St. Paul accounted and numbred this said Power and Office of the Pastors and Doctors among the proper and special Gifts of the Holy Ghost, but also it appeareth that the same was a limited Power and Office, ordained specially and only for the causes and purposes before rehearsed.

Item, That this Power, Office, and Administration is necessary to be preserved here in Earth for three special and principal Causes. First, for that it is the Commandment of God it should be so, as it appeareth in sundry places of Scripture. Secondly, for that God hath instituted and ordained none other ordinary mean or instrument, whereby he will make us partakers of the Reconciliation which is by Christ, and confer and give the Graces of his holy Spirit unto us, and make us the right Inheritors of everlasting Life, there to Reign with him for ever ever in Glory, but only his Word and Sacraments; and therefore the Office and Power to minister the said Word and Sacraments, may in no wise be suffered to perish, or to be abolished, according to the saying of St. Paul, Quomodo credent in eum de quo non audierunt? quomodo autem audient sine prædicante? quomodo autem prædicabunt nisi missi fuerint? sicut scriptum est, quam speciosi super montes pedes Evangelizantium Pacem, Annunciantium bona! Thirdly, Because the said Power and Office or Function hath annexed unto it assuredly Promises of excellent and inestimable things; for thereby is conferred and given the Holy Ghost with all his Graces, and finally our Justification and everlasting Life, according to the saying of St. Paul, Non me pudet Evangelii Jesu Christi, potentia siquidem est Dei ad salutem omni credenti; that is to say, I am not ashamed of the Room and Office which I have given unto me by Christ, to preach his Gospel, for it is the Power of God, that is to say, the elect Organ or Instrument ordained by God and endued with such vertue and efficacy, that it is able to give and minister effectually everlasting Life unto all those that will believe and obey unto the same.

Item, That this Office, this Power and Authority was committed and given by Christ and his Apostles unto certain Persons only, that is to say, unto Priests and Bishops, whom they did elect, call, and admit thereunto by their Prayers and Imposition of their hands.

Secondly, We will that all Bishops and Preachers shall instruct and teach our People committed unto their Spiritual Charge, that the Sacrament of Order may worthily be called a Sacrament, because it is a holy Rite, or Ceremony instituted by Christ and his Apostles in the New Testament, and doth consist of two parts, like as the other Sacraments of the Church do; that is to say, of a Spiritual and an Invisible Grace, and also an outward and a visible Sign. The invisible Gift or Grace conferred in this Sacrament, is nothing else but the Power, the Office and the Authority before mentioned: the visible and outward Sign, is, the Prayer and Imposition of the Bishops hands, upon the person which receiveth the said Gift or Grace. And to the intent the Church of Christ should never be destituted of such Ministers, as should have and execute the said power of the Keys, it was also ordained and commanded by the Apostles, that the same Sacrament should be applyed and ministred by the Bishop from time to time, unto such other persons as had the Qualities which the Apostle very diligently descryve; as it appeareth evidently in the third Chap. of the first Epistle of St. Paul to Tim. and his Epistle unto Titus. And surely this is the whole vertue and efficacy, and the cause also of the institution of this Sacrament as it is found in the New Testament; for albeit the Holy Fathers of the Church which succeeded the Apostles, minded to beautifie and ornate the Church of Christ with all those things which were commendable in the Temple of the Jews, did devise not only certain other Ceremonies than be before rehearsed, as Tonsures, Rasures, Unctions, and such other Observances to be used in the Administration of the said Sacraments, but did also institute certain inferiour orders or degrees, as Janitors, Lectors, Exorcists, Acolits, and Subdeacons, and deputed to every one of thoſe certain Offices to execute in the Church, wherein they followed undoubtedly the Example and Rites uſed in the Old Teſtament; yet the truth is, that in the New Teſtament there is no mention made of any degrees or diſtinctions in Orders, but only of Deacons or Miniſters, and of Prieſts or Biſhops: nor is there any word ſpoken of any other Ceremony uſed in the conferring of this Sacrament, but only of Prayer, and the Impoſition of the Biſhops hands.

VI. A Letter of Melanthons, to perſwade the King to a further Reformation. An Original.

S. D. Sereniſſime & Inclyte Rex, Etſi audieramus Romanum Epiſcopum omnibus artificiis incendere Cæſaris Carololi & Regis Gallici animos adverſus Britannos & Germanos, tamen quia ſpero Deum hæc pericula gubernaturum eſſe, & defenſurum tranquilitatem tuam, ſcripſi in alteris literis de Eccleſiarum emendatione, quam ſi tempora ſinent, rogo ut Regia Majeſtas tua ſuſcipiat. Poſtea adjeci hanc Epiſtolam, non impudentia, ſed optimo ſtudio, & amore cum Eccleſiarum, cum Regiæ Majeſtatis tuæ incitatus: quare per Chriſtum obteſtor Regiam Majeſtatem tuam ut meam libertatem boni conſulat. Sæpe cogito Britannicæ Eccleſiæ primordia, & cæteras laudes: hinc enim propagata eſt doctrina Chriſtiana in magnam Germaniæ & Galliæ partem; imo Britannicæ Eccleſiæ beneficium fuit, quod primum Romanæ Provinciæ liberatæ ſunt perſecutione. Hæc primum nobis Imperatorem pium Conſtantinum dedit: magna hæc gloria eſt veſtri nominis. Nunc quoque Regia Majeſtas tua primum heroica magnitudine animi oſtendit ſe veritati patrocinaturum eſſe excuſſit Romani Epiſcopi tyrannidem, quare veterem puritatem Eccleſiæ veſtræ maxime optarim reſtitui integram. Sed animadverto iſtic eſſe quoſdam qui veteres abuſus ortos aut confirmatos a Romano Epiſcopo adhuc mordicùs tenent. Mirum eſt autem Autore abuſuum ejecto ipſa tamen venena retineri; qua in re illud etiam periculi eſt, quod illi ipſi aut eorum imitatores aliquando revocaturi poteſtatem Romani Epiſcopi videntur, ſi populus hunc putavit eſſe Magiſtrum Eccleſiarum, incurrunt enim Ritus in oculos & admonent de autore, ut Solonis memoria cum legibus Athenis & propagata & jucunda fuit. Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.

Gaudebam igitur in Edicto recens iſtic propoſito de Religione, promitti publicam deliberationem & emendationem de Eccleſiarum Ritibus & Legibus, eaque ſententia mitigavit Decreti acerbitatem; quanquam enim laudo pietatem, quod errores prohibentur, qui pugnant cum doctrina Catholicæ Eccleſiæ quam & nos profitemur; tamen doleo ad eas cauſas adjectum eſſe articulum, in quo precipitur omnium Rituum uſitatorum & Cælibatus obſervatio. Primum enim multi transferrent Edicti Autoritatem ad ſtabiliendos abuſus Miſſæ. Deinde in univerſum confirmatur pertinacia eorum quâ Doctrinæ noſtræ ſunt iniquiores, & debilitantur ſtudia piorum. Auguſtinus queritur ſua ætate jam duriorem fuiſſe ſervitutem Chriſtianam quam Judaicam, quanto erit aſperior ſervitus, ſi ſuperſtitioſiores inepiæ, ut reptatio ad crucem aut res ſimiles, munientur corporum ſuppliciis? Gerſon ſcribit prodeſſe piis, qui tamen ſuperſtitioſius obſervant Ritus, ut invitentur ad eos violandos, ut uſu & exemplo dediſcant ſuperſtitionem.

Sed munio tranquilitatem, dices, & nolo diſſimilitudine Rituum excitari diſcordias. Ego de piis & modeſtis loquor qui humanas traditiones ſine tumultibus violant, non de his qui in cætu publico ſeditioſe tranquillum populum aut concitant aut perturbant. Extant autem antea leges de ſeditioſis, nec ſtatim violatio inepti & non neceſſarii Ritus judicanda eſt ſeditioſa, attamen hac in re non ſolum tranquillitatis, ſed etiam piarum Conſcientiarum ratio habenda eſt: eſt enim tenera res Conſcientia, facile langueſcit perculſa potentum judiciis.

Nec ignoro quoſdam novo jam uti genere ſapientiæ, excuſant abuſus, & leniunt eos aſtute affictis interpretationibus, ut habeant ſpecioſam cauſam cur eos retineant; ſicut nefarios abuſus excuſat Autor reformationis Colonienſis, ut campanarum conſecrationem & ſimiles impoſturas. Quam multa ſunt in fabuloſis hiſtoriis Sanctorum, ut Chriſtophori, Georgii, quæ, ut Poemata, continent venuſtiſſimas Allegorias; nec tamen propter has cogendæ ſunt Eccleſiæ ut illas poeticas perſonas colant.

Erat in Egypto Sacrum cum fici maturuiſſent, populus enim in templo edens recentes ficus, addebat canticum his verbis, Dulcis veritas. Huic Ritui facile eſt bellam ſignificationem addere, eumq; accommodare ad laudem Verbi Dei, nec tamen propterea hic mos in Eccleſias revocandus eſt; atqui hanc novam ſophiſticam exoriri paſſim videmus. Sic in Italia dicuntur abuſibus patrocinari, Contarenus, Sadoletus, & Polus Cardinalis; nam hi præcipue ſuſceperunt ſibi jam has partes defendendæ Romanæ impietatis, & hanc ducunt eſſe magnam ingenii laudem fucos illinire vitioſis Ritibus, putant q; ſe his ineptiis Dionyſii Theologiam Myſticam renovare. Hæc Sophiſtica, niſi prudentes gubernatores Eccleſiarum obſiſtent, parit horribilem confuſionem religionum, & rurſus obruet veritatem. Donec flagitantur humani Ritus tanquam neceſſarii, confirmatur prava opinio de cultu; ideo Paulus tam vehementer non modo opinionem, ſed Ritus ipſos Leviticos inſectatus eſt, prævidebat enim non excuti poſſe ſuperſtitionem, ſi Ritus manerent, quare graviſſime inquit, ſi circumcidimini, Chriſtus vobis nihil proderit.

Retineatur ergo ſimplex & perſpicua ſententia de libertate in adiaphoris, & doceant concionatores quæ ſcandala vitanda ſint; retineantur Ritus divinitus inſtituti, & aliquæ humanæ traditiones utiles ad bonum ordinem, ut Paulus loquitur, & ſit modus Cæremoniarum quæ habeant conjunctam gravitatem & elegantiam; decet autem abeſſe ab Eccleſiis barbariem: Cæteri inutiles & inepti Ritus non duriter flagitentur.

Deinde quantum periculi adfert conſcientiis prohibitio conjugii, nec ignorat Regia Majeſtas tua, Legem de cælibatu perpetuo tantum Romæ natam eſſe: extant Epiſtolæ Epiſcopi Tarraconenſis defendentes conjugia Presbyterorum in Hiſpania contra Romanum Epiſcopum. In Germania ante annos quingentos adhuc Sacerdotes fuerunt mariti, adeoque ægre tulerunt ſibi eripi hanc libertatem, ut in Epiſcopum Moguntinum recitantem Edictum Romanum tumultuantes impetum fecerint, quara Epiſcopus fugere coactus recitationem omiſit. Erat Autor Edicti Gregorius ſeptimus qui cuilibet Tyrannorum veterum audacia & impietate par fuit. Hic cum longo & funeſto bello civili noſtros Germanicos imperatores implicuiſſet, ſimul etiam Eccleſias Tyrannide oppreſſit. Audio & in Anglia Sacerdotes fuiſſe maritos: deniq; notæ ſunt Hiſtoriæ, quæ exempla ſatis multa continent; quare miror in Edicto citari Epiſtolam ad Corinthios, cum hæc longe aliud tradat de conjugio, ac præcipiat conjugium iis qui non ſunt idonei ad cælibatum.

Nec objicienda ſunt vota quæ & expreſſe pugnant cum divinis mandatis, & trahunt ſecum multiplicem ſuperſtitionem & morum corruptionem; videmus enim qualis ſit vita multorum Sacerdotum cælibum:

itaq; non ſine dolore aliquo legi in Edicto, quod hi qui Uxores duxerunt accuſantur Levitatis, nam hoc convicio cauſâ noſtra prægravari videtur, quæ tamen Eccleſiæ neceſſaria eſt, ut Conjugii dignitas clarius conſpiciatur, ut ſuperſtitioſi cultus votorum reprehendantur, ut arceantur libidines. Non enim impurus cœlibatus, ſed honeſta & pia conjugum conſuetudo, eſt caſtitas Deo grata, ſicut Chriſtus ſua voce divinam conjunctionem appellat connubium, inquiens, Quos Deus conjunxit, &c. Diſcamus Dei Ordinationem in natura magnifacere, eaque reverenter uti, non fingamus ipſi novos cultus ſine Verbo Dei; de quo genere Paulus nominatim concionatur, cum ad Timotheum ſcribens duriter reprehendit eos qui prohibent nuptias.

Propheta Daniel inſignes notas addidit Antichriſto duas, cum ait colet Deum Maoſim argento & auro; & Deum Patrum ſuorum non intelliget, & Mulieres non curabit. Hæc quadrant maxime ad Romanos mores: Miſſarum abuſus & Sanctorum cultus pepererunt immenſas opes & Regiam potentiam. Nova numina confecta ſunt, adorantur aureæ & argenteæ ſtatuæ, & auro atque argento ornantur. Deinde accedit Lex de cœlibatu, unde magna corruptio morum orta eſt. Hæ notæ cui genti, cui Regno uſquam competunt niſi factioni Epiſcopi Romani? qui cum ſit Antichriſtus, pio & forti animo ipſius autoritati & legibus adverſandum eſt.

Porro fœliciter cœpit Regia Majeſtas tua quædam emendare, ſuſtulit aliqua idola quæ impie colebantur: Obteſtor ergo Regiam Majeſtatem tuam, ut reliquam Impietatem Romanam etiam ex Eccleſiis tollat. Exempla teſtantur ingentibus victoriis ornatos eſſe Reges qui ſuſtulerunt Idololatriam, ac ſæpe teſtatur Deus quantopere requirat hunc cultum, ut removeantur ſuperſtitiones, & pro hoc officio ingentia præmia pollicetur: quare Deus etiam defendet Regiam Majeſtatem tuam, ſi ut Ezechias & cæteri pii Reges impios ritus ſuſtuleris. Audit Regia Majeſtas tua in Belgico & alibi immanem ſævitiam exerceri adverſus pios; & hæc Tyrannis gignit alia multa vitia, ſtabilit Idololatriam, delet veram invocationem, extinguit penitus veram Religionem; cumq; deſint boni Doctores, multi in populo fiunt palam ἄθεοι. Conſtat enim pæne Ethnicam licentiam eſſe in Belgico, alii ſuperſtitioſi natura, alii Fanaticas opiniones Anbaptiſtarum amplectuntur. Talis eſt in Belgico ſtatus, quod quidem floret pace, otio, opibus; adfluunt luxu ditiores, ita ſe beatos eſſe putant, nec interea proſpiciunt quot pœnæ ipſis impendeant: Deus autem haud dubie tantam impietatem & crudelitatem atrociter puniet. Nollem igitur in Regno tuo renovari aſperitatem adverſus pios, quam ita prohibebit Regia Majeſtas tua ſi Edictum leniet & Eccleſias conſtituere perget. Deinde ut etiam ad poſteritatem, animi abhorreant a Tyrannide Romani Epiſcopi, plurimum refert illas leges tolli, quæ ſunt nervi autoritatis ipſius; magna vero adminicula potentiæ Romanorum Epiſcorum fuerunt, Miſſarum abuſus, & Cœlibatus, quæ ſi durabunt aliquando poterunt præbere occaſionem iis qui depravatæ ſunt opinionis Romanæ Aulæ, ut ad eam rurſus inclinationem faciant. Id caveri quantum referat, ſi Doctrinæ Puritas conſervanda eſt, ſatis intelligit Regia Majeſtas tua. Verum adhuc eſt quod Juvenalis de Romana Aula ſcripſit, hic fiunt homines, &c. imbuti eo loci malis artibus, contumaciam ſingularem adverſus Reges inde referunt, ut multa exempla teſtantur. Hanc Epiſtolam loquaciorem ac liberiorem ut Regia Majeſtas tua

Nec ignoro quoſdam novo jam uti genere ſapientiæ, excuſant abuſus, & leniunt eos aſtute affictis interpretationibus, ut habeant ſpecioſam cauſam cur eos retineant; ſicut nefarios abuſus excuſat Autor reformationis Colonienſis, ut campanarum conſecrationem & ſimiles impoſturas. Audit Regia Majeſtas tua in Belgico & alibi immanem ſævitiam exerceri adverſus pios; & hæc Tyrannis gignit alia multa vitia, ſtabilit Idololatriam, delet veram invocationem, extinguit penitus veram Religionem; cumq; deſint boni Doctores, multi in populo fiunt palam ἄθεοι. Conſtat enim pæne Ethnicam licentiam eſſe in Belgico, alii ſuperſtitioſi natura, alii Fanaticas opiniones Anbaptiſtarum amplectuntur. Talis eſt in Belgico ſtatus, quod quidem floret pace, otio, opibus; adfluunt luxu ditiores, ita ſe beatos eſſe putant, nec interea proſpiciunt quot pœnæ ipſis impendeant: Deus autem haud dubie tantam impietatem & crudelitatem atrociter puniet. Nollem igitur in Regno tuo renovari aſperitatem adverſus pios, quam ita prohibebit Regia Majeſtas tua ſi Edictum leniet & Eccleſias conſtituere perget. Deinde ut etiam ad poſteritatem, animi abhorreant a Tyrannide Romani Epiſcopi, plurimum refert illas leges tolli, quæ ſunt nervi autoritatis ipſius; magna vero adminicula potentiæ Romanorum Epiſcorum fuerunt, Miſſarum abuſus, & Cœlibatus, quæ ſi durabunt aliquando poterunt præbere occaſionem iis qui depravatæ ſunt opinionis Romanæ Aulæ, ut ad eam rurſus inclinationem faciant. Id caveri quantum referat, ſi Doctrinæ Puritas conſervanda eſt, ſatis intelligit Regia Majeſtas tua. Verum adhuc eſt quod Juvenalis de Romana Aula ſcripſit, hic fiunt homines, &c. imbuti eo loci malis artibus, contumaciam ſingularem adverſus Reges inde referunt, ut multa exempla teſtantur. Hanc Epiſtolam loquaciorem ac liberiorem ut Regia Majeſtas tua boni consulat oro. Precor autem Deum & Dominum nostrum Iesum Christum, ut Regiam Majestatem tuam servet & defendat, ac gubernet ad salutem Ecclesiæ. Bene & feliciter valeat Regia Majestas tua. Ex Francofordia

Cott. Libr. Cleop. E. 5.

SErenissime & Potentissime Rex, Domine Clementissime, etsi Serenissimam Regiam Majestatem vestram maximorum negotiorum mole, tum ad Regnum ac Provincias proprias Majestatis Vestræ pertinentium, tum etiam exterorum Regum, Principum, & Potentatuum gravissimis causis, quæ ad Regiam Majestatem Vestram pæne quotidie devolvuntur, obrui non ignoremus; nosque pro nostra erga Regiam Majestatem Vestram debita observantia ut par est, nihil minus velimus aut cogitemus, quam Serenissimam Regiam Majestatem Vestram vel mittendis literis crebrioribus, vel ulla alia re interturbare & a Reipublicæ curis impedire, tamen certis quibusdam de causis, quas Serenissimæ Regiæ Majestati Vestræ probaturos nos speramus, duximus iterum ad Serenissimam Regiam Majestatem Vestram literas dandas esse, nihil dubitantes quin Vestra Serenissima Regia Majestas eas pro sua insigni bonitate, sapientia, doctrina, atque favore sinceriores Religionis, benigne acceptura sit. Cum enim ab Illustrissimis Principibus nostris nobis injuncta mandata Vestræ Serenissimæ Majestati jampridem exposuerimus, & præterea postulante Majestate Vestra cum quibusdam ejusdem Reverendissimis & Eruditissimis Episcopis & Theologiæ Doctoribus, de Articulis Religionis Christianæ per duos pæne menses sermones contulerimus, ac Dei beneficio res eo perducta fuerit, ut nihil ambigamus, quin inter Serenissimam Regiam Majestatem Vestram & Principes nostros, ac eorum in causa religionis confœderatos utrorumq; Episcopos, Theologos & Subditos firma ma atq; perpetua concordia in ſinceriore Evangelii Doctrina, in laudem Dei Optimi Maximi, ſalutem Eccleſiæ Chriſtianæ, ac perniciem Romani Antichriſti, ſecutura ſit, noſque reliquam diſputationem de abuſibus non expectare queamus, exiſtimavimus non eſſe alienum ab officio noſtro, ut ante diſceſſum noſtrum Sereniſſimæ Regiæ Majeſtati Veſtræ, quæ per Dei Gratiam indefeſſa cura & diligentia ſinceram Evangelii Doctrinam promotam cupit, debitam obſervantiam, atque perpetuum ſtudium noſtrum literis noſtris teſtatum relinqueremus, & Majeſtati Veſtræ noſtrorum etiam ſententiam de quibuſdam Articulis abuſuum, de quibus Majeſtas Veſtra poſt abitum noſtrum haud dubie curabit eoſdem Epiſcopos & Theologos pro inquirenda veritate, ſermones conferre & diſputare, declararemus: nihil ambigentes, quin ea etiam in re Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra pro Chriſti gloria id præſtitura ſit, ut non tantum Doctrinam puram habeat, verum etiam abolitis aliquando impiis cultibus & abuſibus per Romanum Epiſcopum in Eccleſiam introductis, cultus ac Cæremonias conſentaneas Verbo Dei conſtituat: facile enim Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra pro ſua ſumma ſapientia perſpicit, non poſſe unquam Doctrinæ puritatem, vel conſtitui, vel conſervari, niſi tollantur è medio etiam hi abuſus, qui prorſus & ex diametro, ut dici ſolet, cum Verbo Dei pugnant, & Romani Antichriſti Tyrannidem ac Idololatriam, tum pepererunt, tum etiam hactenus conſervarunt; nam ut radicibus demum reſectis, neceſſe eſt arbores & herbas penitus exareſcere & perire, ita dubium non eſt, quin impiis Romani Epiſcopi abuſibus & Idololatria, ut fundamento ſtabilitatis ipſius labefactis & everſis, etiam Tyrannis ejuſdem prorſus ruitura & interitura ſit; quod niſi fiat perpetuo metuendum eſt, ne levi aliqua occaſione iterum repullulaſcat & tanquam à radice reviviſcat.

Sunt vero hæc tria pæne capita & fundamentum Tyrannidis & Idololatriæ Pontificiæ, quibus ſtantibus, neque Doctrina Religionis integra permanere, neque unquam Romani Epiſcopi improbiſſimus dominatus, penitus extirpari poterit: nempe, Prohibitio utriuſque ſpeciei Sacramenti in cœna Domini, Miſſa Privata, & Interdictio conjugii Sacerdotum, quæ quidem uſque adeo Dei Verbo adverſantur, adeoque etiam honeſtati publicæ repugnant, ut vel ex his ſolis apertiſſime intelligi poſſit Romanum Pontificem verum Antichriſtum, & omnis Idololatriæ, impietatis, erroris, & turpitudinis, in Chriſti Eccleſiam introductæ auctorem eſſe; de quibus ſane Articulis nos pauca quædam Sereniſſimæ Regiæ Majeſtati Veſtræ optimo ſtudio ſcribemus, & ejuſdem ut Regis ſumma ſapientia, acerrimo judicio, & excellenti Doctrina præditi, cenſuræ committemus, perſuaſiſſimum nobis habentes Veſtram Majeſtatem Illuſtriſſimam Principum noſtrorum, & Statuum confœderatorum Conſilium & Inſtitutum, in hiſce Articulis non improbaturam eſſe.

Primum enim, Sereniſſime ac Potentiſſime Rex, non exiſtimamus quenquam inficias iturum, quin Chriſti Doctrina, mandata, & ordinationes omnibus aliis præceptis, traditionibus aut cæremoniis humanis præferri debeant; hic enim cum ipſe ſit vita & veritas, errare non poteſt, humana vero omnia, præcipue in rebus divinis, incerta & dubia ſunt. Porro conſtat Chriſtum ipſum utramq; ſpeciem inſtituiſſe, cum ait, Bibite ex hoc omnes; & Paulum idem docuiſſe, cum inquit, 2 Cor. 11. Probet ſeipſum homo, & ſic de pane comedat & poculo bibat. Quibus ſane locis, non de una parte Eccleſiæ, id eſt, de Sacerdotibus tantum, De utraque ſpecie.

ſed de tota Eccleſia mentio fit: Nam quod quidam ita Argumentantur ſolis Apoſtolis Chriſtum id dixiſſe, eaque de cauſa utramq; ſpeciem ad ſolos Sacerdotes pertinere, infirmum admodum eſt Argumentum; quia eadem ratione ſequeretur, quod Laicis ne altera quidem ſpecies danda eſſet; neque enim alio loco Chriſtus mandavit ſolum corpus Laicis dari, & utramque ſpeciem pro Sacerdotibus inſtituit: ſed hoc fatendum eſt, quod illud mandatum Chriſti de Sacramento, aut ad omnes, hoc eſt, Laicos & Sacerdotes pertineat, aut Laici prorſus a Sacramento Corporis etiam arcendi fuerint, cum nuſquam alibi in Evangelio, niſi tunc cum dedit Apoſtolis ſimul Corpus & Sanguinem, Sacramentum pro Laicis inſtitutum reperiatur; idque ad omnes pertinere Paulus declarat, cum addit, & de poculo bibat, &c. Quod enim dicunt Sacramenti diviſionem, urgentibus quibuſdam cauſis, ab Eccleſia inſtitutam eſſe, & ſub una ſpecie, non minus quam utraque contineri, non multum ad rem facit: Quis enim non intelligit hic de Chriſti inſtituto & mandato agi, idque humanæ auctoritati & opinionibus longe præferendum eſſe; neque enim Eccleſia ſumit ſibi hanc libertatem ex Chriſti Ordinationibus res indifferentes conſtituendi; & rationes illæ vel de diſcrimine ordinum, ſeu dignitate Sacerdotali, vel periculo effuſionis & ſimiles, nullo modo tantam queunt vim habere, ut propterea Divinæ Ordinationes mutandæ ſint; neque ulla etiam conſuetudo contra mandata Dei introducta, ipſis canonibus Pontificiis atteſtantibus, probanda eſt. Conſtat vero uſum utriuſque ſpeciei, & clarum habere mandatum Chriſti, & adprobationem Sanctorum Patrum, ac conſuetudinem veteris Eccleſiæ; ſic enim, inquit Divus Hieronymus, Sacerdotes qui Euchariſtiæ ſerviunt, & Sanguinem Chriſti populis diſtribuunt: & Gelaſius Pontifex, Sacramenti Corporis & Sanguinis Domini diviſionem prohibet, eamque grande Sacrilegium adpellat.

Adhæc, durat hodie hic mos Communionis utriuſque ſpeciei in Græcis Eccleſiis, quæ hac in re Romani Pontificis Tyrannidi ſemper reſtiterunt, neque ejus jugum recipere voluerunt, & teſtantur Hiſtoriæ tum in Germania, tum in multis aliis Regionibus ac Provinciis, verum Communionis uſum diu conſervatum fuiſſe, ſed tandem fulminibus Romani Antichriſti, quibus totum pæne orbem terrarum conterruit & ſubjugavit, homines, ut veriſimile eſt, victi verum Euchariſtiæ uſum mutarunt, ad quem tamen, per ſingularem Dei Gratiam, agnita iterum veritate Evangelica, cum Principes noſtri, tum alii Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes, jam redierunt, & ſeſe ac ſuos in re Univerſæ Eccleſiæ maxime ſalutifera, tanquam in libertatem, excuſſo jugo Pontificio, vendicarunt & aſſeruerunt. Nam quæ cauſæ Pontificem permoverint, ut contra Chriſti mandatum & inſtitutum, contra ſententiam Sanctorum Patrum, contra conſuetudinem Univerſæ Eccleſiæ Chriſtianæ, Sacramentum divideret, & Laicos Sanguine Domini nefarie ſpoliaret, facile Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra perſpicit. Veriſimile quidem videtur, eum voluiſſe ſuam, ſuique ordinis auctoritatem ac dignitatem, ea ratione augere, & hoc diſcrimen inter Laicos & Sacerdotes conſtituere; nam etiam nunc clamitant adverſarii, Laicos debere eſſe altera ſpecie contentos; quaſi Regnum aliquod poſſideant, & ita imperare ipſis liberum ſit, ut etiam Chriſti beneficium hominibus eripere queant, ad quod potius ſi ſuo officio fungi vellent, omnes invitare & pellicere deberent. Sed quid Chriſto cum Belial? quid Pontifici cum Chriſti inſtituto, cujus ipſe ſe ſummum adverſarium eſſe ſatis declarat, ideoque tum in hoc, tum aliis ſalutaribus Religionis Chriſtianæ Articulis oportuit ipſum a ſcriptura diſcedere, imo Doctrinam Evangelio conſentaneam damnare, ut manifeſtum fieret, eum eſſe Antichriſtum, de quo paſſim Scriptura talia prædixit.

Porro in altero Articulo, De Miſſa Privata, adhuc magis adparet a Romano Pontifice Religionem Chriſtianam adeo oppreſſam & obſcuratam, ut Chriſti Beneficium, qui ſua morte nos redemit, ſoluſque eſt hoſtia & ſatisfactio pro peccatis noſtris, pœnitus ſuſtulerit, & in ejus locum Idololatricum cultum pro abolendis peccatis in Eccleſiam invexerit eamque ſuis erroribus & prophanationibus miſerabiliter implicaverit, turbaverit & deformaverit. Cum enim Miſſa nihil aliud ſit, nec eſſe debeat, quam Communio ſive Synaxis, ut Paulus adpellat, neque etiam alius ejus uſus fuerit tempore Apoſtolorum & veteris Eccleſiæ, quemadmodum hoc clare ex S. Patribus probari poteſt, plane diverſum quoddam opus, prorſus pugnans cum Communione & vero Miſſæ uſu inde factum eſt, quod docent ex opere operato, ut loquuntur, mereri gratiam, & tollere peccata vivorum & mortuorum. De Miſſa privata.

Hæc opinio quantopere diſtet a Scripturis, ac gloriam Paſſionis Chriſti lædat, Sereniſſ. Regia Majeſtas Veſtra facillime judicabit. Si enim hoc verum eſt, quod Miſſa pro aliis applicari poteſt, quod peccata tollit, & prodeſt tam vivis quam mortuis, ſequitur Juſtificationem ex opere Miſſarum contingere, non ex fide; verum hoc omnino Scripturæ repugnat, quæ tradit nos gratis propter Chriſtum per fidem juſtificari, ac peccata nobis condonari, & in gratiam nos recipi, atque ita non alieno opere, ſed propria fide propter Chriſtum, ſingulos juſtos fieri: At illi docent alienum opus pro remittendis peccatis alteri, quod quidem merum eſt ſomnium & figmentum humanum, repugnans Evangelicæ Doctrinæ; nam tunc demum adplicatur gratia per Verbum & Sacramentorum uſum, cum ipſi utimur Sacramentis, ſed iſti pro aliis utuntur, quod perinde eſt ac ſi pro aliis Baptizarentur. Neque vero poteſt dici quantopere deformet Chriſti Gloriam opinio illa de Miſſa, quæ ex opere operato conferat gratiam, aut applicata pro aliis mereatur eis remiſſionem venialium & mortalium peccatorum culpæ & pœnæ; idque aperte adverſari Scripturæ, & a vero uſu Miſſæ ſive Communionis longe diſcidere, vel inde liquet, quia Miſſa ſive Synaxis ideo eſt inſtituta, ut fidelis qui utitur Sacramento recordetur quæ beneficia accipiat per Chriſtum & erigat ac ſoletur pavidam conſcientiam; ideoque ibi porrigi debet Sacramentum, his quibis opus eſt conſolatione, ſicut Ambroſius ait, quia ſemper pecco, ſemper debeo accipere Medicinam. Atque hic uſque ad tempora Gregorii in Eccleſia Miſſæ uſus fuit, neque antea privatæ Miſſæ cognitæ fuerunt; quod quidem cum multis aliis Patrum Sententiis patet, tum Chryſoſtomi, qui inquit, Sacerdotem ſtare ad Altare & alios ad Communionem accerſere, alios arcere: Et ex veteribus Canonibus conſtat, unum aliquem celebraſſe Miſſam, a quo reliqui Presbyteri & Diaconi ſumpſerunt corpus Domini, ſic enim inquit Canon Nicenus, Accipiant Diaconi ſecundum Ordinem poſt Presbyteros ab Epiſcopo vel Presbytero, Sacram Communionem. Et ſcribit Epiphanius, in Aſia Synaxim ter celebratam ſingulis ſeptimanis, nec quotidianas fuiſſe Miſſas, eumque morem ab Apoſtolis traditum eſſe; qui quidem Miſſæ uſus etiam hodie in Græcis Parochiis durare dicitur, nam tantum ſingulis dominicis diebus & feſtis, fit ibi una publica Miſſa, privatas vero non habent: fuitque Græca Ecclesia hoc nomine longe fœlicior quam Latina, quæ meliorem usum cœnæ Domini, Synaxis, sive Missæ retinuerit, neque vel Sacramentum Corporis & Sanguinis Domini, contra claram Evangelii Doctrinam diviserit, ut paulo ante diximus, neque etiam privatas Missas Sacræ Scripturæ acerrime repugnantes, receperit; cujus quidem rei hanc potentissimam causam fuisse arbitramur, quod Græca Ecclesia Romanum Episcopum auctorem perversæ & Idololatricæ Doctrinæ, & omnium pœne abusuum qui in Ecclesiam introducti sunt, pro summo Ecclesiæ Universalis sive Catholicæ Capite, nunquam agnoverit.

Sed concedunt quidam adplicationes quæ fiunt in Missa pro vivis & mortuis, & item opiniones, quod ex opere operato gratiam mereri traduntur, non esse probandas, & disputant abolitis illis opinionibus impiis, alia ratione Missas privatas retinendas, nempe quia sunt gratiarum actiones, quæ possint ab uno vel a pluribus fieri. Hæc sane ratio videtur aliquam habere speciem, estque σοφὸν φάρμακον, ut inquit Sophocles, quo in causis invalidis, & ut ipse ait, morbidis utendum sit. Si Missa tantum esset gratiarum actio, possit fortassis tali aliquo prætextu colorari; verum constat eam principaliter institutam esse, ut sit Sacramentum quod per Ministrum alteri exhibeatur, ut accipens & credens consequatur gratiam. Et hoc quidem principali fine posito, accedit alter de gratiarum actione; quara nullo modo ab institutione Christi recedere, sed modum & formam illius Institutiones, & exemplum veteris Ecclesiæ sequi & retinere debemus: Nulla enim novitas, præsertim in Sacramentis, recipienda est, contra formam a Christo traditam, & contra exempla veteris Ecclesia.

Porro constat privatas Missas esse recentes, & a Romanis Pontificibus introductas, & ne hodie quidem, ut paulo ante dictum est, in Græcis Ecclesiis esse, nisi Parochiales diebus festis, cum quibus adhuc manet vestigium Communionis: Cum igitur contra Dei Verbum Missa privata introducta sit, eamque humanum tantum & commentitium cultum esse appareat, quis dubitat quin talis Missa, sine ullo periculo omitti possit, imo debeat, cum repugnet Evangelio? Estque pium & sanctum opus, verum Missæ sive Synaxis usum Ecclesiæ restituere ac reddere, quo per Romanum Pontificem, hoc est Antichristum, multis jam annis miserabiliter privata fuit, qui quidem adhuc mordicus privatas Missas tenet, adserit, & defendit. Neque id immerito, facile enim sentit quod labefactata Missa privata, labefactetur imo ruat Universum ejus Regnum & Tyrannis, quæ Missis illis nititur; ut enim in seminibus causa est Arborum & stirpium; ita hujus luctuosissimi dominatus, imperii, tyrannidis, nundinationis & Idololatriæ Pontificia semen fuit superstitio Missarum privatarum: Nam hæ pepererunt & sustinuerunt, veluti Atlas quidam, totum Papatum; ad harum normam omnia redacta sunt, siquidem nihil fuit, quod non Missa aliqua expiari posse creditum est. His aucupatus Pontifex Romanus indulgentias, quibus immensam pecuniam ex toto orbe terrarum prædatus est; hæ Monachorum turbas infinitas coacervarunt, cum eorum nullus alius esset usus, quam demurmurandi Missas privatas, & alioquin inutile terræ pondus forent. Hæ sunt & fuerunt universa pietas, quam Pontifex Romanus profitetur, hanc solam novit ille Religionem, quæ in Missis privatis consistit; Doctrinam enim Evangelii non modo non habet, verum acerrime odit & prosequitur, & in

Curarunt igitur illuſtriſſimi Principes noſtri, & alii Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes, Principes & Status, privatas Miſſas penitus aboleri, & verum Miſſæ uſum ſive Synaxim Chriſti inſtitutioni, exemplo Apoſtolorum, veteris Eccleſiæ ac Patrum ſententiis conformem, in Eccleſiam revocarunt & reſtituerunt. Quæ quidem Miſſa ſive Synaxis ſumma cum reverentia celebratur, ſervatis pæne omnibus uſitatis Cæremoniis, quæ non repugnant Pietati; & admiſcentur Germanicæ ſive Vernaculæ cautiones ad docendum populum; præcepit enim Paulus, in Eccleſia uti lingua intellecta à Populo. Porro, quia propter Communionem ſive uſum Sacramenti Miſſa inſtituta eſt, hi qui ſunt idonei & antea explorati, Sacramento utuntur; ac dignitas & uſus Sacramenti, ſumma diligentia ac cura ex Verbo Dei populo commendatur, ut ſciant & intelligant homines, quantam conſolationem pavidis conſcientiis adferat, ac diſcant Deo credere, & optima quæque ab eo expectare & petere.

Et hunc quidem Sacramenti & Miſſæ uſum, Scripturæ conſentaneum, Deo gratum, & Pietati conducibilem eſſe, Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra facile agnoſcit; neque enim hic aliquid contra Dei Verbum admittitur, imo ſecundum Chriſti mandatum & ordinationem, qui hanc Sacram Communionem ad hunc finem inſtituit, omnia geruntur: Nulla eſt hic admixta, prava, aut impia opinio, ut in Miſſa privata Papiſtica, cujus finis & inſtitutio cum Evangelio pugnat. Nihil hic etiam abſque ſumma reverentia, ordine, & decoro, digno Eccleſiæ, fieri cernitur: Audemuſque adfirmare, majore Religione hunc verum Miſſæ uſum exhiberi apud nos, quam hactenus unquam ſub Papatu privatæ Miſſæ celebratæ fuerint, provocamuſque ad teſtimonia doctiſſimorum virorum, qui à Majeſtate Veſtra miſſi in illis locis fuerunt, & hæc omnia coram fieri viderunt & audierunt.

Et hunc quidem Sacramenti & Miſſæ uſum, Scripturæ conſentaneum, Deo gratum, & Pietati conducibilem eſſe, Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra facile agnoſcit; neque enim hic aliquid contra Dei Verbum admittitur, imo ſecundum Chriſti mandatum & ordinationem, qui hanc Sacram Communionem ad hunc finem inſtituit, omnia geruntur: Nulla eſt hic admixta, prava, aut impia opinio, ut in Miſſa privata Papiſtica, cujus finis & inſtitutio cum Evangelio pugnat. Nihil hic etiam abſque ſumma reverentia, ordine, & decoro, digno Eccleſiæ, fieri cernitur: Audemuſque adfirmare, majore Religione hunc verum Miſſæ uſum exhiberi apud nos, quam hactenus unquam ſub Papatu privatæ Miſſæ celebratæ fuerint, provocamuſque ad teſtimonia doctiſſimorum virorum, qui à Majeſtate Veſtra miſſi in illis locis fuerunt, & hæc omnia coram fieri viderunt & audierunt.

non habent: fuitque Græca Eccleſia hoc nomine longe fœlicior quam Latina, quæ meliorem uſum cœnæ Domini, Synaxis, ſive Miſſæ retinuerit, neque vel Sacramentum Corporis & Sanguinis Domini, contra claram Evangelii Doctrinam diviſerit, ut paulo ante diximus, neque etiam privatas Miſſas Sacræ Scripturæ acerrime repugnantes, receperit; cujus quidem rei hanc potentiſſimam cauſam fuiſſe arbitramur, quod Græca Eccleſia Romanum Epiſcopum auctorem perverſæ & Idololatricæ Doctrinæ, & omnium pœne abuſuum qui in Eccleſiam introducti ſunt, pro ſummo Eccleſiæ Univerſalis ſive Catholicæ Capite, nunquam agnoverit.

Sed concedunt quidam adplicationes quæ fiunt in Miſſa pro vivis & mortuis, & item opiniones, quod ex opere operato gratiam mereri traduntur, non eſſe probandas, & diſputant abolitis illis opinionibus impiis, alia ratione Miſſas privatas retinendas, nempe quia ſunt gratiarum actiones, quæ poſſint ab uno vel a pluribus fieri. Hæc ſane ratio videtur aliquam habere ſpeciem, eſtque σοφὸν φάρμακον, ut inquit Sophocles, quo in cauſis invalidis, & ut ipſe ait, morbidis utendum ſit. Si Miſſa tantum eſſet gratiarum actio, poſſit fortaſſis tali aliquo prætextu colorari; verum conſtat eam principaliter inſtitutam eſſe, ut ſit Sacramentum quod per Miniſtrum alteri exhibeatur, ut accipens & credens conſequatur gratiam. Et hoc quidem principali fine poſito, accedit alter de gratiarum actione; quara nullo modo ab inſtitutione Chriſti recedere, ſed modum & formam illius Inſtitutiones, & exemplum veteris Eccleſiæ ſequi & retinere debemus: Nulla enim novitas, præſertim in Sacramentis, recipienda eſt, contra formam a Chriſto traditam, & contra exempla veteris Eccleſia.

Porro conſtat privatas Miſſas eſſe recentes, & a Romanis Pontificibus introductas, & ne hodie quidem, ut paulo ante dictum eſt, in Græcis Eccleſiis eſſe, niſi Parochiales diebus feſtis, cum quibus adhuc manet veſtigium Communionis: Cum igitur contra Dei Verbum Miſſa privata introducta ſit, eamque humanum tantum & commentitium cultum eſſe appareat, quis dubitat quin talis Miſſa, ſine ullo periculo omitti poſſit, imo debeat, cum repugnet Evangelio? Eſtque pium & ſanctum opus, verum Miſſæ ſive Synaxis uſum Eccleſiæ reſtituere ac reddere, quo per Romanum Pontificem, hoc eſt Antichriſtum, multis jam annis miſerabiliter privata fuit, qui quidem adhuc mordicus privatas Miſſas tenet, aſſerit, & defendit. Neque id immerito, facile enim ſentit quod labefactata Miſſa privata, labefactetur imo ruat Univerſum ejus Regnum & Tyrannis, quæ Miſſis illis nititur; ut enim in ſeminibus cauſa eſt Arborum & ſtirpium; ita hujus luctuoſiſſimi dominatus, imperii, tyrannidis, nundinationis & Idololatriæ Pontificia ſemen fuit ſuperſtitio Miſſarum privatarum: Nam hæ pepererunt & ſuſtinuerunt, veluti Atlas quidam, totum Papatum; ad harum normam omnia redacta ſunt, ſiquidem nihil fuit, quod non Miſſa aliqua expiari poſſe creditum eſt. His aucupatus Pontifex Romanus indulgentias, quibus immenſam pecuniam ex toto orbe terrarum prædatus eſt; hæ Monachorum turbas infinitas coacervarunt, cum eorum nullus alius eſſet uſus, quam demurmurandi Miſſas privatas, & alioquin inutile terræ pondus forent. Hæ ſunt & fuerunt univerſa pietas, quam Pontifex Romanus profitetur, hanc ſolam novit ille Religionem, quæ in Miſſis privatis conſiſtit; Doctrinam enim Evangelii non modo non habet, verum acerrime odit & proſequitur, & in

ſumma his Miſſis ipſam prædicationem Verbi Divini Pontifex exterminavit, ut per omnia Antichriſti munere fungeretur: Nam in loco unius concionis Verbi, amplius mille Miſſæ privatæ, hoc eſt, humani & commentitii cultus, contra Divinum Verbum ſucceſſerunt; cum non Miſſas fieri ſed Evangelium prædicare, & Sacramenta rite diſtribuere & adminiſtrare, Chriſtus Apoſtolis, quorum illi volunt eſſe ſucceſſores, mandaverit.

Curarunt igitur illuſtriſſimi Principes noſtri, & alii Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes, Principes & Status, privatas Miſſas penitus aboleri, & verum Miſſæ uſum ſive Synaxim Chriſti inſtitutioni, exemplo Apoſtolorum, veteris Eccleſiæ ac Patrum ſententiis conformem, in Eccleſiam revocarunt & reſtituerunt. Quæ quidem Miſſa ſive Synaxis ſumma cum reverentia celebratur, ſervatis pæne omnibus uſitatis Cæremoniis, quæ non repugnant Pietati; & admiſcentur Germanicæ ſive Vernaculæ cautiones ad docendum populum; præcepit enim Paulus, in Eccleſia uti lingua intellecta à Populo. Porro, quia propter Communionem ſive uſum Sacramenti Miſſa inſtituta eſt, hi qui ſunt idonei & antea explorati, Sacramento utuntur; ac dignitas & uſus Sacramenti, ſumma diligentia ac cura ex Verbo Dei populo commendatur, ut ſciant & intelligant homines, quantam conſolationem pavidis conſcientiis adferat, ac diſcant Deo credere, & optima quæque ab eo expectare & petere.

Et hunc quidem Sacramenti & Miſſæ uſum, Scripturæ conſentaneum, Deo gratum, & Pietati conducibilem eſſe, Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra facile agnoſcit; neque enim hic aliquid contra Dei Verbum admittitur, imo ſecundum Chriſti mandatum & ordinationem, qui hanc Sacram Communionem ad hunc finem inſtituit, omnia geruntur: Nulla eſt hic admixta, prava, aut impia opinio, ut in Miſſa privata Papiſtica, cujus finis & inſtitutio cum Evangelio pugnat. Nihil hic etiam abſque ſumma reverentia, ordine, & decoro, digno Eccleſiæ, fieri cernitur: Audemuſque adfirmare, majore Religione hunc verum Miſſæ uſum exhiberi apud nos, quam hactenus unquam ſub Papatu privatæ Miſſæ celebratæ fuerint, provocamuſque ad teſtimonia doctiſſimorum virorum, qui à Majeſtate Veſtra miſſi in illis locis fuerunt, & hæc omnia coram fieri viderunt & audierunt.

piter prophanentur, quodque hic abuſus in omnibus pæne templis latiſſime pateat, non eſt obſcurum: Nam Chriſti beneficium qui nos pretioſo ſuo ſanguine redemit, idque gratuito pro vili ſtipe & mercede vendere, & tale etiam opus inde conſtituere velle, quod ex ſui natura, hoc eſt ex opere operato, mereatur gratiam, & poſſit adplicari pro peccatis aliorum, mortuorum & vivorum, quis non videt ſummam eſſe impietatem? Quid enim eſt corpus Domini indigne tractare & ſumere, ſi hoc non eſſet? An poteſt etiam magis impium quidquam dici, quam illi de Miſſis iſtis docuerunt? Nempe quod Chriſtus ſua paſſione ſatisfecerit pro peccatis Originis, & inſtituerit Miſſam, in qua fieret Oblatio pro quotidianis delictis mortalibus & venialibus: cum Chriſtus pœnitentiam & remiſſionem peccatorum prædicari mandaverit; Miſſam vero, hoc eſt Synaxim, ad alium plane finem inſtituerit, viz. ut porrigatur Sacramentum his quibus opus eſt conſolatione, & ut per Verbum & Sacramentum credentes gratiam recipiant, & remiſſionem peccatorum conſequantur, non ut ipſi ſuum opus, quod quale quale ſit, humanum figmentum, humanus cultus eſt, contra Scripturam Deo offerant ac ſacrificent. Hoc enim non placat Deum, ut Chriſtus ipſe inquit, ſe fruſtra coli mandatis hominum: Nam Miſſam non eſſe tale opus ſive Sacrificium, quod mereatur gratiam & proſit etiam aliis, inde adparet, quia Miſſa ſive Synaxis ad hoc eſt inſtituta, non ut Deo aliquid offeratur, ſed ut communicantes conſolationem hauriant, & veluti pignus ſeu certum ſignum gratiæ ac bonæ voluntatis Dei erga ſe recipiant, atque ita recordentur mortis Chriſti, hoc eſt, beneficiorum quæ per Chriſtum accipiunt, qui quidem pro nobis mortuus eſt, ſoluſque pro peccatis noſtris ſatisfecit; idque probant Verba ipſa quibus & Chriſtus & Paulus de Miſſa ſive Synaxi uſi ſunt.

Primum enim inquit Chriſtus, hoc eſt Corpus meum, quod pro vobis traditur. Hæc ſunt Verba Promiſſionis Divinæ quæ ſolam fidem exigunt, quibuſque offertur nobis gratia & remiſſio peccatorum, ergo non eſt Sacrificium, hoc eſt, opus quod Deo offeratur & quidem pro abolendis peccatis. Item Paulus ait, Annunciantes mortem Domini: Annunciare autem non eſt ſacrificare, hoc eſt tale opus Deo reddere, quo peccata deleantur. Præterea Evangelii textus ita ſonat, Fregit & dedit Diſcipulis, inquiens, accipite & comedite, &c. item bibite ex hoc omnes, &c. accipere autem, comedere, & bibere, non eſt ſacrificare, quia hæc opera ex opere operato non delent peccata.

Neque mandatur hiſce verbis, ut nos Deo aliquid offeramus, ſed potius ut ab eo accipiamus, quia addit, pro vobis traditum, & ſanguis qui pro vobis effunditur; quæ Verba oſtendunt, non exhiberi a ſumentibus Euchariſtiam Deo Sacrificium, ſed donum hominibus datum. Præterea vero nemo dicit Laicos cum ſumunt Sacramentum, Sacrificare: at quantum ad hanc Sacram Communionem, Miſſam, ſive Synaxim pertinet, nulla eſt ratio diverſitatis, cum idem Chriſtus uno eodemque tempore ac momento, propter eundem finem & uſum, hoc Sacramentum abſque differentia utentium Sacerdotum vel Laicorum inſtituerit. Et quemadmodum prohibitio utriuſque ſpeciei, humanum tantum commentum & mandatum eſt; ita quod de Sacrificio Miſſæ ex opere operato gratiam promerente traditur, humana tantum opinio eſt, contra Verbum Dei, à quo in rebus maximis, nempe ad remiſſionem peccatorum, ſalutem animarum, & vitam æternam pertinentibus, nullo modo eſt diſcedendum:

Non

Non enim fruſtra Paulus inquit & bis repetit, ſi nos aut Angelus de Cœlo evangelizet vobis præter id qd. evangelizavimus, & accepiſtis, Anathema ſit.

Præterea nec poteſt ratio diverſitatis aſſignari ex Sacris Literis, cur magis dicant eos qui Sacramento Euchariſtiæ fruuntur ſacrificare, quam illos qui alio Sacramento, ut Baptiſmo, utuntur, cum utrumq; nihil aliud ſit, quam Sacramenta, quæ Chriſtus horum inſtitutor & auctor prorſus ad alium finem, quam ut ſint talia Sacrificia, qualia illi comminiſcuntur, ordinavit. Sed oportuit, Romanum Pontificem Miſſas privatas, ad opprimendam Chriſti, cum ipſe hoſtis eſt, gloriam attollere, ut populum Chriſtianum à veritate Evangelica & agnitione Chriſti, & Sacramentorum legitimo uſu, prorſus abduceret, Chriſtique bonitatem & miſericordiam obliteraret. Qui enim Miſſam tale Sacrificium eſſe cogitant, quo Deus placetur, hi non queunt Chriſti beneficium expendere pro dignitate, & in terroribus ac doloribus iræ & judicii Dei non habebunt refugium, neque bona conſcientia poterunt dona & ſigna amoris divina agnoſcere, ſi alieno opere Deum placari & peccata remitti ſibi perſuaſum habeant: Nam illi ipſi qui nituntur impias opiniones de Miſſa privata excuſare, hoc prætextu, quaſi Miſſa ideo vocetur Sacrificium, quia ſit gratiarum actio & Sacrificium Laudis, hi convincuntur propriis ipſorum Teſtimoniis & Scriptis quæ de Miſſa extant, hæque perſuaſiones hominum animis etiam hodie de Miſſis privatis inhærent: ſic enim Thomas inquit in Opuſculo de Sacramento Altaris, cur Miſſa inſtituta ſit? Corpus Domini ſemel oblatum eſt in cruce, pro debito originali, ſic offeratur jugiter pro quotidianis delictis in Altari, ut habeat in hoc Eccleſia munus ad placandum ſibi Deum, ſuper omnia legis Sacrificia precioſum & acceptum.

Alexander Papa, nihil in Sacrificiis Eccleſiæ majus eſſe poteſt, quam Corpus & Sanguis Chriſti, nec ulla oblatio hac potior eſt, ſed omnes præcellit: item ipſa veritas nos inſtruit, Calicem ac panem in Sacramento offerre, quando ait, accipite & comedite, nam crimina atq; peccata, oblatis his Domino Sacrificiis, delentur. Et rurſus, inquit, talibus hoſtiis delectabitur & placabitur Deus, & peccata dimittet ingentia. Gabriel de Canon. Miſſæ, Sacramentum Euchariſtiæ veluti Sacrificium ſummo patri oblatum, nedum veniale ſed etiam mortale, non dico ſumentium ſed omnium eorum pro quibus offertur, & quantum ad reatum culpæ & pœnæ, plus vel minus ſecundum diſpoſitionem eorum pro quibus offertur, tollit: unde Thomas in Quarto Diſt. 1, 2. q. 2. Euchariſtia in quantum eſt Sacrificium, habet effectum etiam in aliis pro quibus offertur, in quibus non præ-exigit vitam ſpiritualem in actu, ſed in potentia, & ideo ſi eos diſpoſitos inveniat, eis gratiam obtinet, virtute illius veri Sacrificii a quo omnis gratia in nos fluxit, & per conſequens peccata mortalia in eis delet, non ſicut cauſa proxima, ſed in quantum gratiam contritionis eis impetrat.

His & ſimilibus omnes libri Scholaſticorum pleni ſunt, quibus uno ore docent, Miſſam tale eſſe Sacrificium, quo gratiam homines mereantur ex opere operato, quod ad delenda aliorum peccata adplicari poſſit. Quæ Doctrina aut potius perverſum & impium figmentum, an pugnet cum Sacris Literis necne? An verum Miſſæ ſeu Communionis uſum tradit necne? An Chriſti beneficium non magis obſcuret quam illuſtret, imo etiam prorſus tollat? Veſtræ Sereniſſimæ Regiæ Majeſtati dijudicandum relinquimus, quæ pro ſua ſapientia, & non tantum in rebus politicis, ſed etiam Sacris & in omni genere doctrinarum acerrimo judicio, facile cenſebit, juſtiſſimã cauſam habuiſſe Principes noſtros & alios Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes, Miſſas privatas abrogandi, & verum Miſſæ ſive Communionis uſum, pro Chriſti gloria & conſolatione totius Eccleſiæ Chriſtianæ, reſtituendi & revocandi, poſtquam ex Dei Verbo cognoverunt, quantum privatæ Miſſæ à veritate Evangelica diſtent, quantumq; in iis inſit Impietatis & Idololatriæ: fuit enim unicum Sacrificium propitiatorium in mundo, viz. Mors Chriſti, qui, ut Paulus inquit, ſemel eſt pro nobis oblatus, & factus hoſtia pro peccatis noſtris, quod cætera legis Sacrificia propitiatoria ſignificarunt, quæ ſimilitudine quadam, erunt ſatisfactiones redimentes juſtitiam Legis, ne ex politia excluderentur illi qui peccaverant, eaque ceſſaverunt poſt Revelatum Evangelium: in Novo Teſtamento, neceſſe eſt cultum tantum eſſe Spiritualem, hoc eſt, juſtitiam Fidei & fructus Fidei, quia adfert juſtitiam & vitam ſpiritualem & æternam, juxta, Dabo Legem meam in cordibus eorum; & Chriſtus ait, veri adoratores adorabunt Patrem in ſpiritu & veritate, i. e. vero cordis adfectu, qua de cauſa abrogati ſunt Levitici cultus, quod debeant ſuccedere cultus Spirituales mentis, & horum fructus ac ſigna; ut in Epiſtola ad Hebræos manifeſte docetur.

Ex quibus omnibus ſequitur Miſſam non eſſe Sacrificium, quod ex opere operato mereatur, faciente vel aliis remiſſionem Peccatorum, ut illi docuerunt. Et quocunque quidam fuco nitantur excuſare Miſſas privatas, ſemper eis refragatur & reclamat Doctrina ipſorum de Miſſa, qua eam aliis poſſe adplicare tradiderunt, & peccata delere hominibus perſuaſerunt. Hæc opinio niſi reſtituto vero Miſſæ uſu, nunquam ex animis hominum delebitur, ſed perpetuo manet & redit is error, quod oporteat talem eſſe cultum in Eccleſia, quo Deus placetur.

Et ut videatur fictione juris; Jureconſulti loquuntur, Miſſam poſſe vocari ſacrificium memoriale ſive Laudis: at cum id non ſit ſatisfactorium pro facientibus, vel adplicabile pro aliis, quo quis mereatur remiſſionem Peccatorum, quorſum attinebit, relicto vero ejus uſu & inſtitutione, id in Eccleſiam introducere, ubi propter nullam humanam rationem, commentum, aut opinionem, à Chriſti mandato & ordinatione eſt diſcedendum? Eadem enim ratione; Natalis Domini & ſimilia Feſta, quæ in Chriſti memoriam celebrantur, ſacrificia memorialia ſive Euchariſtica dici poſſent; imo talia Sacrificia verius ſunt, Evangelii prædicatio, fides, invocatio, gratiarum actio, adflictiones, aut adplicationes pro aliis; & Miſſæ principalis finis, ut ſupra diſſeruimus, is eſt, ut ſit Sacramentum, quod per Miniſtrum alteri exhibeatur, quare non poteſt dici Sacrificium; cum nemo ignoret magnum inter Sacrificia & Sacramenta diſcrimen eſſe, his enim nos dona à Deo oblata accipimus, illis vero noſtrum Deo reddimus & offerimus.

Neque vero habent privatæ Miſſæ alios auctores quam Pontifices, qui à tempore Gregorii, nunc hanc, nunc illam Cæremoniam, Cantionem, aut Orationem, ſinguli pro ſua ſanctitate & opinione adjecerunt, ut hiſtoriæ uno conſenſu teſtantur, donec eandem, egregium, illud opus, dignum iſtis auctoribus exædificarunt, & relicto vero Miſſæ ſive Communionis uſu, ac obliterata doctrina de Chriſto, Univerſa Eccleſia Miſſis privatis in qua ſola omnem pæne Sanctitatem poſuerunt, repleta & obruta fuit.

Hæc Sereniſſime ac Potentiſſime Rex noſtrorum Principum & aliorum Imperii ordinum, Evangelicam Doctrinam profitentium, Theologi & Doctores, juſtis voluminibus explicarunt, quæ quidem hac Epiſtola nos breviter attingenda duximus; non quod Sereniſſimam Regiam Majeſtatem Veſtram hæc latere penitus putemus, neq; enim ignoramus Sereniſſimæ Regiæ Majeſtati Veſtræ & veterum & recentium ſcripta, de his & aliis Contro-

Controverſiis Eccleſiaſticis diligentiſſime cognita eſſe, de quibus etiam Majeſtas Veſtra ſapientiſſime, eruditiſſime ſæpe cum doctis viris conferre & diſputare ſolet: ſed hæc ideo fecimus ut Majeſtati Veſtræ, quam poſſet fieri breviſſime, occaſionem & cauſas quaſdam abolitarum, privatarum Miſſarum apud nos, ſumma cum obſervantia ut decet exponeremus; & adverſariorum calumnias, quibus cum apud Regiam Majeſtatem Veſtram, tum alias, undecunque quæſita & arrepta occaſione, variis technis & figmentis, doctrinam ſinceriorem gravare & in odium omnium perducere conantur, declinaremus.

Neque vero ambigimus, quin Majeſtas Veſtra, ut Rex eruditiſſimus & veritatis Evangelicæ amantiſſimus, facillime judicabit, quod non temere privatæ Miſſæ apud nos abrogatæ ſint, ſed juſtiſſimis & firmiſſimis rationibus, ex Dei Verbo quod ſolum errare non poteſt, ſincere & abſque ſophiſtica deductis, pro conſervanda & illuſtranda Chriſti Gloria, & hominum ſalute id factum eſſe: Et opponantur qualeſcunq; excogitari poſſint Cavillationes & Sophiſmata, tamen adparebit noſtros hoc agere quod ſit tutius, dum retinent modum & formam inſtitutionis Chriſti. Ac maxima pars Sacerdotum ſua ſponte apud nos deſiit Miſſas privatas celebrare, poſteaquam intellexerunt ex Evangelica Doctrina, quantum in iis erroris & impietatis eſſet; & plurimi ac doctiſſimi quique, qui Sacerdotia aut Parochias ſub Magiſtratibus alienis à ſincera Evangelii Doctrina tenebant, ea deſeruerunt, ne cogerentur facere contra ſuas Conſcientias, ſeque ad ea loca in quibus Evangelii Doctrina libere prædicatur contulerunt; graviſſimum enim eſt quenquam in re præſertim tali, quæ Dei gloriam lædit, ac Divino Verbo repugnat, tanquam ad cultum divinum adigi, & compelli.

Reſtat tertius locus inſtituti Argumenti, viz. de Conjugio Sacerdotum, quod itidem Romanus Epiſcopus contra Scripturam, contra Leges Naturæ, & contra omnem Honeſtatem prohibuit, ac multorum peccatorum, ſcelerum & turpitudinis occaſionem præbuit: ſed fortaſſe ne poſſit dubitari eum eſſe Chriſti adverſarium, de quo cum illam ipſam prohibitionem, tum alia quædam quæ in illum ſolum adperte quadrant, Scriptura clare prædixit, oportuit eum talem Legem Cœlibatus Sacerdotalis ſancire, ut ſicut leo ex unguibus, ita Papa, hoc eſt, Antichriſtus, ab hac prohibitione Sanctiſſimi & in omnibus honorabilis conjugii, agnoſceretur; ſic enim Paulus inquit, Spiritus autem manifeſte dici, quod in noviſſimis temporibus diſcedent quidam à fide, attendentes Spiritibus Erroris & Doctrinis Dæmoniorum, in hypocriſi loquentium mendacium, cauteriatam habentium Conſcientiam ſuam, prohibentium nubere: hæc ſi non in Romanum Epiſcopum congruunt, in quem alium convenient? nemo enim alius quam ipſe conjugium Sacerdotibus injuſtiſſime eripuit, & cœlibatum impuriſſimum ſub ſpecie Sanctitatis, &, ut Paulus ait, in Hypocriſi & per mendacium introduxit. De Conjugio Sacerdotum.

Scriptura non minus Sacerdotibus, quam alterius ſortis hominibus matrimonium liberum permittit, ſunt enim de eadem carne, quæ totum genus humanum veſtit & continet, nati: non poſſunt igitur naturam ſuam mutare, non poſſunt carnem abjicere, nec abſque ſingulari Dei dono cœlibes vivere, nam non quilibet, ut Chriſtus inquit, capit Verbum hoc: & Paulus, propter Fornicationem unuſquiſque ſuam Uxorem habeat; & peculiariter de Sacerdotibus ait, conſtituas per civitates Preſbyteros ſicut

diſpoſui tibi, ſi quis ſine crimine eſt, unius Uxoris vir, Filios habens fideles, non in accuſatione luxuriæ; item, oportet Epiſcopum eſſe irreprehenſibilem, unius Uxoris virum: patet igitur hanc prohibitionem non ex jure Divino, ſed potius contra Sacram Scripturam decretum eſſe.

At ſolet à quibuſdam Pontificiis defenſoribus opponi, quod licet conjugium Sacerdotum non videatur vetitum Divinis Literis, tamen Sacerdotes à veteribus temporibus in hunc uſq; diem in cœlibatu vixiſſe, eaq; de cauſa addunt non eſſe diſcedendum hac in re à tali exemplo, neq; permittendum conjugium Sacerdotibus. His, Sereniſſime ac Potentiſſime Rex, adperte refragantur hiſtoriæ, tum Eccleſiaſticæ tum aliæ, ex quibus clare patet, Epiſcopos & Sacerdotes veteribus temporibus conjugatos fuiſſe.

Primum enim Spiridion Cyprius Epiſcopus, vir unus ex ordine Prophetarum, ut Hiſtoria Eccleſiaſtica ait, Uxorem habuit ex qua filiam nomine Irenen ſuſcepit; deinde ordine pæne omnes Epiſcopi Uxorati fuerunt, quorum plurimi Filii poſtea, tum Romani, tum alii Epiſcopi creati ſunt: fuit enim Sylverius Papa Hormiſdæ Epiſcopi Filius, Papa Theodorus Theodori Epiſcopi Hieroſolymitani, Papa Adrianus ſecundus Talari Epiſcopi, Joannes decimus Papa Sergii Papæ, Gelaſius Valerii Epiſcopi, Papa Joannes decimus quintus Leonis Preſbyteri Filius; & ne omnes enumeremus, patet vel unica hiſtoria Polycratis, ex cujus parentibus ſeptem fuerunt per ordinem Epiſcopi, ipſe vero fuit octavus: at non eſt credibile omnes illos ex illegitimis nuptiis prognatos eſſe, cum ipſi canones & decreta Synodorum doceant, conjugia Sacerdotum eſſe licita; ſic enim inquit Canon Apoſtolorum, ſi quis docuerit Sacerdotem ſub obtentu Religionis propriam Uxorem contemnere, Anathema ſit.

Item extat præclarum exemplum de Paphnutio confeſſore, qui univerſæ Synodo Nicenæ prohibitionem conjugii diſſuaſit, & obtinuit ne hac ex parte ſancitum, ſed hoc in uniuſcujuſque voluntate non neceſſitate permiſſum fuerit. Quæ Hiſtoria etiam in jure Pontificio recenſetur, extatque decretum quoddam ſextæ Synodi, in quo palam damnatur prohibitio conjugii Sacerdotalis.

Sed objicitur iterum, propter votum caſtitatis, quod Sacerdotes præſtiterunt, non poſſe eis permitti nuptias. Hoc quale votum ſit, quamque obligatorium, quod ſine peccato ſervari non poteſt, Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra pro Summa Sapientia & Doctrina, facile æſtimabit: neq; enim donum caſtitatis omnibus datum eſt, idq; cœlibatus ipſe Sacerdotum, & quotidiana experientia etiam nunc teſtatur; & quid de tali voto ſentiendum ſit, Sanctorum Patrum ſententia declaravit, ſic enim Auguſtinus ait, quidam nubentes poſt votum adſerunt adulteros eſſe, ego autem dico vobis quod graviter peccant qui tales dividunt. Et Cyprianus de virginibus qui continentiam voverunt, ſic inquit, ſi præſervare nolunt, vel non poſſunt, melius eſt ut nubant, quam ut in ignem delitiis ſuis cadant.

Cenſent itaque prædicti Sancti Patres tale votum non debere impedire Matrimonium, ſicut revera etiam non poteſt obſtare quo minus hi quibus donum continentiæ non contigit, matrimonium contrahant: nam melius eſt nubere quam uri, ut inquit Paulus; Quid autem eſt impurius cœlibatu illo Sacerdotali? quam pauci vero continent? quam plurimi in fornicationibus, adulteriis, & id genus ſimilibus ac gravioribus peccatis & flagitiis pæne quotidie deprehenduntur, contra quod ſi leges ſevere animadverterent, non habituri eſſent, quo de illo ficto & hypocritico cœlibatu adeo gloriarentur.

Ac

Ac tradunt Hiſtoriæ in Germania triennium aut amplius, Sacerdotes acerrime reſtitiſſe Sanctioni Pontificis Hildebrandi de cœlibatu, qui ſumma vi eis Uxores adimere conatus eſt, hique juſtiſſimas cauſas contra illam conſtitutionem ac tyrannidem Pontificiam, pro Matrimonio defendendo allegarunt, in qua re cum nihil æqui obtinere potuerint, tandem ingens orta eſt ſeditio contra Archiepiſcopum Moguntinum, qui decretum pontificium detulerat, adeo ut is ab incœpto deſtiterit; & vix tandem Papa poſt multas diras Execrationes & Bullas, quibus etiam Cœlum ipſum expugnare conatus eſt, miſeris Sacerdotibus facultatem liberam conjugii, contra divina & humana jura abſtulerit, & omnis generis libidinis & impuritatis exercendæ occaſionem præbuerit: Extat quoque Epiſtola ad Nicolaum Epiſcopum Romanum I. Divi Udalrici Epiſcopi Auguſtenſis, qua is graviſſimis & optimis argumentis diſſuadet & damnat prohibitionem conjugii Sacerdotum.

Cum igitur Principes noſtri, & alii profitentes Evangelii Doctrinam, patefacta per Dei Gratiam iterum veritate, intellexerint quid de prohibitione illa Pontificia conjugii Sacerdotalis ſentiendum eſſet, & palam viderent & experirentur, quod non poſſet cœlibatus ille ſine peccatis & ſcandalis conſiſtere, ruperunt in ea etiam vincula Pontificia, ac Matrimonium Sacerdotibus, ſicut hoc Scriptura Sacra & exempla Sanctorum Patrum ac veteris Eccleſiæ exigunt & teſtantur, liberum permiſerunt. Exiſtimarunt enim hoc quoque ad ſuum officium pertinere, ut infinitorum ſcandalorum & ſcelerum, quæ neceſſario ſecum trahit cœlibatus Sacerdotalis, occaſionem & materiam præſcinderent & auferrent, publicæque honeſtati hac quoque in re conſulerent; maxime cum animadverterent quantæ etiam abominationes, & in ordine Sacerdotali, & in Monaſteriis Veſtalium ac Monachorum evenerint, in quibus compertum eſt ſæpe infantes crudeliter necatos, pharmacis fœtus depulſos, & ſimilia nefaria crimina commiſſa, quos ſolos fructus cœlibatus ille protulit: ideoque plurimi nunc ſunt conjugati Sacerdotes apud nos, multi etiam cœlibes, idque cujuſque Conſcientiæ ut vel ducat Uxorem vel a Conjugio abſtineat, permittitur; modo ita vivat ne ſit aliis offendiculo, alioqui enim non minus in Sacerdotes quam reliquum vulgus, hac quoque parte, ſecundum Leges politicas animadvertitur. Ac per Dei Gratiam, hoc inde ſecutum eſt, quod eorum Conſcientiis, quibus continentiæ donum non contigit, conſultum fuerit, plurimorum flagitiorum & ſcelerum occaſio ceſſaverit, matronis ac puellis quibus plerique iſtorum ſub ſpecie Pietatis ſæpiſſime inhiabant, & laqueos nectebant, nihil ejuſmodi periculi ſit; & in ſumma, quod quum tum Officia Eccleſiaſtica, tum politica majore reverentia & honeſtate tractentur, quodque ab univerſis in majore honore & favore habeantur Sacerdotes, quam antea in illo pleno ſcandalis cœlibatu acciderit, id quoque magna ex parte honeſtum conjugium Sacerdotum præſtat.

Adhæc, nulli acrius & conſtantius oppugnant Romanum Pontificem, & tum Matrimonii libertatem, tum ſanam Doctrinam ab illo obſcuratam & oppreſſam defendunt, quam hi qui ab ejus jugo impuri illius cœlibatus liberati ſunt: & honeſte etiam ſuos liberos, quos ex conjugio ſuſcipiunt educare ſolent, quibus haud dubie Deus etiam poſt mortem parentum, ubi in timore Domini aliti & edocti fuerint, proſpiciet; graviſſimum enim eſſe, Sacerdotes ideo à conjugio arcere, quia ſua munia ſive officia tantum ad vitam ſuam, non autem jure hæreditario tenent;

eadem ratione multis aliis qui ſunt aut in publicis muneribus, aut in privatis Miniſteriis, Matrimonium interdicendum foret. Quod quidem ſi fieret, Reip. plus incommodi quam boni allaturum eſſet; cum & Sacrarum Literarum Auctoritate, Sanctiſſimorum Patrum Sententiis, Legum, Naturæ & Gentium teſtimonio, & omnium ſapientiſſimorum virorum judicio ac ſuffragiis conſtet, Matrimonium ſemper iis, qui cœlibes vivere non queant, ad vitanda graviora pericula, conceſſum & liberum eſſe debere.

Hæc, Sereniſſime ac Invictiſſime Rex, coram Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtate Veſtra, breviter diſſerenda duximus, ut Majeſtati Veſtræ rationes quaſdam commemoraremus, cur Illuſtriſſimi Principes noſtri, & alii Evangelii Doctrinam profitentes Principes & Status Imperii, in his tribus Articulis adeo diſſentiant à Romano Pontifice, ut ſicut in reliquis Doctrinæ Chriſtianæ partibus a veritate vel latum digitum non diſcedendum eſſe exiſtiment, ita in his etiam decreverint, abjecta ejus Tyrannide, pro Gloria Evangelii, & ad vitanda infinita ſcelera, perdurare: neque vero hic dicemus de aliis abuſibus à Romano Pontifice introductis, in quos imprimis Confeſſio Auricularis recenſeri meretur, qua ille, & Poteſtatem clavium tantum ad turpiſſimum quæſtum & Tyrannidem redegit, & Confeſſionem ipſam, quæ informandarum & conſolandarum Conſcientiarum gratia ſalubriter inſtituta fuit, carnificinam tantum Conſcientiarum reddidit, perque eam tum omnes Reges, Principes, & Potentatus ſub ſuo jugo tenuit, tum multorum malorum auctor extitit; de qua quid noſtri ſentiant, ac qua reverentia in Eccleſiis retineant, edita ipſorum ſcripta teſtantur.

Ac gratulamur nobis datam occaſionem hæc Sereniſſimæ Regiæ Majeſtati Veſtræ exponendi, ejuſq; cenſuræ committendi: Cum enim Majeſtas Veſtra & ſumma Doctrina, Sapientia ac ſtudio Veritatis prædita ſit, & Romani Epiſcopi Tyrannidem (haud ſine mente Deum, ſive numine Divum, ut Poeta inquit) itidem ex ſuis ampliſſimis Regnis exterminari curaverit, neque amplius per Dei Gratiam illius impiis opinionibus captiva teneatur; perſuaſiſſimum nobis habemus Veſtræ Sereniſſimæ Regiæ Majeſtatis hiſce de rebus maximis, quæ ad Dei Gloriam, ſalutem Eccleſiæ, & perpetuam profligationem Romani Antichriſti pertinent, æquiſſimum ac liberrimum fore judicium, quod ſane ii, quibus vel Doctrina aut veritatis ſtudium deeſt, vel animum habent addictum Pontificiis Opinionibus, vel metu interdum prohibentur, aut etiam ab affectibus diverſe trahuntur, non adeo facile præſtare poſſunt; & plurimi interdum inſervientes tempori, fingunt ſe odiſſe Pontificem, ſimulantque ſtudium veritatis, quibus tamen revera aliud eſt cordi, hi vero quum non poſſint nec debeant de hiſce controverſiis ferre ſententiam, Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra nequaquam ignorat.

Non autem dubitamus, quin ut quiſque eſt eruditiſſimus, & veritatis Evangelicæ amantiſſimus, ita facillime eum cauſam noſtram, imo Chriſti & Eccleſiæ, adprobaturum eſſe, neque enim ea ullum commodum aut emolumentum privatum quæritur, ſed ſolum agitur de abolendis impiis abuſibus in Chriſti Eccleſiam per Antichriſtum invectis, & Chriſti Gloria illuſtranda, ac veris Cultibus reſtituendis, & ut hominum Conſcientiæ Jugo ac Tyrannide pontificia liberentur, ac ſcandala publica, quantum fieri poſſit, è medio tollantur. Quarum quidem rerum ſtudium quo jure reprehendi queat, ut etiam magis favore & imitatione dignum cenſendum dum ſit ; Cum enim omnium bene conſtitutarum Rerumpub. hic præcipue finis & ſcopus eſſe debeat, ut & Dei Gloria ornetur, & publica ſalus, honeſtas, pax & tranquillitas conſervetur, quis dubitat eos qui ſedent ad gubernacula Rerumpub. & ad hæc tanquam ad Cynoſuram, ut dici ſolet, curſum ſuum & omnem rationem regendi Rempublicam inſtituunt, maximis Laudibus dignos eſſe? Et quoniam Sereniſſima Regia Veſtra Majeſtas, ut Rex ſapientiſſimus & eruditiſſimus, hunc quoque ſcopum in gubernandis ampliſſimis & laudatiſſimis Regnis & Provinciis ſuis ob oculos habere, Luce meridiana clarius adparet, non poſſumus non nobiſipſis, quum in hac honeſtiſſima cauſa promovendæ Chriſti Gloriæ & Publicæ utilitatis, ad Sereniſſimam Regiam Majeſtatem Veſtram Oratores miſſi ſumus, non gratulari ; non poſſumus etiam non fœlices judicare univerſos ſubditos, Majeſtatis Veſtræ, quibus divina bonitate talis Rex & Princeps contigerit, qui cum aliis regiis Virtutibus excellit, tum ſtudio veræ pietatis & veritatis Evangelicæ omnibus modis admirandus conſpicitur.

Sunt quidem illa maxima Remp. certis & juſtis Legibus civilibus conſtituere, bonos tueri & juvare, improbos pœnis adficere, arcere injurias, Pacem & Concordiam ſubditorum conſervare ; quis enim non tanquam Deum aliquem talem Principem amplectendum & honorandum putet, a quo iſta præſtentur : ſed adhuc ſunt majora, ſi vera pietas acceſſerit, ſi Chriſti Gloria ornetur, ſi Dei Verbum in pretio habeatur, ſi cultus Divinæ Voluntati conſentanei inſtituantur, ſi hominum conſcientiis conſulatur, & publica ſcandala è medio tollantur ; illa enim tantum hanc civilem vitam attingunt, quam unumquemq; quum tempus præfinitum advenerit, deſerere oportet ; hæc vero ad æternam ſalutem pertinent quæ bonos & pios, ceſſante hac miſera conditione humanæ Vitæ, expectat, quibuſq; & in hoc, & in futuro ſæculo, maxima præmia propoſita ſunt. Hoc eſt cur Deus Reges honore ſui nominis ornat, cum ait, Ego dixi, Dii eſtis, maxime ut res divinas intelligant, & veram Religionem in Mundo conſervent ; huc præcipue Scriptura hortatur, cum inquit, Nunc Reges intelligite, & erudimini qui judicatis terram, ſervite Domino, &c. huc invitant exempla præſtantiſſimorum Regum in Sacris Literis, qui ſumma cura, opera, ac ſtudio veram Religionem promoverunt, & impios cultus abrogarunt : hoc David, hoc Joſias, hoc Joſaphat, hoc Ezechias, & deinceps omnes Sanctiſſimi Reges præſtiterunt. Eadem cum Sereniſſ. R. M. Veſtra haud dubie etiam cogitet, imo jam nunc in hoc totis viribus incumbat, ut ſincera Evangelii Doctrina Papæ Tyrannide oppreſſa reſtituatur, Gloria Chriſti itidem à Pontifice obſcurata iterum illuſtretur, & impii abuſus ab illo ipſo Antichriſto in Eccleſiam tanquam venenum quoddam peſtilentiſſimum ſparſi & introducti aboleantur, ac veri & Divinis Literis conſentanei Cultus & Cæremoniæ conſtituantur, non dubitamus quin Deus Opt. Max. Sereniſſ. R. Majeſtatis Veſtræ conatus & conſilia, in hiſce rebus Sanctiſſimis & Honeſtiſſimis fortunaturus ſit, & pro ſua bonitate clementer effecturus, ut inter Sereniſſ. R. M. Veſtram & Principes noſtros, ac eorum in cauſa Religionis conſœderatos, talis concordia conſtituatur, quam & Laudem Evangelii, & publicam totius Chriſtiani Orbis utilitatem ceſſuram, & majori exitio Romano Antichriſto futuram eſſe, minime ambigimus ; eſtque optima ſpes, ut volente Deo, plures Reges, Principes, & Potentatus, ad hanc Sanctiſſimam cauſam accedant, ac Evangelicæ veritatis Doctrinam agnoſcant & recipiant, ſicut etiam hactenus per Dei Gratiam, maximi progreſſus facti ſunt, & non tantum in Germania, verum etiam extra Germaniam, Potentiſſimi Reges, Principes & Civitates, Divini Verbi Doctrinam receperunt.

Adparetque homines paſſim agnita veritate, ex Scriptis eorum qui Evangelii Doctrinam profitentur & docent, per totum pæne orbem terrarum ſparſis ſanioris Doctrinæ admodum cupidos eſſe, quorum preces aliquando Deus pro ſua benignitate exaudiet, ac ſuum Verbum illuminatis mentibus Regum & Principum latiſſime propagabit, ut ſi unus Paſtor, hoc eſt Dominus noſter Jeſus Chriſtus, & unum Ovile quod eſt Eccleſia Catholica, quæ profitetur ſincerum Chriſti Evangelium, & illi conſentaneum uſum Sacramentorum retinet, non Papiſtica aut Romana, quæ utrumque reprobat, odit, & oppugnat.

Quod reliquum eſt, Sereniſſime ac Potentiſſime Rex, Domine Clementiſſime, precamur & optamus ut Sereniſſ. Regia Majeſtas Veſtra in cœpto negotio veritatis Evangelicæ pro illuſtranda Chriſti Gloria & ſalute publica, per Dei Gratiam fortiter pergat, quod quidem Majeſtatem Veſtram, ut Regem veræ Pietatis & omnis virtutis ac Doctrinæ amantiſſimum, facturam nihil dubitamus: Oramuſque ut Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra dato benigno reſponſo, ad Illuſtriſſimos Principes noſtros, quam primum fieri queat, ne commodam præſentis Navigationis occaſionem negligamus, clementer nos dimittat; & ut Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra, erga quam noſtra debita officia atque ſervitia ſumma cum obſervantia perpetuo conſtabunt, has noſtras Literas pro ſua inſigni humanitate, bonitate ac clementia, in optimam partem accipiat, noſque etiam clementer commendatos habeat. Bene valeat Sereniſſima Regia Majeſtas Veſtra, quam Deus Opt. Max. pro illuſtranda & propaganda nominis ſui Gloria & publica ſalute, diu ſervet incolumem. VIII. The King's Anſwer to the former Letter.

LIteras Veſtras, Egregii ac præſtantiſſimi Oratores, per miniſtrum veſtrum nuper ad nos miſſas, ſumma humanitate plenas, atque ingentem erga nos benevolentiam ſpirantes, tum libenter accepimus, tum magna cum voluptate legimus; quibus ſignificatis vos, poſt expoſita nobis mandata, cum quibuſdam Epiſcopis & Theologiæ Doctoribus à nobis deſignatis de Chriſtianæ Religionis nonnullis Articulis per duos menſes contuliſſe; non dubitare quoque quin inter Principes veſtros & nos, atq; utrorumq; Epiſcopos, Theologos & ſubditos, firma perpetuaq; concordia in Evangelii Doctrina ad laudem Dei, & Romani Antichriſti perniciem ſit ſequutura: Verum quia reliquam diſputationem de abuſibus expectare non poteſtis, cum jam naves appulerint vos in patriam deportaturæ, ante diſceſſum Veſtrum exiſtimatis veſtri officii eſſe ut ſententiam veſtram de quibuſdam abuſuum Articulis nobis declaretis, de quibus nos poſt diſceſſum veſtrum cum Epiſcopis & Theologis noſtris conferre poſſemus. Et quia tria capita præcipua putatis quæ fundamentum Pontificiæ Tyrannidis ſuſtentare videntur, nempe Prohibitionem utriuſque ſpeciei in cœna Domini, Miſſas privatas, & Prohibitionem Conjugii Sacerdotum; de his Articulis ſententiam veſtram ingenue aperitis, atque eam judicio noſtro quantumcunq; id ſit, & cenſuræ committitis: Quis non hanc veſtram benevolentiam, Egregii Oratores, ſummopere amplectatur? Quis non hanc Veſtram Gratitudinem modis omnibus admiretur? Qui nobiſcum ea communicare ſtudetis, quæ non modo ad præſentem vitam tranſigendam, ſed ad futuram quoque aſſequendam conferunt? Enimvero ſi illos non abs re exiſtimamus amicos, qui in Regionum commerciis ea quæ ſunt grata atque commoda important, ne quid uſquam deſit quod ad præſentem vitam degendam pertinet; quanto magis illi ſunt amici judicandi, qui quæ ad æternam vitam conferunt, impertiri non gravantur! nam quæ præſentis vitæ ſubſidia parantur durabilia diu non ſunt, quæ vero ad æternam promovent nunquam intermoriuntur? quinimo amicitia ipſa terrena, quantumvis ingens, quantumvis firma, finem habet è vita exceſſum, charitas vero quæ nunquam excidit poſt hanc vitam ſplendeſcit magis. Et quia noſtrum judicium non aſpernari videmini, quod nos ipſi indignum exiſtimamus, ut de rebus tam arduis judicemus, atque ea proponitis quæ putatis inprimis amplectenda, qua in re non vulgarem ſed ingentem vim erga nos amoris oſtenditis, ne nos non reſpondere hinc veſtræ tantæ gratitudini videremur, ſi quæ nobis ad præſens videntur vobiſcum non communicaremus, decrevimus itidem de his tribus Articulis nonnihil attingere, & pectus noſtrum ingenue vobis aperire: Quo fiet ut mutuus inter nos & Principes veſtros amor eo magis augeſcat, eo diutius foveatur, ſi nihil occultum inter amicos retentetur, ſed ſumma ſinceritate gerantur omnia, id quod nos cum omnibus amicis ſemper facere conſuevimus; quod noſtrum perpetuum inſtitutum in præſentia apud Amiciſſimos, eoſque quos habemus chariſſimos, mutare nequaquam libuit. Verum de Articulis ipſis tandem agamus.

De utraque Specie.

Quod imprimis ſub utraq; Specie ſemper Euchariſtiam populis ſecundum primariam Chriſti inſtitutionem dandam eſſe exiſtimetis, & nullo pacto ſub altera tantum, non poſſumus quovis pacto adduci, egregii & præſtantiſſimi Oratores, ut putemus vos id ſerio affirmaſſe, ſed forſan probandi cauſa nobis id potuiſſe, ut quid ſentiamus intelligeritis; nam ipſa opinio tam aliena eſt à recta Scripturæ intelligentia, ut vix quivis id ſerio affirmare præſumeret, quod latius in hac Epiſtola declarabimus. Nec nobis perſuadere poſſumus, etſi occaſio ſit, vos non nobiſcum credere, quod ſub ſpecie Panis ſit realiter & ſubſtantialiter verum & vivum Corpus Chriſti, & una cum Corpore Sanguis verus, alioqui fatendum eſſet Corpus ibi exſangue eſſe, quod nefas eſſet dicere, cum Caro illa Chriſti non modo viva, ſed & vivificatrix ſit; & quod ſub ſpecie vini non modo vivus & verus Chriſti Sanguis ſit, ſed etiam una cum vero Sanguine viva & vera etiam Corporis ſit Caro. Quod cum ita ſit, neceſſario conſequetur etiam eos qui ſub altera ſpecie communicant, & ſolum ſub ſpecie Panis Corpus Chriſti ſumunt, non fraudari Communione Sanguinis Chriſti, atque eos etiam qui ſub ſpecie vini Communicant non fraudari Communione Corporis Domini; Quocirca cum ſub alterutra ſpecie utrumq; contineatur, viz. & Corpus & Sanguis Chriſti, utravis ſolum ſpecies porrigatur populis, utrumque, id eſt tam Sanguis quam Corpus Chriſti, per hoc eiſdem exhibeatur. Nam Chriſtus ipſe ſub altera ſpecie dediſſe legitur in Evangelio Lucæ Diſcipulis duobus in Emaus euntibus, quando agnitus eſt in fractione Panis; ſcribitur enim, quod cum recumberet cum eis, accepit Panem & benedixit, ac fregit & porrigebat illis, & aperti ſunt oculi eorum, & cognoverunt eum fractione Panis. Ubi de Euchariſtia cum locum vetuſtiſſimi Authores Chryſoſtomus, Theophylactus, & Auguſtinus intelligunt, & tamen de vini poculo nulla ibi fit mentio: Unde Chriſtus qui in altera ſpecie miniſtravit Euchariſtiam, libertatem Eccleſiæ ſponſæ ſuæ reliquiſſe videtur, ut imitetur ſponſi ſui veſtigia, ac ſimiliter ſub altera ſpecie, ſicut ſub utraque, communicare libere poſſit. Nam Chriſtus qui ſub utraq; ſpecie Communionem docuit, etiam de Communione ſub altera ipſe exemplum reliquit, qui ſecum tamen nuſquam vel in præceptis, vel in exemplis diſſidet.

Simile idem Lucas in Actis Apoſtolorum citat, quando poſt adventum Spiritus Sancti, prædicante Petro, appoſitæ ſunt animæ circiter tria millia, inquiens, Erant autem perſeverantes in Doctrina Apoſtolorum & Communicatione & fractione Panis & orationibus; Ubi ſimiliter de Euchariſtia eum locum intelligunt veteres, & de poculo nulla ſit ibi mentio. Jam ſi Chriſtum ipſum Autorem, ſi Apoſtolos ab eo ad docendum orbem miſſos Patronos habet, Communio ſub una ſpecie nempe Panis, uſitata in Eccleſia non eſt tanquam Evangelicis præceptis contraria, ſtatim repudianda; nam Apoſtoli, qui per adventum Spiritus edocti ſunt omnem veritatem, nunquam in fractione Panis Communionem dediſſent populo, ſi utraq; ſpecies de præcepto Chriſti ſemper neceſſario ſumſiet porrigenda, ne Chriſti jubentis parum memores inſtitutum ejus mutaſſe viderentur.

de alterutra ſpecie locutum eſſe; ait enim, Dominus Ieſus in qua nocte tradebatur, accepit Panem & Gratias agens fregit, & dixit, accipite & manducate, Hoc eſt Corpus meum quod pro vobis traditur, hoc facite in mei Commemorationem. Ecce Chriſtus de Corpore ſuo ſub ſpecie Panis ſumendo ſeparatim locutus eſt, inquiens, Hoc facite, priuſquam ullam de poculo faceret mentionem. Poſtea autem de Calice ait Paulus, Similiter & Calicem poſtquam cœnavit accepit dicens, Hic Calix Novum Teſtamentum eſt in meo Sanguine, hoc facite quotieſcunq; bibetis in mei Commemorationem: Nec dixit ſicut de corpore dixerat ſimpliciter, Hoc facite in mei Commemorationem, ſed dixit, Hoc facite, cum hac adjectione, nempe quotieſcunq; bibetis in mei Commemorationem, per hoc nobis indicans, non ſemper ſub ſpecie vini ſumendum eſſe ſanguinem una cum Corpore ſub ſpecie Panis, ſed quotieſcunq; ſumeretur Sanguis ſub ſpecie Vini in Commemorationem Chriſti, id faciendum.

Ecce rurſum Chriſtus poſt diſtributionem corporis ſui, peracta cœna in qua corpus ſuum ſub ſpecie Panis ſeparatim prius dederat, iterum ſeparatim ſub ſpecie Vini Sanguinem ſuum offert, inquiens, Hoc facite quotieſcunq; bibetis in mei Commemorationem, ſignificans nobis & ſeorſum nonnunquam alterum porrigi poſſe, & tamen cum ita ſit, utriuſq; vim integram Populis dari, alioqui ſuffeciſſet ſemel duntaxat de utroq; fuiſſe dictum, Hoc facite, nec de Calice adjeciſſet Hoc facite quotieſcunq; bibitis, cum prius de ſpecie Panis ſimpliciter dixiſſet Hoc facite, niſi ſeparatim ea ſumi poſſe judicaret.

Neque quiſquam negare poteſt Diſcipulos in cœna ſub ſpecie Panis ſumpſiſſe Corpus Chriſti, cœnantibus illis, accepit Panem & benedixit, ac fregit dediſq; illis, dicens, Hoc eſt Corpus meum; Calicem autem non niſi poſt intervallum ac peracta cœna porrexit, niſi quis adeo ſtupidus eſſet, ut crederet poſt ſumptionem ſpeciei Panis non prius eos ſumpſiſſe Corpus Chriſti, quum poſtquam cœnavit porrexiſſet Calicem; quaſi vero priora Verba Chriſti irrita fuiſſent, cum de ſpecie Panis diceret Hoc eſt Corpus meum, aut ipſa diſtributio facta Diſcipulis nullam vim haberet, priuſquam de Calice peracta Cœna bibiſſent; Quod cum impium ſit ſentire, tum ipſum Verbum & Factum Chriſti, proh nefas! evacuat. Denique ipſe Paulus, poſtquam etiam de utraque ſpecie conjunctim locutus eſt, rurſum de ipſis ſpeciebus disjunctim infert, inquiens ὥστε ὃς ἂν ἐσθίῃ τὸν ἄρτον τοῦτον, ἢ πίνῃ τὸ ποτήριον τοῦ Κυρίου ἀναξίως, ἔνοχος ἔσται τοῦ σώματος καὶ αἵματος τοῦ Κυρίου.

Quæ verba latine ſic tranſtulit Eraſmus, Itaq; quiſquis ederit Panem hunc aut de Calice biberit indigne, reus erit Corporis & Sanguinis Domini; ubi ex Pauli verbis aperte liquet, Quiſquis indigne Panem hunc ſumpſerit, reum eſſe Corporis & Sanguinis Domini, aut ſiquis de Calice biberet indigne, ſimiliter reum eſſe Sanguinis & Corporis Domini quod tamen nullo modo crimini daretur, niſi ſeorſum ſub ſpecie Panis eſſet & Corpus & Sanguis Chriſti, atque itidem ſub ſpecie Vini ſeorſum eſſet & Corpus & Sanguis Chriſti; nec disjunctim de ſpecie Panis locutus fuiſſet Paulus, ſi nunquam niſi conjunctim cum Calice ſumeretur: Neq; rurſum disjunctim de Calice diciſſet, ſi nunquam niſi conjunctim cum ſpecie Panis eſſet ſumendus. Quorſum enim ea disjunxiſſet ſi nunquam niſi conjuncta eſſe poſſent? An Verba ipſa Scripturæ ſingula ſunt attendenda, nam Propheta inquit, Inclinate aurem Veſtram in Verba oris mei; & Moiſes in Deuteronomio ait, Ponite corda veſtra in omnia Verba quæ ego teſtificor teſtificor vobis hodie, quia non incaſſum præcepta ſunt vobis. Et iterum, non addetis ad verbum quod vobis loquor, nec auferetis ab eo. Verba igitur Domini atque ipſius Pauli, & ſeparatim de alterutra ſpecie primum poſita, & poſt utriuſque conjunctionem etiam iterum disjuncta, ſignificare nobis videntur, & poſſe alterutram ſpeciem ſeorſum porrigi ſecundum Verbum Chriſti.

Nec per hoc quod Chriſtus dixit, Bibite ex hoc omnes, ſtatim conſequetur Chriſtum juſſiſſe Communionem cuilibet de populo ſemper ſub utraq; ſpecie & nunquam ſub altera dandam eſſe: Nam illorum Verborum ſenſum non alium eſſe apparet, quam quem ipſe Dominus Apoſtolum ſuum Paulum, qui à Domino de hoc Sacramento omnia ſe accepiſſe teſtatur, edocuit, nempe quod quotieſcunq; de Calice hoc quiſquam biberet, id in Chriſti memoriam faceret, ſicuti fecerunt Diſcipuli, qui tunc aderant præſentes & de eo biberunt omnes: Itaque quotieſcunque Sanguis Chriſti bibendus à quoquam eſſet, in memoria Paſſio Chriſti recordanda eſt; ſicut ſimiliter quiſquis Corpus Chriſti ſumpſerit, ad memoriam paſſionem ejus revocare debet: Neque ex præcepto Chriſti toties bibendum eſſe de hoc Calice, quotieſcunq; Corpus Chriſti ſumendum eſt, apparet per ea quæ de verbis & de exemplo Chriſti ſupradicta ſunt. Certe quicquid Chriſtus omnino obſervari præcepit, non poſſe ulla humana ſanctione prohiberi putamus, cum humana Lex divinam abolere non poſſit. Similiter etiam exiſtimamus, nec morem ullum, nec ullam conſuetudinem tantopere apud homines valere, ut Dei Verbum expugnet & Chriſti præceptum ſubvertat.

Verumtamen cum Chriſtus nobis libere reliquerit ut eum tribus modis corporaliter ſumere poſſimus, & quarto ſpiritualiter, nempe primo ſub utraque ſpecie, ſecundo, ſub Panis ſpecie tantum; tertio, ſub Vini; quarto voluntate & deſiderio ſolo cum aliter neceſſitate coacti eum ſumere nequimus; exiſtimamus pro primo, ut ſiquis fidelis ardenti in Deum amore flagrans, pietateq; ingenti æſtuans, magnopere deſideraret Sacramentum ſub utraq; ſpecie ſumere, ſi nullum vel valetudinis vel imbecillitatis obſtaret impedimentum, ei ſub utraq; ſpecie Communio præberi poſſit, dummodo neq; poſtulans neq; miniſtrans Sacramentum in ſcandalum Populi, aut in contemptum Eccleſiæ id faciat, neque ſuo jure Leges Religionis in qua degit ſive Eccleſiaſticas ſive Laicas infringere præſumat.

Pro ſecundo & tertio ſic, Quod ſi impedimentum aliquod hujuſmodi intervenit, ut in utraque ſpecie abſq; periculo ſumi non poſſit, ut ſiquis Paralyſi correptus, aut ab alio quovis naturæ aut morborum impedimento utramq; ſpeciem recipere commode non poſſit, hic ſi deſideret Sacram Communionem ſumere, ei ſub altera tantum ſpecie porrigatur. Pro quarto autem, Quod ſiquis nauſea, vel alia corporis moleſtia adeo ſit infeſtatus, ut nihil in ſtomachum receptum non rejectet, huic ſi id petat, Sacramentum ſaltem oſtendi poſſet, ut viſo eo mortem Chriſti redemptoris ſui citius revocans in memoriam compunctus corde ſpiritualiter communicet.

Plurimum igitur demiror, quod hi qui Chriſtianæ Libertatis aſſertores & acerrimi propugnatores videri volunt, libertatem hanc noſtram in hoc uno Corporis & Sanguinis Domini Sacramento, quo nihil ſuperexcellentius, nihil celebrius, nihil incomparabilius, nihil deniq; ad conſolandos fidelium animos ſolidius, Chriſtus hinc abiturus Eccleſiæ ſuæ reliquit, nobis nobis tollere velint, Quid enim majus donare potuit Chriſtus in hoc Sacramento ſumendum quam ſeipſum? Deinde cum ipſe omnino liberum nobis reliquerit, & poſſe aliquos ſub utraq; ſpecie Communionem accipere, & poſſe alios ſub altera, nonnullos quoq; morborum neceſſitate impeditos, ſaltem in conſpectum prolato Corpore Domini compuncto corde poſſe Spiritualiter communicare, quanta immodeſtia, quanta inclementia eſſet, libertate hac fraudare Chriſtianos? Ut quibus ſub utraq; ſpecie, ob impedimenta quæ ſunt innumera, Communio præberi non poſſet, his ſummi boni fruitione privatis ſub neutra daretur! Nec adhuc fatentur etſi non corporaliter ſumatur, ſaltem Spiritualiter capi poſſe. Qua non ſervitute durior eſſet hæc conditio, ut Chriſti redemptoris noſtri corpus, quod ille a fidelibus ſumi voluit, nobis id ſummopere deſiderantibus violenter eripiatur; quis ingenue Chriſtianus libertatem fruitionis hujus ſibi extortam non omni morte intolerabiliorem putaret? Itaq; libertas hæc a Chriſto nobis relicta omni conatu retinenda eſt, omnibus viribus amplectenda, nec ipſis mea opinione fidendum eſt, qui eam nobis tollere velint.

Præterea, quid fiat apud ſeptentrionales Populos? quid apud Populos Aphricæ & qui intra Tropicos habitant? apud quos non ea vini copia eſt ut Populis omnino ſub ſpecie vini præberi poſſit, (nam his Populis cerviſia ex frugibus eſt potui) an ideo quia ſub utraq; ſpecie his miniſtrari Sacramentum non poteſt, ab utraq; arcendi eſſent? aut ſub una non integrum Chriſtum capere poſſent? id quod abſit.

Quando autem primum Populus priſcum morem deſerere, & ſub altera tantum Panis ſpecie Communionem ſacram ſumere cœpit, nobis eſt incompertum; credibile eſt majores noſtros auctoritate Scripturæ motos, quæ alteram nonnunquam ſpeciem per Chriſtum & Apoſtolos datam memorat, propter periculum effuſionis in terram Sanguinis Chriſti, cum liquida omnia levi membrorum trepidante motu facile effundantur, religioſa quadam & pia reverentia, non mediocriq; Dei timore abſtinuiſſe in Sacramento a vini ſpecie, nec Chriſtum qui ſe cum Eccleſia uſque in finem omnibus diebus manſurum promiſit, tot ſæculis eam deſeruiſſe, ut ſi neceſſarium præceptum de utraq; ſpecie ſemper ab omnibus ſumenda dediſſet, in re tanti momenti eam permiſiſſet turpiter labi; ſed magis Eccleſiæ ſuæ liberum reliquiſſe videtur, ut cum in alterutra ſpecie totus & integer Chriſtus contineatur, ſub altera etiam ſumi poſſit.

Qui vero ſit mos hodie de utraq; ſpecie in Eccleſiis Græcis, quæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ Tyrannidem nunquam admiſerunt, non ſatis nobis eſt compertum, cum Græcia tota Turcarum ſubſit imperio, nec liberam habeant facultatem Chriſtum ut libet profitendi, quando nec Verbum Dei publice prædicare, nec ad Campanarum ſonitum Populum convocare, nec publicas Litanias crucis vexillo præeunte facere, his ullo pacto eſt conceſſum.

Sacramentum autem Euchariſtiæ Sacrificium non eſſe arbitramini, quod unum Sacrificium ſit propitiatorium mors Chriſti, & cum is ultra non moritur, qui ſemel tantum pro nobis oblatus eſt, nullum reſtat ultra Sacrificium, niſi cultus Spiritualis, hoc eſt, juſtitia Fidei & Fructus Fidei. Quid ſibi velit juſtitia quæ ex Fide eſt ſcimus, quippe quam Paulus opponit Juſtitiæ quæ eſt ex Lege: Cæterum qui ſunt fructus Fidei, nobis ex Scripturis non ſatis liquet, ipſam Fidem ſicut charitatem, & multas alias virtutes ſcimus eſſe fructus Spiritus. Verum enimvero non ſatis miramur, cur quiſpiam ægre ferat Miſſam Sacrificium vocari, quando omnis vetuſtas & Græcorum & Latinorum ſic eam appellare conſuevit, quum ibi fiat conſecratio Corporis & Sanguinis Domini in memoriam mortis ejus, qui, ut inquit Paulus, pro peccatis offerens hoſtiam, in ſempiternum ſedet ad dextram Dei, una enim oblatione conſummavit in ſempiternum ſanctificatos; itaq; ſi Chriſtus & Sacerdos eſſet, & Sacrificum, & Hoſtia, ubicunq; eſt Chriſtus, ibi eſt Hoſtia noſtra, ibi eſt Sacrificium noſtrum; at ſi in Sacramento altaris eſt verum Corpus Chriſti, & verus Sanguis Chriſti, quo pacto manente veritate Corporis & Sanguinis Domini, non eſt ibi Sacrificium noſtrum?

Porro quia in Miſſa eſt Chriſtus Sacrificium noſtrum, qui ipſe ultra non moritur, ibiq; cum ipſo capite noſtro, nos illius Corpus & Membra noſmet ipſos Deo Hoſtias vivas offerimus, Græci id totum ἀναίμακτον θυσίαν, id eſt, Sacrificium incruentum vocant: ita veteres omnes intrepide Miſſam Sacrificium vocarunt, quod ibi ſit Chriſtus Sacrificium noſtrum in Sacramento.

Sic Baſilius, ſic Chryſoſtomus, ſic Hieronymus, ſic Auguſtinus, eam appellare non dubitavit; Quocirca quid vetat Miſſam, in qua conſecratur Panis in Corpus Chriſti, & Vinum in Sanguinem ejus, qui vere eſt Sacrificium noſtrum, & hoc fieri in memoriam ſui juſſit, vocari Sacrificium: alioqui ſi id negabimus, non parum verendum eſt, ne cum Sacramentariis quos nunc vocant, qui veritatem Corporis & Sanguinis in Sacramento negant, & cum Anabaptiſtis conſentire videamur, à qua ſuſpicione ſicut in animo noſtro nos profitemur longe abeſſe, ita quoq; cupimus calumniantibus adverſariis omnem obtrectandi anſam auferri: Atqui cum in Miſſa tum Sacerdos, tum Populus contritus de peccatis ſe, ut hortatur Paulus, Hoſtiam vivam, ſanctam atq; Deo placentem exhibeat, Laudes quas Deo canat & in gratiarum actione verſetur, quis dubitare poteſt, ea quoq; ratione, Miſſam jure Sacrificium nominari, cum Propheta appellat Sacrificium Laudis, & Paulus omnes hortetur, ut ſe Hoſtias vivas exhibeant, id quod fit in Miſſa. Malachias etiam propheta inquit, Ab ortu ſolis uſq; ad occaſum, magnum eſt nomen meum in gentibus, & in omni loco Sacrificatur, & offertur nomini meo Oblatio munda, quia magnum eſt nomen meum in gentibus, dicit Dominus exercituum. At quæ alia Oblatio munda in omni loco inter gentes, niſi ſolus Chriſtus aut quod aliud Sacrificium Chriſtianorum, niſi Miſſa, ubi Commemoratio mortis Chriſti agitur? Nam aut aliquot inter gentes Chriſtianorum oportet eſſe Sacrificium, aut mentitus eſt Propheta: quænam quæſo eſt Oblatio munda, niſi ſolus Chriſtus Hoſtia noſtra, qui in Sacramento altaris eſt ſub Panis & Vini ſpeciebus? quippe quantumcunq; nos ipſi nos

Deo

Deo offeramus, hostiæ mundæ non meremur nomen, quorum omnis justitia velut pannus est menstruatæ; Itaque, constat Missam Sacrificium vocari ex Verbo Dei per Malachiam enunciato, quod cum ita sit, cur Missæ invidemus nomen Sacrificii, quod Propheta prædixit, & in qua Christus in Sacramento præsens est ipse mundi Sacrificium.

De Conjugio Sacerdotum.

Cœlibatum Sacerdotum contra Scripturam, contra Leges Naturæ, contra Honestatem, per Pontificem Romanum asseritis introductum, cum Scriptura Sacerdotibus, sicut cæteris hominibus, conjugium permittat, nec possit naturam suam mutare, nec absq; singulari dono cœlibes vivere: nam non omnes capiunt verbum hoc, & Paulus inquit, propter fornicationem unusquisq; Uxorem suam habeat.

Hic primum ordiri juvat, ut locum illum Evangelii de tribus Eunuchorum generibus consideremus, quandoquidem Christus alios à natura Eunuchos esse asserit, alios per vim factos, quorum neutrum genus continentiæ virtute splendet; quoniam alteros ad generandum natura, alteros violentia reddidit inutiles. Tertium vero genus eorum est, qui quanquam terrena generatione uti possunt, malunt continere, & se castrare propter Regnum Cœlorum; de quo genere Christus statim infert; qui potest capere, capiat, id quod nec de primo, nec de secundo Eunuchorum genere intelligi potest, quibus continentiæ palma negata est, cum descendere in certamen nequeunt: tertium vero genus eorum est, qui continentiæ student, & à licitis nuptiis abstinere malunt propter Regnum Cœlorum, quo Christum liberius atq; expeditius sequantur, ne terrenis nuptiis implicati, cogitare cogantur, ut inquit Paulus, quæ sunt mundi; ad quod genus Christus virginitatis autor homines sapientissime invitat, inquiens, Qui potest capere, capiat: per hoc quod inquit, capiat, homines adhortans ad capescendum certamen ut palmam arripiant, nempe Regnum Cœlorum, ad quod neminem hortaretur, si nemo carnem posset vincere; per hoc vero quod ait, qui potest capere, posse capi palmam indicans; alioqui si impossibile esset carnem superare, quorsum attineret dicere, qui potest, si nemo id possit.

Præterea per ea verba, Qui potest capere, quosdam etiam esse declarat, qui non facile possunt, nam nisi aliqui non facile possent capere, cur secerneret eos qui possunt; itaq; considerandas animi vires admonet, priusquam certamen aggrediare, ne temere arrepto certamine turpiter succumbas: Nec dixisset quosdam esse, qui se castraverunt propter Regnum Cœlorum, si caro esset insuperabilis, & nemo se castrare posset. Nec dubitandum est quin is qui hortatur ad subeundum certamen, gratiam suam sine qua nihil possent, his non defuturam demonstrat, qui nomina sua in militiam ei dederunt, quorum ille ipse dux futurus est, qui non modo in periculis suos Milites invocatus nunquam deserit, sed stat ante Januam & pulsat, paratus semper ad succurrendum, siquis ei aperiat: Nam Paulus tentationes superari posse nos admonet, modo Dei auxilium imploremus, inquiens, Tentatio vos non apprehendit nisi humana, fidelis autem Deus qui non patietur vos tentari supra id quod potestis, sed faciet etiam cum tentatione proventum ut possitis sustinere. Quamobrem his qui continentiam semel profitentur, & eam postea turpiter deserunt, etiam atq; etiam considerandum est, ne nomen Dei blasphemare videantur, tur, Chriſtum accuſantes deſerti auxilii, cum ſint ipſi deſertores militiæ, & primo ſtatim congreſſu terga dantes hoſti: itaq; quod Paulus liberum cuiq; facit, ut propter fornicationem Uxorem ſuam habeat, id de his intelligi, qui continentiam non ſunt profeſſi, Paulus ipſe nos docet, inquiens, de viduis adoleſcentioribus, quæ cum luxuriatæ fuerunt in Chriſto nubere volunt, habentes damnationem quia primam fidem irritam fecerunt. Auguſtinus Pauli Doctrinam ſecutus, Pſal. 83. inquit, alius ex Dei munere majus aliquid vovit, ſtatuit, nec nuptias pati, qui non damnaretur ſi duxiſſet Uxorem; poſt votum quod Deo promiſit ſi duxerit damnabitur: ſic virgo quæ ſi nuberet non peccaret, Sanctimonialis ſi nupſerit Chriſti adultera reputabitur, reſpexit enim retro de loco quo acceſſerat, exemplo Uxoris Loth, & ſicut canis reverſus ad vomitum reputatur.

Itidem Auguſtinus, Pſal. 75. ample aſſerit votum ſemel emiſſum ſervandum eſſe. Hieronymus etiam adverſus Jovinianum inquit, virgo quæ ſe Deo dicavit, ſi nubat, damnationem habet; atq; alio loco adverſus eundem, Virgines tuæ quas prudentiſſimo conſilio (quod nemo unquam legerat, nec audierat de Apoſtolo) docuiſti, melius eſſe nubere quam uri, occultos adulteros in apertos verterunt maritos; non ſuaſit hoc Apoſtolus, non Electionis vas Virgilianum conſilium eſt, conjugium vocat, hoc prætexit nomine culpam. Verbum ipſum Dei palam adverſatur ubique ne rumpantur vota. Propheta inquit, vovete & reddite Domino Deo Veſtro; in Deuteronomio quoq; ſcribitur, cum votum voveris Domino Deo tuo, non tardabis reddere, quia requiret illud Dominus Deus tuus, & ſi moratus fueris, reputabitur tibi in peccatum; ſi nolueris polliceri abſq; peccato eris, quod autem egreſſum eſt de labiis tuis, obſervabis & facies, ſicut promiſiſti Domino Deo tuo & propria voluntate & ore locutus es. Eccleſiaſtes etiam inquit, ſiquid voviſti ne moreris reddere, ſed quodcunq; voveris redde: Et in Numerorum libro ſcribitur, ſiquis virorum votum Domino voverit, aut ſe conſtrinxerit juramento, non faciat irritum verbum ſuum, ſed omne quod promiſit implebit. Quocirca Eccleſia à principio ſicut conjugatos Sacerdotes & Epiſcopos, qui ſine crimine eſſent unius Uxoris viri propter neceſſitatem admiſit, cum tot alii quot poſſent ad edocendum orbem ſufficere tunc non reperirentur idonei, & tamen Paulus ipſe Timotheum cœlibem elegit; Ita quoq; ſiquis ad Sacerdotium cœlebs accerſitus, poſtea Uxorem duxerit, ſemper à Sacerdotio deponebatur, ſecundum Canonem Neocæſarienſis Concilii, quod fuit ante Nicenum. Similiter in Calcedonenſi Concilio, in cujus primo capite priora Concilia confirmantur, ſtatuitur ut Diaconiſſa, ſi ſe nuptiis tradat, maneat ſub Anathemate, & Virgo Deo dicata & Monachus jungentes ſe nuptiis, maneant excommunicati.

Hoc quoq; obſervandum eſt, quod in Canonibus Apoſtolorum habetur, tantummodo Lectores Cantoreſq; non conjugatos poſſe Uxores ducere, cæteris vero in Clerum admiſſis poſtea Uxorem ducere nunquam licuit.

Qui vero conjugati ad Sacerdotium admiſſi erant, Uxores ſuas prætextu Religionis abjicere nequaquam poterant, ut docet Canon Apoſtolicus; cumque in Niceno Concilio proponeretur de Preſbyterorum jam ductis Uxoribus abjiciendis, reſtitit Paphnutius ne legitimæ Uxores pellerentur, cujus ſententiam, cum Canone Apoſtolorum de non non abjiciendis Uxoribus concordantem, omnes ſunt ſecuti.

Cæterum in Niceno Concilo nihil unquam propoſitum fuit, ut Sacerdotes poſt Sacerdotium Uxores ducerent, quod jam ante ſic erit prohibitum, ut ſiquis contrarium auderet, ducens poſtea Uxorem, deponeretur à Sacerdotio, ut ſupra dictum eſt; itaq; Paphnutius de non abjiciendis jam ductis ante Sacerdotium Uxoribus, non autem de ducendis poſt Sacerdotium aperte locutus eſt.

Itaq; neq; Canon aliquis Apoſtolicus, neq; Concilium Nicenum quicquam habet ejuſmodi ut in Sacerdotium admiſſi, poſtea Uxores ducant, ſicuti vos allegatis.

His concordat ſexta Synodus in qua ſancitum eſt quod ſiquis è Clero vellet Uxorem ducere, ante ſubdiaconatum id faceret, poſtea nequaquam liceret, nec ulla uſquam libertas Sacerdotibus in ſexta Synodo datur poſt Sacerdotium Uxores ducendi, ſicut vos aſſeritis.

Itaq; à principio naſcentis Eccleſiæ, plane compertum eſt nullo unquam tempore licuiſſe Sacerdoti poſt Sacerdotium Uxorem ducere; atq; ubicunq; id fuit attentatum, id non fuit impune, nam tantum nefas auſus deponebatur à Sacerdotio. Paulus Apoſtolus inquit, de conjugibus loquens, nolite fraudare invicem niſi forte ex conſenſu ad tempus, ut vacetis orationi. Hieronymus in Apologia ad Pammachium ait, Paulus Apoſtolus dicit, Quando coimus cum Uxoribus nos orare non poſſe, ſi per coitum quod minus eſt impeditur, id eſt orare, quanto plus quod majus eſt, id eſt Corpus Chriſti, prohibetur accipere: idque late proſequitur exemplo Panum Propoſitionis, qui non dabantur niſi continentibus Davidi & Miniſtris, ut ſcribitur in libro Regum; Panes enim Propoſitionis, quaſi Corpus Chriſti, de Uxorum cubilibus conſurgentes edere non poterant, ut inquit Hieronymus, atq; exemplo dationis legis veteris, ante cujus dationem filii Iſrael in Exodo triduo abſtinere ſunt juſſi ab Uxoribus.

Hieronymus etiam adverſus Jovinianum inquit, ſi Laicus & quicunq; fidelis orare non poteſt, niſi careat officio conjugali, Sacerdoti cui ſemper pro Populo offerenda ſunt ſacrificia, ſemper orandum eſt: ſi ſemper orandum eſt, ſemper ergo carendum Matrimonio. Idem aſſerit Ambroſius ample in Epiſtola ad Timotheum prima, cum quo conſentit Auguſtinus.

Paulus Timotheum Diſcipulum in Sacerdotali Officio erudiens, admonet ſecularia negotia fugienda eſſe, inquiens, Labora ut bonus miles Chriſti Ieſu, nemo militans implicat ſe negotiis ſecularibus, ut ei placeat cui ſe probavit; & ſi Sacerdotes Uxores acciperent, curis ſecularibus neceſſe eſt involvantur, nam teſte Paulo, qui cum Uxore eſt, ſolicitus eſt quæ ſunt mundi, quomodo placeat Uxori; qui vero ſine Uxore eſt, ſolicitus eſt quæ Domini ſunt, quomodo placeat Deo: Ideoq; eundem ad cœlibatum hortatur, quando ait Teipſum caſtum cuſtodi, nam Caſtitas, ubi de conjugatis non fit ſermo, cœlibatus intelligitur, ſuum enim Diſcipulum ſui ſimilem reddere cupiebat; atque quodam in loco Corinthiis ſcribens, omnes homines hortatur ad continentiam, ait enim, volo omnes homines eſſe ſicut meipſum, & rurſus dico non-nuptis & viduis bonum eſt, ſi ſic permanſerint ſicut & ego. Alio in loco ſcribens eiſdem, Miniſtros Eccleſiæ ſui officii admonet, adhortans ne in vacuum Gratiam Dei recipiant, & ſubdit, Nemini dantes ullam offenſionem, ut non vituperetur miniſterium, ſe in omnibus exhibeamus noſmetipſos ſicut Dei Miniſtros, Miniſtros, &c. in vigiliis, in jejuniis, in caſtitate, in ſcientia, in verbo veritatis. Quæ omnia ad Miniſtros Eccleſiæ pertinent quos caſtitatem maxime ſectari convenit, ut impuri non appropinquent altaribus, à quibus ſalaces omnino arceri decet: Nam non niſi de Sacerdotibus ea intelligi poſſunt, quando ſcientia divinæ Legis & Populi inſtitutio ad eos ſpectat, ut inquit Malachias, Labia Sacerdotis cuſtodiunt Scientiam & Legem requirunt ex ore ejus. Et Paulus Timotheum vult ſe exhibere operarium inconfuſibilem, recte tractantem verbum veritatis, viz. in Doctrina populi; igitur Sacerdotes Domini, qui ſe Deo jampridem dedicaverunt, qui ſe caſtraverunt propter Regnum Cœlorum, qui pro ſuis & populi peccatis orare aſſidue debent, quonam pacto, deſerto cœlibatus vexillifero Chriſto, novis nuptiis operam dare ſecularibuſq; moleſtiis quibus ſcaturiunt ſe implicare decet? quid enim eſt ad aratrum manum mittere, retroq; recipere exemplo Uxoris Loth, ſi hoc non eſt? cujuſmodi homines non aptos eſſe Regno Dei, Chriſtus ipſe pronunciat, etenim ſi nemo poteſt Uxori pariter & Philoſophiæ operam dare, ut mundana prudentia docet, quanto magis is qui ſe Deo dicavit, duobus Dominis ſervire non poterit, nempe Deo pariter & mundo, quorum uterq; totum hominem, non dimidiatum, ad ſe raptat?

Quanquam autem & conjugati & cœlibes in initio Eccleſiæ admittebantur ad Sacerdotium, id tamen non ubiq; ita ſervabatur teſte Hieronymo adverſus Vigilantium, ubi inquit, quid facient Orientis Eccleſiæ, quid Egypti, & Sedis Apoſtolicæ quæ aut Virgines clericos accipiunt, aut continentes, aut ſi Uxores habuerint mariti eſſe deſiſtunt? Atque ad Pammachium Hieronymus inquit, Chriſtus Virgo, Virgo Maria, utriuſq; ſexus virginitatem dedicaverunt, Apoſtoli vel Virgines, vel poſt nuptias continentes, Epiſcopi, Preſbyteri, Diaconi, aut Virgines eliguntur, aut vidui, aut certe poſt Sacerdotium in æternum pudici, in morem Eccleſiæ veterem, cujus autor eſt haud dubie Paulus & Scriptura ipſa. Jam vero uti Auguſtinum citatis, qui ait quidam nubentes poſt votum aſſerunt adulteros eſſe, ego dico vobis quod graviter peccant qui tales dividunt: at ille ipſe Auguſtinus aſſerit, lapſus & ruinas à caſtitate Sanctiori quæ vovetur Deo adulteriis eſſe pejores, neq; ſtatim legitimum eſt quicquid tolerat Eccleſia.

Cyprianus quoq; ipſe quem citatis, in illa ipſa Epiſtola de Virginibus quæ continentiam voverunt, ubi inquit, ſi perſeverare nolunt, vel non poſſint, melius eſt ut nubant, quam ut in ignem delitiis ſuis ruant; ex quo infertis tale votum non impedire Matrimonium, longe aliud ſentit: nam conſultus à Pomponio Sacerdote, quid ſibi videretur de Virginibus his, quæ cum ſemel ſtatum ſuum continenter & firmiter tenere decreverint, detectæ ſunt poſtea in eodem lecto pariter manſiſſe cum Maſculis; ea de re altius repetens Sermonem, periculoſamq; eſſe Virginum & Maſculorum cohabitationem, confirmans per Scripturas ac graves multorum ruinas ex hoc enatas, aſſerens generaliter de omnibus Virginibus inquit, quod ſi ex fide Chriſto ſe dicaverint caſte & pudice ſine ulla fabula perſeverent, ita fortes & ſtabiles præmium Virginitatis expectent; ſi autem perſeverare nolunt, vel non poſſunt, melius eſt ut nubant, quam ut in ignem delitiis ſuis cadant, certe nullum Fratribus aut Sororibus ſcandalum faciant, cum ſcriptum ſit, &c. Et paulo poſt infert, Chriſtus Dominus & Judex noſter, cum Virginem ſuam ſibi dicatam & ſanctitati ſuæ deſtinatam jacere cum altero cernat, quam indignatur & iraſcitur, & quas pœnas inceſtis hujuſmodi conjunctionibus comminatur! Deinde ad quæſitum reſpondens, jubet obſtetrices adhiberi ut videatur an Virgines illæ ſint corruptæ, ubi inquit, ſi autem aliquæ ex eis corruptæ fuerunt deprehenſæ, agant pœnitentiam plenam, quia quæ hoc crimen admiſit, non mariti ſed Chriſti adultera eſt, & ideo æſtimato juſto tempore & ex Homologeſi facta ad Eccleſiam redeant; quodſi obſtinatæ perſeverent, nec ſe ab invicem ſeparent, ſciant ſe cum hac ſua impudica obſtinatione nunquam à nobis admitti in Eccleſiam poſſe, ne exemplum cæteris ad ruinam delictis ſuis facere incipiant. Ecce quid ſentit Cyprianus de votis ruptis, inceſtuoſos & Chriſti Adulteros hujuſmodi flagitioſos appellat, & niſi ſeparentur, nunquam admittit in Eccleſiam; quomodo erga talia vota non impediant Matrimonium, aut quis ad tale Matrimonium quenquam hortari audebit, quod ſine violatione voti & tranſgreſſione divini mandati, ideoq; ſine graviſſimo ſcelere contrahi non poſſit? Atqui quod Principes Germaniæ, ſcribitis, cum viderent multa flagitia de cœlibatu Sacerdotum provenire, Matrimonia Sacerdotibus libera permiſiſſe, ſi meum, Egregii Oratores, conſilium requiſiſſent veſtri Principes, priuſquam tot Sacerdotes apud vos ruptis vinculis ad nuptias convolaſſent, ad id conſilii dediſſem quod veſtri Principes arripuerunt hæſito magnopere; nam ſi Sacerdotes qui continere nollent, erumpere ad nuptias omnino voluiſſent, quanto ſatius forte fuiſſet, exemplo veterum depoſuiſſe tales à Sacerdotio, ſuæq; de cætero Conſcientiæ quenquam reliquiſſe, ac deinde puriores altaribus admoviſſe, quam libere omnia permittendo peccatis alienis auctores videri, atq; ea ratione aliena peccata noſtra facere: Veruntamen nos qui in aliena Repub. curioſi nunquam fuimus nec eſſe voluimus, omnia Principum veſtrorum acta atq; geſta in optimam partem interpretamur, non dubitantes, quin ad tollendos abuſus omnes ſincerus his animus, atq; ad repurgandam Dei Eccleſiam appoſitus non deſit.

Porro nos qui in Regno noſtro Romani Epiſcopi Tyrannidem profligare magna induſtria ſtuduimus, & Chriſti Gloriam ſinceriter promovere curabimus Deo propitio, quantum humano conſilio fieri poteſt, ne quis abuſus ſive à Romano Epiſcopo ſive à quovis alio inductus non aboleatur, & ſi quos comperiemus tempori inſervientes, fingenteſq; ſe odiſſe Romanum Epiſcopum, atq; in Sermone ſimulare veritatem, quam corde non amplectuntur, ejuſmodi viris conſilia noſtra de rebus ſacris non communicabimus, nec eorum vel de Sacris vel de Prophanis expectabimus ſententiam.

Quæ vero Chriſti purum atq; ſinceram Doctrinam promovere, quæ Chriſti Evangelium dilatare, quæ ad repurganda Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ vitia tendere, quæ ad extirpandos abuſus atq; errores omnes ſpectare, quæ deniq; Eccleſiæ candorem exornare poſſe videbuntur, ea totis viribus ſectabimur, his ſtudebimus, his Deo volente in perpetuum incumbemus.

Vobis autem, Præſtantiſſimi Oratores qui tot labores terra marique perpeſſi eſtis, ut nos inviſeretis, qui cum Theologis noſtris tamdiu contuliſtis, qui ob Evangelii negotium à Patria abfuiſtis multis menſibus, immenſas atq; innumeras habemus gratias; nec miramur ſi dulcis amor

Patriæ,

Cotton Libr. Cleo. E. 5.

RIght Reverend Father in God, right truſty and well-beloved, we greet you well: And whereas for the Vertue, Learning and good Qualities which we ſaw and perceived heretofore in you, judging you thereby a Perſonage that would ſincerely, devoutly, purely, and plainly ſet forth the Word of God, and inſtruct our People in the truth of the ſame, after a ſimple and plain ſort, for their better Inſtruction, Unity, Quiet, and Agreement in the Points thereof, we advanced you to the room and office of a Biſhop within this our Realm; and ſo endowed you with great Revenues and Poſſeſſions; perceiving after, by the contrariety of preaching within this our Realm, our ſaid People were brought into a diverſity of Opinion, whereby there enſued Contention amongſt them; which was only engendred by a certain contemptuous manner of ſpeaking, againſt honeſt, laudable, and tolerable Ceremonies, Uſages, and Cuſtoms of the Church; we are enforced, by our ſundry Letters, to admoniſh and command you, amongſt others, to preach God's Word ſincerely, to declare Abuſes plainly, and in no wiſe contentiouſly to treat of matters indifferent, which be neither neceſſary to our Salvation, as the good and vertuous Ceremonies of Holy Church, ne yet to be in any wiſe contemned and abrogated, for that they be incitements and motions to Vertue, and allurements to Devotion: All which our travail notwithſtanding, ſo little regard was by ſome taken and adhibited to our Advertiſements therein, that we were conſtrained to put our own Pen to the Book, and to conceive certain Articles, which were by all you the Biſhops and whole Clergy of this our Realm in Convocation agreed on, as Catholick, meet, and neceſſary to be by our Authority for avoiding of all Contention ſet forth, read and taught to our Subjects, to bring the ſame in Unity, Quietneſs, and good Concord: ſuppoſing then that no Perſon having Authority under us, would either have preſumed to have ſpoken any word, that might have offended the ſentence and meaning of the ſame, or have been any thing remiſs, ſlack, or negligent in the plain ſetting forth of them as they be conceived, ſo as by that mean of abſtinence ſuch Quiet and Unity ſhould not grow thereupon as we deſired and looked for of the ſame; and perceiving eft-ſoons, by credible report, that our labours, travail, and deſire therein, is nevertheleſs defeated, and in manner by general and contemptuous words ſpoken, ſpoken by ſundry light and ſeditious Perſons, contemned and deſpiſed, ſo that by the abſtinence of direct and plain ſetting forth of the ſaid Articles, and by the fond and contentious manner of ſpeaking, that the ſaid light Perſonages do ſtill uſe againſt the honeſt Rites, Cuſtoms, Uſages, and ceremonial things of the Church, our People be much more offended than they were before; and in a manner exclaim that we will ſuffer that injury at any Man's hand, whereby they think both God, Us, and our whole Realm highly offended, inſomuch that principally upon that ground, and for the Reformation of thoſe Follies and Abuſes, they have made this Commotion and Inſurrection, and have thereby grievouſly offended us, damaged themſelves, and troubled many of our good Subjects: We be now enforced, for our diſcharge towards God, and for the tender Love and Zeal we bear to the Tranquillity and loving Unity of our ſaid People and Subjects, again to readdreſs theſe our Letters to all the Biſhops of our Realm, and amongſt other unto you, as a peremptory Warning to admoniſh you, to demean and uſe your ſelf for the redobbying of theſe things as ſhall be hereafter declared, upon pain of deprivation from the Biſhoprick, and further to be puniſhed for your Contempt, if you ſhall offend in the contrary, as Juſtice ſhall require for your own Treſpaſs.

And firſt, we ſtraitly charge and command you, that plainly and diſtinctly, without any additions, ye ſhall every Holy-day, whereſoever ye ſhall be within your Dioceſs, when ye may ſo do with your Health and convenient Commodity, openly, in your Cathedral Church, or the Pariſh Church of the place where ye ſhall for time be, read and declare our Articles; and in no wiſe, in the reſt of your words which ye ſhall then ſpeak of your ſelf, if you ſpeak any thing, utter any word that ſhall make the ſame, or any word in the ſame, doubtful to the People.

Secondly; We will and command you, That you ſhall in your Perſon travel from place to place in all your Dioceſs, as you may with your Commodity, and endeavour your ſelves every Holy-day to make a Collation to the People, and in the ſame to ſet forth plainly the Texts of Scripture that you ſhall treat of; and with that alſo as well to declare the Obedience due by God's Laws to their Prince and Soveraign Lord, againſt whoſe Commandment they ought in no wiſe, though the ſame were unjuſt, to uſe any violence, as to commend and praiſe honeſt Ceremonies of the Church as they be to be praiſed, in ſuch plain and reverent ſort, that the People may perceive they be not contemned, and yet learn how they were inſtituted, and how they ought to be obſerved and eſteemed; uſing ſuch a temperance therein, as our ſaid People be not corrupted, by putting over-much affiance in them, which a part ſhould more offend, than the clear ſilencing of the ſame, and that our People may thereto the better know their Duties to us, being their King and Soveraign Lord.

Thirdly; We ſtraitly charge and command you, That neither in your private Communications you ſhall uſe any Words that may ſound

to the contrary of this our Commandment, ne you ſhall keep or retain any Man of any degree, that ſhall in his words privately or openly, directly or indirectly, ſpeak in theſe matters of the Ceremonies, contentiouſly or contemptuouſly; but we will that in caſe ye have, or ſhall have towards you any ſuch Perſon that will not better temper his Tongue, you ſhall, as an Offender and a Seductor of our People, ſend the ſame in ſure cuſtody to us and our Council, to be puniſhed as ſhall appertain; and ſemblably to do with other Strangers whom ye ſhall bear to be notable Offenders in that part.

Fourthly; Our Pleaſure and Commandment is, That you ſhall on your behalf, give ſtrait Commandment upon like pain of deprivation and further puniſhment, to all Parſons, Vicars, Curates, and Governors of Religious Houſes, Colledges, and other places Eccleſiaſtical within your Dioceſs, that they and every of them ſhall, touching the indifferent praiſe of Ceremonies, the avoiding of contentious and contemptuous Communication, concerning any of the ſame, and the diſtinct and plain reading of our ſaid Articles, obſerve and perform, in their Churches, Monaſteries, and other Houſes Eccleſiaſtical aforeſaid, the very ſame order that is before to you preſcribed. And further, that you permit nor ſuffer any Man, of what degree ſoever in Learning, Strangers or other, to preach in any place within your ſaid Dioceſs out of his own Church, by virtue of any Licenſe by us, or any other of our Miniſters, granted before the fifteenth day of this Month, neither in your preſence nor elſewhere, unleſs he be a Man of ſuch Honeſty, Vertue, Learning, and Judgment, as you ſhall think able for that purpoſe, and one whom in manner you dare anſwer for.

Finally; Whereas we be advertiſed that divers Prieſts have preſumed to marry themſelves, contrary to the cuſtom of our Church of England, Our Pleaſure is, Ye ſhall make ſecret enquiry within your Dioceſs, whether there be any ſuch reſiant within the ſame or not; And in caſe ye ſhall find that there be any Prieſts that have ſo preſumed to marry themſelves, and have ſithence nevertheleſs uſed and exerciſed in any thing the Office of Prieſthood, we charge you, as ye will anſwer upon the pains aforeſaid, not to conceal their doings therein, but rather to ſignify their demeanour to our Council, or to cauſe them to be apprehended, and ſo ſent up unto us accordingly. Given under our Signet at our Caſtle of Windſor, the 19*th* day of November, in the 28*th* Year of our Reign.

X. Tonſtall's Arguments for the Divine Inſtitution of Auricular Confeſſion; with ſome Notes written on the Margent by King Henry's own Hand. An Original.

Quod Confeſſio Auricularis ſit de Jure Divino.

PRobari videtur ex illo loco Matthæi 3. ubi Joanne Baptiſta in deſerto prædicante pœnitentiam, exibat ad eum Hieroſolyma & omnis Judæa, & baptizabantur ab eo in Jordane confitentes peccata ſua; quem locum Chryſoſtomus ita exponit, inquiens, Confeſſio peccatorum eſt Teſtimonium Conſcientiæ confitentis Deum, qui enim timet Judicium Dei peccata ſua non erubeſcat confiteri; qui autem erubeſcit non timet, perfectus enim timor ſolvit omnem pudorem; illic enim turpitudo confeſſionis aſpicitur, ubi futuri judicii pœna non creditur. Nunquid neſcimus quia Confeſſio peccatorum habet pudorem, & quia hoc ipſum erubeſcere pœna eſt gravis, ſed ideo magis non jubet Deus confiteri peccata noſtra, ut verecundiam patiamur pro pœna? nam & hoc ipſum pars eſt judicii, O miſericordia Dei! quem toties ad iracundiam excitavimus, ſufficit ei * ſolus pudor pro pœna. Cotton Libr. Cleop. E. 5.

* Nota bene de ſolo pudore.

Si verecundia pro pœna eſt apud Deum, ea autem non continget ex confeſſione facta ſoli Deo, nam nemo rationis compos ignorat etiam abſque Confeſſione Deum peccata noſtra ſcire, de Confeſſione facta homini neceſſe eſt intelligatur. Præterea ipſa Verba demonſtrant quod Joanni Baptiſtæ confeſſi ſunt peccata ſua, nam dixit eis, facite ergo fructum dignum pœnitentia, quod apte dicere non poterat, niſi pœnitentes eos ex confeſſione ſibi facta reſciviſſet. Fallax.

XI. A Letter of King Henry's to Tonſtall, Biſhop of Dureſme, againſt Auricular Confeſſion being of Divine Inſtitution. An Original.

Cot. Libr. Cleop. E. 5. SInce me thought (my Lord of Durham) that both the Biſhops of York, Wincheſter, and your Reaſons and Texts were ſo fully anſwered this other day, in the houſe, as to my ſeeming and ſuppoſal, the moſt of the Houſe was ſatisfied; I marvelled not a little why eft-ſoons you have ſent to me this now your writing, being in a manner few other Texts or Reaſons than there were declared both by the Biſhop of Canterbury and me, to make ſmally or nothing to your intended purpoſe: but either I eſteem that you do it to prove my ſimple judgment alone, which indeed doth not much uſe (tho not the wiſeſt) to call in aid, the Judgments of other learned Men, and ſo by mine ignorant Anſwer, ſeem to win the Field; or elſe that you be too much blinded in your own Fancy and Judgment, to think that a Truth, which by learning you have not yet proved, nor I fear me cannot by Scriptures, nor any other Directors probable grounds, though I know mine unſufficiency in Learning, if the matter were indifferent, and that the Ballance ſtood equal, ſince I take the verity of the Cauſe rather to favorize the part I take than yours, it giveth me therefore great boldneſs, not preſuming in Learning, but in juſtneſs of the Cauſe, ſeeing by writing you have provoked me to it, to make anſwer to your Arguments: Therefore I beginning now to reply to your firſt Allegation, ſhall eſſay to prove, if I can, that your own Author in place by you alledged, maketh plain againſt your Opinion; for as you alledg him, St. Chryſoſtom ſaith Quod ſufficit ſolus pudor pro pœna, then Auricular Confeſſion is not by commandment neceſſary; for if it were, this word (Solus) is by your Author ill ſet; therefore your Author in this place furdereth you but little. To your Fallax Argument, I deny your conſequent, founded only upon ſmall Reaſon, which is the ground of your Fallax Argument: which Reaſon I need not take away, for your alledged Author doth ſhew too plainly, in his 5. Homily, Tom. 5. that you gather wrong ſence upon his Words; for he ſaith, with much more touching this matter, theſe few Words, Non hominibus peccata detegere cogo; then this other Text before rehearſed, is not to be underſtood as you will by writing it. Further, me thinketh I need not (God thank you) too greatly ſtudy for Authors to conclude your wrong taking of Texts, for thoſe your ſelf alledg ſerveth me well to purpoſe: for all your labour is to prove that Auricular Confeſſion were by God commanded, and both your Authorities of Bede and Paul, ſheweth nothing but that they did confeſs their Sins, and yet do not they affirm that it was by commandment; wherefore they make for mine Argument and not for yours. Your other Texts of John 21. and Matthew 10. were ſo throughly anſwered this other day, and ſo manifeſtly declared not to appertain to our grounded Argument, that I marvel you be not aſhamed eft-ſoons to put them in writing, and to found your Argument now ſo fondly on them; for what fonder Argument can be made to prove thereby a neceſſity of Confeſſion, than to ſay, If you confeſs not, I cannot forgive? Would a Thief which committeth mitteth Fellony, think himſelf obliged by the Law to diſcloſe his Fellony, if the Law ſay no more, but if thou confeſs not I cannot forgive thee? or would Theft the ſooner therefore be forgiven? This is matter ſo apparent, that none can but perceive except he would not ſee. As touching Origens places by you alledged; as the firſt, in Leviticum, ſheweth that we be as much bound lavare ſtratum Lacrimis, as dicere Sacerdoti, which no Man, I think, will affirm that we be bound to do; and yet he affirmeth not that any of them is commanded: The Text alſo whereby ye would approve his ſo ſaying, doth not yet ſpeak quod pronunciabo juſtitiam meam Sacerdoti, but Domino: The other of James ſeemeth better to make for extream Unction, than for Confeſſion; for when was ever the uſe, that Folk comming only to Confeſſion, were wont to be anointed with Oil, therefore this makes nothing to your Argument. As touching Origen in Pſal. 37. he ſaith not quod obligamur dicere Sacerdoti, but ſi confiteantur; and ſeemeth rather to perſwade Men that they ſhould not parvi pendere Confeſſionem, (as all good Folk would) than that they were obliged to confeſs them to a Prieſt. Though Cyprian de Lapſis, doth praiſe them which do confeſs their Faults to Prieſts, yet doth he confeſs that we be not bound to do ſo; for he ſaith in the higheſt of his praiſe theſe Words, How much be they then higher in Faith, and better in Fear of God, which though they be not bound by any Deed of Sacrifice, or Book, yet be they content ſorrowfully to confeſs to the Prieſt Sins! He knowledgeth no bond in us by neither fact of Sacrifice or Libel, why alledg you (tho he praiſe Auricular Confeſſion) that we ſhould be bound by God and Law thereto? This is no proof thereof, neither by Reaſon nor by Scripture, nor any good Authority. And whereas he ſaith further, Confiteantur ſinguli, quæſo vos fratres, delictum ſuum; this doth not argue a Precept: nor yet the ſaying of Eſay, cap. 43. ſecundum Septuaginta; nor Solomon in the Proverbs 10. for theſe ſpeak rather of knowledging our Offence to God in our Heart, than of Auricular Confeſſion; after David the Prophet's ſaying and teaching, when he ſaid, Tibi ſoli peccavi, that was not to a Prieſt. By the Text alſo which you alledg, beginning, circa perſonas vero Miniſtrorum, &c. you do openly confeſs that the Church hath not accepted Auricular Confeſſion to be by God's Commandment; or elſe by your ſaying and Allegation, they have long erred: for you confeſs that the Church hath divers times changed, both to whom Confeſſion ſhould be made, and times when; and that alſo they have changed divers Ways for divers Regions; if it were by God's Commandment they might not do thus: Wherefore, my Lord, ſince I hear no other Allegations, I pray you blame not me tho I be not of your Opinion; and of the both, I think that I have more cauſe to think you obſtinate, than you me, ſeeing your Authors and Allegations make ſo little to your purpoſe. And thus far you well.

THE PREFACE.

THE favourable reception which the former Part of this Work had, together with the new Materials that were ſent me from Noble and Worthy Hands, have encouraged me to proſecute it, and to carry down the Hiſtory of the Reformation of this Church till it was brought to a compleat ſettlement in the beginning of Queen Elizabeths Reign, which I now offer to the World.

The great zeal of this Age for what was done in that, about Religion, has made the Hiſtory of it to be received and read with more than ordinary attention and care: and many have expreſſed their ſatisfaction in what was formerly publiſhed, by contributing ſeveral Papers of great conſequence to what remained: and ſince I found no part of the firſt Volume was more univerſally acceptable, than that wherein I was only a Tranſcriber, I mean the Collection of Records and Authentick Papers, which I had ſet down in confirmation of the more remarkable and doubtful parts of the Hiſtory; I continue the ſame method now. I ſhall repeat nothing here that was in my former Preface: But refer the Reader to ſuch things as concern this Hiſtory in general, and my encouragement in the undertaking and proſecution of it, to what is there premiſed to the whole Work: and therefore I ſhall now enlarge on ſuch things as do more particularly relate to this Volume.

The Papers that were conveyed to me from ſeveral Hands are referred to, as the occaſion to mention them occurs in the Hiſtory, with ſuch acknowledgments as I thought beſt became this way of writing, though far ſhort of the merits of thoſe who furniſhed me with them. But the Store-houſe from whence I drew the greateſt part both of the Hiſtory and Collection, is the often-celebrated Cotton Library, out of which, by the noble favour of its truly learned Owner, Sir John Cotton, I gathered all that was neceſſary for compoſing this Part, together with ſome few things which had eſcaped me in my former Search, and belong to the Firſt Part: and thoſe I have mixed in the Collection added to this Volume upon ſuch occaſions as I thought moſt pertinent. But among all the Remains of the laſt Age, that are with great induſtry and order laid up in that Treaſury, none pleaſed me better, nor were of more uſe to me, than the Journal of King Edwards Reign, written all with his own Hand: with ſome other Papers of his, which I have put by themſelves in the beginning of the Collection: Of theſe I ſhall ſay nothing here, having given a full account of them in the Hiſtory of his Reign, to which I refer the Reader. I find moſt of our Writers have taken Parcels out of them, and Sir John Heyward has tranſcribed from them the greateſt part of his Book; therefore I thought this a thing of ſuch conſequence, that upon good advice I have publiſhed them all faithfully copied from the Originals.

But as others aſſiſted me towards the perfecting this Part, ſo that learned Divine, and moſt exact Enquirer into Hiſtorical Learning, Mr. Fulman, Rector of Hamton-Meyſey in Gloceſter-ſhire, did moſt ſignally oblige me, by a Collection of ſome miſtakes I had made in the former Work. He had for many years applied his thoughts with a very ſearching care to the ſame Subject, and ſo was able to judge more critically of it, than other Readers. Some of thoſe had eſcaped me, others had not come within my view, in ſome particulars my Vouchers were not good, and in others I had miſtaken my Authors. Theſe I publiſh at the end of this Volume, being neither aſhamed to confeſs my faults, nor unwilling to acknowledge from what Hand I received better information. My deſign in writing is to diſcover Truth, and to deliver it down impartially to the next Age; ſo I ſhould think it both a mean and criminal piece of vanity to ſuppreſs this diſcovery of my Errors. And though the number and conſequence of them had been greater than it is, I ſhould rather have ſubmitted to a much ſeverer Penance, than have left the World in the miſtakes, I had led them into: yet I was not a little pleaſed to find that they were neither many, nor of importance to the main Parts of the Hiſtory: and were chiefly about Dates or ſmall variations in the order of Time. I hope this Part has fewer faults ſince that worthy Perſon did purſue his former kindneſs ſo far, as to review it before-hand: and with great judgment to correct ſuch errors as he found in it: Thoſe I had formerly fallen into, made me more careful in examining even the ſmalleſt matters. Yet if after all my care, and the kind Cenſures of thoſe who have reviſed this Work, there is any thing left that may require a further Retractation, I ſhall not decline to make it ſo ſoon as I ſee there is need of it, being, I hope, raiſed above the poor vanity of ſeeking my own reputation, by ſacrificing Truth to it.

Thoſe to whoſe cenſure I ſubmitted this whole Hiſtory in both its Parts, where chiefly three great Divines, whoſe Lives are ſuch Examples, their Sermons ſuch Inſtructions, their Writings ſuch unanſwerable Vindications of our Church, and their whole deportment ſo ſutable to their profeſſion, that as I reckon my being admitted into ſome meaſure of frendſhip with them, among the chief Bleſſings of my Life, ſo I know nothing can more effectually recommend this Work than to ſay that it paſſed with their hearty approbation, after they had examined it with that care, which their great zeal for the Cauſe concerned in it, and their goodneſs to the Author, and freedom with him obliged them to uſe. They are ſo well known, that without naming them, thoſe of this Age will eaſily gueſs who they are; and they will be ſo well known to Poſterity, by their excellent Writings, that the naming them is ſo high an advantage to my Book, that I much doubt whether it is decent for me to do it. One of them, Dr. Lloyd, is now, while I am writing, by His Majeſties favour, promoted to the Biſhoprick of St. Aſaph: a Dignity to which how deſervedly ſoever his great Learning, Piety, and Merit, has advanced him, yet I particularly know how far he was from any aſpirings to it. It was he I deſcribed in my former Preface, that engaged me firſt to this deſign, and for that reaſon he has been more than ordinary careful to examine it, with that exactneſs that is peculiar to him. The other two are the Reverend, Learned, and Judicious Deans, of Canterbury and St. Pauls, Dr. Tillotſon, and Dr. Stillingfleet, too well known to receive any addition from the Characters I can give of them.

Others gave me Supplies of another ſort, to enable me to go through with an undertaking that put me to no ſmall expence. I am not aſhamed to acknowledge, that the ſtraitneſs of my condition, made this uneaſie to me, being deſtitute of all publick proviſion: but I ſhould be much aſhamed of my ingratitude, if I did not celebrate their bounty who have taken ſuch care of me, as not to leave this addition of charge, on one who lives not without difficulties. I muſt again repeat my Thanks, for the generous kindneſs, protection, and liberal Supplies of Sir Harbotle Grimſtone, Maſter of the Rolls, this being the ſixth year of my ſubſiſtance under him, to whom I muſt ever acknowledge that I am more beholding than to all Men living. The noble Mr. Boyle, as he employs both his Time and Wealth, for the good of Mankind, (for which he conſiders himſelf as chiefly born, and which he has promoted not only in his own excellent Writings, that have made him ſo famous over all the World, but in many other deſigns that have been chiefly carried on at his coſt,) ſo hath he renewed his kindneſs to me in largeſſes ſutable to ſo great a Mind. Others were alſo pleaſed to joyn their help. The Right Honourable the Lord Finch, now Lord High Chancellor of England, whoſe great Parts, and greater Vertues, are ſo conſpicuous, that it were a high Preſumption in me to ſay any thing in his commendation, being in nothing more eminent than in his zeal for, and care of this Church, thought it might be of ſome importance to have its Hiſtory well digeſted, and therefore as he bore a large ſhare of my expence, ſo he took it more particularly under his care, and under all the Burdens of that high Employment which he now bears, yet found time for reading it in Manuſcript, of which he muſt have robbed himſelf, ſince he never denies it to thoſe who have a Right to it on any publick account; and hath added ſuch Remarks and Corrections as are no ſmall part of any finiſhing it may be judged to have. The Lord Ruſſel, the Inheritor of that Zeal for true Religion, and the other Vertues that have from the firſt beginnings of the Reformation, in a continued Entail, adorned that Noble Family of Bedford, beyond moſt others of the Kingdom, did eſpouſe the Intereſts of the Proteſtant Religion in this particular, as he has done on all other more publick occaſions; and by a moſt liberal Supply encouraged me to proſecute this Undertaking. That Worthy Counſellor, whoſe celebrated Integrity and clear Judgment have raiſed him ſo high in his Profeſſion, Anthony Keck Eſquire, did alſo concur in eaſing me of the charge that Searching, Copying, and gathering Materials put me to: And having received as much from theſe my Noble Benefactors, as did enable me to carry on my Deſign, I did excuſe my ſelf at other Perſons Hands, who very generouſly offered to ſupply me in the expence which this Work brought with it. That was done in a moſt extraordinary manner, by the Right Honourable the Earl of Halifax, whom, if I reckon among the greateſt Perſons this Age has produced, I am ſure all that know him will allow, that I ſpeak modeſtly of him: He indeed offered me the yearly continuance of a Bounty, that would not only have defrayed all this expence, but have been an entire and honourable ſubſiſtance to me; and though my neceſſities were not ſo preſſing as to perſwade me to accept it, yet ſo unuſual a generoſity neroſity doth certainly merit the higheſt acknowledg ments I can make for it.

But I now turn to that which ought to be the chief Subject of this Preface to remove the prejudices, by which weak and unwary Perſons have been prepoſſeſſed in their Judgments concerning the Reformation, during that Period of it that falls within this Volume. I know the Duty of an Hiſtorian leads him to write as one that is of neither Party, and I have endeavoured to follow it as carefully as I could, neither concealiug the faults of the one Party, nor denying the juſt Praiſes that were due to any of the other ſide, and have delivered things as I found them, making them neither better nor worſe than indeed they were: But now that I am not yet entred into that Province, and am here writing my own Thoughts, and not relating the Actions of other Men, I hope it will be judged no indecent thing to clear the Readers mind of thoſe Impreſſions, which may either have already biaſſed him too much, or may upon a ſlight Reading of what follows, ariſe in his thoughts: unleſs he were prepared and armed with ſome neceſſary Reflections, which every one that may poſſibly read this Hiſtory, has not had the leiſure, or other opportunities, to make to ſuch a degree as were needful.

It is certainly an unjuſt way of proceeding, in any that is to be a Judge, to let himſelf be ſecretly poſſeſſed with ſuch Impreſſions of Perſons and Things, as may biaſs his thoughts: for where the Scales are not well adjuſted, the Weight cannot be truly reckoned. So that it is an indirect Method to load Mens Minds with Prejudices, and not to let them in to the trial of Truth, till their Inclinations are firſt ſwayed ſuch a way. I deny not but in matters of Religion moſt commonly Men receive ſuch Notions, before they can well examine them, as do much determine them in the Enquiries they make afterwards, when their underſtandings grow up to a fuller ripeneſs: but thoſe Pre-occupations, if rightly infuſed, are rather ſuch as give them general Notions of what is good and honeſt in the abſtracted Idea's, than concerning matters of Fact: for every wiſe and pious Man muſt avoid all ſuch Methods of Inſtruction, as are founded on Falſhood and Craft: and he that will breed a Man to love Truth, muſt form in him ſuch a liking of it, that he may clearly ſee he would bribe him into no Opinion or Party by falſe or indirect Arts: But ſince Men are generally ſo apt to let ſome eaſie Notions enter into their Minds, which will pre-engage their Affections, and for moſt part thoſe who ſet themſelves to gain Proſelites, do begin with ſuch Arts, it will not be amiſs to give the Reader ſuch an account of theſe, as may prepare him againſt them, that ſo he may with a clearer mind conſider what is now to be delivered to him, concerning the Reformation of Religion among us.

I ſhall begin with that which is moſt commonly urged; that the whole Church being one Body, the Changes that were made in Religion, did break that Unity, and diſſolve the Bond by which the Catholick Church is to be knit together, and that therefore the firſt Reformers began, and we ſtill continue a Schiſme in the Church.

In anſwer to this, it is to be conſidered that the Biſhops and Paſtors of the Church are obliged to inſtruct their People in the true Faith of Chriſt, according to the Scriptures: The nature of their Function, being a Sacred Truſt, binds them to this; they were alſo at their Conſecration engaged to it, by a formal Sponſion, according to the Queſtions and Anſwers that are in the

the Roman Pontifical to this day. Paſtors owe it as a Debt to their People to teach them according to the Scriptures: They owe a Charity to their Brethren, and are to live with them in the terms of Brotherly Love, and Friendly Correſpondence; but if that cannot be had on eaſier terms, than the concealing neceſſary Truths, and the delivering groſs errors to thoſe committed to their charge, it is certain that they ought not to purchaſe it at ſo dear a rate. When the Paſtors of this Church ſaw it over-run with errors and corruptions, they were obliged by the duty they owed to God and to their People, to diſcover them; and to undeceive their miſled Flocks. It is of great importance to maintain Peace and Unity, but if a Party in the Church does ſet up ſome Doctrines and Practiſes, that do much endanger the Salvation of Souls, and makes advantages by theſe, ſo that there is no hope left to gain them by rational and ſofter Methods, than as St. Peter was to be withſtood to his Face, in a leſſer matter, much more are thoſe, who pretend no higher than to be his Succeſſors, to be withſtood, when the things are of great moment and conſequence. When Hereſies ſprung up in the Primitive Church, we find the neighbouring Biſhops condemned them without ſtaying for the concurrence of other Churches; as in the Caſe of Samoſatenus, Arius, and Pelagius: and even when the greateſt part of the Church was become Semi-Arian, and many great Councils, chiefly that at Ariminum, conſiſting of above 800 Biſhops, as ſome ſay, had through ignorance and fear complied, the Orthodox Biſhops did not forbear to inſtruct thoſe committed to their care according to the true Faith. A general concurrence is a thing much to be laboured for; but when it cannot be had, every Biſhop muſt then do his duty ſo as to be anſwerable to the chief Biſhop of Souls.

So that inſtead of being led away by ſo ſlight a prejudice, we muſt turn our Enquiries to this, Whether there were really ſuch abuſes in the Church, as did require a Reformation? and whether there was any reaſon to hope for a more general concurrence in it? In the following Hiſtory the Reader will ſee what corruptions were found to be both in the Doctrine and Worſhip of this Church: from whence he may infer what need there was of Reformation. And it is very plain, that they had no reaſon to expect the concurrence of other Churches; for the Council of Trent had already made a great progreſs, and it was very viſible, that as the Court of Rome governed all things there, ſo they were reſolved to admit of no effectual Reformation, of any conſiderable matters; but to eſtabliſh by a more formal deciſion, thoſe errors and abuſes that had given ſo much ſcandal to the Chriſtian World for ſo many Ages.

This being the true ſtate of the Caſe, it is certain, that if there were really great corruptions, either in Belief or Manners in this Church, then the Biſhops were bound to reform them: ſince the backwardneſs of others in their duty, could no excuſe them from doing theirs, when they were clearly convinced of it. So that the Reader is to ſhake off this prejudice, and only to examine whether there was really ſuch need of a Reformation? ſince if that be true, it is certain the Biſhops of this, as well as of other Churches, were bound to ſet about it; and the faultineſs of ſome could be no excuſe to the reſt.

The ſecond Prejudice is, That the Reformation was begun and carried on, not by the major part of the Biſhops and Clergy; but by a few ſelected Biſhops and Divines, who being ſupported by the Name of the Kings Authority, did frame things as they pleaſed; and by their Intereſt at Court got them to be Enacted in Parliament: and after they had removed ſuch Biſhops as oppoſed them, then they procured the Convocation to conſent to what was done: So that upon the matter, the Reformation was the Work of Cranmer, with a few more of his Party, and not of this Church, which never agreed wholly to it, till the Biſhops were ſo modelled as to be compliant to the deſigns of the Court. In ſhort, the reſolution of this, is to be taken from a common Caſe; when the major part of a Church is according to the Conſcience of the Supream Civil Magiſtrate in an Error, and the leſſer part is in the right. The Caſe is not hard, if well underſtood: for in the whole Scripture there is no promiſe made to the major part of the Paſtors of the Church; and there being no Divine Promiſe made about it, it is certain that the Nature of Man is ſuch, that Truth ſeparated from Intereſt hath few Votaries: but when it is oppoſite to it, it muſt have a very ſmall Party. So that moſt of thoſe things which needed Reformation, being ſuch as added much to the Wealth and Power of the Clergy, it had been a wonder indeed, if the greater part had not oppoſed it. In that Caſe, as the ſmaller part were not to depart from their Sentiments, becauſe oppoſed in them by a more numerous Party that was too deeply concerned in the matter: ſo it was both natural for them, and very reaſonable, to take Sanctuary in the Authority and Protection of the Prince and the Law. That Princes have an Authority in things Sacred, was ſo univerſally agreed to in King Henry's Reign, and was made out upon ſuch clear Evidence of Reaſon and Precedents, both in the Jewiſh State, and in the Roman Empire, when it turned Chriſtian, that this ground was already gained. It is the firſt Law in Juſtinians Code, made by Theodoſius when he came to the Empire, That all ſhould every where, under ſevere pains, follow that Faith which was received by Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, and Peter of Alexandria. And why might not the King and Laws of England give the like Authority to the Arch-biſhops of Canterbury and York.

When the Empire, and eſpecially the Eaſtern part of it, had been, during the Reign of Conſtantius, and Valens ſucceeding him after a ſhort Interval, ſo overſpread with Arianiſme, it is ſcarce to be imagined how it could have been reformed in any other manner: for they durſt not at firſt truſt it to the diſcretion of a Synod; and yet the Queſtion then on foot was not ſo link'd with Intereſt, being a Speculative Point of Divinity, as thoſe about which the Conteſt were in the beginnings of the Reformation.

It is not to be imagined how any Changes in Religion can be made by Soveraign Princes, unleſs an Authority be lodged with them of giving the Sanction of a Law, to the ſounder, though the leſſer part of a Church: for as Princes and Law-givers are not tied to an implicite obedience to Clergymen, but are left to the freedom of their own diſcerning, ſo they muſt have a Power to chooſe what ſide to be of where things are much enquired into. The Juriſdiction of Synods or Councils, is founded either on the Rules of Expediency and Brotherly Correſpondence, or on the force of Civil Laws: for when the Chriſtian Belief had not the ſupport of Law, every Biſhop taught his own Flock the beſt he could, and gave his Neighbours ſuch an account of his Faith, at, or ſoon after his Conſecration, as ſatisfied them, and ſo maintained the Unity of the Church. The formality of Synods grew up in the Church, from the diviſion of the Roman Empire, and the Dignity of the ſeveral Cities; which is a thing ſo well known, and ſo plainly acknowledged by the Writers of all ſides, that it were a needleſs impoſing on the Readers patience, to ſpend time to prove it. Such as would underſtand it more perfectly, will find it in De Marca the late Arch-biſhop of Paris's Books de Concordia Imperii & Sacerdotii, and in Blondells Works, De la Primaute de l'Egliſe. None can imagine there is a Divine Authority in that which ſprang from ſuch a beginning. The major part of Synods cannot be ſuppoſed to be in matters of Faith, ſo aſſiſted from Heaven, that the leſſer part muſt neceſſarily acquieſce in their Decrees, or that the Civil Powers muſt always meaſure their Laws by their Votes: eſpecially where Intereſt does viſibly turn the Scales. And this may ſatisfie any reaſonable Man as to this prejudice; that if Arch-biſhop Cranmer and Holgate, the two Primates and Metropolitans of this Church, were in the right, in the things that they procured to be reformed, though the greater part of the Biſhops being biaſſed by baſe ends, and generally both ſuperſtitious and little converſant in the true Theological Learning, did oppoſe them, and they were thereby forced to order matters ſo, that at firſt they were prepared by ſome ſelected Biſhops and Divines, and afterwards Enacted by King and Parliament, this is no juſt exception to what was ſo managed. And ſuch a Reformation can no more be blaſted by being called a Parliament-Religion, than the Reformations made by the Kings of Iſrael without or againſt the Majority of the Prieſts, could be blemiſh'd by being call'd the Kings Religion.

A third Prejudice is, that the Perſons who governed the Affairs at Court, were weak or ill Men: that the King being under Age, things were carried by thoſe who had him in their Power. And for the two great Miniſters of that Reign, or rather the Adminiſtrators of it, the Dukes of Somerſet and Northumberland, as their violent and untimely deaths, may ſeem to be effects of the indignation of Heaven, for what they did; ſo they were both eminently faulty in their Adminiſtration, and are ſuppoſed to have ſought too much their own ends. This ſeems to caſt a blemiſh on their Actions, and to give ſome reaſon to ſuſpect the things were not good which had ſuch Inſtruments to advance them.

But this Prejudice, compounded of many Particulars, when taken to pieces, will appear of no force to blaſt the credit of what they did. By our Law, the King never dies, and is never young nor old, ſo that the Authority of the King is the ſame, whether adminiſtred by himſelf or by his Governours, when he is under Age: nor are we to judge of Men by the events that befall them. Theſe are the deepeſt Secrets of Divine Providence, into which it is impoſſible for Men of limited underſtandings to penetrate: and if we make Judgments of Perſons and Things by accidents, we ſhall very often moſt certainly conclude falſely. Soloman made the Obſervation, which the Series of Humane Affairs ever ſince hath fully juſtified, That there are juſt men to whom it happens according to the Work of the Wicked; and Wicked Men to whom it happens according to the Work of the Righteous: and the enquiring into theſe ſeemingly unequal ſteps of Gods Governing the World, is a Vanity. As for the Duke of Northumberland, the Reformation is not at all concerned in him, for if we believe what he ſaid, when there was the leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect him, on the Scaffold, he was all the while a Papiſt in his Heart. And ſo no wonder if ſuch a Man, ſtriking in for his own ambitious ends, with that which was popular, even againſt the perſwaſions of his Conſcience, did very ill things. The Duke of Somerſet was indeed more ſincere, and though he was not without his faults, (which we may ſafely acknowledge, ſince the Man of Infallibility is not pretended to be without ſin) yet theſe were not ſuch heinous tranſgreſſions, but rather ſuch as humane infirmity expoſes moſt Men to, when they are raiſed to an high condition. He was too vain, too much addicted to his own Notions, and being a Man of no extraordinary Parts, he was too much at the diſpoſal of thoſe, who by flatteries and ſubmiſſions inſinuated themſelves into him; and he made too great haſte to raiſe a vaſt Eſtate to be altogether innocent: but I never find him charged with any perſonal diſorders, nor was he ever guilty of falſhood, of perverting Juſtice, of Cruelty, or of Oppreſſion. He was ſo much againſt the laſt of theſe, that he loſt the affections of the Nobility for being ſo careful of the Commons, and covering them from the oppreſſion of their Landlords. The Buſineſs of his Brother, though it has a very ill appearance, and is made to look worſe by the lame account our Books give of it, ſeems to have been forced on him: for the Admiral was a Man of moſt incurable ambition, and ſo inclined to raiſe diſturbance, that after ſo many relapſes and ſuch frequent Reconcilions, he ſtill breaking out into new diſorders, it became almoſt neceſſary to put him out of a capacity of doing more miſchief. But if we compare the Duke of Somerſet with the great Miniſters even in the beſt Courts; we ſhall find him better than moſt of them: and if ſome few have carried their Proſperity better, many more even of thoſe who are otherwiſe recorded for extraordinary Perſons, have been guilty of far greater faults. He who is but a little acquainted with Hiſtory, or with the Courts of Princes, muſt needs know ſo much of this Argument, that he will eaſily cure himſelf of any ill effects which this Prejudice may have on him.

A fourth Prejudice is raiſed from the great Invaſions which were then made upon the Church-Lands, and things dedicated to Pious Uſes; which is a thing hated by Men of all Religions, and branded with the odious Names of Sacriledge, and robbing of God; ſo that the Spoils of Religious Houſes and Churches, ſeem to have been the ſecret Motives that at firſt drew in, and ſtill engage ſo many to the Reformation. This has more weight in it than the former, and therefore deſerves to be more fully conſidered.

The Light of Nature teaches, that thoſe who are dedicated to the Service of God and for inſtructing the People, ought to be ſo well provided for, that they may be delivered from the diſtractions of Secular Cares, and ſecured from the contempt which follows Poverty; and be furniſhed with ſuch means as may both enable them to know that well wherein they are to inſtruct others, and to gain ſuch an Intereſt in the affections of thoſe among whom they labour, as modeſt Hoſpitality and liberal Almſ-giving may procure. In this all Nations and Religions have ſo generally agreed, that it may be well called a Law of Nations, if not of Nature. Had Church-men been contented with this meaſure, it is very probable things had never run to the other Extream ſo much as they have done. But as the Pope got to himſelf a great Principality, ſo the reſt of his Clergy deſigned to imitate him in that, as much as was poſſible: they ſpared no pains, nor thought they any Methods too bad, that could ſet forward theſe Projects. The belief of Purgatory, and the redeeming of Souls out of it by Maſſes, with many other publick Cheats impoſed on the World, had brought the Wealth of this and other Nations into their Hands. Upon the diſcovery of this impoſture, it was but a reaſonable and juſt proceeding of the Government to re-aſſume thoſe Lands, and diſpoſe otherwiſe of them, which had been for moſt part fraudulently drawn from the former Ages: for indeed the best part of the Soil of England, being in such ill Hands, it was the Interest of the whole Kingdom to have it put to better uses. So that the Abbies being generally raised and endowed by the efficacy of those false Opinions, which were infused into the People, I can see no just exception against the Dissolution of them, with the Chantries, and other Foundations of like Superstition; and the fault was not in taking them away, but in not applying a greater part of them to uses truly Religious.

But most of these Monasteries had been enriched by that, which was indeed the Spoil of the Church: for in many Places the Tithes which belonged to the Secular Clergy were taken from them, and by the Authority of Papal Bulls were given to the Monasteries. This was the Original of the greatest mischief that came on this Church at the Reformation: The Abbots having possessed themselves of the Tithes, and having left to those who served the Cure either some small Donative or Stipend, and at best the small Tithes or Vicarage, those who purchased the Abbey-Lands from the Crown in the former Reign, had them with no other charge reserved for the Incumbents, but that small Pittance that the Abbots had formerly given them: and this is now a much less allowance, than the Curates had in the times of Popery: for though they have now the same Right by their Incumbency that they then had, yet in the time of Superstition, the Fees of Obits, Exequies, Soul-Masses, and such other Perquisites did furnish them so plentifully, that considering their obligation to remain unmarried, they lived well, though their certain maintenance was but small: but these things falling off by the Reformation, which likewise leaves the Clergy at liberty in the matter of Marriage, this has occasioned much ignorance and scandal among the Clergy. I shall not enter into the debate about the Divine Right of Tithes, this I am sure of, a decent maintenance of the Clergy is of natural Right, and that it is not better looked to, is a publick reproach to the whole Nation; when in all other Religions and Nations, those who serve at the Altar live by it. The ancient Allowances for the Curates in Market Towns being generally so small, because the Number and Wealth of the People made the Perquisites so considerable, has made those Places to be too often but ill supplied: and what way this makes for the seducers of all hands, when the Minister is of so mean a condition, and hath so incompetent a Maintenance that he can scarce secure himself from extream want, and great contempt, I leave it to every Man to judge.

This is as high a contempt of Religion and the Gospel as any can be, and is one of those things for which this Nation has much to answer to God; that now in one hundred and twenty years time, so little has been done by publick Authority for the redress of such a crying oppression. Some private Persons have done great things this way, but the publick has yet done nothing suitable to the occasion: Though their Neighbour Nation of Scotland, has set them a very good Example, where, by the great zeal and care of King James, and the late blessed King, Acts and Orders of Parliament have been made, for examining the whole state of the Clergy, and for supplying all poor Livings so plentifully, that in Glebe and Tithes all Benefices are now raised, to at least fifty Pounds Sterling yearly. What greater scorn can be put upon Religion, than to provide so scantly for those that are trusted with the care of Souls, that some hundreds of Parishes in England pay not Ten Pounds a year to their Pastors, and perhaps some thousands not

Fifty? This is to be numbred among those crying sins that are bringing down vengeance on us, since by this many Souls are left to perish, because it is not possible to provide them with able and faithful Shepherds. I shall not examine all the particular Reasons that have obstructed the redress of this mischief, but those concerned in it may soon find some of them out in themselves. And here I acknowledge a great and just prejudice lies against our Reformation, which no man can fully answer. But how faulty soever we may be in this Particular, they of the Church of Rome have little reason to object it to us, since the first and true occasion of it was of their own doing. Our fault is, that at the dissolution of the Monasteries, restitution was not made to the Parish Priests of what the Popes had sacrilegiously taken from them. And now that we are upon the utter extirpation of Popery, let us not retain this Relique of it. And I pray God to inspire and direct His Majesty and His two Houses of Parliament effectually to remove this just, and, for ought I know, only great scandal of our English Reformation.

A fifth Prejudice, which seems to give ill impressions of our Reformation, is, that the Clergy have now no interest in the Consciences of the People, nor any inspection into their manners; but they are without yoke or restraint. All the Ancient Canons for the publick Penance of scandalous offenders are laid aside, and our Clergy are so little admitted to know or direct the Lives and Manners of their Flocks, that many will scarce bear a reproof patiently from them: Our Ecclesiastical Courts are not in the Hands of the Bishops and their Clergy, but put over to the Civilians, where too often Fees are more strictly look'd after, than the correction of Manners. I hope there is not cause for so great a Cry, but so it is, these Courts are much complained of; and publick vice and scandal is but little enquired after, or punished: Excommunication is become a kind of Secular Sentence, and is hardly now considered as a Spiritual Censure, being judged and given out by Lay-men, and often upon Grounds, which, to speak moderately, do not merit so severe and dreadful a Sentence. There are besides this a great many other Abuses, brought in in the worst Times, and now purged out of some of the Churches of the Roman Communion, which yet continue, and are too much in use among us, such as Pluralities, Non-residencies, and other things of that nature: so that it may be said, that some of the manifest corruptions of Popery, where they are recommended by the advantages that accompany them, are not yet throughly purged out, notwithstanding all the noise we have made about Reformation in matters much more disputable, and of far less consequence.

This whole Objection, when all acknowledged, as the greatest part of it cannot be denied, amounts indeed to this, that our Reformation is not yet arrived at that full perfection, that is to be desired. The want of publick Penance, and Penitentiary Canons, is indeed a very great defect: our Church does not deny it, but acknowledges it in the Preface to the Office of Commination. It was one of the greatest Glories of the Primitive Church, that they were so governed, that none of their number could sin openly without publick Censure, and a long separation from the Holy Communion; which they judged was defiled by a promiscuous admitting of all Persons to it. Had they consulted the Arts of Policy, they would not have held in Converts by so strict a way of proceeding, lest their discontent might have driven them away; at a time when to be a Christian was attended with so many discouragements, that it might seem dangerous by so severe a Discipline, pline, to frighten the World out of their Communion. But the Paſtors of that time, reſolved to follow the Rules delivered them by the Apoſtles, and truſted God with the ſucceſs, which anſwered and exceeded all their expectations: for nothing convinced the World more of the truth of that Religion, than to ſee thoſe truſted with the care of Souls, watch ſo effectually over their Manners, that for ſome ſins, which in theſe looſe Ages in which we live, paſs but for common effects of humane frailty, Men were made to abſtain from the Communion for many years, and did cheerfully ſubmit to ſuch Rules as might be truly medicinal for curing thoſe Diſeaſes in their Minds.

But alas! the Church-men of the latter Ages being once veſted with this Authority, to which the World ſubmitted, as long as it ſaw the good effects of it, did ſoon learn to abuſe it; and to bring the People to a blind ſubjection to them. It was one of the chief Arts by which the Papacy ſwelled to its height: for Confeſſors inſtead of bringing their Penitents to open Penance, ſet up other things in the room of it; pretending they could commute it, and in the Name of God accept of one thing for another: and they accepted of a Penitents going, either to the Holy War, or which was more Holy of the two, to one of the Popes Wars againſt Hereticks, or depoſed Princes; and gave full Pardons to thoſe who thus engaged in their deſigns. Afterwards (when the Pope had no great occaſion to kill Men, or the People no great mind to be killed in his Service) they accepted of Money, as an Alms to God: and ſo all publick Penance was laid down, and Murder or Merchandiſe was ſet up in its room. This being the ſtate of things at the Reformation, it is no wonder if the People could not be eaſily brought to ſubmit to publick Penance; which had been for ſome Ages entirely laid aſide: and there was reaſon why they ſhould not be forward to come under the Yoke of their Prieſts, leſt they ſhould have raiſed upon that Foundation, ſuch a Tyrannical Dominion over them, as others had formerly exerciſed. This made ſome Reformed Churches beyond Sea bring in the Laity with them, into their Courts, which if they had done meerly as a good Expedient, for removing the jealouſie which the World then had of Eccleſiaſtical Tyranny, there was no great Objection to have been made to it; but they made the thing liable to very great exception, when they pretended a Divine Inſtitution for thoſe Lay-Elders. Here in England, it is plain the Nation would not bear ſuch Authority to be lodged with the Clergy at firſt; but it will appear in the following Work, that a Platform was made of an Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, though the Biſhops had no hopes of reducing it into practice, till the King ſhould come to be of Age, and paſs a Law for the authoriſing of it: but he dying before this was effected, it was not proſecuted with that zeal that the thing required in Queen Elizabeths time: and then thoſe who in their Exile were taken with the Models beyond Seas, contending more to get it put in the method of other Churches, than to have it ſet up in any other Form, that contention begat ſuch heat, that it took Men off from this and many other excellent deſigns: and whereas the Preſbyters were found to have had anciently a ſhare in the Government of the Churches, as the Biſhops Council and Aſſiſtants, ſome of them that were of hot tempers demanding more than their ſhare, they were by the immoderate uſe of the Counterpoiſe kept out of any part of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline; and all went into thoſe Courts commonly called the Spiritual Courts; without making diſtinction between thoſe Cauſes of Teſtaments, Marriages, and such other ſuits, that require ſome learning in the Civil and Canon Law, and the other Cauſes of the Cenſures of the Clergy and Laity, which are of a more Spiritual Nature, and ought indeed to be tried only by the Biſhops and Clergy; for they are no ſmall part of the Care of Souls, which is incumbent on them: and by them only Excommunications ought to be made, as being a Suſpenſion from the Sacred Rites of Chriſtians, of which none can be the competent Judges, but thoſe to whom the charge of Souls is committed. The worſt that can be ſaid of all theſe Abuſes, is, that they are Reliques of Popery, and we owe it to the unhappy Conteſts among our ſelves, that a due correction has not been yet given to them.

From hence one evil has followed, not inferior to theſe from whence it flows, that the Paſtoral Charge is now looked on by too many, rather as a device only for inſtructing People, to which they may ſubmit as much as they think fit, than as a care of Souls, as indeed it is: And it is not to be denied but the practice of not a few of us of the Clergy, has confirmed the People in this miſtake, who conſider our Function as a Method of living, by performing Divine Offices, and making Sermons, rather than as a watching over the Souls of the Flocks committed to us, viſiting the Sick, reproving ſcandalous Perſons, reconciling differences, and being ſtrict at leaſt in governing the Poor, whoſe neceſſities will oblige them to ſubmit to any good Rules, we ſhall ſet them for the better conduct of their Lives. In theſe things does the Paſtoral Care chiefly conſiſt, and not only in the bare performing of Offices, or pronouncing Sermons, which every one almoſt may learn to do after ſome tolerable faſhion. If Men had a juſt Notion of this Holy Function, and a right ſenſe of it before they were initiated into it, thoſe ſcandalous abuſes of Plurality of Benefices with Cure, (except where they are ſo poor and contiguous, that both can ſcarce maintain one Incumbent, and one Man can diſcharge the duty of both very well) Non-reſidencies, and the hiring out that Sacred Truſt to pitiful Mercenaries at the cheapeſt rates, would ſoon fall off. Theſe are things of ſo crying a nature, that no wonder if the wrath of God is ready to break out upon us. Theſe are abuſes that even the Church of Rome, after all her impudence, is aſhamed of, and are at this day generally diſcountenanced all France over. Queen Mary here in England in the time of Popery, ſet her ſelf effectually to root them out. And that they ſhould be ſtill found among Proteſtants, and in ſo Reformed a Church, is a ſcandal that may juſtly make us bluſh. All the honeſt Prelates at the Council of Trent endeavoured to get Reſidence declared to be of Divine Right, and ſo not to be diſpenſed with upon any conſideration whatſoever: and there is nothing more apparently contrary to the moſt common impreſſions, which all men have about matters of Religion, than that Benefices are given for the Office to which they are annexed: and if in matters of Mens Eſtates, or of their Health, it would be a thing of high ſcandal, for one to receive the Fees, and commit the Work to the care of ſome inferiour or raw Practitioner, how much worſe is it to turn over ſo important a concernment, as the care of Souls muſt be confeſſed to be, to mean hands? And to conclude, thoſe who are guilty of ſuch diſorders, have much to anſwer for, both to God, for the neglect of thoſe Souls for which they are to give an account, and to the World, for the reproach they have brought on this Church and on the Sacred Functions, by their ill practices; nor could the diviſions of this Age ever have riſen to ſuch a height, if the People had not been poſſeſſed with ill impreſſions of ſome of the Clergy, from thoſe inexcuſable faults, that are ſo conſpicuous in too many that are called Shepherds: Who Cloath themſelves with the Wool, but have not fed the Flock, that have not ſtrengthened the diſeaſed, nor healed the ſick, nor bound up that which was broken, nor brought again that which was driven away, nor ſought that which was loſt, but have ruled them with force and cruelty: And if we would look up to God who is viſibly angry with us, and has made us baſe and contemptible among the People, we ſhould find great reaſon to reflect on thoſe words of Jeremy. The Paſtors are become Brutiſh, and have not ſought the Lord, therefore they ſhall not proſper, and all their Flocks ſhall be ſcattered.

But I were very unjuſt if having ventured on ſo plain and neceſſary a reprehenſion; I ſhould not add, that God has not ſo left this Age and Church, but there is in it a great number in both the holy Functions, who are perhaps as Eminent in the exemplarineſs of their Lives, and as diligent in their Labours, as has been in any one Church in any Age ſince Miracles ceaſed. The humility and ſtrictneſs of Life in many of our Prelates and ſome that were highly Born, and yet have far out-gone ſome others from whom more might have been expected, raiſes them far above cenſure, though perhaps not above envy. And when ſuch think not the daily inſtructing their Neighbours a thing below them, but do it with as conſtant a care, as if they were to earn their Bread by it, when they are ſo affable to the meaneſt Clergy-men that come to them, when they are ſo nicely ſcrupulous about thoſe whom they admit into holy Orders, and ſo large in their Charities, that one would think they were furniſhed with ſome unſeen ways, theſe things muſt raiſe great eſteem for ſuch Biſhops, and ſeem to give ſome hopes of better times. Of all this I may be allowed to ſpeak the more freely, ſince I am led to it by none of thoſe Bribes, either of gratitude, or fear, or hope, which are wont to Corrupt men to ſay what they do not think: But I were much to blame, if in a Work that may perhaps Live ſome time in the World, I ſhould only find fault with what is amiſs, and not alſo acknowledge what is ſo very commendable and Praiſeworthy. And when I look into the Inferior Clergy, there are, chiefly about this great City of London, ſo many, ſo Eminent, both for the ſtrictneſs of their Lives, the conſtancy of their Labours, their Excellent and plain way of Preaching, (which is now perhaps brought to as great a Perfection, as ever was ſince men ſpoke as they received it immediately from the Holy Ghoſt) the great gentleneſs of their Deportment to ſuch as differ from them, their mutual Love and Charity, and in a Word for all the qualities that can adorn Miniſters or Chriſtians, that if ſuch a number of ſuch Men cannot prevail with this debauched Age, this one thing to me looks more diſmally than all the other affrighting Symptoms of our Condition; that God having ſent ſo many faithful Teachers, their Labours are ſtill ſo ineffectual.

I have now examined all the prejudices that either occur to my thoughts, or that I have not met with in Books or Diſcourſes, againſt our Reformation; and I hope upon a free enquiry into them, it will be found that ſome of them are of no force at all, and that the other, which are better Grounded, can amount to no more than this, that things were not managed with that care, or brought to that Perfection that were to be deſired: ſo that all the uſe we ought to make of theſe Objections, is to be directed by them to do those things which may compleat and adorn that Work, which was managed by Men subject to Infirmities, who neither could see every thing, nor were able to accomplish all that they had Projected, and saw fit to be done.

But from the matter of the following History, another Objection of another sort may arise, which though it has no relation to the Reformation, yet leaves no small Imputation on the Nation, as too apt to change, and be carried about with every Religion in Vogue, since in little more than 20 years time, there were four great changes made in Religion; and in all these the main Body of the Nation turned with the Stream: and it was but a small number that stood firm and suffered for their Consciences. But if the State of the Nation be well considered, there will be nothing in all this so strange as at first view it may perhaps appear: for in the times of Popery the People were kept in such profound ignorance, that they knowing nothing of Religion, beyond the outward Forms and Pageantry, and being highly dissatisfied with the ill Lives of the Clergy, and offended with their Cruelty against those that contradicted their Opinions, it is no wonder that they were inclined to hear Preachers of any sort, who laid out to them the reasons of the Doctrine they delivered, and did not impose it on them in gross, as the others had done. These Teachers being also Men of Innocent tempers, and good Lives, and being recommended to the Compassion of the Nation, by their sufferings, and to their esteem, by their zeal and readiness to run all hazards for their Consciences, had great advantages to gain on the Belief and affections of the People. And to speak freely, I make no doubt, but if the Reformation had been longer a hatching under the heat of Persecution, it had come forth perfecter than it was. This disposition of the People, and King Henry's Quarrelling with the Pope made the way easie for the first Change: But then the severities about the Supremacy on one hand, and the six Articles on the other, made People to stagger and reel between the two Religions. And all People being fond of new things, and the discoveries of the Impostures of the Priests and lewdness of the Monks, encreasing their dislike of them, it was no wonder the Reformation went on with so little Tumult and Precipitation till King Edward's time. But though there were then very Learned and Zealous Divines, who managed and carried on the changes that were made, yet still the greater part of the Clergy was very Ignorant, and very Corrupt; which was occasioned by the Pensions that were reserved out of the Rents of the suppressed Monasteries to the Monks during their Lives, or till they were provided with Livings. The Abbey-Lands that were sold with the Charge of these annexed to them, coming into the Hands of Persons who had no mind to have that Burden lie longer on them, they got these Monks provided with Benefices, that so they might be eased of that Charge. And for the other Abbies that still remained with the Crown, the same Course was taken: for the Monks were put into all the small Benefices that were in the Kings gift. So that the greatest part of the Clergy, were such as had been formerly Monks or Friers, very ignorant for most part, and generally addicted to their former Superstition, though otherwise Men, that would comply with any thing rather than forfeit their Livings. Under such Incumbents nothing but Ignorance and Unconcernedness in Religion could prevail. By this means it was that the greater part of the Nation was not well inſtructed, nor poſſeſſed with any warmth and ſincere Love to the Reformation, which made the following change under Queen Mary more eaſily effected. The Proceedings in King Edward's time were likewiſe ſo gentle and Moderate, flowing from the calm temper of Arch-Biſhop Cranmer, and the policy of others, who were willing to accept of any thing they could obtain, hoping that time would do the buſineſs, if the over-driving it did not precipitate the whole affair; that it was an eaſie thing for a Concealed Papiſt to weather the difficulties of that Reign. There were alſo great ſcandals given by the Indiſcretion of many of the New Preachers. The miſgovernment of Affairs under the Duke of Somerſet, with the reſtleſs Ambition of the Duke of Northumberland did alienate the Nation much from them; and a great averſion commonly begets an univerſal diſlike of every thing that is done by thoſe whom we hate.

Na-

All theſe things concurred to prepare the minds of the People to the change made by Queen Mary: but in her Reign Popery did more plainly diſcover it ſelf in the many repeated Burnings, and the other Cruelties then openly exerciſed. The Nation was alſo in ſuch danger of being brought under the uneaſie Yoak of Spaniſh Government, and they were many of them in fear of loſing their new-gotten Church Lands; theſe things, together with the loſs of Calais in the end of her Reign, which was univerſally much reſented as a laſting diſhonour to the Nation, raiſed in them a far greater averſion to her Government, and to every thing that had been done in it, than they had to the former. The Genius of the Engliſh leads them to hate Cruelty and Tyranny; and when they ſaw theſe were the neceſſary Concomitants of Popery, no wonder it was thrown out with ſo general an agreement, that there was ſcarce any conſiderable Oppoſition made to it, except by ſome few of their Clergy: who having changed ſo oft, were aſhamed of ſuch repeated recantations: and ſo reſolved at laſt to ſtand their ground; which was the more eaſie to reſolve on under ſo merciful a Prince, who puniſht them only by a Forfeiture of their Benefices; and that being done, took care of their Subſiſtence for the reſt of their Lives: Bonner himſelf not being excepted, though ſo deeply dyed in the Blood of ſo many Innocents.

All theſe things laid together, it will not ſeem ſtrange that ſuch great Alterations were ſo eaſily brought about in ſo ſhort a time. But from the days of Queen Elizabeth that the Old Monks were worn out, and New Men better Educated were placed in Churches, things did generally put on a new Viſage: and this Church has ſince that time continued to be the Sanctuary and ſhelter of all Forreigners, and the chief Object of the Envy and Hatred of the Popiſh Church, and the great Glory of the Reformation; and has wiſely avoided the ſplitting aſunder, on the high Points of the Divine Decrees, which have broken ſo many of then Reformed beyond Sea; but in theſe has left Divines to the freedom of their ſeveral Opinions: nor did ſhe run on that other Rock, of deſiring at firſt ſo peremptorily the manner of Chriſts Preſence in the Sacrament, which divided the Cerman and the Helvetian Churches, but in that did alſo leave a Latitude to Men of different perſwaſions. From this great temper it might have reaſonably been expected, that we ſhould have continued United at Home, and then for things Sacred, as well as Civil, we had been out of the Danger of what all our Forreign Enemies could have contrived or done againſt us.

But

But the Enemy, while the Watchmen ſlept, ſowed his Tares even in this Fruitful Field; of which it may be expected I ſhould give ſome Account here, and the rather becauſe I end this Work at the time when thoſe unhappy differences firſt aroſe; ſo that I give them no part in this Hiſtory: and yet I have in the ſearch I made, ſeen ſome things of great Importance, which are very little known, that give me a clearer light into the beginnings of theſe Differences than is commonly to be had; of which I ſhall diſcourſe ſo, as becomes one who has not blindly given himſelf up to any Party, and is not afraid to ſpeak the truth even in the moſt critical matters.

There were many learned and Pious divines in the beginning of Queen Elizabeths Reign, who being driven beyond Sea had obſerved the New Models ſet up in Geneva, and other places, for the Cenſuring of Scandalous Perſons, of mixed Judicatories of the Miniſters and Laity: and theſe reflecting on the great looſneſs of Life which had been univerſally Complained of in King Edward's time, thought ſuch a Platform might be an effectual way for keeping out a return of the like diſorders. There were alſo ſome few Rites reſerved in this Church, that had been either uſed in the Primitive Church, or though brought in of latter time, yet ſeemed of excellent uſe to beget Reverence in Holy Performances: which had alſo this to be ſaid for them, that the keeping theſe ſtill, was done in Imitation of what Chriſt and his Apoſtles did in Symbolizing with the Jewiſh Rites, to gain the Jews thereby as much as could be; ſo it was judged neceſſary to preſerve theſe, to let the World ſee that though Corruptions were thrown out, yet the Reformers did not love to change only for change ſake, when it was not otherwiſe needful: and this they hoped might draw in many, who otherwiſe would not ſo eaſily have forſaken the Roman Communion. Yet theſe Divines excepted to thoſe, as Compliances with Popery, and though they profeſſed no great diſlike to the Ceremonies themſelves, or doubt of their Lawfulneſs, yet were they againſt their Continuance, upon that ſingle Account, which was indeed the chief reaſon why they were continued. But all this Debate was modeſty Managed, and without violent Heat or Separation: afterwards ſome of the Queens Courtiers had an eye to the fair Manours of ſome of the greater Sees, and being otherwiſe Men of ill Tempers and Lives, and probably of no Religion, would have perſwaded the Queen, that nothing could Unite all the Reformed Churches ſo effectually, as to bring the Engliſh Church to the Model beyond Sea, and that it would much enrich the Crown, if ſhe took the Revenues of Biſhopricks and Cathedrals into her own Hands. This made thoſe on the other hand who laid to Heart the true Intereſt of the Proteſtant Religion, and therefore endeavoured to preſerve this Church in that ſtrong and well Modelled Frame to which it was brought (particularly the Lord Burleigh, the Wiſeſt Stateſ-man of that Age, and perhaps of any other) ſtudy how to Engage the Queen out of Intereſt to ſupport it, and they Demonſtrated to her that theſe New Models would certainly bring with them a great Abatement of her Prerogative: ſince if the Concerns of Religion came into Popular Hands, there would be a Power ſet up diſtinct from hers, over which ſhe could have no Authority.

This ſhe perceived well, and therefore reſolved to Maintain the Antient Government of the Church, but by this means it became a matter of Intereſt, and ſo theſe differences which might have been more eaſily reconciled before grew now into formed Factions: ſo that all Expedients were left unattempted which might have made up the Breach: And it becoming the Intereſt of ſome, to put it paſt reconciling, this was too eaſily effected. Thoſe of the Diviſion finding they could not carry their main deſign, raiſed all the Clamours they could againſt the Churchmen; and put in Bills into the Parliament againſt the abuſes of Pluralities, Non-reſidences, and the Exceſſes of the Spiritual Courts. But the Queen being poſſeſſed with this, that the Parliaments medling in theſe matters tended to the leſſening of her Authority, of which ſhe was extreamly ſenſible, got all theſe Bills to be thrown out. If the abuſes that gave ſuch occaſion to the male-contented to complain, had been effectually redreſſed, that Party muſt have had little to work on: but theſe things furniſhed them with new Complaints ſtill: the Market-Towns being alſo ill provided for, there were Voluntary Contributions made, for Lectures in theſe places. The Lecturers were generally Men that overtopped the Incumbents in diligent and Zealous Preaching, and they depending on the bounty of the People for their Subſiſtence, were engaged to follow the humours of thoſe who Governed thoſe Voluntary Contributions. All theſe things tended to the encreaſe of the Party; which owed its chief growth to the ſcandalous Maintenance of the Miniſters of great Towns, for which reaſon they were ſeldom of great Abilities, and to the ſcandals given by the Pluralities and Non-reſidences of others, that were over-provided. Yet the Government in Civil matters was ſo ſteady all the Queens Reign, that they could do no great thing, after ſhe once declared her ſelf ſo openly and reſolutely againſt them.

But upon King James's coming to the Crown, and the diviſions that came to be afterwards in Parliaments, between the too too often named Parties, for the Court and Country; and Clergymen being linked to the intereſts of the Crown, all thoſe who in Civil matters oppoſed the deſigns of the Court, reſolved to cheriſh thoſe of the Diviſion, under the Colour of their being hearty Proteſtants, and that it was the intereſt of the Reformed Religion to uſe them well; and that all Proteſtants ſhould Unite: And indeed the differences between them were then ſo ſmall, that if great Art had not been uſed to keep them aſunder, they had certainly United of their own accord. But the late unhappy Wars, engaged thoſe who before only complained of abuſes, into a formed ſeparation, which ſtill continues to the great danger and diſgrace of the Proteſtant Religion. I ſhall not make any Obſervations on latter Tranſactions which fall within all Mens View; but it is plain that from the beginning there have been laboured deſigns to make Tools of the ſeveral Parties, and to make a great breach between them; which lays us now ſo open to our common Enemy. And it looks like a ſad forerunner of Ruin, when we cannot after ſo long Experience of the miſchievous Effects of theſe Conteſts, learn to be ſo wiſe as to void the running on thoſe Rocks, on which our Fathers did ſo unfortunately ſplit; but on the contrary many ſteer as ſteadily towards them, as if they were the only ſafe Harbours, where they may ſecurely weather every Storm.

But being now to lead the Reader into ſo agreeable a Proſpect, as I hope the Reformation of the Church will be to him, I will hold him yet a little longer before I open it, and deſire him for his better preparation to it to reflect on the nature of Religion in general, and of the Christian in particular. That Religion is chiefly designed for perfecting the nature of Man, for improving his Faculties, governing his Actions, and securing the Peace of every Mans Conscience, and of the societies of Mankind in common, is a truth so plain, that without further arguing about it all will agree to it. Every part of Religion is then to be judged by its Relation to the main ends of it; and since the Christian Doctrine was revealed from Heaven, as the most perfect and proper way that ever was, for the advancing the good of Mankind, nothing can be a part of this holy Faith but what is proportioned to the end for which it was designed. And all the additions that have been made to it, since it was first delivered to the World, are justly to be suspected; especially where it is manifest at first view that they were intended to serve carnal and secular ends. What can be reasonably supposed in the Papacy, where the Popes are chosen by such intrigues, either of the two Crowns, the Nephews of the former Pope, or the craft of some aspiring men, to entitle them to infallibility or Universal Jurisdiction? What can we think of redeeming Souls out of Purgatory, or preserving them from it by tricks, or some mean Pageantry; but that it is a foul piece of Merchandise? What is to be said of Implicit Obedience, the Priestly Dominion over Consciences, the keeping the Scriptures out of the peoples hands, and the Worship of God in a strange Tongue? but that these are so many Arts to hoodwink the world, and to deliver it up into the hands of the ambitious Clergy. What can we think of the superstition and idolatry of Images, and all the other pomp of the Roman Worship? but that by these things the People are to be kept up in a gross notion of Religion, as a splendid business, and that the Priests have a trick of saving them, if they will but take care to humour them, and leave that matter wholly in their hands. And to sum up all, what can we think of that constellation of Prodigies in the Sacrament of the Altar, as they pretend to explain it, and all really to no purpose? but that it is an art to bring the World by whole sale to renounce their reason and sense, and to have a most wonderful veneration for a sort of men who can with a word perform the most astonishing thing that ever was.

I should grow too large for a Preface, if I would pursue this Argument as far as it will go. But if on the other hand we reflect on the true ends of this holy Religion, we must needs be convinced that we need go no where else out of this Church to find them; but are compleatly instructed in all parts of it, and furnished with all the helps to advance us to that which is indeed the end of our faith, the salvation of our souls. Here we have the Rules of holy Obedience, and the Methods of Repentance and Reconciliation for past sins clearly set before us: we believe all that Doctrine which Christ and his Apostles delivered, and the Primitive Church received: we have the comfort of all those Sacraments which Christ instituted, and in the same manner that he appointed them: All the helps to devotion that the Gospel offers are in every ones hand. So what can it be that should so extravagantly seduce any who have been bred up in a Church so well constituted, unless a blind superstition in their temper, or a desire to get heaven in some easier method than Christ has appointed, do strangely impose on their understandings, or corrupt their minds. Indeed the thing is so unaccountable that it looks like a curse from heaven on those who are given up to it, for their other sins; for an ordinary measure of Infatuation cannot carry any one so far in folly. And it may be laid down for a certain Maxim, that such as leave us, have never had a true and well formed Notion of Religion, or of Chriſtianity in its main and chief Deſign; but take things in parcels, and without examining them ſuffer themſelves to be carried away by ſome prejudices which only darken weaker Judgments.

But if it is an high and unaccountable folly for any to forſake our Communion, and go over to thoſe of Rome, it is at the ſame time an unexcuſable weakneſs in others who ſeem full of zeal againſt Popery, and yet upon ſome inconſiderable Objections do depart from the unity of this Body, and form ſeparated Aſſemblies and Communions; though they cannot object any thing material either to our Doctrine or Worſhip: but the moſt aſtoniſhing part of the wonder is, that in ſuch differences there ſhould be ſo little mutual forbearance or gentleneſs to be found: and that theſe ſhould raiſe ſuch heats as if the ſubſtance of Religion were concerned in them. This is of God, and is a ſtroke from Heaven on both ſides, for their other ſins: We of the Church Communion have truſted too much to the ſupports we receive from the Law, we have done our duties too ſlightly, and have minded the Care of Souls too little; therefore God to puniſh and awaken us has ſuffered ſo many of our People to be wreſted out of our hands: and thoſe of the Separation have been too forward to Blood and War, and thereby have drawn much guilt on themſelves, and have been too compliant with the Leaders of their ſeveral Factions, or rather apt to out-run them. It is plain, God is offended with us all, and therefore we are puniſhed with this fatal blindneſs, not to ſee at this time the things that belong to our peace.

And this leads me to Reflections of another ſort, with which I ſhall conclude this Preface, which I have now drawn out to a greater length than at firſt I intended. It is apparent the Wrath of God hangs over our heads, and is ready to break out upon us. The Symptoms of our ill condition are as ſad as they are viſible: and one of the worſt is, that each ſort and Party is very ready to throw the guilt of it off themſelves, and caſt it on others, with whom they are diſpleaſed: But no man ſays, What have I done? The Clergy accuſe the Laity, and the Laity condemn the Clergy. Thoſe in the City charge the Country, and the Country complains of the City: every one finds out ſomewhat wherein he thinks he is leaſt concerned, and is willing to fix on that all the indignation of Heaven, which, God knows, we our ſelves have kindled againſt our ſelves. It cannot be denied, ſince it is ſo viſible, that univerſally the whole Nation is corrupted, and that the Goſpel has not had thoſe effects among us which might have been expected, after ſo long and ſo free a courſe as it has had in this Iſland. Our wiſe and worthy Progenitors reformed our Doctrine and Worſhip; but we have not reformed our Lives and Manners: what will it avail us to underſtand the right Methods of worſhiping God, if we are without true Devotion, and coldly perform publick Offices, without ſenſe and affection, which is as bad as a Bead-roll of Prayers in what ever Language they be pronounced. What ſignifies our having the Sacraments purely adminiſtred among us, if we either contemptuouſly neglect them, or irreverently handle them, more perhaps in compliance with Law, than out of a ſenſe of the Holy Duties incumbent on us? for what end are the Scriptures put in our hands, if we do not read them with great attention, and order our lives according to them? and what does all preaching ſignifie, if Men go to Church meerly for Form, and hear Sermons only as ſet Diſcourſes, which they will cenſure or commend as they think they ſee cauſe, but are reſolved never to be the better for them? If to all theſe

ſad Conſiderations we add the groſs ſenſuality and impurity, that is ſo avowedly practiſed that it is become a faſhion, ſo far it is from being a reproach; the oppreſſion, injuſtice, intemperance, and many other immoralities among us, what can be expected, but that theſe abominations receiving the higheſt aggravation they are capable of, from the clear light of the Goſpel which we have ſo long enjoyed, the juſt Judgments of Heaven, ſhould fall on us ſo ſignally, as to make us a reproach to all our Neighbours. But as if all this were not enough, to fill up the meaſure of our iniquities, many have arriv'd at a new pitch of impiety, by defying Heaven it ſelf, with their avowed Blaſphemies and Atheiſm: and if they are driven out of their Atheiſtical Tenets which are indeed the moſt ridiculous of any in the World, they ſet up their reſt on ſome general Notions of Morality and Natural Religion, and do boldly reject all that is revealed: and where they dare vent it, (alas! where dare they not do it?) they reject Chriſtianity and the Scriptures, with open and impudent ſcorn, and are abſolutely inſenſible of any obligation of Conſcience in any thing whatſoever: and even in that Morality which they for decencies ſake magnifie ſo much, none are more bare-facedly and groſly faulty. This is a direct attempt againſt God himſelf, and can we think that he will not viſit for ſuch things, nor be avenged on ſuch a Nation? And yet the hypocriſie of thoſe who diſguiſe their flagitious Lives, with a Maſk of Religion, is perhaps a degree above all; though not ſo ſcandalous till the Maſk falls off, and that they appear to be what they truly are. When we are all ſo guilty, and when we are ſo allarumed by the black Clouds that threaten ſuch terrible and laſting Storms, what may be expected but that we ſhould be generally ſtruck with a deep ſenſe of our crying ſins, and turn to God with our whole Souls? But if after all the loud awakenings from Heaven we will not hearken to that Voice, but will ſtill go on in our ſins, we may juſtly look for unheard-of Calamities, and ſuch miſeries as ſhall be proportioned to our offences: and then we are ſure they will be great and wonderful.

Yet if on the other hand there were a general turning to God, or at leaſt if ſo many were rightly ſenſible of this, as, according to the proportion that the Mercies of God allow, did ſome way ballance the wickedneſs of the reſt, and if theſe were as zealous in the true methods of imploring Gods favour, as others are in procuring his diſpleaſure; and were not only mourning for their own ſins, but for the ſins of others; the Prayers and Sighs of many ſuch, might diſſipate that diſmal Cloud which our ſins have gathered; and we might yet hope to ſee the Goſpel take root among us: ſince that God who is the Author of it is merciful, and full of compaſſion, and ready to forgive; and this holy Religion which by his Grace is planted among us is ſtill ſo dear to him, that if we by our own unworthineſs do not render our ſelves incapable of ſo great a Bleſſing, we may reaſonably hope that he will continue that which at firſt was by ſo many happy concurring Providences brought in, and was by a continued Series of the ſame indulgent care advanc'd by degrees, and at laſt raiſed to that pitch of perfection which few things attain in this World. But this will beſt appear in the enſuing Hiſtory, from which I fear I may have too long detained the Reader.

The Second Part OF THE HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION OF THE Church of England.

Of the Life and Reign of King Edward the Sixth.

EDward, the Sixth King of England of that Name, was the only Son of King Henry the 8th, by his best beloved Queen Jane Seimour, or St. Maur, Daughter to Sir John Seimour, who was descended from Roger St. Maur, that married one of the Daughters and Heirs of the Lord Beauchamp of Hacche. Their Ancestors came into England with William the Conqueror, and had at several times made themselves considerable by the Noble Acts they did in the Wars. *He was born at Hampton-Court on the 12*th* day of October, being St. Edwards Eve, in the Year 1537. *and lost his Mother the day after he was born; who died, not by the cruelty of the Chyrurgeons ripping up her Belly to make way for the Princes Birth. (as some Writers gave out, to represent King Henry barbarous and cruel in all his Actions; whose report has been since too easily followed:) but as the Original Letters that are yet extant, shew, she was well delivered of him, and the day following was taken with a distemper incident to Women in that condition, of which she died. 1547.

* 1537. Oct. 12. Edward VI. born.

* The Queen died on the 14*th*, say Hall, Stow, Speed, and Herbert: on the 15*th*. saith Hennings: on the 17*th*, if the Letter, of the Physicians be true in Fullers Church Hist. p. 422. Cott. libr.

He was soon after Christened, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk being his God-fathers, according to his And Christned.

1547. own Journal, though Hall says the last was only his God-father when he was Bishopped; he continued under the charge and care of the Women, till he was six years old; and then he was put under the Government of Dr. Cox and Mr. Cheek: The one was to be his Præceptor for his Manners, and the knowledge of Philosophy and Divinity: The other for the Tongues and Mathematicks. And he was also provided with Masters for the French, and all other things becoming a Prince, the Heir of so great a Crown.

His disposition. He gave very early many indications of a good disposition to Learning, and of a most wonderful probity of mind, and above all, of great respect to Religion, and every thing relating to it. So that when he was once in one of his childish diversions, somewhat being to be reached at, that he and his Companions were too low for, one of them laid on the floor a great Bible that was in the Room to step on; which he beholding with indignation, took up the Bible himself, and gave over his play for that time. He was in all things subject to the Orders laid down for his Education, and profited so much in Learning, that all about him conceived great hopes of extraordinary things from him, if he should live: But such unusual beginnings seemed rather to threaten the too early end of a Life, that by all appearance was likely to have produced such astonishing things. He was so forward in his Learning, that before he was eight years old he wrote Latine Letters to his Father, who was a Prince of that stern severity, that one can hardly think those about his Son durst cheat him by making Letters for him. He used also at that Age to write both to his God-father the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and to his Unkle, who was first made Viscount Beauchamp, as descended from that Family, and soon after Earl of Hartford. It seems Q. Catherine Parr understood Latin, for he wrote to her also in the same Language. But the full Character of this young Prince is given us by Cardan, who writ it after his death, and in Italy, where this Prince was accounted an Heretick, so that there was nothing to be got or expected by flattering him; and yet it is so Great, and withal so agreeing in all things to Truth, that as I shall begin my Collection of Papers at the end of this Volume with his words in Latin, so it will be very fit to give them here in English.

Collection. Numb. 1.

Cardans Character of him. "All the Graces were in him. He had many Tongues when he was "yet but a Child: Together with the English his natural Tongue, he had "both Latin and French: nor was he ignorant, as I hear, of the Greek, "Italian, and Spanish, and perhaps some more. But for the English, "French and Latin, he was exact in them; and apt to learn every thing. "Nor was he ignorant of Logick, of the Principles of natural Philoso- "phy, nor of Musick. The sweetness of his temper was such as became "a Mortal, his gravity becoming the Majesty of a King, and his disposi- "tion suitable to his high degree. In sum, that Child was so bred, had "such Parts, was of such expectation, that he looked like a Miracle of his "a Man, These things are not spoken Rhetorically, and beyond the "truth, but are indeed short of it. And afterwards he adds, He was "a marvellous Boy: When I was with him, he was in the 15*th* Year of "Age, in which he spake Latin as politely and as promptly as I did: "He asked me what was the subject of my Books, de rerum Varietate, "which I had dedicated to him? I answered, That in the first Chapter "I gave the true cause of Comets, which had been long enquired into.

"but was never found out before. What is it, said he? I said, it was "the concourse of the light of wandring Stars. He answered, How "can that be, since the Stars move in different Motions? How comes it "that the Comets are not soon dissipated, or do not move after them ac- "cording to their Motions? To this I answered, They do move after "them, but much quicker than they, by reason of the different Aspect, "as we see in a Christal, or when a Rain-bow rebounds from the Wall: "for a little change makes a great difference of place. But the King "said, How can that be, where there is no Subject to receive that Light, "as the Wall is the Subject for the Rain-bow? To this I answered, That "this was as in the Milky-way, or where many Candles were lighted, the "middle place where their shining met was white and clear. From this "little tast it may be imagined what he was. And indeed the ingenuity "and sweetness of his disposition had raised in all good and learned Men "the greatest expectation of him possible. He began to love the Libe- "ral Arts before he knew them, and to know them before he could use "them: and in him there was such an attempt of Nature, that not only "England, but the World has reason to lament his being so early snatched "away. How truly was it said of such extraordinary Persons, That "their Lives are short, and seldom do they come to be old? He gave us "an Essay of Vertue, though he did not live to give a pattern of it. When "the gravity of a King was needful, he carryed himself like an Old Man; "and yet he was always affable and gentle, as became his Age. He play- "ed on the Lute: he meddled in affairs of State: and for bounty, he did "in that emulate his Father; though he even, when he endeavoured to "be too good, might appear to have been bad: but there was no ground "of suspecting any such thing in the Son, whose mind was cultivated by the "study of Philosophy. 1547.

A design to create him Prince of Wales.

It has been said in the end of his Fathers Life, that he then designed to create him Prince of Wales: For though he was called so, as the Heirs of this Crown are, yet he was not by a formal Creation invested with that dignity. This pretence was made use of to hasten forward the Attainder of the Duke of Norfolk; since he had many Offices for life, which the King intended to dispose of; and desired to have them speedily filled, in order to the creating of his Son Prince of Wales. In the mean time his Father died, and the Earl of Hartford, and Sir Anthony Brown, were sent by the Council to give him notice of it, being then at Hartford, and to bring him to the Tower of London; and having brought him to Enfield, with his Sister the Lady Elizabeth, they let him know of his Fathers death, and that he was now their King: On the 31*st* of January the Kings Death was published in London, and he proclaimed King.

King Henry dies.

King Edward came to the Tower.

At the Tower, his Fathers Executors, with the rest of the Privy-Council, received him with the respects due to their King: So tempering their sorrow for the death of their late Master, with their joy for his Sons happy succeeding him; that by an excess of joy they might not seem to have forgot the one so soon, nor to bode ill to the other by an extreme grief. The first thing they did, was the opening King Henry's Will: by which they found he had nominated sixteen Persons to be his Executors, and Governours to his Son, and to the Kingdom, till his Son was eighteen years of Age. These were the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, the Lord St. John Great Master, the

1547. Lord Ruſſel Lord Privy-Seal, the Earl of Hartford Lord Great Chamberlain, the Viſcount Liſle Lord Admiral, Tonſtal biſhop of Dureſme, Sir Anthony Brown Maſter of the Horſe, Sir William Paget Secretary of State, Sir Edward North Chancellor of the Court of Augmentations, Sir Edward Montague Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, Judge Bromley, Sir Anthony Denny, and Sir William Herbert Chief Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, Sir Edward Wotton Treaſurer of Callice, and Dr. Wotton Dean of Canterbury and York. Theſe, or the major part of them, were to execute his Will, and to adminiſter the Affairs of the Kingdom. By their conſent were the King and his Siſters to be diſpoſed of in Marriage. But with this difference, that it was only ordered, That the King ſhould marry by their Advice; but the two Siſters were ſo limited in their Marriage, that they were to forfeit their Right of Succeſſion, if they married without their conſent; it being of far greater importance to the Peace and Intereſt of the Nation who ſhould be their Husbands, if the Crown did devolve on them, than who ſhould be the Kings Wife. And by the Act paſſed in the 35*th* Year of King Henry, he was empowred to leave the Crown to them, with what limitations he ſhould think fit. To the Executors, the King added by his Will, a Privy-Council who ſhould be aſſiſting to them. Theſe were, the Earls of Arundel, and Eſſex, Sir Thomas Cheyney Treaſurer of the Houſhold, Sir John Gage Comptroller, Sir Anthony Wingfield Vice-Chamberlain, Sir William Petre Secretary of State, Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Seimour, Sir Richard Southwell, and Sir Edmund Peckham. The King alſo ordered, That if any of the Executors ſhould die, the Survivors without giving them a Power of ſubſtituting others, ſhould continue to adminiſter Affairs. He alſo charged them to pay all his Debts, and the Legacies he left, and to perfect any Grants he had begun, and to make good every thing that he had promiſed. The Will being opened and read, all the Executors, Judge Bromley and the two Wottons only excepted, were preſent, and did reſolve to execute the Will in all points, and to take an Oath for their faithful diſcharge of that Truſt.

Debate about chooſing a Protector.

But it was alſo propoſed, That for the ſpeedier diſpatch of things, and for a more certain order and direction of all Affairs, there ſhould be one choſen to be Head of the reſt, to whom Ambaſſadors and others might addreſs themſelves. It was added to caution this, That the Perſon to be raiſed to that Dignity, ſhould do nothing of any ſort without the Advice and Conſent of the greater part of the reſt. But this was oppoſed by the Lord Chancellour, who thought that the Dignity of his Office, ſetting him next the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who did not much follow Secular Affairs, he ſhould have the chief ſtroke in the Government; therefore he preſſed, That they might not depart from the Kings Will in any particular, neither by adding to it, nor taking from it, It was plain, the late King intended they ſhould be all alike in the Adminiſtration, and the raiſing one to a Title or Degree above the reſt, was a great change from what he had ordered. And whereas it was now ſaid, that the Perſon to be thus nominated was to have no manner of Power over the reſt, that was only to exalt him into an high Dignity with the leſs envy or apprehenſion of danger; for it was certain great Titles always make way for high Power. But the Earl of Hartford had ſo great a Party

Party among them, that it was agreed to, the Lord Chancellor himſelf consenting when he ſaw his oppoſition was without effect, that one ſhould be raiſed over the reſt in Title to be called the Protector of the Kings Realms, and the Governour of his Perſon: The next Point held no long debate, who ſhould be nominated to this high Truſt; for they unanimouſly agreed, That the Earl of Hartford, by reaſon of his nearneſs of Blood to the King, and the great experience he had in affairs, was the fitteſt Perſon. "So he was declared Protector of the Realm, and Go- "vernour to the Kings Perſon; but with that ſpecial and expreſs Condi- "tion, that he ſhould not do any Act but by the Advice and Conſent "of the other Executors, according to the Will of the late King. Then they all went to take their Oaths, but it was propoſed, that it ſhould be delayed till the next day, that ſo they might do it upon better conſideration. More was not done that day, ſave that the Lord Chancellor was ordered to deliver up the Seals to the King, and to receive them again from his Hands; for King Henry's Seal was to be made uſe of, either till a new one was made, or till the King was Crowned; He was alſo ordered to renew the Commiſſions of the Judges, the Juſtices of Peace, the Preſidents of the North, and of Wales, and of ſome other Officers. This was the iſſue of the firſt Council-day under this King: In which, the ſo eaſie advancement of the Earl of Hartford to ſo high a Dignity gave great occaſion to cenſure: it ſeeming to be a change of what King Henry had deſigned. But the Kings great kindneſs to his Unkle made it paſs ſo ſmoothly; For the reſt of the Executors, not being of the Ancient Nobility, but Courtiers, were drawn in eaſily to comply with that which was ſo acceptable to their young King. Only the Lord Chancellor, who had chiefly oppoſed it, was to expect ſmall favour at the new Protectors hands. It was ſoon apparent what emulation there was between them. And the Nation being then divided, between thoſe who loved the old Superſtition, and thoſe who deſired a more complete Reformation; The Protector ſet himſelf at the Head of the one, and the Lord Chancellor at the Head of the other Party. 1547. The Earl of Hartford choſen.

The next day the Executors met again, and firſt took their Oaths moſt ſolemnly for their faithful executing the Will. They alſo ordered all thoſe who were by the late King named Privy-Councellors to come into the Kings Preſence, and there they declared to the King the choice they had made of his Unkle; who gave his Aſſent to it. It was alſo ſignified to the Lords of the Council, who likewiſe with one voice gave their Conſent to it. And diſpatches were ordered to be ſent to the Emperour, the French King, and the Regent of Flanders, giving notice of the Kings Death, and of the Conſtitution of the Council, and the Nomination of the Protector during the Minority of their young King. All Diſpatches were ordered to be Signed only by the Ptotector; and all the Temporal Lords, with all the Biſhops about the Town, were commanded to come and ſwear Allegiance to the King. On the 2*d.* of Feb. the Protector was declared Lord Treaſurer, and Earl Marſhal, theſe Places having been deſigned for him by the late King upon the Duke of Norfolks Attainder. Letters were alſo ſent to Callice, Bulloigne, Ireland, the Marches of Scotland, and moſt of the Counties of England, giving notice of the Kings Succeſſion, and of the order now ſetled. The Will was alſo ordered to be Enrolled, and every of the Executors Which is declared in Council. Feb. 2.

1547. was to have an Exemplification of it under the Great Seal: and the Clerks of Council were alſo ordered to give to every of them an account of all things done in Council under their Hands and Seals. And the Biſhops were required to take out new Commiſſions of the ſame form with thoſe they had taken out in King Henry's time, (for which ſee Page. 267. of the former Part;) only with this difference, That there is no mention made of a Vicar-General in theſe Commiſſions, as was in the former, there being none after Cromwel advanced to that dignity. Two of theſe Commiſſions are yet extant, one taken out by Cranmer, the other taken out by Bonner. But this was only done by reaſon of the preſent juncture, becauſe the Biſhops being generally addicted to the former Superſtition, it was thought neceſſary to keep them under ſo arbitrary a Power as that ſubjected them to; for they hereby held their Biſhopricks only during the Kings pleaſure, and were to exerciſe them as his Delegates in his Name, and by his Authority. Cranmer ſet an Example to the reſt, and took out his Commiſſion, which is in the Collection. But this was afterwards judged too heavy a Yoak, and therefore the new Biſhops that were made by this King were not put under it; (and ſo Ridley, when made Biſhop of London in Bonners room, was not required to take out any ſuch Commiſſion;) but they were to hold their Biſhopricks during life.

Collection Number 2.

The Reaſon of the new Creation of many Noblemen.

There was a Clauſe in the Kings Will, requiring his Executors to make good all that he had promiſed in any manner of ways. Whereupon Sir William Paget, Sir Anthony Denny, and Sir William Herbert, were required to declare what they knew of the Kings Intentions and Promiſes; the former being the Secretary whom he had truſted moſt, and the other two, thoſe that attended on him in his Bed-Chamber during his Sickneſs; though they were called Gentlemen of the Privy-chamber; for the Service of the Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber was not then ſet up. Paget declared, That when the evidence appeared againſt the Duke of Norfolk, and his Son the Earl of Surrey, the King, who uſed to talk oft in private with him alone, told him, that he intended to beſtow their Lands liberally: and ſince by Attainders, and other ways, the Nobility were much decayed, he intended to create ſome Peers; and ordered him to write a Book of ſuch as he thought meeteſt: who thereupon propoſed the Earl of Hartford to be a Duke; the Earl of Eſſex to be a Marqueſs; the Viſcount Liſle to be an Earl; the Lords St. John, Ruſſel, and Wriotheſley, to be Earls; and Sir Tho. Seimour, Sir Thom. Cheyney, Sir Richard Rich. Sir William Willoughby, Sir Tho. Arundel, Sir Edmund Sheffield, Sir Jo. St. Leiger, Sir Wymbiſh, Sir Vernon of the Peak, and Sir Chriſtopher Danby, to be Barons. Paget alſo propoſed a diſtribution of the Duke of Norfolk's Eſtate. But the King liked it not, and made Mr. Gates bring him the Books of that Eſtate; which being done, he ordered Paget to tot upon the Earl of Hartford (theſe are the words of his Depoſition) a Thouſand Marks; on the Lord Liſle, St. John, and Ruſſel, 200 Pounds a year; to the Lord Wriotheſley 100; and for Sir Tho. Seimour 300 Pounds a year. But Paget ſaid it was too little, and ſtood long arguing it with him: yet the King ordered him to propoſe it to the Perſons concerned, and ſee how they liked it. And he putting the King in mind of Denny, who had been oft a Suiter for him, but he had never yet in lieu of that obtained any thing for Denny, the

King

King ordered 200 Pounds for him, and 400 Marks for Sir William Herbert, and remembred ſome others likewiſe. But Paget having according to the Kings Commands, ſpoken to theſe who were to be advanced, found that many of them deſired to continue in their former Ranks, and thought the Lands the King intended to give were not ſufficient for the maintenance of the Honour to be conferred on them: which he reported to the beſt advantage he could for every Man, and endeavoured to raiſe the Kings favour to them as high as he could. But while this was in conſultation, the Duke of Norfolk, very prudently apprehending the ruin of his Poſterity, if his Lands were divided into many Hands, out of which he could not ſo eaſily recover them; whereas if they continued in the Crown, ſome turn of Affairs might again eſtabliſh his Family; and intending alſo to oblige the King by ſo unuſual a Complement, ſent a deſire to him that he would be pleaſed to ſettle all his Lands on the Prince, (the now King) and not give them away: for, ſaid he, according to the Phraſe of that Time, They are good and ſtately Gear. This wrought ſo far on the King, that he reſolved to reſerve them for himſelf, and to reward his Servants ſome other way. Whereupon Paget preſſed him once to reſolve on the Honours he would beſtow, and what he would give with them, and they ſhould afterwards conſider of the way how to give it. The King growing ſtill worſe, ſaid to him, "That if ought "came to him but good, as he thought he could not long endure, he in- "tended to place them all about his Son, as Men whom he truſted and lov- "ed above all other: and that therefore he would conſider them the "more. So after many Conſultations he ordered the Book to be thus filled up, "The Earl ol Hartford to be Earl Marſhal, and Lord Treaſu- "rer, and to be Duke of Somerſet, Exeter, or Hartford, and his Son to "be Earl of Wiltſhire, with 800 l. a year of Land, and 300 l. a year "out of the next Biſhops Land that fell void; the Earl of Eſſex to be "Marqueſs of Eſſex; the Viſcount Liſle to be Earl of Coventry; the "Lord Wriotheſly to be Earl of Wincheſter; Sir Tho. Seimour to be a Ba- "ron and Lord Admiral; Sir Richard Rich, Sir Jo. St. Leiger, Sir Wil- "liam Willoughby, Sir Ed. Sheffield, and Sir Chriſtopher Danby, to be Barons: with yearly Revenues to them, and ſeveral other Perſons. And having at the Suit of Sir Edward North promiſed to give the Earl of Hartford ſix of the beſt Prebends that ſhould fall in any Cathedral, except Deanries and Treaſurerſhips; at his Suit he agreed, that a Deanry and a Treaſurerſhip ſhould be inſtead of two of the ſix Prebendaries. And thus all this being written as the King had ordered it, the King took the Book and put it in his Pocket, and gave the Secretary order to let every one know what he had determined for them. But before theſe things took effect the King died. Yet being on his Death-bed put in mind of what he had promiſed, he ordered it to be put in his Will, that his Executors ſhould perform every thing that ſhould appear to have been promiſed by him. All this Denny and Herbert confirmed, for they then waited in his Chamber; and when the Secretary went out, the King told them the ſubſtance of what had paſſed between them, and made Denny read the Book over again to him; whereupon Herbert obſerved that the Secretary had remembred all but himſelf; to which the King anſwered, He ſhould not forget him, and ordered Denny to write 400 l. a year for him. All theſe things being thus declared upon Oath, and the greateſt part 1547. part of them having been formerly signified to some of them, and the whole matter being well known and spread abroad, the Executors, both out of Conscience to the Kings Will, and for their own Honours, resolved to fulfil what the King had intended, but was hindred by death to accomplish. But being apprehensive both of Wars with the Emperour and French King, they resolved not to lessen the Kings Treasure nor Revenue, nor to sell his Jewels or Plate, but to find some other wayes to pay them; and this put them afterwards on selling the Chantry Lands.

The Affairs of Scotland. The business of Scotland was then so pressing, that Balnaves, who was Agent for those that had shut themselves within the Castle of St. Andrews, had this day 1180*l.* ordered to be carried to them for an half years pay to the Soldiers of that Garrison: There were also Pensions appointed for the most leading Men in that Business. The Earl of Rothes eldest Son had 280 Pound, Sir James Kircaldy had 200, and many others had smaller Pensions allowed them, for their amity, as it is expressed in the Council Books. That day the Lord Protector Knighted the King, being authorized to do it by Letters Patents. So it seems, that as the Laws of Chivalry required that the King should receive Knighthood from the Hand of some other Knight; so it was judged too great a presumption for his own Subject to give it, without a Warrant under the Great Seal. The King at the same time Knighted Sir John Hubblethorn the Lord Major of London. When it was known abroad what a distribution of Honour and Wealth the Council had resolved on, it was much censured: many saying, that it was not enough for them to have drained the dead King of all his Treasure, but that the first step of their proceedings in their new Trust was to provide Honour and Estates for themselves; whereas it had been a more decent way for them to have reserved their Pretensions till the King had come to be of Age. Another thing in the Attestations seemed much to lessen the credit of the Kings Will, which was said to be Signed the 30*th* of Decemb. and so did bear date: whereas this Narration insinuates, that it was made a very little while before he dyed, not being able to accomplish his design in these things which he had projected: but it was well known that he was not so ill on the 30*th* of December.

1547. Feb. 6. the King Knighted.

Secular Men had their Ecclesiastical Dignities. It may perhaps seem strange, that the Earl of Hartford had six good Prebends promised him; two of these being afterwards converted into a Deanry and a Treasurership. But it was ordinary at that time. The Lord Cromwel had been Dean of Wells; and many other secular Men had these Ecclesiastical Benefices without Cure conferred on them. For which, there being no charge of Souls annexed to them, this might seem to be an excuse. Yet even those had a sacred charge incumbent on them in the Cathedrals; and were just and necessary encouragements, either for such as by Age or other defects were not fit for a Parochial Charge, and yet might be otherwise capable to do eminent service in the Church; or for the support of such as in their Parochial labours did serve so well as to merit preferment, and yet perhaps were so meanly provided for as to need some farther help for their subsistence. But certainly they were never intended for the enriching of such lazy and sensual Men, who having given themselves up to a secular course of life, had little of a Church-man but the Habit and Name; and yet used to rail against Sacriledge in others, not considering how guilty themselves were of the ſame crime, enriching their Families with the Spoils of the Church, or with the Goods of it, which were put into their Hands for better uſes. And it was no wonder that when Clergy-men had thus abuſed theſe Endowments, Secular Men broke in upon them; obſerving plainly, that the Clergy who enjoyed them made no better uſe of them than Laicks might do. Though inſtead of reforming an abuſe that was ſo generally ſpread, they, like Men that minded nothing more than the enriching of themſelves, took a certain courſe to make the miſchief perpetual, by robing the Church of thoſe Endowments and helps it had received from the Munificence of the Founders of its Cathedrals, who were generally the firſt Chriſtian Kings of this Nation; which had it been done by Law would have been a thing of very bad conſequence; but as it was done, was directly contrary to the Magna Charta, and to the Kings Coronation Oath. 1547.

But now they that were weary of the Popiſh Superſtitions obſerving that Arch-biſhop Cranmer had ſo great a ſhare of the young Kings affection, and that the Protector and he were in the ſame Intereſts, began to call for a further Reformation of Religion; and ſome were ſo full of zeal for it, that they would not wait on the ſlow motions of the State. So the Curate and Church-wardens of St. Martins in Ironmonger-Lane in London, took down the Images and Pictures of the Saints, and the Crucifix out of their Church, and painted many Texts of Scripture upon the Walls; ſome of them according to a perverſe Tranſlation, as the Complaint has it; and in the place where the Crucifix was, they ſet up the Kings Arms with ſome Texts of Scripture about it. Upon this the Biſhop and Lord-Major of London complained to the Council. And the Curate and Church-wardens being cited to appear, anſwered for themſelves, That the Roof of their Church being bad, they had taken it down, and that the Crucifix and Images were ſo rotten, that when they removed them they fell to powder: That the charge they had been at in repairing their Church was ſuch, that they could not buy new Images: That they had taken down the Images in the Chancel, becauſe ſome had been guilty of Idolatry towards them. In concluſion, they ſaid, what they had done was with a good intention; and if they had in any thing done amiſs, they asked pardon, and ſubmitted themſelves. Some were for puniſhing them ſeverely; for all the Papiſts reckoned that this would be a leading Caſe to all the reſt of this Reign: and if this was eaſily paſſed over, others would be from that remiſneſs animated to attempt ſuch things every where. But on the other hand, thoſe at Court who had deſigned to ſet forward a Reformation, had a mind only ſo far to check the heat of the People, as to keep it within compaſs, but not to diſhearten their friends too much. Cranmer and his Party were for a general removing of all Images; and ſaid that in the late Kings time order being given to remove ſuch as were abuſed to Superſtition; Upon that there were great Conteſts in many Places what Images had been ſo abuſed, and what not; and that theſe Diſputes would be endleſs unleſs all were taken away.

Images removed without Authority out of one Church in London.

In the pureſt times of Chriſtianity they had no Images at all in their Churches. One of the firſt Councils, namely that at Elvira in Spain, made a Canon againſt the painting what they worſhiped on the Walls. Epiphanius was highly offended when he ſaw a Vail hanging before the door of a Church with a Picture on it, which he conſidered ſo little as

An account of the Progreſs of Image-worſhip.

1547. not to know well whose Picture it was, but thought it might be Christs, or some other Saints; yet he tore it, and gave them of that Place Money to buy a new Vail in its room. Afterwards, with the rest of the pomp of Hetheniſm, Images came to be set up in Churches; yet so as that there was no sort of Worship payed to them. But in the time of Pope Gregory the first, many went into extremes about them; some were for breaking them, and others worshiped them; That Pope thought the middle way best, neither to break, nor to worship them, but to keep them only to put the People in mind of the Saints. Afterwards there being subtil Questions started about the Unity of Christs Person and Will, the Greek Emperours generally inclined to have the animosities raised by these, removed by some comprehensive words to which all might consent: which the Interest of State as well as Religion seemed to require; for their Empire every day declining, all methods for uniting it were thought good and prudent. But the Bishops were stiff and peremptory: So in the sixth general Council they condemned all who differed from them. Upon this the Emperours that succeeded would not receive that Council, but the Bishops of Rome ordered the Pictures of all the Bishops who had been at that Council to be set up in the Churches: Upon which the Emperours contended against these or any Pictures whatsoever in Churches. And herein that hapned which is not unusual, that one Controversie rising occasionally out of another, the Parties forsake the first Contest, and fall into sharp Conflicts about the occasional differences. For now the Emperours and Popes quarrelled most violently about the use of Images, and ill Names going a great way towards the defaming an Opinion, the Popes and their Party accused all that were against Images, as favouring Judaism, or Mahometaniſm, which was then much spread in Asia and Africk: The Emperours and their Party accusing the others of Gentiliſm and Heathenish Idolatry. Upon this occasion Gregory the third first assumed the Rebellious Pretension to a Power to depose Leo the Emperour from all his dominions in Italy. There was one General Council at Constantinople that condemned the use or worship of Images; and soon after another at Nice did establish it: and yet at the same time Charles the Great, though not a little linked in Interest to the Bishops of Rome, holding both the French and Imperial Crowns by the favour of the Popes, wrote, or imployed Alcuinus (a most learned Country-man of ours as these times went) to write in his Name against the Worship of Images. And in a Council at Frankfort it was condemned, which was also done afterwards in another Council at Paris. But in such Ages of Ignorance and Superstition any thing that wrought so much on the senses and imaginations of the People was sure to prevail in conclusion. And this had in a Course of seven more Ages been improved by the craft and impostures of the Monks, so wonderfully, that there was no sign of Divine Adoration that could be invented that was not applied to these Images. So in King Henry's time that temper was found that such Images as had been abused to Superstition should be removed; and for other Images external Worship, such as kneeling, censing, and praying before them, was kept up, but the People were to be taught that these were not at all intended to the Image, but to that which was represented by it. And upon this there was much subtle arguing. Among Cranmers Papers I have have ſeen ſeveral Arguments for a moderate uſe of Images. But to all theſe they oppoſed the ſecond Commandment as plainly forbidding all viſible Objects of Adoration, together with what was in the Scriptures againſt the Idolatry of the Heathens, and what the Fathers had written againſt the Gentiles. And they added, that how excuſable ſoever that practice might have been in ſuch dark and barbarous Ages in which the People knew little more of Divine Matters than what they learned from their Images, yet the horrible abuſes that followed on the bringing them into Churches, made it neceſſary now to throw them all out. It was notorious that the People every where doted on them, and gave them Divine Honour: Nor did the Clergy, who were generally too guilty themſelves of ſuch abuſes, teach them how to diſtinguiſh aright: and the Acts of Worſhip that were allowed, were ſuch, that beſide the ſcandal ſuch Worſhip had in it, and the danger of drawing People into Idolatry, it was in it ſelf inexcuſable to offer up ſuch external parts of Religious Adoration to Gold or Slver, Wood or Stone. So Cranmer and others, being reſolved to purge the Church of this Abuſe, got the worſt part of the Sentence, that ſome had deſigned againſt the Curate and Church-wardens, to be mitigated into a Reprimend; and as it is entred in the Council Books, "In reſpect of their ſubmiſſion, and of ſome o- "ther Reaſons which did mitigate their offence, (Theſe were Cranmers "Arguments againſt Images) they did pardon their impriſonment, which "was at firſt determined, and ordered them to provide a Crucifix, or at "leaſt ſome painting of it till one were ready, and to beware of ſuch "raſhneſs for the future. But no mention is made of the other Images. 1547.

Many begin to pull down Images.

The carriage of the Council in this matter diſcovering the inclinations of the greateſt part of them, and Dr. Ridley having in his Lent Sermon preached againſt the Superſtition that was generally had to Images and Holy Water, it raiſed a great heat over England: So that Gardiner hearing that on May-day the People of Portſmouth had removed and broken the Images of Chriſt and the Saints, writ about it with great warmth to one Captain Vaughan, that waited on the Protector, and was then at Portſmouth. "He deſired to know whether he ſhould ſend one "to preach againſt it; though he thought that was the caſting Precious "Stones to Hogs, or worſe than Hogs, as were theſe Lollards. He ſaid "that Luther had ſet out a Book againſt thoſe who removed Images, and "himſelf had ſeen them ſtill in the Lutheran Churches: and he thought "the removing Images was on deſign to ſubvert Religion and the ſtate "of the World: he argues for them from the Kings Image on the Seal, "Cæſars Image on the Coin brought to Chriſt, the Kings Arms carried by "the Heralds: he condemns falſe Images; but for thoſe that were againſt "true Images, he thought they were poſſeſt with the Devil. Vaughan ſent his Letter to the Protector, with one from Gardiner to himſelf, who finding the reaſoning in it not ſo ſtrong but that it might be anſwered, wrote to him himſelf, "That he allowed of his zeal againſt Innovations, "but that there were other things that needed to be looked to as much. "Great difference there was between the Civil reſpect due to the Kings "Arms, and the Worſhip given to Images. There had been a time in "which the abuſe of the Scriptures was thought a good reaſon to take "them from the People, yea and to burn them: though he looked on "them as more ſacred than Images; which if they ſtood meerly as Re-

At which Gardiner is much offended.

The Letters are in Fox's Acts and Monuments.

1547. "membrancers, he thought the hurt was not great; but it was known "that for the moſt part it was otherwiſe: and upon abuſe the Brazen Ser- "pent was broken, though made at Gods Commandment: and it being "pretended that they were the Books of the People, he thought the Bible "a much more intelligible and uſeful Book. There were ſome too raſh, "and others too obſtinate. The Magiſtrate was to ſteer a middle Courſe "between them; not conſidering the Antiquity of things ſo much, as "what was good and expedient. Gardiner writ again to the Protector, "complaining of Bale and others, who publiſhed Books to the diſhonour "of the late King; and that all were running after Novelties; and often "inculcates it, that things ſhould be kept in the ſtate they were in, till "the King were of Age: and in his Letters reflects both on the Arch- "biſhop of Canterbury and the Biſhop of Dureſme for conſenting to ſuch "things.

Gardiner writ to Ridley who had preached againſt Images.

But finding his Letters had no effect on the Protector, he wrote to Ridley: "That by the Law of Moſes we were no more bound not to "have Images than not to eat Blood-Puddings. Image and Idol might "have been uſed promiſcuouſly in former times, as King and Tyrant "were; yet there was a great difference between theſe, according to the "Notions we now have. He cites Pope Gregory who was againſt both "adoring and breaking them: and ſays the Worſhip is not given to the "Image, ſo there is no Idolatry but to him repreſented by it: and as the "ſound of Speech did by the Ear beget Notions in us, ſo he did not ſee "but the ſight of an Image might ſtir up devotion. He confeſſed there "had been abuſes, as there is in every thing that is in Mens Hands: he "thinks Imagery, and Graving, to be of as good uſe for inſtruction, as "Writing or Printing: and becauſe Ridley had alſo preached againſt "the Superſtition of Holy Water to drive away Devils, he added, That "a Vertue might be in Water, as well as in Chriſts Garment, St. Peters "Shadow, or Eliſha's Staff. Pope Marcellus ordered Equitius to uſe it, "and the late King uſed to bleſs Cramp-Rings both of Gold and Silver, "which were much eſteemed every where, and when he was abroad "they were often deſired from him. This Gift he hoped the young King "would not neglect. He believed the Invocation of the Name of God "might give ſuch a Vertue to Holy Water as well as to the Water of "Baptiſm. For Ridley's Anſwer to this, I never ſaw it; ſo theſe things muſt here paſs without any Reply: though it is very probable an ordinary Reader will with a very ſmall meaſure of common Senſe and Learning, ſee how they might have been anſwered. The thing moſt remarkable here is about theſe Cramp-Rings which King Henry uſed to bleſs, of which I never met with any thing before I ſaw this Letter; but ſince I underſtand the Office of Bleſſing of theſe Rings is extant, as it was prepared for Queen Maries uſe, as ſhall be told in her Reign: It muſt be left to conjecture whether he did it as a practice of former Kings, or whether upon his being made Supream Head, he thought fit to take on him, as the Pope did, to conſecrate ſuch things, and ſend them about. Where to be ſure Fancy and Flattery would raiſe many Stories of the wonderful effects of what he had ſo bleſſed; and perhaps theſe might have been as true as the Reports made of the Vertues of Agnus Dei's, touched Beads, bleſſed Peebles, with ſuch other goodly Ware which the Friars were wont to carry about and diſtribute to their Benefactors as things highly ſanctified.

This

This I ſet down more fully, and have laid ſome things together that fell not out till ſome months after this, being the firſt ſtep that was made towards a Reformation in this Reign. 1547.

Upon this occaſion it is not unlikely that the Council wrote their Letters to all the Juſtices of Peace of England, on the 12*th*. of Feb. letting them know, that they had ſent down new Commiſſions to them for keeping the Peace: ordering them to aſſemble together, and firſt to call earneſtly on God for his Grace to diſcharge their Duties faithfully according to the Oaths which they were to take: and that they ſhould impartially, without corruption, or ſiniſter affection, execute their Office, ſo that it might appear that they had God and the good of their King and Country before their Eyes: and that they ſhould divide themſelves into the ſeveral Hundreds, and ſee to the publick Peace: and that all Vagabonds and diſturbers of the Peace ſhould be duly puniſhed; and that once every ſix weeks they ſhould write to the Lord Protector and Council, the ſtate in which the County was, till they were otherwiſe commanded. That which was ſent into the County of Norfolk will be found in the Collection. 1547. Feb. 12. The Commiſſion of the Juſtices of the Peace. Collection Number 3.

But now the Funeral of the deceaſed King, and the Coronation of his Son were to be diſpatched. In the Coronation-Ceremonies that had been formerly uſed, there were ſome things that did not agree with the preſent Laws of the Land: as the Promiſe made to the Abbots for maintaining their Lands and Dignities: They were alſo ſo tedious, that a new Form was ordered to be drawn, which the Reader will find in the Collection. The moſt material thing in it is the firſt Ceremony, whereby, the King being ſhewed to the People at the four Corners of the Stage, the Arch-biſhop was to demand their Conſent to it: and yet in ſuch terms as ſhould demonſtrate he was no Elective Prince; "for he "being declared the rightful and undoubted Heir both by the Laws of "God and Man, they were deſired to give their good Wills and Aſſents "to the ſame, as by their Duty of Allegiance they were bound to do. This being agreed on the 13*th* of Feb. on the day following King Henry's Body was with all the Pomp of a Royal Funeral removed to Sheen in the way to Windſor. There great obſervation was made on a thing that was no extraordinary matter: He had been extreme corpulent, and dying of a Dropſie, or ſome thing like it, it was no wonder if a fortnight after, upon ſo long a motion, ſome putrid matter might run thorough the Coffin. But Sheen having been a Houſe of Religious Women, it was called a ſignal Mark of the diſpleaſure of Heaven, that ſome of his Blood and Fat dropped through the Lead in the night: and to make this work mightily on weak People, it was ſaid, that the Dogs licked it next morning. This was much magnified in commendation of Friar Peto, afterwards made Cardinal, who (as was told Page 151. of the former Part) had threatned him in a Sermon at Greenwich, That the Dogs ſhould lick his Blood. Though to conſider things more equally, it had been a Wonder indeed if it had been otherwiſe. But having met with this Obſervation in a MS. written near that time, I would not envy the World the Pleaſure of it. Next day he was brought to Windſor, and interred in St. George's Chappel. And he having by his Will left that Church 600 l. a year for ever for two Prieſts to ſay Maſs at his Tomb daily, for four Obits yearly, and a Sermon at every Obit, with 10 l. to the Poor, Collection Number 4. 1547. Feb. 13. King Henry buried.

1547. Poor, and for a Sermon every Sunday, together with the maintenance of thirteen poor Knights; The Judges were conſulted how this ſhould be well ſetled in Law. Who adviſed that the Lands which the King had given, ſhould be made over to that Colledge by Indentures Tripartite, the King being one Party, the Protector and the other Executors a ſecond, and the Dean and Chapter of Windſor a third Party. Theſe were to be ſigned with the Kings Hand, and the great Seal put to them, with the Hands and Seals of all the reſt: and then Patents were to be given for the Lands, founded on the Kings Teſtament, and the Indentures Tripartite.

Soul-Maſſes examined. But the Pomp of this Buſineſs miniſtred an occaſion of enquiring into the uſe and lawfulneſs of Soul-Maſſes and Obits, which came to be among the firſt things that were reformed. Chriſt had inſtituted the Sacrament to be celebrated in remembrance of his Death, and it was a Sacrament only to thoſe who did participate in it: but that the conſecrating the Sacrament could be of any uſe to departed Souls, ſeemed a thing not eaſie to be conceived. For if they are the Prayers of the Living that profit the Dead, then theſe would have done as well without a Maſs. But the People would not have eſteemed bare Prayers ſo much, nor have payed ſo dear for them. So that the true Original of Soul-Maſſes was thought to have been only to encreaſe the Eſteem and Wealth of the Clergy. It is true, in the Primitive Church there was a Commemoration of the Saints departed in the Daily Sacrifice, ſo they termed the Communion, and ſuch as had given any offence at their death were not remembred in it: So that for ſo ſlight an offence; as the leaving a Prieſt Tutor to ones Children, which might diſtract them from their Spiritual care, ones name was to be left out of that Commemoration in Cyprians time; which was a very diſproportioned puniſhment to that offence, if ſuch Commemorations had been thought uſeful or neceſſary to the Souls departed. But all this was nothing to the private Maſſes for them, and was indeed nothing at firſt but an honourable mention of ſuch as had died in the Faith. And they believing then generally that there was a Glorious Thouſand Years to be on Earth, and that the Saints ſhould riſe ſome ſooner and ſome later to have their part in it, they prayed in general for their quiet Reſt, and their ſpeedy Reſurrection. Yet theſe Prayers growing, as all ſuperſtitious devices do, to be more conſidered, ſome began to frame an Hypotheſis to juſtifie them by; that of the Thouſand years being generally exploded. And in St. Auſtin's time they began to fancy there was a ſtate of puniſhment even for the Good in another Life, out of which ſome were ſooner and ſome later freed, according to the meaſure of their Repentance for their Sins in this Life. But he tells us, this was taken up without any ſure ground, and that it was no way certain. Yet by Viſions, Dreams, and Tales, the belief of it was ſo far promoted, that it came to be generally received in the next Age after him: and then as the People were told that the Saints interceded for them, ſo it was added that they might intercede for their departed Friends. And this was the Foundation of all that Trade of Soul-Maſſes and Obits. Now the deceaſed King had acted like one who did not believe that theſe things ſignified much; otherwiſe he was to have but ill reception in Purgatory, having by the ſubverſion of the Monaſteries deprived the departed Souls of the benefit of the many Maſſes that were were ſaid for them in theſe Houſes: yet it ſeems at his death he would make the matter ſure, and to ſhew he intended as much benefit to the Living, as to himſelf being dead, he took care that there ſhould be not only Maſſes and Obits, but ſo many Sermons at Windſor, and a frequent diſtribution of Alms for the relief of the Poor. But upon this occaſion it came to be examined what value there was in ſuch things. Yet the Arch-biſhop plainly ſaw that the Lord Chancellor would give great oppoſition to every motion that ſhould be made for any further alteration; for which he and all that Party had this ſpecious pretence always in their Mouths; That their late Glorious King was not only the moſt learned Prince, but the moſt learned Divine in the World, (for the flattering him did not end with his Life) and that therefore they were at leaſt, to keep all things in the condition wherein he had left them, till the King were of Age. And this ſeemed alſo neceſſary on Conſiderations of State; For Changes in matter of Religion might bring on commotions and Diſorders, which they as faithful Executors ought to avoid. But to this it was anſwered, That as their late King was infinitely learned, (for both Parties flattered him dead, as well as living) ſo he had reſolved to make great Alterations, and was contriving how to change the Maſs into a Communion: that therefore they were not to put off a thing of ſuch conſequence, wherein the Salvation of Peoples Souls was ſo much concerned, but were immediately to ſet about it. But the Lord Chancellor gave quickly great advantage againſt himſelf to his Enemies, who were reſolved to make uſe of any Error he might be guilty of, ſo far as to eaſe themſelves of the trouble he was like to give them. 1547.

The Kings Funeral being over, order was given for the Creation of Peers. The Protector was to be Duke of Somerſet, the Earl of Eſſex to be Marqueſs of Northampton, the Viſcount Liſle to be Earl of Warwick, the Lord Wriotheſley Earl of Southampton; beſides the new Creation of the Lords Seimour, Rich, Willoughby of Parham, and Sheffield: the reſt it ſeems excuſing themſelves from new honours, as it appeared from the Depoſition of Paget, that many of thoſe on whom the late King had intended to confer Titles of Honour had declined it formerly. On the 20*th*. of Feb. being Shrove-Sunday the King was Crowned by the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, according to the form that was agreed to. The Protector ſerving in it as Lord Steward, the Marqueſs of Dorſet as Lord Conſtable, and the Earl of Arundel as Earl Marſhal, deputed by the Protector. A Pardon was proclaimed, out of which the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pole, and ſome others were excepted. The Creation of Peers. 1547 Feb. 20. Coronation.

The firſt buſineſs of importance after the Coronation, was the Lord Chancellors fall. Who, reſolving to give himſelf wholly to Matters of State, had on the 18*th*. of Feb. put the great Seal to a Commiſſion, "directed to Sir Richard Southwell Maſter of the Rolls, John Tregonnel "Eſq; Maſter of Chancery, and to John Oliver, and Anthony Bellaſis, "Clarks, Maſters of Chancery; ſetting forth, that the Lord Chancellor "being ſo employed in the Affairs of State, that he could not attend on "the hearing of Cauſes in the Court of Chancery, theſe three Maſters, or "any two of them, were empowered to execute the Lord Chancellors "Office in that Court, in as ample manner as if he himſelf were preſent; "only their Decrees were to be brought to the Lord Chancellor to be "Signed by him, before they were enrolled. This being done without any The Lord Chancellor is removed from his Office.

1547. any Warrant from the Lord Protector, and the other Executors, it was judged a high presumption in the Lord Chancellor thus to devolve on others that Power which the Law had trusted in his Hands. The Persons named by him encreased the offence which this gave, two of them being Canonists, so that the common Lawyers looked upon this as a President of very high and ill consequence. And being encouraged by those who had no good will to the Chancellor, they petitioned the Council in this Matter, and complained of the evil consequences of such a Commission, and set forth the fears that all the Students of the Law were under, of a Change that was intended to be made of the Laws of England. The Council remembred well they had given no Warrant at all to the Lord Chancellor for the issuing out any such Commission; so they sent it to the Judges, and required them to examine the Commission with the Pe-

March 6. Imprisonment at the Kings pleasure. This lay sleeping till the sixth of March, and then the Judges Answer being brought to the Council, Signed with all their Hands, they entred into a debate how far it ought to be punished. The Lord Chancellor carried it very high; and as he had used many Menaces to those who had petitioned against him, and to the Judges for giving their Opinions as they did, so he carried himself insolently to the Protector, and told him he held his Place by a better Authority than he held his: That the late King being empow'red to it by Act of Parliament, had made him not only Chancellor, but one of the Governours of the Realm during his Sons Minority; and had by his Will given none of them Power over the rest to throw them out at pleasure: and that therefore they might declare the Commission void if they pleased, to which he should consent; but they could not for such an error turn him out of his Office, nor out of his share of the Government. To this it was answered, that by the late Kings Will they, or the major part of them, were to Administer till the King was at Age; That this subjected every one of them in particular to the rest; that otherwise if any of them broke out into Rebellion, he might pretend he could not be attainted nor put from the Government: Therefore it was agreed on, That every of them in particular was subject to the greater part. Then the Lord Chancellor was required to shew what Warrant he had for that he had done: Being now driven from that which he chiefly relied on, he answered for himself, That he had no Warrant; yet he thought by his Office he had Power to do it; that he had no ill intention in it, and therefore submitted himself to the Kings mercy, and to the gracious consideration of the Protector and the Council; and desired that in respect of his past Services he might forego his Office with as little slander as might be; and that as to his Fine and Imprisonment they would use moderation. So he was made to withdraw. "The Councellors (as it is en-
"tred into the Council-Book) considering in their Consciences his abuses
"sundry ways in his Office, to the great prejudice and utter decay of "the Common Laws, and the prejudice that might follow by the Seals
"continuing in the Hands of so stout and arrogant a Person, who would

"his Office, and be further fined as ſhould be afterwards thought fitting;
"only they excuſed him from Impriſonment. So he being called in, and heard ſay all he could think of for his own juſtification, they did not judg it of ſuch importance as might move them to change their mind. Sentence was therefore given, That he ſhould ſtay in the Council-Chamber and Cloſet till the Sermon was ended, that then he ſhould go home with the Seal to Ely Houſe where he lived: but that after Supper, the Lord Seimour, Sir Anthony Brown, and Sir Edw. North, ſhould be ſent to him, and that he ſhould deliver the Seal into their Hands; and be from that time deprived of his Office, and confined to his Houſe during pleaſure, and pay what Fine ſhould be laid on him. To all which he ſubmitted, and acknowledged the juſtice of their Sentence. So the next day the Seal was put into the Lord St. Johns Hands, till they ſhould agree on a fit man to be Lord Chancellor; and it continued with him ſeveral months. On the day following, the late Kings Will being in his Hands for the granting of Exemplifications of it under the Great Seal, it was ſent for, and ordered to be laid up in the Treaſury of the Exchequer: and the Earl of Southampton continued in his Confinement till the 29*th.* of June, but then he entred into a Recogniſance of 4000 l. to pay what Fine they ſhould impoſe on him, and upon that he was diſcharged of his Impriſonment. But in all this Sentence, they made no mention of his forfeiting his being one of the late Kings Executors, and of the preſent Kings Governours; either judging that, being put in theſe Truſts as he was Lord Chancellor, the diſcharging him of his Office did by conſequence put an end to them; or perhaps they were not willing to do any thing that might ſeem to change the late Kings Will; and therefore by keeping him under the fear of a ſevere Fine, they choſe rather to oblige him to be abſent, and to carry himſelf quietly, than by any Sentence to exclude him from his ſhare in that Truſt. Which I encline the rather to believe, becauſe I find him afterwards brought to Council without any Order entred about it: So that he ſeems to have come thither rather on a former Right than on a new choice made of him. Thus fell the Lord Chancellor, and in him the Popiſh Party loſt their chief ſupport, and the Protector his moſt emulous Rival. The Reader will find the Commiſſion with the Opinion of the Judges about it in the Collection, from which he will be better able to judg of theſe Proceedings againſt him, Which were ſummary, and ſevere, beyond the uſage of the Privy Council, and without the common forms of legal Proceſſes. But the Councils Authority had been raiſed ſo high, by the Act mentioned Page 263. of the former Part, that they were empowered ſufficiently for Matters of that nature.

Collection Number 5.

That which followed a few days after made this be the more cenſured, ſince the Lord Protector, who hitherto held his Office but by the choice of the reſt, and under great reſtrictions, was now reſolved to hold it by Patent, to which the late Chancellor had been unwilling to conſent. The pretence for it was, That the Forreign Miniſters, the French Ambaſſador in particular, deſired to be ſatisfied concerning his Power, and how far they might treat with him, and depend on the aſſurances and promiſes he gave. So the Protector and Council did on the 13*th* of March petition the King that they might act by a Commiſſion under the Great

1547. Seal, which might empower and justifie them in what they were to do. And that was to be done in this manner. The King and the Lords were to Sign the Warrant for it, upon which the Lord St. John (who, though he had the keeping of the Great Seal, was never designed to be Lord Keeper, nor was empowred to hear Causes) should set the Seal to it. The Original Warrant was to be kept by the Protector, and Exemplifications of it were to be given to Forreign Ministers. To this Order Sir Thom. Cheyney set his Hand, upon what Authority I do not so clearly see, since he was none of the Executors. By this Commission, (which will be found in the Collection) it is set forth, "That the King being "under Age, was desired by divers of the Nobles and Prelates of the "Realm, to name and authorize one above all others, to have the Charge "of the Kingdom, with the Government of his Person; whereupon he "had formerly by word of mouth named his Uncle to be Protector and "Governour of his Person; yet for a more perfect Declaration of that, "he did now ratifie and approve all he had done since that Nomination, "and constituted him his Governour and the Protector of his Kingdom "till he should attain the full Age of 18 years: giving him the full Au-"thority that belonged to that Office, to do every thing as he by his Wis-"dom should think for the Honour, Good, and Prosperity of the King "and Kingdoms: and that he might be furnished with a Council for his "aid and assistance, he did by the advice of his Uncle and others, No-"bles, Prelates, and wise Men, accept of these Persons for his Councel-"lors, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Lord St. John President, the "Lord Russel Lord Privy-Seal, the Marques of Northampton, the Earls "of Warwick, and Arundel, the Lord Seimour, the Bishop of Duresme, "the Lord Rich, Sir Thomas Cheyney, Sir Joh. Gage, Sir Anth. Brown, "Sir Anthony Wingfield, Sir William Paget, Sir William Petre, Sir Ralph "Sadler, Sir John Baker, Doctor Wotton, Sir Anth. Denny, Sir William "Herbert, Sir Edw. North, Sir Ed. Montague, Sir Ed. Wotton, Sir Edm. "Peckham, Sir Tho. Bromley, and Sir Richard Southwell: giving the Pro-"tector Power to swear such other Commissioners as he should think fit: "and that he with so many of the Council as he should think meet, "might annul and change what they thought fitting: restraining the "Council to act only by his Advice and Consent. And thus was the Protector fully setled in his Power, and no more under the curb of the Co-executors, who were now mixed with the other Councellors, that by the late King's Will were only to be consulted with as they saw cause. But as he depressed them to an equality with the rest of the Councellors, so he highly obliged the others who had been formerly under them, by bringing these equally with them into a share of the Government. He had also obtained to himself an high Authority over them; since they could do nothing without his consent, but he was only bound to call for so many of them as he thought meet, and was not limited to act as they advised, but cloathed with the full Regal Power: and had it in his Hands to oblige whom he would, and to make his Party greater by calling into the Council such as he should nominate. How far this was Legal I shall not enquire. It was certainly contrary to King Henry's Will. And that being made upon an Act of Parliament, which empowred him to limit the Crown and the Government of it at his pleasure, this Commission, that did change the whole Government during the Kings Minority, seems capable capable of no other defence, but that it being made by the consent of the major part of the Executors, it was still warrantable even by the Will, which devolved the Government on them, or the major part of them. 1547.

All this I have opened the more largely, both because none of our Historians have taken any notice of the first Constitution of the Government during this Reign, and being ignorant of the true account of it, they have committed great errors: and because having obtained, by the favour of that most industrious Collector of the Transactions of this Age Mr. Rushworth, the Original Council-Book, for the two first years of this Reign, I had a certain Authority to follow in it: the exactness of that Book, being beyond any thing I ever met with in all our Records. For every Council-day the Privy-Councellors that were present set their Hands to all that was ordered; judging so great caution necessary when the King was under Age. And therefore I thought this a Book of too great consequence to lie in private Hands: so the owner having made a Present of it to me, I delivered it to that Noble and Vertuous Gentleman Sir John Nicolas, one of the Clerks of the Council, to be kept with the rest of their Books.

The state of Affairs in Germany.

And having now given the Reader a clear Prospect of the state of the Court, I shall next turn to the Affairs that were under their consideration. That which was first brought before them was concerning the state of Germany. Francis Burgartus Chancellor to the Duke of Saxe, with others from the other Princes and Cities of the Empire, were sent over upon the news of the former Kings death to solicit for Aids from the new King toward the carrying on the War with the Emperor. In order to the clearing of this, and to give a just account of our Councils in reference to Forreign Affairs, especially the cause being about Religion, I shall give a short view of the state of Germany at this time. The Emperor, having formed a design of an Universal Monarchy, laid hold on the differences of Religion in Germany, as a good mean to cover what he did, with the specious pretence of punishing Heresie, and protecting the Catholicks. But before he had formed this design, he procured his Brother to be chosen King of the Romans, and so declared his Successor in the Empire; which he was forced to do, being obliged to be much in Spain and his other hereditary Dominions; and being then so young as not to enter into such deep Counsels as he afterwards laid. But his Wars in Italy put him oft in ill terms with the Pope; and being likewise watched over in all his Motions by Francis the I. and Henry VIII. and the Turk often breaking into Hungary and Germany, he was forced to great compliances with the Princes of the Empire: Who being animated by the two great Crowns, did enter into a League for their mutual defence against all Aggressors. And at last in the Year 1544. in the Diet held at Spire, the Emperor, being engaged in War with France, and the Turk, both to secure Germany, and to obtain Money of the Princes, was willing to agree to the Edict made there; which was, That till there was a free Council in Germany, or such an Assembly in which Matters of Religion might be setled, there should be a general Peace, and none was to be troubled for Religion; the free exercise of both Religions being allowed; and all things were to continue in the state they were then in. And the Imperial Chamber at Spire was to be reformed: for the Judges of 1547. that Court being all Papiſts, there were many Proceſſes depending at the Suit of the Eccleſiaſticks againſt the Proteſtant Princes, who had driven them out of their Lands: and the Princes expecting no fair dealing from them, all theſe Proceſſes were now ſuſpended, and the Chamber was to be filled up with new Judges, that ſhould be more favourable to them. They obtaining this Decree, contributed very liberally to the Wars the Emperor ſeemed to be engaged in. Who having his Treaſure thus filled, preſently made Peace both with France and the Grand Seignior, and reſolved to turn his Wars upon the Empire, and to make uſe of that Treaſure and Force they had contributed, to invade their Liberties, and to ſubdue them entirely to himſelf. Upon this he entred into a Treaty with the Pope, that a Council ſhould be opened in Trent; upon which he ſhould require the Princes to ſubmit to it, which if they refuſed to do, he ſhould make war on them. The Pope was to assist him with 10000 Men, beſides heavy Taxes laid on his Clergy; to which he willingly conſented. But the Emperor knowing, That if Religion were declared to be the ground of the War, all the Proteſtants would unite againſt him, who were the much greater number of the Empire; reſolved to divide them among themſelves, and to pretend ſomewhat elſe than Religion as the cauſe of the War. There were then four of the Electors of that Religion; the Count Palatine, the Duke of Saxe, the Marqueſs of Brandenburg, and the Arch-biſhop of Colen; beſides the Landgrave of Heſſe, the Duke of Wittemburg, and many leſſer Princes: and almoſt all the Cities of the Empire. Bohem and the other hereditary Dominions of the Houſe of Auſtria were alſo generally of the ſame Religion. The Northern Kings and the Swiſs Cantons were firmly united to them: The two Crowns of England and France were likewiſe concerned in Intereſt to ſupport them againſt the Auſtrian Family. But the Emperor got France and England engaged in a War betweem themſelves. So that he was now at leiſure to accompliſh his deſigns on the Empire; where ſome of the Princes being extreme old, as the Count Palatine, and Herman Arch-biſhop of Colen; others being of ſoft and unactive tempers, as the Marqueſs of Brandenburg; and others diſcontented and ambitious, as Maurice of Saxony, and the Brothers of Brandenburg: he had indeed none of the firſt Rank to deal with, but the Duke of Saxe and the Landgrave of Heſſe, who were both great Captains, but of ſuch different tempers, that where they were in equal Command, there was no great probability of ſucceſs. The former was a Prince of the beſt compoſition of any in that Age, he was ſincerely religious, and one of the moſt equally tempered Men that was then alive, neither lifted up with ſucceſs, nor caſt down with misfortunes: He had a great capacity, but was ſlow in his reſolutions. The Landgrave on the other hand had much more heat, was a quicker Man, and of an impatient temper, on which the accidents of Life made deep impreſſions.

When the Emperor began to engage in this deſign, the Pope, being jealous of his greatneſs, and deſirous to entangle him in a long and expenceful War, publiſhed the ſecret ends of the League; and opened the Council in Trent in Novem. 1545. where a few Biſhops and Abbots, with his Legates preſiding over them, uſurped the moſt Glorious Title of The moſt Holy Oecumenical Council repreſenting the Catholick Church. They entred by ſuch ſlow ſteps, as were directed from Rome, into the diſcuſ-

sion of Articles of Doctrine; which were, as they were pleased to call it, explained to them by some Divines, for most part Friars, who amused the more ignorant Bishops with the nice speculations with which they had been exercised in the Schools; where hard and barbarous words served in good stead to conceal some things not so fit to be proposed bare-faced, and in plain terms. The Emperor having done enough towards his design, that a Council was opened in Germany, endeavoured to keep them from determining points of Doctrine, and pressed them to examine some abuses in the Government of the Church, which had, at least given occasion to that great alienation of so many from the See of Rome and the Clergy. There were also divers wise and learned Prelates, chiefly of Spain, who came thither, full of hopes of getting these abuses redressed. Some of them had observed, That in all times, Heresies and Schisms did owe their chief growth to the scandals, the ignorance, and negligence of the Clergy, which made the Laity conceive an ill opinion of them, and so disposed them both in inclination and interest to cherish such as opposed them; and therefore they designed to have many great corruptions cast out; and observing that Bishops Non-residence was a chief occasion of all those evils, they endeavoured to have Residence declared to be of Divine Right; intending thereby to lessen the Power of the Papacy, which was grown to that height, that they were slaves to that See, taxed by it at pleasure, and the care of their Dioceses extorted out of their hands by the several ranks of exempted Priests; and also to raise the Episcopal Authority to what it was anciently, and to cut off all these encroachments which the See of Rome had made on them at first by craft, and which they still maintained by their Power: But the Court of Rome was to lose much by all Reformations, and some Cardinals openly declared, That every Reformation gave the Hereticks great advantages, and was a Confession that the Church had erred, and that these very things so much complained of were the chief Nerves of the Popedom, which being cut, the greatness of their Court must needs fall: and therefore they did oppose all these motions, and were still for proceeding in establishing the Doctrine. And though the opposing a Decree to oblige all to Residence was so grossly scandalous that they were ashamed of it, yet they intended to secure the greatness of the Court by a Salvo for the Popes Priviledge and Dignity in granting Dispensations. These Proceedings at Trent discovered what was to be expected from that Council, and alarum'd all the Protestants to think what they were to look for, if the Emperour should force them to submit to the Decrees of such an Assembly, where those whom they called Hereticks could expect little, since the Emperor himself could not prevail so far as to obtain or hinder delays, or to give preference for Matters of Discipline to Points of Doctrine. So the Protestants met at Frankfort, and entred into Councils for their common safety, in case any of them should be disturbed about Religion; chiefly for preserving the Elector of Colen, whom the Pope had cited to Rome for Heresie. They wrote to the Emperors Ministers, That they heard from all Hands that the Emperor was raising great Forces, and designing a War against them; who thought themselves secured by the Edict of Spire, and desired nothing but the confirmation of that, and the regulation of the Imperial Chamber, as was then agreed on. A Meeting being proposed between the Emperor and the Landgrave, the Land-

1547. Landgrave went to him to Spire, where the Emperor denied he had any design of a War, with which the other charged him: only he said he had with great difficulty obtained a Council in Germany, and therefore he hoped they would submit to it. But after some expostulations on both hands, the Landgrave left him; and now the thing was generally understood, though the Emperor did still deny it, and said he would make no War about Religion, but only against the disturbers of the Peace of the Empire. By this means he got the Elector Palatine to give little or no aid to the other Princes. The Marques of Brandenburg was become jealous of the greatness of Saxe, and so was at first Neuter, but afterwards openly declared for the Emperor. But Maurice the Duke of Saxe's near Kinsman, who by that Dukes means was setled in a fair Principality, which his Unkle George had left him only on condition that he turned Papist, notwithstanding which he got him to be possessed of it; was made use of by the Emperor as the best Instrument to work his ends. To him therefore he promised the Electoral Dignity with the Dominions belonging to the Duke of Saxe, if he would assist him in the War against his Kinsman the present Elector; and gave him assurance under his Hand and Seal, That he would make no change in Religion, but leave the Princes of the Ausburg Confession the free exercise of their Religion. And thus the Emperor singled out the Duke of Saxe and the Landgrave from the rest, reckoning wisely, that if he once mastered them, he should more easily overcome all the rest. He pretended some other quarrels against them, as that of the Duke of Brunswick, who having begun a War with his Neighbours was taken Prisoner, and his Dominions possessed by the Landgrave. That with some old Quarrels was pretended the ground of the War. Upon which the Princes published a Writing to shew that it was Religion only, and a secret design to subdue Germany, that was the true cause of the War; and those alledged were sought Pretences to excuse so infamous a breach of Faith; and of the publick Decrees: that the Pope who designed the destruction of all of that Confession, had set on the Emperor to this; who easily laid hold on it, that he might master the liberty of Germany. Therefore they warned all the Princes of their danger. The Emperors Forces being to be drawn together out of several Places in Italy, Flanders, Burgundy, and Bohemе, they whose Forces lay nearer had a great advantage if they had known how to use it: For in June they brought into the Field 70000 Foot and 15000 Horse, and might have driven the Emperor out of Germany, had they proceeded vigorously at first. But the divided Command was fatal to them, for when one was for Action, the other was against it. So they lost their opportunity, and gave the Emperor time to gather all his Forces about him, which were far inferior to theirs in strength: but the Emperor gained by time, whereas they who had no great Treasure lost much. All the Summer and a great deal of the Winter was spent without any considerable Action, though the two Armies were oft in view one of another. But in the beginning of the Winter, the Emperor having proscribed the Duke of Saxe, and promised to bestow the Principality on Maurice, he fell into Saxony, and carried a great many of the Cities which were not prepared for any such impression. This made the Duke separate his Army, and return to the defence of his own Country; which he quickly recovered, and drove Maurice almost out of all all his own Principality. The States of Boheme alſo declared for the Elector of Saxony. 1547.

This was the ſtate of the Affairs there. The Princes thought they had a good Proſpect for the next Year, having mediated a Peace between the Crowns of England and France, whoſe Forces falling into Flanders muſt needs have bred a great diſtraction in the Emperors Councils. But King Henry's death gave them great apprehenſions, and not without cauſe. For when they ſent hither for an Aid in Money to carry on the War, the Protector and Council ſaw great dangers on both hands: if they left the Germans to periſh, the Emperor would be then ſo lifted up, that they might expect to have an uneaſie Neighbour of him: on the other hand it was a thing of great conſequence to engage an Infant King in ſuch a War. Therefore their Succours from hence were like to be weak and very ſlow. Howſoever the Council ordered Paget to aſſure them that within three or four Months they ſhould ſend 50000 Crowns to their aſſiſtance: which was to be covered thus; The Merchants of the Still-yard were to borrow ſo much of the King, and to engage to bring home Stores to that value; they having the Money, ſhould ſend it to Hamburg, and ſo to the Duke of Saxe. But the Princes received a ſecond Blow in the loſs of Francis the firſt of France. Who having lived long in a familiarity and friendſhip with King Henry, not ordinary for Crowned heads, was ſo much affected with the news of his death, that he was never ſeen cheerful after it. He made Royal Funeral Rites to be performed to his memory in the Church of Noſtredame: to which the Clergy (who one would have thought ſhould have been glad to have ſeen his Funerals Celebrated in any faſhion) were very averſe. But that King had emancipated himſelf to a good degree from a ſervile ſubjection to them, and would be obeyed. He out-lived the other not long, for he died the laſt of March. He was the chief Patron of Learned Men and advancer of Learning that had been for many Ages. He was generally unſucceſsful in his Wars, and yet a great Commander. At his death he left his Son an Advice to beware of the Brethren of Lorain, and to depend much on the Councellors whom he had employed. But his Son, upon his coming to the Crown, did ſo deliver himſelf up to the charms of his Miſtreſs Diana, that all things were ordered as Men made their Court to her; which the Miniſters that had ſerved the former King ſcorning to do, and the Brothers of the Houſe of Lorain doing very ſubmiſſively, the one were diſcharged of their employments, and the other governed all the Councils. Francis had been oft fluctuating in the buſineſs of Religion. Sometimes he had reſolved to ſhake off the Popes Obedience, and ſet up a Patriarch in France; and had agreed with Henry the 8th to go on in the ſame Councils with him. But he was firſt diverted by his Alliance with Clement the 7th; and afterwards by the Aſcendant which the Cardinal of Tournon had over him, who engaged him at ſeveral times into ſeverities againſt thoſe that received the Reformation. Yet he had ſuch a cloſe Eye upon the Emperors motions, that he kept a conſtant good underſtanding with the Proteſtant Princes, and had no doubt aſſiſted them if he had lived. But upon his death new Councils were taken; the Brothers of Lorain were furiouſly addicted to the Intereſts of the Papacy, one of them being a Cardinal, who perſwaded the King rather to begin his Reign with the recovery of Bulloigne

And indeed the Germans loſt ſo much in the death of theſe two Kings, upon whoſe aſſiſtance they had depended, that it was no wonder they were eaſily over-run by the Emperor. Some of their Allies, the Cities of Ulm and Frankfort, and the Duke of Wittemburg, ſubmitting themſelves to the Emperors mercy, the reſt were much diſheartned: which is a conſtant forerunner of the ruine of a Confederacy. Such was the ſtate of Religion abroad.

The deſign laid for a further Reformation at home.

At home Mens minds were much diſtracted. The People, eſpecially in Market Towns and Places of Trade, began generally to ſee into many of the corruptions of the Doctrine and Worſhip, and were weary of them; Some preached againſt ſome abuſes: Glaſier at Pauls Croſs taught, that the obſervance of Lent was only a Poſitive Law; others went further, and plainly condemned moſt of the former abuſes; But the Clergy were as much engaged to defend them. They were for the moſt part ſuch as had been bred in Monaſteries and Religious Houſes. For there being Penſions reſerved for the Monks, when their Houſes were ſurrendred and diſſolved, till they ſhould be otherwiſe provided; The Court of Augmentations took care to eaſe the King of that Charge by recommending them to ſuch ſmall Benefices as were at the Kings diſpoſal; and ſuch as purchaſed thoſe Lands of the Crown, with that Charge of paying the Penſions to the Monks, were alſo careful to eaſe themſelves by procuring Benefices for them. The Benefices were generally very ſmall, ſo that in many Places three or four Benefices could hardly afford enough for the maintenance of one Man. And this gave ſome colour for that abuſe of one Man's having many Benefices that have a care of Souls annexed to them; and that not only where they are ſo contiguous, that the duty can be diſcharged by one, and ſo poor that the maintenance of both will ſcarce ſerve for the encouragement of one Perſon, but even where they are very remote, and of conſiderable value. This Corruption that crept in, in the dark Ages of the Church, was now practiſed in England out of neceſſity. By an Act made in King Henry the 8*th*'s time, none might hold two Benefices without a Diſpenſation, but no Diſpenſation could enable one to hold three: yet that was not at this time much conſidered. The excuſes made for this were That in ſome Places they could not find good Men for the Benefices, but in moſt Places the Livings were brought to nothing. For while the Abbies ſtood, the Abbots allowed thoſe whom they appointed to ſerve the Cure in the Churches that belonged to them, (which were in value above the half of England) a ſmall Stipend, or ſome little part of the Vicarage Tithes; and they were to raiſe their ſubſiſtence out of the Fees they had by the Sacraments, and other Sacramentals; and chiefly by the ſinging Maſſes for the Poor that died; for the Abbies had the profit of it from the Rich. And Maſſes went generally for 2 d. a Groat was thought a great Bounty. So they all concluded themſelves undone, if theſe things were withdrawn. This engaged them againſt any Reformation, ſince every ſtep that was made in it took their Bread out of their Mouths. But they being generally very ignorant could oppoſe nothing with the force of Reaſon or Learning. So although they were reſolved to comply with any thing, rather than forfeit their Benefices; yet in their hearts they abhorred horred all Reformation, and murmurred againſt it where they thought they might do it ſafely; ſome preached as much for the old abuſes, as others did againſt them. Dr. Peru at St. Andrews Underſhaft juſtified the Worſhip of Images on the 23*d* of April; yet on the 19*th* of June he preached a Recantation of that Sermon. Beſides theſe, there were great Prelates, as Gardiner, Bonner, and Tonſtall, whoſe long experience in Affairs, they being oft employed in Forreign Ambaſſies, together with their high preferment, gave them great Authority; and they were againſt all Alterations in Religion. But that was not ſo decent to profeſs, therefore they ſet upon this pretence, that till the King, their Supreme Head were of Age, ſo as to conſider things himſelf, all ſhould continue in the ſtate in which King Henry had left them: and theſe depended on the Lady Mary the Kings eldeſt Siſter as their Head, who now profeſſed her ſelf to be in all Points for what her Father had done: and was very earneſt to have every thing Enacted by him, but chiefly the ſix Articles, to continue in force. 1547.

On the other hand Cranmer, being now delivered from that too awful ſubjection that he had been held under by King Henry, reſolved to go on more vigorouſly in purging out abuſes. He had the Protector firmly united to him in this deſign. Dr. Cox and Mr. Cheek, who were about the young King, were alſo very careful to infuſe right Principles of Religion into him; and as he was very capable of underſtanding what was laid before him, ſo he had an early liking to all good and generous Principles; and was of ſo excellent a temper of mind, that as he naturally loved Truth, ſo the great probity of his Manners made him very inclinable to love and cheriſh true Religion. Cranmer had alſo ſeveral Biſhops of his ſide; Holgate of York, Holbeach of Lincoln, Goodrick of Ely, and above all Ridley Elect of Rocheſter, deſigned for that See by King Henry, but not Conſecrated till September this Year. Old Latimer was now diſcharged of his Impriſonment, but had no mind to return to a more publick Station, and did chooſe rather to live private, and employ himſelf in Preaching. He was kept by Cranmer at Lambeth, where he ſpent the reſt of his days, till he was impriſoned in Queen Maries time, and attained the glorious end of his innocent and pious Life. But the apprehenſions of his being reſtored again to his old Biſhoprick, put Heath, then Biſhop of Worceſter, into great anxieties; ſometimes he thought if he conſented to the Reformation, then Latimer, who left his Biſhoprick on the account of the ſix Articles, muſt be reſtored, and this made him joyn with the Popiſh Party: at other times, when he ſaw the Houſe of Commons moved to have Latimer put in again, then he joyned in the Councils for the Reformation, to ſecure Friends to himſelf by that compliance. Others of the Biſhops were ignorant and weak Men, who underſtood Religion little, and valued it leſs; and ſo, although they liked the old Superſtition beſt, becauſe it encouraged Ignorance moſt, and that was the only ſure ſupport of their Power and Wealth, yet they reſolved to ſwim with the Stream. It was deſigned by Cranmer and his Friends to carry on the Reformation but by ſlow and ſafe degrees, not hazarding too much at once. They truſted in the Providence of God, that he would aſſiſt them in ſo good a Work. They knew the corruptions they were to throw out to be ſuch that they ſhould eaſily ſatisfie the People with what they did, and they had many learned 4157. Men among them, who had now for divers years been examining theſe matters. There were alſo many that declared they had heard the late King expreſs his great regret for leaving the ſtate of Religion in ſo unſettled a condition; and that he had reſolved to have changed the Maſs into a Communion, beſides many other things. And in the Act of Parliament which he had procured, (ſee Pag. 263. firſt Part) for giving force and Authority to his Proclamations, a Proviſo was added; That his Sons Councellors, while he ſhould be under Age, might ſet out Proclamations of the ſame Authority with theſe which were made by the King himſelf. This gave them a full power to proceed in that Work; in which they reſolved to follow the method begun by the late King of ſending Viſitors over England with Injunctions and Articles. They ordered them ſix ſeveral Circuits or Precincts. The firſt was London, Weſtminſter, Norwich, and Ely. The ſecond Rocheſter, Canterbury Chicheſter, and Wincheſter. The third Sarum, Exeter, Bath, Briſtol, and Gloceſter. The fourth York, Durham, Carliſle, and Cheſter. The fifth Peterborough, Lincoln, Oxford, Coventry, and Lichfield. And the ſixth Wales, Worceſter, and Hereford. For every Circuit there were two Gentlemen, a Civilian, a Divine, and a Regiſter. They were deſigned to be ſent out in the beginning of May, as appears by a Letter to be found in the Collection, written the fourth of May to the Arch-biſhop of York. (There is alſo in the Regiſters of London another of the ſame ſtrain.) Yet the Viſitation being put off for ſome Months, this Inhibition was ſuſpended on the 16th of May, till it ſhould be again renewed. The Letter ſets forth, that the King being ſpeedily to order a Viſitation over his whole Kingdom, therefore neither the Arch-biſhop nor any other ſhould exerciſe any Juriſdiction while that Viſitation laſted. And ſince the minds of the People were held in great ſuſpence by the Controverſies they heard ſo variouſly toſſed in the Pulpits, that for quieting theſe the King did require all Biſhops to preach no where but in their Cathedrals, and that all other Clergy-men ſhould not preach but in their Collegiate or Parochial Churches, unleſs they obtained a ſpecial Licence from the King to that effect. The deſign of this was to make a diſtinction between ſuch as preached for the reformation of abuſes, and ſuch as did it not. The one were to be encouraged by Licenſes to preach whereever they deſired to do it, but the others were reſtrained to the Places where they were Incumbents. But that which of all other things did moſt damp thoſe who deſigned the Reformation, was the miſery to which they ſaw the Clergy reduced, and the great want of able men to propagate it over England. For the Rents of the Church were either ſo ſwallowed up by the ſuppreſſion of Religious Houſes, to whom the Tithes were generally appropriated, or ſo baſely alienated by ſome lewd or ſuperſtitious Incumbents, who, to preſerve themſelves, being otherwiſe obnoxious, or to purchaſe Friends, had given away the beſt part of their Revenues and Benefices; that there was very little encouragement left for thoſe that ſhould labour in the Work of the Goſpel. And though many Projects were thought on for remedying this great abuſe, yet thoſe were all ſo powerfully oppoſed, that there was no hope left of getting it remedied, till the King ſhould come to be of Age, and be able by his Authority to procure the Church-men a more proportioned maintenance.

A Viſitation is made over England.

Two

Two things only remained to be done at preſent. The one was to draw up ſome Homilies for the inſtruction of the People, which might ſupply the defects of their Incumbents, together with the providing them with ſuch Books as might lead them into the underſtanding of the Scripture. The other was to ſelect the moſt eminent Preachers they could find, and ſend them over England with the Viſitors, who ſhould with more Authority inſtruct the Nation in the Principles of Religion. Therefore ſome were appointed to compile thoſe Homilies; and Twelve were at firſt agreed on, being about thoſe Arguments which were in themſelves of the greateſt importance. The 1*ſt* was about the uſe of the Scriptures. The 2*d* of the miſery of Mankind by ſin. 3*d*. Of their Salvation by Chriſt. 4*th*. Of True and Lively Faith. 5*th*. Of Good Works. 6*th*. Of Chriſtian Love and Charity. 7*th*. Againſt Swearing, and chiefly Perjury. 8*th*. Againſt Apoſtacy, or declining from God. 9*th*. Againſt the fear of Death. 10*th*. An Exhortation to Obedience. 11*th*. Againſt Whoredom and Adultery, ſetting forth the ſtate of Marriage how neceſſary and honourable it was. And the 12*th* againſt Contention, chiefly about matters of Religion. They intended to ſet out more afterwards, but theſe were all that were at this time finiſhed. The chief deſign in them was to acquaint the People with the method of Salvation according to the Goſpel; in which there were two dangerous Extremes at that time that had divided the World. The greateſt part of the ignorant Commons ſeemed to conſider their Prieſts as a ſort of a People who had ſuch a ſecret trick of ſaving their Souls, as Mountebanks pretend in the curing of diſeaſes; and that there was nothing to be done but to leave themſelves in their hands, and the buſineſs could not miſcarry. This was the chief Baſis and ſupport of all that Superſtition which was ſo prevalent over the Nation. The other extreme was of ſome corrupt Goſpellers, who thought if they magnified Chriſt much, and depended on his Merits and Interceſſion, they could not periſh, which way ſoever they led their Lives. In theſe Homilies therefore ſpecial care was taken to rectifie theſe errors. And the Salvation of Mankind was on the one hand wholly aſcribed to the Death and Sufferings of Chriſt, to which Sinners were taught to fly, and to truſt to it only, and to no other devices for the pardon of ſin. They were at the ſame time taught that there was no Salvation through Chriſt, but to ſuch as truly repented, and lived according to the Rules of the Goſpel. The whole matter was ſo ordered to teach them, that avoiding the hurtful errors on both hands, they might all know the true and certain way of attaining Eternal Happineſs. For the underſtanding the New Teſtament Eraſmus's Paraphraſe, which was tranſlated into Engliſh, was thought the moſt profitable and eaſieſt Book. Therefore it was reſolved, that together with the Bible there ſhould be one of theſe in every Pariſh-Church over England. They next conſidered the Articles and Injunctions that ſhould be given to the Viſitors. The greateſt part of them were only the renewing what had been ordered by King Henry during Cromwel's being Vicegerent, which had been much neglected ſince his fall. For as there was no Vicegerent, ſo there was few Viſitations appointed after his death by the Kings Authority; but the executing former Injunctions was left to the ſeveral Biſhops, who were for the moſt part more careful about the ſix Articles, than about the Injunctions.

"So now all the Orders about renouncing the Popes Power, and aſ-
"ſerting the Kings Supremacy, about Preaching, teaching the Elements
"of Religion in the Vulgar Tongue, about the Benefices of the Clergy,
"and the Taxes on them for the Poor, for Scholars, and their Manſion-
"Houſes, with the other Injunctions for the ſtrictneſs of Church-mens
"Lives, and againſt Superſtitions, Pilgrimages, Images, or other Rites
"of that kind, and for Regiſter-Books, were renewed. And to theſe,
"many others were added: as, That Curates ſhould take down ſuch
"Images as they knew were abuſed by Pilgrimages or Offerings to them;
"but that private Perſons ſhould not do it. That in the Confeſſions in Lent
"they ſhould examine all People whether they could recite the Elements "of Religion in the Engliſh Tongue. That at High-Maſs they ſhould
"read the Epiſtle and Goſpel in Engliſh, and every Sunday and Holy-day
"they ſhould read at Mattins one Chapter out of the New Teſtament, "and at Even-ſong another out of the Old in Engliſh. That the Cu-
"rates ſhould often viſit the Sick, and have many places of the Scripture
"in Engliſh in readineſs wherewith to comfort them. That there ſhould be "no more Proceſſions about Churches, for avoiding contention for pre"cedence in them. And that the Letany formerly ſaid in the Proceſſions, "ſhould be ſaid thereafter in the Quire in Engliſh, as had been ordered "by the late King. That the Holy-day being inſtituted at firſt that Men
"ſhould give themſelves wholly to God, yet God was generally "more diſhonoured upon it than on the other days, by idleneſs,
"drunkenneſs, and quarrelling, the People thinking that they ſufficient-
"ly honoured God by hearing Maſs and Mattins, though they underſtood
"nothing of it to their edifying; therefore thereafter the Holy-day
"ſhould be ſpent, according to Gods Holy Will, in hearing and reading
"his Holy Word, in publick and private Prayers, in amending their "Lives, receiving the Communion, Viſiting the Sick, and reconciling "themſelves to their Neighbours. Yet the Curates were to declare to "their People, that in Harveſt-time they might upon the Holy and Feſti-
"val days labour in their Harveſt: That Curates were to admit none to
"the Communion, who were not reconciled to their Neighbours: That "all dignified Clergy-men ſhould preach perſonally twice a year. That the "People ſhould be taught not to deſpiſe any of the Ceremonies not yet
"abrogated, but to beware of the Superſtition of ſprinkling their Beds
"with Holy Water, or the ringing of Bells, or uſing of Bleſſed Candles for "driving away Devils. That all Monuments of Idolatry ſhould be re"moved out of the Walls or Windows of Churches, and that there ſhould
"be a Pulpit in every Church for preaching: That there ſhould be a
"Cheſt with a hole in it for the receiving the Oblations of the People
"for the Poor, and that the People ſhould be exhorted to Almſ-giving
"as much more profitable than what they formerly beſtowed on Super"ſtitious Pilgrimages, Trentals, and decking of Images. That all Pa"trons who diſpoſed of their Livings by Simoniacal Pactions ſhould for"feit their Right for that vacancy to the King, That the Homilies ſhould "be read. That Prieſts ſhould be uſed charitably and reverently for "their office ſake. That no other Primer ſhould be uſed but that ſet
"out by King Henry. That the Prime and the Hours ſhould be omitted
"where there was a Sermon or Homily. That they ſhould in Bidding
"the Prayers remember the King their Supream Head, the Queen Dowa"ger

"ger, the Kings two Sisters, the Lord Protector, and the Council, the "Lords, the Clergy, and the Commons of the Realm; and to pray "for Souls departed this life, that at the last day we with them may rest "both body and Soul. All which Injunctions were to be observed, un- "der the pains of Excommunication, Sequestration, or Deprivation, as "the Ordinaries should answer it to the King, the Justices of Peace being "required to assist them. 1547.

Besides these, there were other Injunctions given to the Bishops, "That they should see the former put in Execution, and should preach "four times a year in their Dioceses: once at their Cathedral, and "three times in other Churches, unless they had a reasonable excuse for "their omission. That their Chaplains should be able to preach Gods "Word, and should be made labour oft in it: That they should give "Orders to none but such as would do the same; and if any did other- "wise, that they should punish him, and recall their Licence. These are the chief Heads of the Injunctions, which being so often printed, I shall refer the Reader that would consider them more carefully, to the Collection of these and other such curious things made by the Right Reverend Father in God Anthony Sparrow now Lord Bishop of Norwich. Injunctions to the Bishops.

These being published, gave occasion to those who censured all things of that nature to examine them. These were much censured.

The removing Images that had been abused, gave great occasion of quarrel; and the thing being to be done by the Clergy only, it was not like that they, who lived chiefly by such things, would be very zealous in the removing them. Yet on the other hand, it was thought necessary to set some restraints to the heats of the People, who were otherwise apt to run too far where Bounds were not set to them.

The Article about the strict observance of the Holy-day seemed a little doubtful, whether by the Holy-day was to be understood, only the Lords-day, or that and all other Church-Festivals. The naming it singularly the Holy-day, and in the end of that Article adding Festival-days to the Holy-day, seemed to favour their opinion that thought this strict observance of the Holy-day was particularly intended for the Lords-day, and not for the other Festivals. And indeed the setting aside of large portions of time on that day for our Spiritual Edification, and for the Service of God, both in publick and private, is so necessary for the advancement of true Piety, that great and good effects must needs follow on it. But some came afterwards, who not content to press great strictness on that day, would needs make a Controversie about the Morality of it, and about the fourth Commandment, and framed many Rules for it, which were stricter than themselves or any other could keep, and so could only load Mens Consciences with many scruples. This drew an opposition from others who could not agree to these severities, and these Contests were, by the subtilty of the Enemies of the Power and Progress of Religion so improved, that in stead of all Mens observing that time devoutly as they ought, some took occasion from the strictness of their own way, to censure all as irreligious, who did not in every thing agree to their notion concerning it: Others by the heat of contradiction did too much slacken this great Bond and Instrument of Religion; which is since brought under so much neglect, that it is for most part a day 1547. day only of Reſt from Mens bodily labours, but perhaps worſe employed than if they were at work: So hard a thing it is to keep the due mean, between the Extremes of Superſtition on the one hand, and of Irreligion on the other.

The corruption of Lay-Patrons in their Simoniacal Bargains, was then ſo notorious, that it was neceſſary to give a Check to it, as we find there was by theſe Injunctions. But whether either this, or the Oath afterwards appointed to be taken, has effectually delivered this Church of that great abuſe, I ſhall not determine. If thoſe who beſtow Benefices, did conſider, that the charge of Souls being annexed to them, they ſhall anſwer to God ſeverely for putting ſo ſacred a Truſt in mean or ill hands, upon any baſe or ſervile accounts, it would make them look a little more carefully to a thing of ſo high conſequence; and neither expoſe ſo holy a thing to ſale, nor gratifie a Friend or Servant by granting them the next Advowſon, or be too eaſily overcome with the ſollicitations of impudent Pretenders.

The Form of Bidding Prayer was not begun by King Henry, as ſome have weakly imagined; but was uſed in the times of Popery, as will appear by the Form of Bidding the Beads in King Henry the 7th's time, which will be found in the Collection. Where the way was, firſt for the Preacher to name and open his Text, and then to call on the People to go to their Prayers, and to tell them what they were to pray for; after which, all the People ſaid their Beads in a general ſilence, and the Miniſter kneeled down likewiſe, and ſaid his. All the change King Henry the 8th. made in this, was, That the Pope and Cardinals names being left out, he was ordered to be mentioned with the addition of his Title of Supream Head, that the People hearing that oft repeated by their Prieſts, might be better perſwaded about it, but his other Titles were not mentioned. And this Order was now renewed. Only the Prayer for departed Souls was changed from what it had been. It was formerly in theſe words. "Ye ſhall pray for the Souls that be departed, abiding "the Mercy of Almighty God, that it may pleaſe him, the rather at the "contemplation of our Prayers, to grant them the Fruition of his Pre- "ſence; which did imply their being in a ſtate where they did not enjoy the Preſence of God; which was avoided by the more general words now preſcribed.

Collection. Number 8.

The Injunctions given the Biſhops directed them to that which, if followed carefully, would be the moſt effectual means of Reforming, at leaſt the next Age, if not that wherein they lived. For if Holy Orders were given to none, but to thoſe who are well qualified, and ſeem to be internally called by a Divine Vocation, the Church muſt ſoon put on a new face: whereas, when Orders are too eaſily given, upon the credit of emendicated Recommendations, or Titles, and after a ſlight trial of the knowledge of ſuch Candidates, without any exact ſcrutiny into their ſenſe of things, or into the diſpoſition of their minds; no wonder if by the means of Clergy-men ſo ordained, the Church loſe much in the eſteem and love of the People, who being poſſeſſed with prejudices againſt the whole Society for the faults which they ſee in particular Perſons, become an eaſie prey to ſuch as divide from it.

Thus

Thus were the Viſitors inſtructed, and ſent out to make their Circuits, in Auguſt, about the time that the Protector made his Expedition into Scotland. For the occaſion of it I ſhall refer the Reader to what is already ſaid in the former part of this Work. Before they engaged deeper in the War, Sir Francis Brian was ſent over to France, to congratulate the new King, and to ſee if he would confirm theſe Propoſitions that were agreed to during his Fathers life; and if he would pay the Penſion that was to be given yearly till Bulloigne was reſtored; and chiefly to obtain of him to be neutral in the War of Scotland: complaining of that Nation that had broken their Faith with England in the matter of the Marriage. To all which the French King anſwered, That for theſe Articles they mentioned he thought it diſhonourable for him to confirm them; and ſaid his Fathers Agent Poligny had no Warrant to yield to them, for by them the Engliſh were at liberty to fortifie what they had about Bulloigne, which he would never conſent to; That he was willing to pay what was agreed to by his Father, but would have firſt the conditions of the delivery of Bulloigne made more clear; As for the Scots, they were his perpetual Allies, whom he could not forſake if they were in any diſtreſs. And when it was preſſed on him, and his Ambaſſador at London, that Scotland was ſubject to the Crown of England, they had no regard to it. When the Council deſired the French Ambaſſador to look on the Records which they ſhould bring him for proving their Title: He excuſed himſelf; and ſaid his Maſter would not interpoſe in a Queſtion of that nature, nor would he look back to what was pretended to have done two or three hundred years ago; but was to take things as he found them; and that the Scots had Records likewiſe to prove their being a free Kingdom. So the Council ſaw they could not engage in the War with Scotland, without drawing on a War with France; which made them try their Intereſt with their friends this year to ſee if the Marriage could be obtained. But the Caſtle of St. Andrews was now loſt by the aſſiſtance that Leo Strozi brought from France. And though they in England continued to ſend Penſions to their Party, (for in May 1300 l. was ſent down by Henry Balnaves, and in June 125 l. was ſent to the Earl of Glencairn for an half years payment of his Penſion) yet they could gain no ground there; for the Scots now thought themſelves ſafer then formerly; the Crown of England being in the hands of a Child, and the Court of France being much governed by their Queen Dowagers Brothers. They gave way to the Borders to make In-rodes; of whom about two thouſand fell into the Weſtern Marches, and made great Depredations. The Scots in Ireland were alſo very ill Neighbours to the Engliſh there. There were many other Complaints of Pyracies at Sea, and of a Ship-Royal that robbed many Engliſh Ships; but how theſe came to be complained of, I do not ſee, for they were in open War, and I do not find any Truce had been made. The French Agent at London preſſed much that there might be a Treaty on the Borders before the Breach were made wider. But now the Protector had given Orders for raiſing an Army; ſo that he had no mind to loſe that Summer. Yet to let the French King ſee how careful they were of preſerving his Friendſhip, they appointed the Biſhop of Dureſme, and Sir Robert Bowes, to give the Scotch Commiſſioners a Meeting on the Borders the 4*th* of Auguſt: but with theſe ſecret Inſtructions, That if the Queſtions made, whether Scotland was a free Kingdom or Subject to England.

1547. the Scots would confirm the Marriage, all other things ſhould be preſently forgiven, and Peace be immediately made up; but if they were not empow'red in that particular, and offered only to treat about Reſtitutions, that then they ſhould immediately break off the Treaty. The Biſhop of Dureſme was alſo ordered to carry down with him the Exemplifications of many Records, to prove the Subjection of the Crown of Scotland to England: ſome of theſe are ſaid to have been under the Hands and Seals of their Kings, their Nobles, their Biſhops, Abbots, and Towns. He was alſo ordered to ſearch for all the Records that were lying at Dureſme, where many of them were kept, to be ready to be ſhewed to the Scots upon any occaſion that might require it. The meeting on the Borders came to a quick iſſue, for the Scottiſh Commiſſioners had no power to treat about the Marriage. But Tonſtall ſearching the Regiſters of his See, found many Writings of great conſequence to clear that Subjection, of which the Reader will ſee an account, in a Letter he writ to the Council, in the Collection of Papers. The moſt remarkable of theſe was, the Homage King William of Scotland made to Henry the Second, by which he granted, that all the Nobles of his Realm ſhould be his Subjects, and do Homage to him: and that all the Biſhops of Scotland ſhould be under the Arch biſhops of York: and that the King of England ſhould give all the Abbeys and Honours in Scotland, at the leaſt they ſhould not be given without his conſent, with many other things of the like nature. It was ſaid that the Monks in thoſe days, who generally kept the Records, were ſo accuſtomed to the forging of Stories and Writings, that little credit was to be given to ſuch Records as lay in their keeping. But having ſo faithfully acknowledged what was alledged againſt the freedom of Scotland, I may be allowed to ſet down a Proof on the other ſide, for my Native Country, copied from the original Writing yet extant under the Hands and Seals of many of the Nobility and Gentry of that Kingdom. It is a Letter to the Pope: and it was ordinary that of ſuch publick Letters there were Duplicates ſigned; the one of which was ſent, and the other laid up among the Records, of which I have met with ſeveral Inſtances. So that of this Letter the Copy which was reſerved being now in Noble Hands, was communicated to me, and is in the Collection. It was upon the Popes engaging with the King of England to aſſiſt him to ſubdue Scotland that they writ to him, and did aſſert moſt directly that their Kingdom was at all times free and independent. But now theſe Queſtions being waved, the other difference about the Marriage was brought to a ſharper deciſion.

Aug. 21. On the 21*ſt* of Auguſt the Protector took out a Commiſſion to be General, and to make War on Scotland: and did devolve his Power during his abſence on the Privy-Council; and appointed his Brother to be Lord-Lievtenant for the South, and the Earl of Warwick (whom he carried with him) Lord-Lievtenant for the North; and left a Commiſſion of Array to the Marqueſs of Northampton for Eſſex, Suffolk, and Norfolk; to the Earl of Arundel for Suſſex, Surrey, Hampſhire, and Wiltſhire; and to Sir Thomas Cheney for Kent. All this was in caſe of any Invaſion from France. Having thus ſettled Affairs during his abſence, he ſet out for Newcaſtle, having ordered his Troops to march thither before: and coming thither on the 27*th* of that Month, he ſaw his Army muſtered on the 28*th*, and marched forward to Scotland. The Lord Clinton commanded the Ships that ſailed on as the Army marched; which was done, that Proviſions and Ammunition might be brought by them from Newcaſtle or Berwick, if the Enemy ſhould at any time fall in behind their Army. He entred into Scotch Ground the ſecond of September, and advanced to the Paths the 5th, where the Paſſage being narrow and untoward, they looked for an Enemy to have diſputed it, but found none; the Scots having only broken the Ways, which in that dry ſeaſon ſignified not much, but to ſtop them ſome hours in their March. When they had paſſed theſe, ſome little Caſtles, Dunglas, Thornton, and Innerwick, having but a few ill provided Men in them, rendred to them. On the 9th they came to Falſide, where there was a long Fight in ſeveral Parties, in which there were 1300 of the Scots ſlain. And now they were in ſight of the Scotch Army, which was for numbers of Men one of the greateſt that they had ever brought together, conſiſting of 30000 Men: of which 10000 were commanded by the Governour, 8000 by the Earl of Angus, 8000 by the Earl of Huntley, and 4000 by the Earl of Argile, with a fair Train of Artillery, nine Braſs, and 21 Iron Guns. On the other ſide, the Engliſh Army conſiſted of about 15000 Foot, and 3000 Horſe, but all well appointed. The Scots were now heated with the old National Quarrel to England. It was given out that the Protector was come with his Army to carry away their Queen, and to enſlave the Kingdom. And for the encouraging of the Army it was alſo ſaid, that 12 Gallies and 50 Ships were on the Sea from France, and that they looked for them every day. 1547. Sept. 2. 5. Sept. 9.

The Protector finding an Army brought together ſo ſoon, and ſo much greater than he expected, began to be in ſome apprehenſion, and therefore he writ to the Scots to this effect, That they ſhould remember they were both Chriſtians, and ſo ſhould be tender of the effuſion of ſo much Blood; that this War was not made with any deſign, but for a perpetual Peace, by the Marriage of their two Princes which they had already agreed, and given their publick Faith upon it; and that the Scots were to be much more gainers by it than the Engliſh: The Iſland ſeemed made for one Empire; It was pitty it ſhould be more diſtracted with ſuch Wars, when there was ſo fair and juſt a way offered for uniting it: and it was much better for them to marry their Queen to a Prince of the ſame Language, and on the ſame Continent, than to a Forreigner: but if they would not agree to that, he offered that their Queen ſhould be bred up among them, and not at all contracted, neither to the French, nor to any other Forreigner, till ſhe came of Age, that by the conſent of the Eſtates ſhe might chooſe a Husband for her ſelf. If they would agree to this, he would immediately return with his Army out of Scotland, and make ſatisfaction for the damages the Country had ſuffered by the Invaſion. This Propoſition ſeems to juſtifie what the Scotch Writers ſay, though none of the Engliſh mention it, That the Protector, what for want of Proviſions, and what from the apprehenſions he had of ſo numerous an Army of the Scots, was in great ſtraits, and intended to have returned back to England, without hazarding an Engagement. But the Scots thought they were ſo much ſuperior to the Engliſh, and that they had them now at ſuch a diſadvantage, that they reſolved to fall upon them next day. And that the fair offers made by the Protector might not raiſe diviſion among them, The Protectors Offers to the Scots, 1547. Rejected by them. the Governour having communicated theſe to a few whom he truſted, was by their advice perſwaded to ſuppreſs them; but he ſent a Trumpeter to the Engliſh Army with an Offer to ſuffer them to return without falling upon them: which the Protector had reaſon to reject, knowing that ſo mean an Action in the beginning of his Adminiſtation, would have quite ruined his Reputation. But to this, another that came with the Trumpeter added a Meſſage from the Earl of Huntley, That the Protector and he with ten or twenty of a ſide, or ſingly, ſhould decide the Quarrel by their Perſonal Valour. The Protector ſaid, This was no private Quarrel, and the Truſt he was in obliged him not to expoſe himſelf in ſuch a way: and therefore he was to fight no other way but at the Head of his Army. But the Earl of Warwick offered to accept the Challenge. The Earl of Huntly ſent no ſuch Challenge, as he afterwards purged himſelf when he heard of it. For as it was unreaſonable for him to expect the Protector ſhould have anſwered it, ſo it had been an affronting the Governour of Scotland to have taken it off of his hands, ſince he was the only Perſon that might have challenged the Protector on equal terms. The truth of the matter was, a Gentleman that went along with the Trumpeter, made him do it without Warrant, fancying the Anſwer to it would have taken up ſome time, in which he might have viewed the Enemies Camp.

Sept. 10. The Battle of Pinkey near Muſſelburgh. On the 10*th* of September the two Armies drew out, and fought in the Field of Pinkey near Muſſelburgh. The Engliſh had the advantage of the Ground. And in the beginning of the Action, a Cannon Ball from one of the Engliſh Ships killed the Lord Grames eldeſt Son, and 25 Men more; which put the Earl of Argiles Highlanders into ſuch a fright, that they could not be held in order. But after a Charge given by the Earl of Angus, in which the Engliſh loſt ſome few Men, the Scots gave ground; and the Engliſh obſerving that, and breaking in furiouſly upon them, the Scots threw down their Arms and fled: The Engliſh purſued hard, and

A great defeat given the Scots. ſlew them without mercy. There were reckoned to be killed about 14000 and 1500 taken Priſoners, among whom was the Earl of Huntley, and 500 Gentlemen; and all the Artillery was taken. This loſs quite diſheartned the Scots, ſo that they all retired to Strivling, and left the whole Countrey to the Protectors mercy. Who the next day went and took Lieth, and the Souldiers in the Ships burnt ſome of the Sea-Towns of Fife, and re-took ſome Engliſh Ships that had been taken by the Scots, and burnt the reſt. Thy alſo put a Garriſon in the Iſle of St. Columba in the Frith of about 200 Souldiers, and left two Ships to wait on them. He alſo ſent the Earl of Warwick's Brother, Sir Ambroſe Dudley, to take Broughty, a Caſtle in the Mount of Tay; in which he put 200 Souldiers. He waſted Edenburgh, and uncovered the Abbey of Holyrood-houſe, and carried away the Lead and the Bells belonging to it. But he neither took the Caſtle of Edenburgh, nor did he go on to Strivling where the Queen with the ſtraglers of the Army lay. And it was thought, that in the conſternation wherein the late defeat had put them, every Place would have yielded to him. But he had ſome private reaſons that preſſed his return, and made him let go the advantages that were now in his hands, and ſo gave the Scots time to bring Succours out of France; wheres he might eaſily have made an end of the War now at once, if he had followed his ſucceſs vigorouſly. The Earl of Warwick, who had a great ſhare in the Honour of the Victory, but knew that the errors in conduct would much diminish the Protectors glory, which had been otherwise raised to an unmeasurable height, was not displeased at it. So on the 18*th.* of September the Protector drew his Army back into England, and having received a Message from the Queen and the Governour of Scotland offering a Treaty, he ordered them to send Commissioners to Berwick to treat with those he should appoint. As he returned through the Merch, and Teviotdale, all the chief Men in these Counties came in to him, and took an Oath to King Edward, the Form whereof will be found in the Collection, and delivered into his hands all the Places of strength in their Counties. He left a Garrison of 200 in Home Castle, under the Command of Sir Edw. Dudley; and fortified Roxburgh, where, for encouraging the rest, he wrought two hours with his own hands, and put 300 Souldiers and 200 Pioneers into it, giving Sir Ralph Bulmer the Command. At the same time the Earl of Lennox and the Lord Wharton made an in-road by the West Marches; but with little effect. 1547. Sept. 18. Collection Number 11.

Honour

On the 29*th* of September the Protector returned into England full of Honour, having in all that expedition lost not above 60 Men, as one that then writ the account of it says: The Scotch Writers say he lost between 2 and 300. He had taken 80 Pieces of Canon, and bridled the two chief Rivers of the Kingdom by the Garrisons he left in them; and had left many Garrisons in the strong Places on the Frontier. And now it may be easily imagined how much this raised his reputation in England; since Men commonly make Auguries of the Fortune of their Rulers, from the Successes of the first Designs they undertake. So now they remembred what he had done formerly in Scotland; and how he had in France with 7000 Men, raised the French Army of 20000 that was set down before Bulloigne, and had forced them to leave their Ordnance, Baggage, and Tents, with the loss of one Man only in the year 1544, and that next year he had fallen into Picardy, and built New-haven with two other Forts there. So that they all expected great success under his Government. And indeed if the breach between his Brother and him, with some other errors, had not lost him the advantages he now had, this prosperous Action had laid the foundation of great Fortunes to him. Sept. 29. The Protector returned to England.

He left the Earl of Warwick to treat with those that should be sent from Scotland. But none came; for that Proposition had been made only to gain time. The Queen Mother there, was not ill pleased to see the interest of the Governour so much impaired by that misfortune, and perswaded the chief Men of that Kingdom to cast themselves wholly into the Arms of France, and to offer their young Queen to the Dolphin, and to think of no Treaty with the English. So the Earl of Warwick returned to London, having no small share in the Honour of this Expedition. He was Son to that Dudley, who was attainted and executed the first year of King Henry the 8*th*'s Reign. But whether it was that the King afterwards repented of his severity to the Father, or that he was taken with the qualities of the Son, he raised him by many degrees to be Admiral and Viscount Lisle. He had defended Bulloigne, when it was in no good condition, against the Dolphin, whose Army was believed 50000 strong; and when the French had carried the Basletown, he recovered it, and killed 800 of their Men: The Year after that, being in 1547. Command at Sea, he offered the French Fleet Battel; which they declining, he made a deſcent upon Normandy with 5000 Men, and having burnt, and ſpoiled, a great deal, he returned to his Ships with the loſs only of one Man. And he ſhewed he was as fit for a Court as a Camp; For being ſent over to the French Court upon the Peace, he appeared there with much Splendour, and came off with great Honour. He was indeed a Man of great Parts, had not inſatiable ambition with profound diſſimulation ſtained his other Noble Qualities.

The Protector at his return was adviſed preſently to meet the Parliament, (for which the Writs had been ſent out before he went into Scotland) now that he was ſo covered with Glory, to get himſelf eſtabliſhed in his Authority, and to do thoſe other things which required a Seſſion. He found the Viſitors had performed their Viſitation, and all had given obedience. And thoſe who expounded the ſecret Providences of God with an Eye to their own opinions, took great notice of this; that on the ſame day in which the Viſitors removed, and deſtroyed, moſt of the Images in London, their Armies were ſo ſucceſful in Scotland in Pinkey Field. It is too common to all Men to magnifie ſuch Events much, when they make for them; but if they are againſt them, they turn it off by this, That Gods Ways are paſt finding out. So partially do men argue where they are once engaged. Bonner and Gardiner had ſhewed ſome diſlike of the Injunctions. Bonner received them with a Proteſtation that he would obſerve them, if they were not contrary to Gods Law and the Ordinances of the Church. Upon which Sir Anthony Cook, and the other Viſitors, complained to the Council. So Bonner was ſent for where he offered a ſubmiſſion, but full of vain Quiddities, (ſo it is expreſſed in the Council-Book,) But they not accepting of that, he made ſuch a full one as they deſired, which is in the Collection. Yet for giving terror to others he was ſent to lie for ſome time in the Priſon called the Fleet. Gardiner ſeeing the Homilies, was alſo reſolved to proteſt againſt them. Sir John Godſave, who was one of the Viſitors, wrote to him not to ruine himſelf, nor loſe his Biſhoprick by ſuch an Action. To whom he wrote a Letter, that has more of a Chriſtian, and of a Biſhop in it, than any thing I ever ſaw of his. He expreſſes in handſom terms a great contempt of the World, and a reſolution to ſuffer any thing rather than depart from his Conſcience. Beſides that, (as he ſaid) the things being againſt Law, he would not deliver up the Liberties of his Country, but would petition againſt them. This Letter will be found in the Collection, for I am reſolved to ſuppreſs nothing of conſequence on what ſide ſoever it may be. On the 25*th* of September it being informed to the Council, that Gardiner had written to ſome of that Board, and had ſpoken to others, many things in prejudice and contempt of the Kings Viſitation; and that he intended to refuſe to ſet forth the Homilies and Injunctions; he was ſent for to the Council. Where being examined, he ſaid, he thought they were contrary to the Word of God, and that his Conſcience would not ſuffer him to obſerve them. He excepted to one of the Homilies that it did exclude Charity from juſtifying Men, as well as Faith. This he ſaid was contrary to the Book ſet out in the late Kings time, which was afterwards confirmed in Parliament in the Year 1542. He ſaid further, that he could never ſee one place of Scripture nor any ancient Doctor that favoured it. He alſo ſaid Eraſmus's Paraphraſe was bad enough in in Latin, but much worſe in Engliſh, for the Tranſlator had oft out of ignorance, and oft out of deſign, miſrendred him palpably, and was one that neither underſtood Latine nor Engliſh well. He offered to go to Oxford to diſpute about Juſtification with any they ſhould ſend him to, or to enter in conference with any that would undertake his Inſtruction in Town. But this did not ſatisfie the Council. So they preſſed him to declare what he intended to do when the Viſitors ſhould be with him. He ſaid, he did not know; he ſhould further ſtudy theſe Points, for it would be three weeks before they could be with him; and he was ſure he would ſay no worſe than that he ſhould obey them as far as could conſiſt with Gods Law and the Kings. The Council urged him to promiſe that he would without any limitation ſet forth the Homilies and the Injunctions, which he refuſing to do, was ſent to the Fleet. Some days after that Cranmer went to ſee the Dean of St. Paul, having the Biſhops of Lincoln and Rocheſter with Dr. Cox and ſome others with him. He ſent for Gardiner thither, and entred into diſcourſe with him about that Paſſage in the Homily, excluding Charity out of our Juſtification: and urged thoſe Places of St. Paul, That we are juſtified by Faith without the Works of the Law: He ſaid his deſign in that Paſſage was only to draw Men from truſting in any thing they did: and to teach them to truſt only to Chriſt. But Gardiner had a very different Notion of Juſtification. For as he ſaid, Infants were juſtified by Baptiſme, and Penitents by the Sacrament of Penance: and that the Conditions of the juſtifying of thoſe of Age were Charity as well as Faith, as the three Eſtates make a Law all joyned together: for by this Simile he ſet it out in the report he writ of that Diſcourſe to the Lord Protector, reckoning the King one of the three Eſtates, (a way of Speech very ſtrange, eſpecially in a Biſhop, and a Lawyer.) For Eraſmus it was ſaid, that though there were faults, in his Paraphraſe, as no Book beſides the Scriptures is without faults, yet it was the beſt for that uſe they could find: and they did chooſe rather to ſet out what ſo learned a Man had written, than to make a new one which might give occaſion to more Objections; and he was the moſt indifferent Writer they knew. Afterwards Cranmer knowing what was likely to work moſt on him, let fall ſome words (as Gardiner writ to the Protector) of bringing him into the Privy-Council, if he would concur in what they were carrying on. But that not having its ordinary effect on him, he was carried back to the Fleet. 1547.

There were alſo many complaints brought by ſome Clergy-men, of ſuch as had uſed them ill for their obeying the Kings Injunctions, and for removing Images. Many were upon their ſubmiſſion ſent away with a ſevere rebuke; others that offended more hainouſly were put in the Fleet for ſome time, and afterwards giving Bond for their good behaviour were diſcharged. But upon the Protectors return, the Biſhop of Wincheſter writ him a long Letter in his own vindication. "He complained "of the Viſitors proceeding in his abſence in ſo great a matter. He ſaid "the Injunctions were contrary to themſelves, for they appointed the "Homilies to be read, and Eraſmus's Paraphraſe to be put in all Churches: ſo he ſelected many paſſages out of theſe, that were contrary to "one another. He alſo gathered many things out of Eraſmus's Paraphraſe that were contrary to the Power of Princes, and ſeveral other "cenſurable things in that Work, which Eraſmus wrote, when he was

But he concluded his Letter with a diſcourſe of the extent of the King and Councils " Power, which is all I tranſcribed of it, being very long, and full of " things of no great conſequence. He queſtions how far the King could " command againſt Common or Statute Law: of which himſelf had " many occaſions to be well informed. Cardinal Wolſey had obtained " his Legatine Power at the Kings deſire, but notwithſtanding that, he " was brought into a Præmunire: and the Lawyers upon that Argument " cited many Precedents of Judges that were fined when they tranſgreſſed the Laws, though commanded by Warrants from the King; and Earl " Typteſt, who was Chancellor, loſt his Head for acting upon the Kings " Warrant againſt Law. In the late Kings time the Judges would not let " Fines on the breakers of the Kings Proclamations, when they were " contrary to Law, till the Act concerning them was paſſed, about " which there were many hot words when it was debated. He mentions " a Diſcourſe that paſſed between him and the Lord Audley in the Parliament concerning the Kings Supremacy. Audley bid him look the Act " of Supremacy, and he would ſee the Kings doings were reſtrained to " Spiritual Juriſdiction: and by another Act no Spiritual Law could take " place againſt the Common Law or an Act of Parliament: otherwiſe " the Biſhops would ſtrike in with the King, and by means of the Supremacy would order the Law as they pleaſed: but we will provide, ſaid " he, that the Præmunire ſhall never go off of your backs. In ſome late " Caſes he heard the Judges declare what the King might do againſt an " Act of Parliament, and what danger they were in that medled in ſuch " matters. Theſe things being ſo freſh in his memory he thought he might " write what he did to the Lords of Council. But by this it appears, that no ſort of Men is ſo much for the Kings Prerogative, but when it becomes in any inſtance uneaſie to them, they will ſhelter themſelves under the Law. He continued afterwards by many Letters to the Protector to complain of his ill uſage: " That he had been then ſeven weeks in the " Fleet without Servants, a Chaplain, or a Phyſician: that though he " had his Writ of Summons, he was not ſuffered to come to the Parliament, which might be a ground afterwards of queſtioning their Pro- " ceedings: He adviſed the Protector not to make himſelf a Party in " theſe matters, and uſed all the inſinuations of decent flattery that he " could invent, with many ſharp reflections on Cranmer, and ſtood much on " the force of Laws, that they could not be repealed by the Kings Will. " Concerning which he mentions a Paſſage that fell out between Cromwel " and himſelf before the late King. Cromwel ſaid, That the King might " make or repeal Laws as the Roman Emperors did, and asked his opinion " about it, whether the Kings Will was not a Law? To which he an- " ſwered facetiouſly, That he thought it was much better for the King to " make the Law his Will, than to make his Will a Law. But notwithſtanding all his Letters, (which are printed in the ſecond Volume of Acts and Monum. Edit. 1641.) yet he continued a Priſoner till the Parliament was over, and then by the Act of Pardon he was ſet at liberty. This was much cenſured as an invaſion of Liberty; and it was ſaid theſe at Court durſt not ſuffer him to come to the Houſe, leſt he had confounded them in all they did. that were to be read to the People, was thought a needleſs ſubtilty. But the former abuſes of truſting to the Acts of Charity that Men did, by which they fancied they bought Heaven, made Cranmer judge it neceſſary to expreſs the matter ſo nicely; though the expounding thoſe Places of St. Paul, was, as many thought, rather according to the ſtrain of the Germans, than to the meaning of theſe Epiſtles. And upon the whole matter, they knew Gardiners haughty temper, and that it was neceſſary to mortifie him a little, though the pretence on which they did it ſeemed too ſlight for ſuch ſeverities. But it is ordinary, when a thing is once reſolved on, to make uſe of the firſt occaſion that offers for effecting it. 1547.

The Party that oppoſed the Reformation, finding theſe attempts ſo unſucceſful, engaged the Lady Mary to appear for them. She therefore wrote to the Protector, that ſhe thought all changes of Religion till the King came to be of Age, were very much contrary to the reſpect they owed the memory of her Father, if they went about to ſhake what he had ſetled; and againſt their duty to their young Maſter, to hazard the Peace of his Kingdom, and engage his Authority in ſuch Points before he was capable of judging them. I gather this to have been the ſubſtance of her Letter, from the Anſwer which the Protector wrote, which is in the Collection. In it he wrote, "That he believed her Letter flowed not "immediately from her ſelf, but from the inſtigation of ſome malicious "Perſons. He proteſts they had no other deſign, but the Glory of "God, and the Honour and ſafety of the King; and that what they done "was ſo well conſidered, that all good Subjects ought rather to re"joyce at it than find fault with it. And whereas ſhe had ſaid, That "her Father had brought Religion to a godly order and quietneſs, to "which both Spiritualty and Temporalty did without compulſion give "their aſſent; he remembers her what oppoſition the ſtiff-necked Papiſts "gave him; and what Rebellions they raiſed againſt him; which he won"ders how ſhe came ſo ſoon to forget: Adding, that death had prevent"ed him before he had finiſhed theſe Godly Orders which he had deſign"ed; and that no kind of Religion was perfected at his death, but all "was left ſo uncertain, that it muſt inevitably bring on great diſorders, if "God did not help them; and that himſelf and many others could wit"neſs what regret their late Maſter had, when he ſaw he muſt die before "he had finiſhed what he intended. He wondred that ſhe, who had "been well bred, and was learned, ſhould eſteem true Religion, and the "knowledge of the Scriptures, Newfangledneſs, or Fantaſie. He deſired "ſhe would turn the Leaf, and look on the other ſide, and would with "an humble Spirit, and by the aſſiſtance of the Grace of God, conſider "the matter better.

The Protector writ to her. Collection Numb. 15.

Thus things went on, till the Parliament met, which was ſummoned to meet the forth of November. The day before it met, the Protector gave to publick an inſtance how much his proſperous ſucceſs had lifted him up. For by a Patent under the Great Seal, he was warranted to ſit in Parliament on the Right Hand of the Throne under the Cloath of State; and was to have all the Honours and Priviledges that at any time any of the Uncles of the Kings of England, whether by the Fathers or Mothers ſide had enjoyed; with a Non obſtante to the Statute of Precedence. The Lord Rich had been made Lord Chancellor on the 24*th.* of October; but whether the Protector, or he, opened the Parliament by

It was read the ſecond time on the 12*th*, and the third time on the 16*th* day. On the 19*th* ſome Proviſoes were added to it, and it was ſent down to the Commons, who ſent it up the 23*d* of December, to which the Royal Aſſent was given. The Commons had formed a new Bill for repealing theſe Stututes, which upon ſome Conferences they were willing to let fall; only ſome Proviſoes were added to the old one; upon which, the Biſhops of London, Dureſme, Ely, Hereford, and Chicheſter, diſſented. The Preamble of it ſets forth, "That nothing made a Government happier than when the Prince governed with much clemency, and "the Subjects obeyed out of love. Yet the late King and ſome of his "Progenitors, being provoked by the unrulineſs of ſome of their Peo- "ple, had made ſevere Laws; but they judging it neceſſary now to re- "commend the Kings Government to the affections of the People, re- "pealed all Laws that made any thing to be Treaſon, but what was in the "Act of 25 Edw. the 3*d*, as alſo two of the Statutes about Lollardies, "together with the Act of the ſix Articles, and the other Acts that fol- "lowed in explanation of that. All Acts in King Henry the 8*th*'s time "declaring any thing to be Felony that was not ſo declared before, were "alſo repealed, together with the Acts that made the King's Proclamations "of equal authority with Acts of Parliament. It was alſo Enacted, "That all who denied the Kings Supremacy, or aſſerted the Popes, in "words, ſhould for the firſt offence forfeit their Goods and Chattels, and "ſuffer Impriſonment during pleaſure; For the ſecond offence ſhould in- "cur the pain of Præmunire; and for the third offence be attainted of "Treaſon. But if any did in Writing, Printing, or by any overt Act or "Deed, endeavour to deprive the King of his Eſtate, or Titles, parti- "cularly of his Supremacy; or to conſer them on any other, after the "firſt of March next, he was to be adjudged guilty of High Treaſon: "and if any of the Heirs of the Crown ſhould uſurp upon another, or "did endeavour to break the Succeſſion of the Crown, it was declared "high Treaſon, in them, their Aiders and Abettors. And all were to enjoy "the benefit of Clergy, and the Priviledge of Sanctuary, as they had it "before King Henry the 8*th*'s Reign; excepting only ſuch as were guil- "ty of Murder, Poiſoning, Burglary, Robbing on the High-way, the "ſtealing of Cattel, or ſtealing out of Churches or Chappels. Poiſoners "were to ſuffer as other Murtherers. None were to be accuſed of Words, "but within a Month after they were ſpoken. And thoſe who called the "French King by the Title of King of France, were not to be eſteemed "guilty of the Pains of Tranſlating the Kings Authority, or Titles, on "any other. This Act was occaſioned by a Speech that Arch-biſhop Cranmer had in Convocation, in which he exhorted the Clergy to give themſelves much to the ſtudy of the Scripture, and to conſider ſeriouſly what things were in the Church that needed Reformation, that ſo they might throw out all the Popiſh traſh, that was not yet caſt out. Upon this ſome intimated to him, that as long as the ſix Articles ſtood in force, it was not ſafe for them to deliver their Opinions. This he reported to the Council, upon which they ordered this Act of Repeal. By it the Subjects were delivered from many fears they were under, and had good hopes of a mild Government, when in ſtead of procuring new ſevere Laws,

Law, the old ones were let fall. The Council did alſo free the Nation of the jealouſies they might have of them by ſuch an abridgment of their own Power. But others judged it had been more for the intereſt of the Government, to have kept up theſe Laws ſtill in force, but to have reſtrained the execution of them. This Repeal drew on another, which was ſent from the Commons on the 20*th.* of December, and was agreed to by the Lords on the 21*ſt.* It was of an Act in the 28*th.* year of the laſt King, by which all Laws made while his Son was under 24 years of Age, might be by his Letters Patents, after he attained that Age, annulled as if they had never been. Which they altered thus, That the King, after that Age, might by his Letters Patents void any Act of Parliament for the future; but could not ſo void it from the beginning, as to annul all things done upon it between the making and annulling of it, which were ſtill to be lawful Deeds. 1547.

Act about the Communion.

The next Bill of a publick nature was concerning the Sacrament. Which was brought in, and read the firſt time, on the 12*th.* of Novemb. the ſecond time on the 15*th*, and was twice read on the 17*th.* And on the 24*th.* a Bill was brought in for the Communion to be received in both kinds; on the third of December it was read the ſecond time, and given to the Protector; on the 5*th.* read again, and given to two Judges; on the 7*th.* it was read again, and joyned to the other Bill about the Sacrament. And on the 10*th.* the whole Bill was agreed to by all the Peers, except the Biſhops of London, Hereford, Norwich, Worceſter, and Chicheſter, and ſent down to the Commons. On the 17*th.* a Proviſo was ſent after it, but was rejected by the Commons, ſince the Lords had not agreed to it. On the 20*th.* it was ſent up agreed to, and had afterwards the Royal Aſſent. "By it, firſt, the value of the Holy Sacrament, commonly called "the Sacrament of the Altar, and in the Scripture the Supper and Table of "the Lord, was ſet forth; together with its firſt Inſtitution; but it having "been of late marvellouſly abuſed, ſome had been thereby brought to a "contempt of it, which they had expreſſed in Sermons, Diſcourſes, and "Songs, (in words not fit to be repeated;) therefore whoſoever ſhould "ſo offend after the firſt of May next was to ſuffer Fine and Impriſon-"ment at the Kings Pleaſure; and the Juſtices of the Peace were to take "Information, and make Preſentments of Perſons ſo offending within "three Months after the offences ſo committed, allowing them Witneſ-"ſes for their own purgation. And it being more agreeable to Chriſts firſt "Inſtitution, and the practice of the Church for 500 years after Chriſt, "that the Sacrament ſhould be given in both the kinds of Bread and "Wine, rather than in one kind only; Therefore it was Enacted, That it "ſhould be commonly given in both kinds, except neceſſity did otherwiſe "require it. And it being alſo more agreeable to the firſt Inſtitution, and "the primitive Practice, that the People ſhould receive with the Prieſt, "than that the Prieſt ſhould receive it alone; therefore the day before "every Sacrament, an Exhortation was to be made to the People, to "prepare themſelves for it, in which the benefits and danger of worthy "and unworthy receiving were to be expreſſed, and the Prieſts were "not without a lawful cauſe to deny it to any who humbly askt "it.

Communion appointed in both kinds.

This was an Act of great conſequence, ſince it reformed two abuſes that had crept into the Church. The one was the denying the Cup to 1547. the Laity, the other was the Prieſts communicating alone. In the firſt Inſtitution it is plain, that as Chriſt had all drink of the Cup, and his Diſciples all drank of it, ſo St. Paul directed every one to examine himſelf, that he might eat of that Bread and drink of that Cup. From thence the Church for many Ages continued this practice: and the Superſtition of ſome who received only in one kind was ſeverely cenſured, and ſuch were appointed either to receive the whole Sacrament or to abſtain wholly. It continued thus till the belief of the Corporal Preſence of Chriſt was ſet up; and then the keeping and carrying about the Cup in Proceſſions, not being ſo eaſily done, ſome began to lay it aſide. For a great while the Bread was given dipt in the Cup, to repreſent a bleeding Chriſt, as it is in the Greek Church to this day. In other Places the Laity had the Cup given them, but they were to ſuck it through Pipes that nothing of it ſhould fall to the ground. But ſince they believed that Chriſt was in every crumb of Bread, it was thought needleſs to give the Sacrament in both kinds: So in the Council of Conſtance the Cup was ordered to be denied the Laity, though they acknowledged it to have been inſtituted and practiſed otherwiſe. To this the Bohemians would never ſubmit; though to compel them to it much Blood was ſhed in this Quarrel. And now in the Reformation this was every where one of the firſt things with which the People were poſſeſſed, the oppoſition of the Roman Church herein to the Inſtitution of Chriſt being ſo manifeſt.

And all private Maſſes put down.

At firſt this Sacrament was alſo underſtood to be a Communion of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, of which many were to be partakers: while the fervor of devotion laſted, it was thought a ſcandalous and cenſurable thing if any had come unto the Chriſtian Aſſemblies, and had not ſtayed to receive theſe Holy Myſteries: and the denying to give any one the Sacrament was accounted a very great puniſhment. So ſenſible were the Chriſtians of their ill condition when they were hindred to participate of it. But afterwards the former Devotion ſlackening, the good Biſhops in the 4th and 5th Centuries complained oft of it, that ſo few came to receive: yet the Cuſtom being to make Oblations before the Sacrament, out of which the Clergy had been maintained during the poverty of the Church, the Prieſts had a great mind to keep up the conſtant uſe of theſe Oblations; and ſo perſwaded the Laity to continue them, and to come to the Sacrament, though they did not receive it: and in proceſs of time they were made to believe that the Prieſt received in behalf of the whole People. And whereas this Sacrament was the Commemoration of Chriſts Sacrifice on the Croſs, and ſo by a Phraſe of Speech was called a Sacrifice, they came afterwards to fancy that the Prieſts conſecrating and conſuming the Sacrament was an Action of it ſelf expiatory, and that both for the Dead and the Living. And there roſe an infinite number of ſeveral ſorts of Maſſes; ſome were for commemorating the Saints, and thoſe were called the Maſſes of ſuch Saints; others for a particular bleſſing, for Rain, Health, &c. and indeed for all the accidents of Humane Life, where the addition or variation of a Collect made the difference: So that all that Trade of Maſſing was now removed. An Intimation was alſo made of Exhortations to be read in it, which they intended next to ſet about. Theſe abuſes in the Maſs gave great advantages to thoſe who intended to change it into a Communion. But many in ſtead of managing them prudently, made unſeemly Jeſts about about them: and were carried by a lightneſs of temper to make Songs, and Plays, of the Maſs: for now the Preſs went quick, and many Books were printed this year about matters of Religion; the greateſt number of them being concerning the Maſs; which were not written in ſo decent and grave a ſtyle as the matter required. Againſt this Act only five Biſhops proteſted. Many of that Order were abſent from the Parliament, ſo the oppoſition made to it was not conſiderable. 1547.

An Act about the Admiſſion of Biſhops.

The next Bill brought into the Houſe of Lords, was concerning the admiſſion of Biſhops to their Sees by the Kings Letters Patents. Which being read, was committed to the Arch-biſhop of Canterburies care on the fifth of November, and was read the ſecond time on the 10*th*, and committed to ſome of the Judges, and was read the third time on the 28*th*. of November, and ſent down to the Commons on the 5*th*. of December. There was alſo another Bill brought in, concerning the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in the Biſhops Courts, on the 17*th*. of November, and paſs'd, and ſent down on the 13*th*. of December. But both theſe Bills were put in one, and ſent up by the Commons on the 20*th*. of that Month, and aſſented to by the King. By this Act it was ſet forth, "That the way of "chooſing Biſhops by Conge d'Eſlire was tedious and expenceful, that "there was only a ſhadow of Election in it, and that therefore Biſhops "ſhould thereafter be made by the Kings Letters Patents, upon which "they were to be conſecrated: And whereas the Biſhops did exerciſe "their Authority, and carry on Proceſſes, in their own Names, as they "were wont to do in the time of Popery; and ſince all Juriſdiction "both Spiritual and Temporal was derived from the King, that therefore "their Courts and all Proceſſes ſhould be from henceforth carried on in "the Kings Name, and be ſealed by the Kings Seal, as it was in the other "Courts of Common-Law, after the firſt of July next; excepting only "the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury's Courts, and all Collations, Preſen-"tations, or Letters of Orders, which were to paſs under the Biſhops "proper Seals as formerly. Upon this Act great advantages were taken to diſparage the Reformation, as ſubjecting the Biſhops wholly to the pleaſure of the Court.

The ancient ways of electing Biſhops.

At firſt, Biſhops were choſen and ordained by the other Biſhops in the Countries where they lived. The Apoſtles, by that Spirit of diſcerning, which was one of the extraordinary gifts they were endued with, did ordain the firſt Fruits of their Labours; and never left the Election of Paſtors to the diſcretion of the People: Indeed when they were to ordain Deacons, who were to be truſted with the diſtribution of the publick Alms, they appointed ſuch as the People made choice of; but when St. Paul gave directions to Timothy and Titus about the choice of Paſtors, all that depended on the People by them was that they ſhould be blameleſs and of good report. But afterwards, the poverty of the Church being ſuch, that Church-men lived only by the free bounty of the People, it was neceſſary to conſider them much; ſo that in many Places the choice began among the People; and in all Places it was done by their approbation and good liking. But great diſorders followed upon this, as ſoon as by the Emperors turning Chriſtians, the Wealth of Church-benefices made the Paſtoral Charge more deſirable: and the vaſt numbers of thoſe who turned Chriſtians with the Tide, brought in great Multitudes to have their Votes in theſe Elections. The inconvenience of this was felt 1547. early in Phrygia, where the Council of Laodicea made a Canon againſt theſe Popular Elections. Yet in other parts of Aſia, and at Rome, there were great and often Conteſts about it. In ſome of theſe many Men were killed. In many Places the inferior Clergy choſe their Biſhops. But in moſt Places the Biſhops of the Province made the choice, yet ſo as to obtain the conſent of the Clergy and People. The Emperors by their Laws made it neceſſary that it ſhould be confirmed by the Metropolitans: They reſerved the Elections of the great Sees to themſelves, or at leaſt the Confirmation of them. Thus it continued till Charles the Great's time. But then the nature of Church-employments came to be much altered. For though the Church had Predial Lands with the other Rights that belonged to them by the Roman Law, yet he firſt gave Biſhops and Abbots great Territories, with ſome branches of Royal Juriſdiction in them, who held theſe Lands of him, according to the Fewdal Laws. This, as it carried Church-men off from the humility and abſtraction from the World which became their Function, ſo it ſubjected them much to the Humours and Intereſts of thoſe Princes on whom they had their dependance. The Popes, who had made themſelves Heads of the Hierarchy, could not but be glad to ſee Church-men grow rich and powerful in the World; but they were not ſo well pleaſed to ſee them made ſo much the more dependent on their Princes: and no doubt by ſome of thoſe Princes that were thus become Patrons of Churches, the Biſhopricks were either given for Money, or charged with reſerved Penſions. Upon this the Popes filled the World with the complaints of Simony, and of enſlaving Church-men to court Intereſts; and ſo would not ſuffer them to accept of Inveſtitures from their Princes; but ſet up for free Elections, as they called them, which they ſaid were to be confirmed by the See-Apoſtolick. So the Canons Secular or Regular in Cathedral Churches were to chooſe the Biſhops, and their Election was to be confirmed at Rome: yet Princes in moſt Places got ſome hold of thoſe Elections, ſo that ſtill they went as they had a mind they ſhould. Which was oft complained of as a great ſlavery on the Church; and would have been more univerſally condemned, if the World had not been convinced that the matter would not be much the better, if there ſhould have been ſet up either the Popular or Synodical Elections, in which Faction was like to ſway all. King Henry had continued the old way of the Elections by the Clergy, but ſo, as that it ſeemed to be little more than a mockery; but now it was thought a more ingenuous way of proceeding, to have the thing done directly by the King, rather than under the thin covert of an involuntary Election.

For the other Branch about Eccleſiaſtical Courts, The Cauſes before them concerning Wills and Marriages, being matters of a mixed nature, and which only belong to theſe by the Laws of the Land, and being no parts of the Sacred Functions; it was thought no Invaſion of the Sacred Offices to have theſe tried in the Kings Name. But the Collation of Benefices, and giving of Orders, which are the chief parts of the Epiſcopal Function, were to be performed ſtill by the Biſhops in their own Names. Only Excommunication, by a fatal neglect, continued to be the puniſhment for contempts of theſe Courts; which belonging only to the Spiritual Cogniſance, ought to have been reſerved for the Biſhop with the aſſiſtance of his Clergy. But the Canoniſts had ſo confounded all the Ancient Rules about the Government of the Church, that the Reformers being called away by Conſiderations that were more obvious and preſſing, there was not that care taken in this that the thing required. And theſe errors or overſights in the firſt concoction have by a continuance grown ſince into ſo formed a ſtrength, that it is eaſier to ſee what is amiſs, than to know how to rectifie it. 1547.

On the 29*th.* of November the Bill againſt Vagabonds was brought in. By this it was Enacted, "That all that ſhould any where loiter without "work, or without offering themſelves to work, three days together; or "that ſhould run away from work, and reſolve to live idly, ſhould be ſeized "on, and whoſoever ſhould preſent them to a Juſtice of Peace, was to have "them adjudged to be his Slaves for two years; and they were to be mark-"ed with the Letter V. imprinted with a hot Iron on their Breaſt. A great many Proviſoes follow concerning Clerks ſo convict, which ſhew that this Act was chiefly levelled at the idle Monks and Friars, who went about the Country, and would betake themſelves to no employment; but finding the People apt to have compaſſion on them, they continued in that courſe of life. Which was of very ill conſequence to the State. For theſe Vagrants did every where alienate the Peoples Minds from the Government, and perſwaded them that things would never be well ſetled, till they were again reſtored to their Houſes. Some of theſe came often to London, on pretence of ſuing for their Penſions; but really to practiſe up and down through the Country: To prevent this, there was a Proclamation ſet out on the 18*th.* of September, requiring them to ſtay in the Places where they lived, and to ſend up a Certificate where they were, to the Court of Augmentations; who ſhould thereupon give order for their conſtant payment. Some thought this Law againſt Vagabonds was too ſevere, and contrary to that common liberty, of which the Engliſh Nation has been always very ſenſible, both in their own, and their Neighbours particulars. Yet it could not be denied but extream Diſeaſes required extream Remedies: and perhaps there is no puniſhment too ſevere for Perſons that are in health, and yet prefer a loitering courſe of life to an honeſt employment. There followed in the Act many excellent Rules for providing for the truly poor and indigent in the ſeveral Places where they were born, and had their abode. Of which this can only be ſaid, That as no Nation has laid down more effectual Rules for the ſupplying the Poor, than England, ſo that indeed none can be in abſolute want; ſo the neglect of theſe Laws is a juſt and great reproach on thoſe who are charged with the execution of them, when ſuch numbers of poor Vagabonds ſwarm every where without the due reſtraints that the Laws have appointed. An Act againſt Vagabonds.

On the 6*th.* of December the Bill for giving the Chantries to the King was brought into the Houſe of Lords. It was read the ſecond time on the 12*th*, the third time on the 13*th*, and the fourth time on the 14*th.* of that Month. It was much oppoſed, both by Cranmer on the one hand, and the Popiſh Biſhops on the other. The late Kings Executors ſaw they could not pay his Debts, nor ſatisfie themſelves in their own pretenſions formerly mentioned, out of the Kings Revenue; and ſo intended to have theſe to be divided among them. Cranmer oppoſed it long. For the Clergy being much empoveriſhed by the Sale of the impropriated Tithes, that ought in all reaſon to have return'd into the Church, but upon An Act giving the Chantries to the King.

1547. upon the diſſolution of the Abbies were all ſold among the Laity; he ſaw no probable way remaining for their ſupply, but to ſave theſe Endowments till the King were of Age, being confident he was ſo piouſly diſpoſed, that they ſhould eaſily perſwade him to convert them all to the bettering of the Condition of the poor Clergy that were now brought into extream miſery. And therefore he was for reforming and preſerving theſe Foundations, till the Kings full Age. The Popiſh Biſhops liked theſe Endowments ſo well, that upon far different Motives, they were for continuing them in the ſtate they were in. But thoſe who were to gain by it were ſo many that the Act paſſed; the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of London, Dureſme, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Worceſter, and Chicheſter, diſſenting. So it being ſent down to the Houſe of Commons, was there much oppoſed by ſome Burgeſſes; who repreſented that the Boroughs, for which they ſerved, could not maintain their Churches, and other publick Works of the Guilds and Fraternities, if the Rents belonging to them were given to the King, for theſe were likewiſe in the Act. This was chiefly done by the Burgeſſes of Linn, and Coventry; who were ſo active, that the whole Houſe was much ſet againſt that part of the Bill for the Guild-Lands. Therefore thoſe who managed that Houſe for the Court, took theſe off by an aſſurance that their Guild-Lands ſhould be reſtored to them. And ſo they deſiſted from their oppoſition, and the Bill paſſed on the promiſe given to them, which was afterwards made good by the Protector. In the Preamble of the Act it is ſet forth, "That the great ſuperſtition of Chriſtians, riſing out of "their ignorance of the true way of Salvation by the death of Chriſt, "in ſtead of which they had ſet up the vain conceits of Purgatory, and "Maſſes ſatisfactory, was much ſupported by Trentals and Chantries. "And ſince the converting theſe to godly uſes, ſuch as the endowing of "Schools, Proviſions for the Poor, and the augmenting of Places in the "Univerſities, could not be done by Parliament; they therefore com-"mitted it to the care of the King. And then reciting the Act made in "the 37*th.* year of his Fathers Reign, they give the King all ſuch Chan-"tries, Colledges, and Chappels, as were not poſſeſſed by the late King, "and all that had been in being any time theſe five years laſt paſt: as "alſo all Revenues belonging to any Church, for Anniverſaries, Obits, "and Lights; together with all Guild-Lands, which any Fraternity of "Men enjoyed, for Obits, or the like: and appoint theſe to be convert-"ed to the maintenance of Grammar-Schools, or Preachers, and for the "encreaſe of Vicarages. After this followed the Act giving the King the Cuſtoms known by the Name of Tonnage and Poundage, beſides ſome other Laws, of Matters that are not needful to be remembred in this Hiſtory. Laſt of all came the Kings general Pardon; with the common Exceptions, among which, one was of theſe who were then Priſoners in the Tower of London, in which the Duke of Norfolk was included. So all buſineſs being ended, the Parliament was Prorogued from the 24*th.* of December to the 20*th.* of April following.

Acts that were propoſed but not carried.

But having given this account of theſe Bills that were paſſed, I ſhall not eſteem it an unfruitful piece of Hiſtory to ſhew what other Bills were deſigned. There were put into the Houſe of Lords, two Bills that were ſtifled. The one was, for the uſe of the Scriptures, which came not to a ſecond reading. The other was a Bill for erecting a new Court of Chancery

Chancery for Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Cauſes, which was committed to ſome Biſhops and Temporal Lords, but never more mentioned. The Commons ſent up alſo ſome Bills, which the Lords did not agree to. One was about Benefices with Cure, and Reſidence. It was committed, but never reported. Another was for the Reformation of divers Laws, and of the Courts of Common-Law; and a third was, that married Men might be Prieſts, and have Benefices. To this the Commons did ſo readily agree, that it being put in on the 19*th.* of December, and read then for the firſt time, it was read twice the next day, and ſent up to the Lords on the 21*ſt.* But being read there once, it was like to have raiſed ſuch debates, that, it being reſolved to end the Seſſion before Chriſtmas, the Lords laid it aſide. 1547.

The Convocation meets.

But while the Parliament was ſitting, they were not idle in the Convocation; though the Popiſh Party was yet ſo prevalent in both Houſes, that Cranmer had no hopes of doing any thing, till they were freed of the trouble which ſome of the great Biſhops gave them. The moſt important thing they did, was the carrying up four Petitions to the Biſhops, which will be found in the Collection. 1. That according to the Statute made in the Reign of the late King there might be Perſons empow'red for reforming the Eccleſiaſtical Laws. The ſecond, That according to the ancient Cuſtom of the Nation, and the Tenor of the Biſhops Writ to the Parliament, the inferior Clergy might be admitted again to ſit in the Houſe of Commons, or that no Acts concerning matters of Religion might paſs without the ſight and aſſent of the Clergy. The third, That ſince divers Prelates, and other Divines, had been in the late Kings time appointed to alter the Service of the Church; and had made ſome progreſs in it, that this might be brought to its full perfection. The fourth, That ſome conſideration might be had for the maintenance of the Clergy, the firſt year they came into their Livings, in which they were charged with the Firſt-fruits; to which they added, a deſire to know whether they might ſafely ſpeak their minds about Religion, without the danger of any Law. For the firſt of theſe four Petitions, an account of it ſhall be given hereafter. As to the ſecond it was a thing of great conſequence, and deſerves to be farther conſidered in this place.

The lower Houſe made ſome Petitions Number 16.

The Inferior Clergy deſire to be admitted to have Repreſentatives in the Houſe of Commons.

Anciently, all the free Men of England, or at leaſt thoſe that held of the Crown in chief, came to Parliament; and then the Inferior Clergy had Writs as well as the Superior, and the firſt of the three Eſtates of the Kingdom were the Biſhops, the other Prelates and the Inferior Clergy. But when the Parliament was divided into two Houſes, then the Clergy made likewiſe a Body of their own, and ſate in Convocation, which was the third Eſtate. But the Biſhops having a double capacity, the one of Eccleſiaſtical Prelature, the other of being the Kings Barons, they had a Right to ſit with the Lords as a part of their Eſtate, as well as in the Convocation. And though by parity of reaſon it might ſeem that the reſt of the Clergy, being Freeholders as well as Clarks, had an equal Right to chooſe, or be choſen, into the Houſe of Commons; yet whether they were ever in poſſeſſion of it, or whether according to the Clauſe Premonentes in the Biſhops Writ, they were ever a part of the Houſe of Commons, is a juſt doubt. For beſides this aſſertion in the Petition that was mentioned, and a more large one in the ſecond Petition, which they preſented to the ſame purpoſe, which is likewiſe in the Collection, I have never

Number 17.

1547. never met with any good reason to satisfie me in it. There was a general Tradition in Queen Elizabeths Reign, that the Inferior Clergy departed from their Right of being in the House of Commons; when they were all brought into the Præmunire upon Cardinal Wolsey's Legatine Power, and made their submission to the King. But that is not credible: for as there is no footstep of it, which in a time of so much writing and printing must have remained, if so great a change had been then made; so it cannot be thought, that those who made this Address but 17 years after that Submission, (many being alive in this, who were of that Convocation, Polidore Virgil in particular, a curious observer since he was maintained here to write the History of England) none of them should have remembred a thing that was so fresh, but have appealed to Writs and ancient Practices. But though this design of bringing the Inferior Clergy into the House of Commons did not take at this time, yet it was again set on foot, in the end of Queen Elizabeths Reign, and Reasons were offered to perswade her to set it forward. Which not being then successful, these same Reasons were again offered to King James, to induce him to endeavour it. The Paper that discovers this was communicated to me by Dr. Borlace the Worthy Author of the History of the Irish Rebellion. It is corrected in many places by the Hand of Bishop Ravis, then Bishop of London, a Man of great Worth. This, for the affinity of the matter, and the curiosity of the thing, I have put into
Number 18. the Collection, with a large Marginal Note, as it was designed to be transcribed for King James. But whether this Matter was ever much considered, or lightly laid aside, as a thing unfit and unpracticable, does not appear; certain it is, that it came to nothing. Upon the whole matter it is not certain what was the Power or Right of these Proctors of the Clergy in former times: Some are of opinion, that they were only assi-
Coke 4. Inst. 3, 4 stants to the Bishops, but had no Voice in either House of Parliament. This is much confirmed by an Act pass'd in the Parliament of Ireland, in the 28*th*. Year of the former Reign, which sets forth in the Preamble, "That though the Proctors of the Clergy were always summoned to "Parliament, yet they were no part of it; nor had they any right to "Vote in it, but were only Assistants in case Matters of Controversie or "Learning came before them, as the Convocation was in England, "which had been determined by the Judges of England after much en-"quiry made about it. But the Proctors were then pretending to so "high an Authority, that nothing could pass without their consents; "and it was presumed they were set on to it by the Bishops, whose "Chaplains they were for the most part. Therefore they were by that "Act declared to have no right to Vote.

From this some infer, they were no other in England, and that they were only the Bishops Assistants and Council. But as the Clause Premunientes in the Writ, seems to make them a part of the Parliament; so these Petitions suppose that they sate in the House of Commons anciently, where it cannot be imagined they could sit, if they came only to be Assistants to the Bishops, for then they must have sate in the House of Lords rather; as the Judges, the Masters of Chancery, and the King's Council do. Nor is it reasonable to think they had no Voice: for then their sitting in Parliament had been so insignificant a thing, that it is not likely they would have used such endeavours to be restored to it since their coming to Parliament, upon such an account must have been only a charge to them. 1547.

There is against this Opinion an Objection of great force from the Acts pass'd in the 21*st.* Year of Richard the second's Reign. In the second Act of that Parliament it is said. "That it was first prayed by the "Commons, and that the Lords Spiritual, and the Proctors of the Cler- "gy, did assent to it, upon which the King, by the assent of all the "Lords and Commons, did enact it. The 12*th.* Act of that Parliament was a Repeal of the whole Parliament that was held in the 11*th.* Year of that Reign; and concerning it, it is expressed, "That the Lords Spiri- "tual and Temporal, the Proctors of the Clergy, and the Commons, "being severally examined, did all agree to it. From hence it appears, that these Proctors were then not only a part of the Parliament, but were a distinct Body of Men that did severally from all the rest deliver their Opinions. It may seem strange, that if they were then considered as a part of either House of Parliament, this should be the only time in which they should be mentioned as bearing their share in the Legislative Power. In a matter that is so perplexed and dark, I shall presume to offer a Conjecture which will not appear perhaps improbable. In the 129*th.* Page of the former part, I gave the Reasons that made me think the lower House of Convocation consisted at first only of the Proctors of the Clergy. So that by the Proctors of the Clergy, both in the Statute of Ireland, and in those made by Richard the second, is perhaps to be understood, the lower House of Convocation: and it is not unreasonable to think, that upon so great an occasion as the annulling a whole Parliament, to make it pass the better, in an Age in which the People payed so blind a Submission to the Clergy, the concurrence of the whole Representative of the Church might have been thought necessary. It is generally believed, that the whole Parliament sate together in one House before Edward the thirds time, and then the inferior Clergy were a part of that Body without question. But when the Lords and Commons sate a-part, the Clergy likewise sate in two Houses, and granted Subsidies as well as the Temporalty. It may pass for no unlikely conjecture that the Clause Premonentes was first put in the Bishops Writ for the summoning of the lower House of Convocation, consisting of these Proctors, and afterwards, though there was a special Writ for the Convocation, yet this might at first have been continued in the Bishops Writ by the neglect of a Clerk, and from thence be still used. So that it seems to me most probable, that the Proctors of the Clergy were both in England and Ireland the lower House of Convocation. Now before the Submission which the Clergy made to King Henry, as the Convocation gave the King great Subsidies, so the whole business of Religion lay within their Sphere. But after the Submission they were cut off from meddling with it, except as they were authorized by the King. So that having now so little Power left them, it is no wonder they desired to be put in the state they had been in before the Convocation was separated from the Parliament: or at least that matters of Religion should not be determined till they had been consulted, and had reported their Opinions and Reasons. The extreme of raising the Ecclesiastical Power too high in the Times of Popery, had now produced another of depressing it too much. For seldom is the Counterpoise 1547. so justly ballanced, that Extremes are reduced to a well-tempered Mediocrity.

For the third Petition, it was resolved that many Bishops and Divines should be sent to Windsor to labour in the Matter of the Church Service. But that required so much consideration, that they could not enter on it during a Session of Parliament. And for the fourth, what Answer was given to it doth not appear

On the 29*th* of November a Declaration was sent down from the Bishops concerning the Sacraments being to be received in both kinds. To which, Jo. Tyler the Prolocutor, and several others set their Hands; and being again brought before them, it was agreed to by all without a contradictory Vote: 64 being present, among whom I find Polidore Virgil was one. And on the 17*th* of December the Proposition concerning the Marriage of the Clergy was also sent to them, and subscribed, by 35 affirmatively, and by 14 negatively: so it was ordered, that a Bill should be drawn concerning it. I shall not here digress to give an account of what was alledged for, or against this, reserving that to its proper place, when the thing was finally setled.

And this is all the account I could recover of this Convocation. I have chiefly gathered it from some Notes, and other Papers, of the then Dr. Parker, (afterwards Arch-bishop of Canterbury) which are carefully preserved with his other MSS. in Corpus Christi Colledge Library, at Cambridge. To which Library I had free access by the favour of the most learned Master Dr. Spencer, with the other Worthy Fellows of that House: and from thence I collected many remarkable things in this History.

The Parliament being brought to so good a Conclusion, the Protector took out a new Commission, in which all the Addition that is made to that Authority he formerly had, is, that in his absence he is impow'red to substitute another to whom he might delegate his Power.

The state of Affairs in Germany.

And thus this Year ended in England, but as they were carrying on the Reformation here, it was declining apace in Germany. The Duke of Saxe and the Landgrave were this Year to command their Armies apart. The Duke of Saxe kept within his own Country, but having there unfortunately divided his Forces, the Emperor overtook him near the Alb at Mulberg; where the Emperors Soldiers crossing the River, and pursuing him with great fury, after some resistance, in which he himself performed all that could be expected from so great a Captain, was taken Prisoner, and his Country all possessed by Maurice, who was now to be invested with the Electoral Dignity. He bore his misfortunes with a greatness and equality of mind that is scarce to be parrallel'd in History. Neither could the insolence with which the Emperor treated him, nor the fears of death to which he adjudged him, nor that tedious imprisonment which he suffered so long, ever shake or disorder a Mind that was raised so far above the inconstancies of Humane Affairs. And though he was forced to submit to the hardest Conditions possible, of renouncing his Dignity and Dominions, some few Places being only reserved for his Family; yet no Entreaties nor Fears could ever bring him to yield any thing in Matters of Religion. He made the Bible his chief Companion and comfort in his sharp Afflictions; which he bore so, as he had been raiſed up to that end, to let the World ſee how much he was above it. It ſeemed unimitable; and therefore engaged Thuanus, with the other excellent Writers of that Age, to ſet it out with all the advantages that ſo unuſual a temper of mind deſerved. Yet had thoſe Writers lived in our Age, and ſeen a great King, not overpow'red by a Superior Prince, but by the meaneſt of his own People, and treated with equal degrees of malice and ſcorn, and at laſt put to death openly, with the Pageantry of Juſtice; and bearing all this with ſuch invincible Patience, Heroical Courage, and moſt Chriſtian Submiſſion to God, they had yet found a nobler Subject for their eloquent Pens: but he ſaved the World the labour of giving a juſt Repreſentation of his behaviour in his Sufferings, having left his own Portraiture drawn by himſelf in ſuch lively and laſting Colours. 1547.

The Landgrave of Heſſe ſaw he could not long withſtand the Emperors Army, now ſo lifted up with ſucceſs; and therefore was willing to ſubmit to him on the beſt terms that his Sons-in-law the Elector of Brandenburg, and Maurice of Saxe, could obtain for him. Which were very hard, only he was to enjoy his Liberty, without any Impriſonment, and to preſerve his Dominions. But the Emperors Miniſters dealt moſt unfaithfully with him in this: For in the German Language there was but one Letters difference, and that only inverted, between perpetual Impriſonment and any Impriſonment, (Ewig for Emig) ſo by this baſe Artifice, he was, when he came and ſubmitted to the Emperor, detained a Priſoner. He had not the Duke of Saxes temper, but was out of meaſure impatient, and did exclaim of his ill uſage: but there was no remedy, for the Emperor was now abſolute. All the Towns of Germany, Magdeburg and Breme only excepted, ſubmitted to him, and redeemed his favour by great Sums of Money, and many Pieces of Ordnance. And the Bohemians were alſo forced to implore his Brothers mercy, who before he would receive them into his Hands, got his Revenue to be raiſed vaſtly. And now the Empire was wholly at the Emperors mercy. Nothing could withſtand him who had in one year turned out two Electors. For Herman Biſhop of Colen, as he was before condemned by the Pope, ſo was alſo degraded from that Dignity by the Emperor; and Adolph, whom he had procured to be made his Coadjutor, was declared Elector. Many of his Subjects and Neighbour Princes offered their Service, if he would ſtand to his own defence; but he was very old, and of ſo meek a temper, that he would ſuffer no Blood to be ſhed on his account; and therefore withdrew peaceably to a retirement in which he lived four years till his death. His Brother that was Biſhop of Munſter and Dean of Bonne, who had gone along with him in his Reformation, was alſo turned out; and Gropper was made Dean, who was eſteemed one of the learneſt and beſt Men of the Clergy at this time. He is ſaid to have expreſſed a generous contempt of the higheſt Dignity the See of Rome could beſtow on him, for he refuſed a Cardinals Hat when it was offered him: yet in this matter he had not behaved himſelf as became ſo good a Man, and ſo Learned a Divine. For he had conſented to the Changes had been made, and was in a correſpondence with Martin Bucer, whom Herman brought to Colen: (as will appear by an excellent Letter of Bucers to him, which will be found in the Collection concerning that matter) by which it is plain he went along with them from the beginning. But it 1547. seems he did it covertly and fearfully, and was afterwards drawn off, either by the love of the World, or the fears of the Cross; of which it appears Bucer had then some apprehensions, though he expressed them very modestly, Groppers Memory being in such high esteem, and this Letter being found among Bucers Papers, I thought the publishing of it would not be unacceptable, though it be of a Forreign Matter.

Germany being thus under the Power and Dread of the Emperor, a Diet was summoned to Ausburg: Where the chief Church was taken from the Protestants, and put into the Cardinal of Ausburg's Hands, to have the Mass set up again in it, though the Town was so much Protestant that they could find none that would come to it, but some poor People who were hired. The Emperor, among other Propositions he put in to the Diet, pressed this, That all differences in Religion, which had so distracted Germany, might be removed. The Ecclesiastical Princes answered, That the only way to effect that, was to submit to the General Council that was at Trent: Those that were for the Ausburg Confession, said, they could submit to no Council where the Pope Presided, and where the Bishops were sworn to obey him; but would submit to it, if that Oath was dispensed with, and their Divines admitted to defend their Opinions, and all the Decrees that had been made were again considered. In this difference of Opinion, the Emperor thought that if the whole matter should be left to his discretion, to which all should be bound to submit, he would then be able to determine it as he pleased. So he dealt privately with the Electors Palatine, and Saxe; and as they published it afterwards, gave them secret assurances about the freedom of their Religion, and that he only desired this to put him in a capacity of dealing on other terms with the Pope. Upon which, they consented to a Decree referring the Matter of Religion wholly to his care. But the Deputies from the Cities, who looked on this as a giving up of their Religion, could not be wrought to do it, without Conditions, which they put into another Writing, as explanatory of the Submission: But the Emperor took no notice of that, and only thanked them for their confidence in him, and so the Decree was published. All this was in some sort necessary for the Emperor, who was then in very ill terms with the Pope about the business of Placenzia. For the Popes Natural Son Petrus Aloisius being killed by a Conspiracy, the Governour of Millain had seized on Placenzia, which made the Pope believe the Emperour was accessary to it: for which the Reader is referred to the Italian Historians. The Pope saw the Emperor in one Summer delivered of a War, which he had hoped would have entangled him his whole life; and though in decency he could not but seem to rejoyce, and did so no doubt, at the ruine of those whom he called Hereticks, yet he was not a little grieved to see the Emperor so much exalted.

1547. Sept. 10. Petrus Aloisius killed.

The Proceedings at Trent. At Trent the Legates had been oft threatned and affronted by the Emperors Ambassadors and Bishops, who were much set on reforming abuses, and lessening the Power of the See of Rome. So they had a mind to break up the Council; but that would have been so scandalous a thing, and so resented by the Emperor, that they resolved rather on a Translation into some Town of the Popes, to which it was not likely the Imperialists would follow them, and so at least the Council would be suspended, if not dissolved. For this Remove, they laid hold on the first colour they could find. One dying of a malignant Feaver, it was given out and certified by Phyſicians, that he died of the Plague; ſo in all haſt they tranſlated the Council to Bologna. The Imperialiſts proteſted againſt it; but in vain, for thither they went. The Emperor was hereby quite diſappointed of his chief deſign, which was to force the Germans to ſubmit to a Council held in Germany: and therefore no Plague appearing at Trent, he preſſed the return of the Council thither. But the Pope ſaid, it was the Councils act, and not his; and that their Honour was to be kept up; that therefore ſuch as ſtayed at Trent were to go firſt to Bologna, and acknowledge the Council, and they ſhould then conſider what was to be done. So that now all the hope the Germans had, was, that this difference between the Pope and Emperor might give them ſome breathing; and time might bring them out of theſe extremities into which they were then driven. Upon theſe diſorders the Forreign Reformers, who generally made Germany their Sanctuary were now forced to ſeek it elſewhere. So Peter Martyr, in the end of November this Year, was brought over to England, by the Invitation which the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury ſent him in the Kings Name. He was born in Florence, where he had been an Auguſtinian-Monk. He was learned in the Greek, and the Hebrew, which drew on him the envy of the reſt of his Order, whoſe Manners he inveighed oft againſt. So he left them, and went to Naples, where he gathered an Aſſembly of thoſe who loved to Worſhip God more purely. This being made known, he was forced to leave that Place, and went next to Lucca, where he lived in ſociety with Tremellius and Zanchius. But being alſo in danger there, he went to Zurick with Bernardinus Ochinus, that had been one of the moſt celebrated Preachers of Italy, and now forſook his former Superſtitions. From Zurick he went to Baſil; and from thence by Martin Bucers means he was brought to Strasburg; where Cranmers Letters found both him and Ochinus. The Letter was made a Canon of Canterbury, with a Diſpenſation of Reſidence; and by other Letters Patents 40 Marks were given yearly to him, and as much to Peter Martyr.

Apr. 21. The firſt Seſſion of Bologna

There had been this Year ſome differences between the Engliſh and French concerning the Fortifications about Bulloigne. The Engliſh were raiſing a great Fort by the Harbour there. This being ſignified to King Henry by Gaſpar Coligny, afterwards the famous Admiral of France, then Governour of the neighbouring Parts to Bulloigne; it was complained of at the Court of England, It was anſwered, That this was only to make the Harbour more ſecure, and ſo the Works were ordered to be vigorouſly carried on. But this could not ſatisfie the French, who plainly ſaw it was of another ſort than to be intended only for the Sea. The King of France came and viewed the Country himſelf, and ordered Coligny to raiſe a Fort on a high Ground near it, which was called the Chaſtilion Fort, and commanded both the Engliſh Fort and the Harbour. But the Protector had no mind to give the French a colour for breaking with the Engliſh; ſo there was a Truce and further Ceſſation agreed on, in the end of September. Theſe are all the conſiderable Forreign Tranſactions of this Year, in which England was concerned. But there was a ſecret contrivance laid at home of a high nature, which though it broke not out till the next Year, yet the beginnings of it did now appear.

The French quarrel about Bulloigne.

1547. The Breach between the Protector and the Admiral.

The Protectors Brother, Thomas Seimour, was brought to ſuch a ſhare in his Fortunes, that he was made a Baron, and Lord Admiral. But this not ſatisfying his ambition, he endeavoured to have linked himſelf into a nearer relation with the Crown, by marrying the Kings Siſter the Lady Elizabeth. But finding he could not compaſs that, he made his Addreſſes to the Queen Dowager. Who enjoying now the Honour and Wealth the late King had left her, reſolved to ſatisfy her ſelf in her next Choice; and entertained him a little too early, for they were married ſo ſoon after the Kings death, that it was charged afterwards on the Admiral, that if ſhe had brought a Child as ſoon as might have been after the Marriage, it had given cauſe to doubt whether it had not been by the late King: which might have raiſed great diſturbance afterwards. But being thus married to the Queen, he concealed it for ſome time, till he procured a Letter from the King, recommending him to her for a Huſband: upon which they declared their Marriage, with which the Protector was much offended. Being thus poſſeſſed of great Wealth, and being Husband to the Queen Dowager, he ſtudied to engage all that were about the King to be his Friends: and he corrupted ſome of them by his Preſents, and forced one on Sir John Cheek. That which he deſigned, was, That whereas in former times, the Infant Kings of England had had Governours of their Perſons, diſtinct from the Protectors of their Realms; which Truſts were divided between their Unkles; it being judged too much to joyn both in one Perſon, who was thereby too great, whereas a Governour of the Kings Perſon might be a check on the Protector; he would therefore himſelf be made Governour of the Kings Perſon, alledging, that ſince he was the Kings Unkle as well as his Brother, he ought to have a proportioned ſhare with him in the Government. About Eaſter this Year he firſt ſet about this deſign; and corrupted ſome about the King who ſhould bring him ſometimes privately through the Gallery to the Queens Lodgings, and he deſired they would let him know when the King had occaſion for Money, and that they ſhould not always trouble the Treaſury, for he would be ready to furniſh him, and he thought a young Knight might be taken with this. So it happened that the firſt time Latimer preached at Court, the King ſent to him to know what Preſent he ſhould make him: Seimour ſent him 40 l. but ſaid, he thought 20 enough to give Latimer, and the King might diſpoſe of the reſt as he pleaſed. Thus he gained ground with the King, whoſe ſweet nature expoſed him to be eaſily won by ſuch Artifices.

It is generally ſaid, that all this difference between the Brothers was begun by their Wives, and that the Protectors Lady, being offended that the younger Brothers Wife had the precedence of her, which ſhe thought belonged to her ſelf, did thereupon raiſe and inflame the differences. But in all the Letters that I have ſeen concerning this Breach, I could never find any ſuch thing once mentioned. Nor is it reaſonable to imagine that the Dutcheſs of Somerſet ſhould be ſo fooliſh as to think that ſhe ought to have the precedence of the Queen Dowager. Therefore I look upon this Story as a meer Fiction, though it is probable enough there might upon ſome other accounts have been ſome Animoſities between the two high-ſpirited Ladies, which might have afterwards be thought to have occaſioned their Husbands quarrel.

It

It is plain in the whole thread of this Affair, that the Protector was at first very easie to be reconciled to his Brother; and was only assaulted by him; but bore the trouble he gave him with much patience for a great while, though in the end, seeing his factious temper was incurable, he laid off Nature too much, when he consented to his Execution. Yet all along till then, he had rather too much encouraged his Brother to go on, by his readiness to be after every breach reconciled to him. When the Protector was in Scotland, the Admiral then began to act more avowedly, and was making a party for himself; of which Paget took notice, and charged him with it in plain terms. He asked him, why he would go about to reverse that, which himself and others had consented to under their Hands? Their Family was now so great, that nothing but their mutual quarrelling could do them any prejudice: But there would not be wanting officious Men to inflame them, if they once divided among themselves; and the Breaches among near Friends commonly turn to the most irreconcileable Quarrels. Yet all was ineffectual; for the Admiral was resolved to go on, and either get himself advanced higher, or to perish in the Attempt. It was the knowledge of this which forced the Protector to return from Scotland so abruptly and disadvantagiously, for the securing of his Interest with the King on whom his Brothers Artifices had made some impression. Whether there was any reconciliation made between them before the Parliament met, is not certain. But during the Session, the Admiral got the King to write with his own Hand a Message to the House of Commons, for the making of him the Governour of his Person; and he intended to have gone with it to the House, and had a Party there, by whose means he was confident to have carried his business. He dealt also with many of the Lords and Counsellors to assist him in it. When this was known, before he had gone with it to the House, some were sent to him in his Brothers Name to see if they could prevail with him to proceed no further. He refused to hearken to them; and said, That if he were cross'd in his attempt, he would make this the blackest Parliament that ever was in England. Upon that, he was sent for by Order from the Council, but refused to come. Then they threatned him severely, and told him the Kings Writing was nothing in Law, but that he who had procured it, was punishable for doing an Act of such a nature, to the disturbance of the Government, and for engaging the young King in it. So they resolved to have sent him to the Tower, and to have turned him out of all his Offices. But he submitted himself to the Protector and Council: and his Brother and he seemed to be perfectly reconciled. Yet as the Protector had reason to have a watchful Eye over him, so it was too soon visible that he had not laid down, but only put off his high Projects, till a fitter conjuncture. For he began the next Christmas to deal Money again among the Kings Servants, and was on all occasions infusing into the King a dislike of every thing that was done, and did often perswade him to assume the Government himself. But the sequel of this Quarrel proved fatal to him, as shall be told in its proper place. And thus ended the Year 1547. 1547.

On the 8*th* of Jan. next year, Gardiner was brought before the Council; where it was told him, that his former Offences being included in the Kings general Pardon, he was thereupon discharged; a grave admonition was given 1548. Jan. 8.

1548. given him to carry himself reverently and obediently, and he was desired to declare whether he would receive the Injunctions and Homilies, and the Doctrine to be set forth from time to time by the King and Clergy of the Realm. He answered, he would conform himself as the other Bishops did, and only excepted to the Homily of Justification, and desired four or five dayes to consider of it. What he did at the end of that time does not appear from the Council-Book, no farther mention being made of this matter; for the Clerks of Council did not then enter every thing with that exactness that is since used. He went home to his Diocess, where there still appeared in his whole behaviour great malignity to Cranmer, and to all motions for Reformation; yet he gave such outward compliance, that it was not easie to find any advantage against him, especially now since the Councils great Power was so much abridged.

The Marquess of Northampton sues a Divorce for Adultery.

In the end of Jan. the Council made an Order concerning the Marquess of Northampton, which will oblige me to look back a little for the clear account of it. This Lord, who was Brother to the Queen Dowager, had married Anne Bourchier, Daughter to the Earl of Essex, the last of that Name. But she being convicted of Adultery, he was divorced from her; which according to the Law of the Ecclesiastical Courts was only a separation from Bed and Board. Upon which Divorce, it was proposed in King Henry's time to consider what might be done in favour of the Innocent Person, when the other was convicted of Adultery. So in the beginning of King Edward's Reign, on the 7th. of May, a Commission was granted to the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Duresme and Rochester, (this was Holbeack, who was not then translated to Lincoln) to Dr. Ridley, and six more, ten in all, of whom six were a Quorum, to try whether the Lady Anne was not by the Word of God so lawfully divorced, that she was no more his Wife, and whether thereupon he might not marry another Wife. This being a new Case, and of great importance, Cranmer resolved to examine it with his ordinary diligence, and searched into the Opinions of the Fathers and Doctors, so copiously, that his Collections about it grew into a large Book, (the Original whereof I have perused;) the greatest part of it being either written, or marked, and interlined, with his own Hand. This required a longer time, than the Marquess of Northampton could stay; and therefore presuming on his great Power, without waiting for Judgment, he solemnly married Eliz. Daughter to Brooke Lord Cobham. On the 28th of Jan. Information was brought to the Council of this, which gave great scandal, since his first Marriage stood yet firm in Law. So he being put to answer for himself, said, he thought that by the Word of God he was discharged of his tye to his former Wife; and the making Marriages indissoluble was but a part of the Popish Law, by which it was reckoned a Sacrament; and yet the Popes, knowing that the World would not easily come under such a Yoke, had by the help of the Canonists invented such distinctions, that it was no uneasie thing to make a Marriage void among them: and that the condition of this Church was very hard, if upon Adulteries, the innocent must either live with the Guilty, or be exposed to temptations to the like sins, if a separation was only allowed, but the bond of the Marriage continued undissolved. But since he had proceeded so far before the Delegates had given sentence, it was Ordered, that he and his new Wife should be parted; and that that ſhe ſhould be put into his Siſter the Queen Dowagers keeping, till the matter were tried, whether it was according to the Word of God, or not; and that then further order ſhould be given in it. Upon this the Delegates made haſte, and gathered their Arguments together, Of which I ſhall give an Abſtract, both for the clearing of this matter, (concerning which not many years ago there were great debates in Parliament) and alſo to ſhew the exactneſs of the Proceedings in that time. 1548.

Chriſt condemned all Marriages upon Divorces, except in the Caſe of Adultery; which ſeemed manifeſtly to allow them in that Caſe. And though this is not mentioned by St. Mark, and St. Luke, yet it is enough that St. Matthew has it. Chriſt alſo defined the ſtate of Marriage, to be that in which two are one fleſh; ſo that when either of the two hath broken that Union, by becoming one with another Perſon, then the Marriage is diſſolved. And it is oft repeated in the Goſpel, That married Perſons have power over one anothers Bodies, and that they are to give due benevolence to each other; which is plainly contrary to this way of ſeparation without diſſolving the Bond. St. Paul putting the caſe of an Unbeliever departing from the Partner in Marriage, ſays, The Believing Party, whether Brother or Siſter, is not under Bondage in ſuch a caſe: which ſeems a diſcharge of the Bond in caſe of Deſertion: and certainly Adultery is yet of a higher nature. But againſt this was alledged on the other ſide, That our Saviours allowing Divorce in the Caſe of Adultery was only for the Jews, to whom it was ſpoken, to mitigate the cruelty of their Law, by which the Adultereſs was to be put to death: and therefore he yielded Divorce in that Caſe, to mitigate the ſeverity of the other Law. But the Apoſtle writing to the Gentile Chriſtians, at Rome, and Corinth, ſaid, The Wife was tied by the Law to the Husband, as long as he lived. And that other general Rule, Whom God has joyned together let no Man put aſunder, ſeems againſt the diſſolving the Bond. To this it was anſwered, That it is againſt ſeparating as well as diſſolving: that the Wife is tied to her Husband; but if he ceaſeth to be her Husband, that tie is at an end: That our Saviour left the Wife at liberty to divorce her Husband for Adultery, though the Law of Moſes had only provided, That the Adulterous Wife, and he who defiled her, were to die, but the Husband who committed Adultery was not ſo puniſhable; therefore our Saviour had by that Proviſion declared the Marriage to be clearly diſſolved by Adultery.

The Grounds on which he was ſuffered to marry again.

From hence they went to examine the Authorities of the Fathers. Hermes was for putting away the Adultereſs, but ſo as to receive her again upon repentance. Origen thought the Wife could not marry again after divorce. Tertullian allowed Divorce, and though it diſſolved the Marriage as much as Death did. Epiphanius did alſo allow it. And Ambroſe in one Place allows the Husband to marry after divorce for Adultery, though he condemns it always in the Wife. Baſil allowed it on either ſide upon Adultery. Jerome, who condemns the Wife's marrying, though her Husband were guilty of Adultery; and who diſliked the Husbands marrying again, though he allowed him to divorce upon Adultery, or the ſuſpition of it; yet when his Friend Fabiola had married after a Divorce, he excuſes it, ſaying it was better for her to marry than to burn. Chromatius allowed of ſecond Marriages after Divorce.

1548. And so did Chrysostome, though he condemned them in Women so divorcing. St. Austin was sometimes for a Divorce, but against Marriage upon it; yet in his Retractations, he writ doubtfully of his former Opinion. In the Civil Law, the Christian Emperors allowed the power of Divorcing both to Husband and Wife, with the right of marrying afterwards. Nor did they restrain the Grounds of Divorce only to Adultery, but permitted it in many other Cases; as if the Wife were guilty of Treason, had treated for another Husband, had procured an Abortion, had been whole nights abroad, or had gone to see the publick Plays without leave from her Husband; besides many other Particulars. Against which, none of the Fathers had writ, nor endeavoured to get them repealed. All these Laws were confirmed by Justinian, when he gathered the Laws into a Body, and added to it where they were defective. In the Canon Law, it is provided, that he whose Wife is defiled must not be denied lawful Marriage. Pope Gregory denied a second Marriage to the guilty Person, but allowed it to the Innocent after Divorce. Pope Zachary allowed the Wife of an Incestuous Adulterer to be married, if she could not contain. In the Canon Law, the Council of Tribury is cited, for allowing the like Priviledge to the Husbands. By the Council of Elvira, a Man that finds that his Wife intends to kill him, may put her away, and marry another; but she must never marry. The Council of Arles recommended it to Husbands, whose Wives were found in Adultery, not to marry during their Lives. And that at Elvira denied the Sacrament, to a Wife who left an Adulterous Husband, and married another; but she might have the Communion when her first Husband died: So the second Marriage was accounted good, but only indecent. But the Council of Milevi forbids both Man and Wife to marry after Divorce. All these were collected by Cranmer, with several very important Reflections on most of the Quotations out of the Fathers. With these, there is another Paper, given in by one who was against the dissolving the Bond, in which there are many Quotations brought both from the Canon Law, and the Fathers, for the contrary Opinion. But most of the Fathers there cited are of the latter Ages; in which the state of Cœlibate had been so exalted by the Monks, that, in all doubtful Cases, they were resolved still to prefer that Opinion which denied Liberty for further Marriages. In conclusion, this whole Question was divided into eight Queries, which were put to some learned Men; (who these were does not appear) and they returned their Answer in favour of the second Marriage, which will be found in the Collection. In the end Sentence was given, allowing the second Marriage in that Case, and by consequence confirming the Marques of Northampton's Marriage to his second Wife, who upon that was suffered to cohabit with him. Yet four years after, he was advised to have a special act of Parliament for confirming this Sentence; of which mention shall be made in its due time and Place.

Some further advance in the Reformation.

The next thing that came under consideration, was the great contradiction that was in most of the Sermons over England. Some were very earnest to justifie and maintain all the old Rites that yet remained; and others were no less hot to have them laid aside. So that in London especially, the People were wonderfully distracted by this variety among their Teachers. The Ceremonies of Candlemass, and their observance of of Lent, with the Rites uſed on Palm-Sunday, Good-Friday, and Eaſter, were now approaching. Thoſe that were againſt them, condemned them as ſuperſtitious Additions to the Worſhip of God, invented in the dark Ages, when an outward Pageantry had been the chief thing that was looked after. But others ſet out the good uſe that might be made of theſe things, and taught that, till they were aboliſhed by the Kings Authority, they ought to be ſtill obſerved. In a Viſitation that had been made, (when I cannot learn, only it ſeems to have been about the end of King Henry's Reign) it had been declared that Faſting in Lent was only a Poſitive Law. Several Directions were alſo given about the uſe of the Ceremonies, and ſome hints as if they were not to be long continued: and all Wakes, and Plough-Mondays, were ſuppreſſed, ſince they drew great Aſſenblies of People together, which ended in drinking and quarrelling. Theſe I have alſo inſerted in the Collection, having had a Copy of the Articles left at the Viſitation of the Deanary of Doncaſter, communicated to me by the favour of a moſt learned Phyſitian, and curious Antiquary, Dr. Nathaniel Johnſton, who ſent me this with ſeveral other Papers out of his generous zeal for contributing every thing in his power to the perfecting of this Work. 1548. Number 21.

The Country People generally loved all theſe Shews, Proceſſions, and Aſſemblies, as things of diverſion: and judged it a dull buſineſs, only to come to Church for Divine Worſhip, and the hearing of Sermons: therefore they were much delighted with the gayity and cheerfulneſs of thoſe Rites. But others, obſerving that they kept up all theſe things, juſt as the Heathens did their Plays and Feſtivities for their Gods, judged them contrary to the gravity and ſimplicity of the Chriſtian Religion, and therefore were earneſt to have them removed. This was ſo effectually repreſented to the Council, by Cranmer, that an Order was ſent to him about it. He ſent it to Bonner, who, being Dean of the Colledge of Biſhops in the Province of Canterbury, was to tranſmit, all ſuch Orders over the whole Province. By it, the carrying of Candles on Candlemas day, of Aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, and Palms on Palm-Sunday, were forbidden to be uſed any longer. And this was ſignified by Bonner, to Thirleby Biſhop of Weſtminſter, on the 28*th*. of June, as appears by the Regiſter.

A Proclamation againſt thoſe who Innovated without Authority.

After this, on the 6*th*. of February, a Proclamation was iſſued out againſt ſuch as ſhould on the other hand raſhly innovate, or perſwade the People from the old accuſtomed Rites, under the Pains of Impriſonment, and other Puniſhments at the Kings pleaſure; excepting only the formerly mentioned Rites; to which are added, the creeping to the Croſs on Good-Friday, taking Holy Bread and Water, and any other that ſhould be afterwards at any time certified by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury to the other Biſhops in the Kings Name to be laid aſide. And for preventing the miſchiefs occaſioned by raſh Preachers, none were to preach without Licence from the King or his Viſitors, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, or the Biſhop of the Dioceſs, where they lived; excepting only Incumbents preaching in their own Pariſhes. Thoſe who preached otherwiſe were to be impriſoned till Order were given for their puniſhment: and the inferiour Magiſtrates were required to ſee to the execution of theſe Orders. This Proclamation, which is in the Collection, was neceſſary for giving Authority to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury's Number 22.

1548. Letters which were cenſured as a great preſumption for him without any publick Order to appoint changes in Sacred Rites. Some obſerved, that the Council went on making Proclamations with arbitrary Puniſhments, though the Act was repealed that had formerly given ſo great Authority to them. To this it was anſwered, That the King by his Supremacy might ſtill in matters of Religion make new Orders, and add Puniſhments upon the Tranſgreſſors; yet this was much queſtioned, though univerſally ſubmitted to.

The general taking away of all Images. Number 23.

On the 11*th.* of Feb. there was a Letter ſent from the Council to the Arch-biſhop for a more conſiderable Change. There were every where great Heats about the removing of Images which had been abuſed to ſuperſtition: Some affirming, and others denying, that their Images had been ſo abuſed. There were in the Churches ſome Images of ſo ſtrange a nature, that it could not be denied that they had been abuſed. Such was the Image of the Bleſſed Trinity, which was to be cenſed, on the day of the Innocents, by him that was made the Biſhop of the Children: This ſhews it was uſed on other days, in which it is like it was cenſed by the Biſhop where he was preſent. How this Image was made, can only be gathered from the Prints that were of it at that time: In which the Father is repreſented ſitting on the one Hand as an old Man with a Triple Crown and Rayes about him, the Son on the other hand as a young Man with a Crown and Rayes, and the Bleſſed Virgin between them, and the Emblem of the Holy Ghoſt a Dove ſpread over her Head. So it is repreſented in a fair Book of the Hours according to the uſe of Sarum, printed Anno 1526. The impiety of this did raiſe horror in moſt Mens Minds, when that unconceivable Myſtery was ſo groſly expreſſed. Beſides, the taking the Virgin into it, was done in purſuance to what had been ſaid by ſome blaſphemous Friars, of her being aſſumed into the Trinity. In another Edition of theſe it is repreſented by three Faces formed in one Head. Theſe things had not been ſet up by any publick Warrant; but having been ſo long in practice, they ſtood upon the general Plea that was for keeping the Traditions of the Church: for it was ſaid, that the Promiſes made to the Church were the ſame in all Ages, and that therefore every Age of the Church had an equal Right to them. But for the other Images, it was urged againſt them, that they had been all conſecrated with ſuch Rites and Prayers, that it was certain they were every one of them ſuperſtitious; ſince it was prayed, that they might be ſo bleſſed and conſecrated, that whoſoever worſhipped them might by the Saints Prayers and Aid, whom they repreſented, obtain every thing that he deſired. So they reſolved on an entire removal of all Images. And the Protector with the Council wrote to Cranmer, that for putting an end to all theſe Conteſts, and that the living Images of Chriſt might not quarrel about the dead ones, it was concluded they ſhould all of them be taken down: and he was to give order to ſee this executed in his own Dioceſs, and to tranſmit it to the other Biſhops to be in like manner executed by them. There were alſo Orders given, That all rich Shrines, with all the Plate belonging to them ſhould be brought in to the Kings uſe, and that the Cloaths that covered them, ſhould be converted to the uſe of the Poor. This gave Gardiner, and thoſe of his Party, a new affliction. For in his Dioceſs he had been always on their ſide that were for keeping up the Images. But they all ſubmitted, and

ſo the Churches were emptied of all theſe Pictures and Statues which had been for divers Ages the chief Objects of the Peoples Worſhip. 1548.

And now the greateſt care of the Reformers was, to find the beſt Men they could, who ſhould be licenſed by the Kings Authority to preach. To whom the Council ſent a Letter in the beginning of May, intimating, that by the reſtraint put on preaching, they only intended to put an end to the raſh contentions of indiſcreet Men, and not to extinguiſh the lively preaching of the pure Word of God, made after ſuch ſort as the Holy Ghoſt ſhould for the time put in the Preachers mind: They are therefore charged to preach ſincerely, and with that caution and moderation, that the time and Place ſhall require: and particularly that they ſhould not ſet on the People to make Innovations, or to run before thoſe whom they ſhould obey; but ſhould perſwade them to amend their Lives, and keep the Commandments of God, and to forſake all their old Superſtitions. And for the things not yet changed, they ought to wait patiently, and to conclude that the Prince did either allow, or ſuffer them: and in delivering things to the People, they were ordered to have a ſpecial regard to what they could bear. Some Reſtraints put on Preachers. May 4. Number 24.

But this temper was not obſerved. Some plainly condemned it as a political patching, and ſaid, Why ſhould not all theſe Superſtitions be ſwept away at once? To this it was anſwered by others, That as Chriſt forbade the pulling up of the Tares, leſt with them they ſhould pull up good Wheat; ſo if they went too forwardly to the changing of things, they might in that haſte change much for the worſe: and great care was to be had not to provoke the People too much, leſt in the infancy of the King, or in ſome ill conjuncture of Affairs, they might be diſpoſed to make Commotions. And the compliances that both Chriſt and his Apoſtles gave to the Jews, when they were to abrogate the Moſaical Law, were often inſiſted on. It was ſaid, if they who were cloathed with a Power of Miracles, for the more effectual conviction of the World, condeſcended ſo far; it was much more reaſonable for them, who had not that Authority over Mens Conſciences, and had no immediate ſigns to ſhew from Heaven, to perſwade the People rather by degrees to forſake their old miſtakes, and not to precipitate things by an over haſt.

This Winter there was a Committee of ſelected Biſhops and Divines appointed for examining all the Offices of the Church, and for reforming them. Some had been in King Henry's time employed in the ſame buſineſs, in which they had made a good progreſs, which was now to be brought to a full perfection. Therefore the Arch-Biſhops of Canterbury and York, the Biſhops of London, Dureſme, Worceſter, Norwich, St. Aſaph, Saliſbury, Coventry and Litchfield, Carliſle, Briſtol, St. Davids, Ely, Lincoln, Chicheſter, Hereford, Weſtminſter, and Rocheſter, with Doctors Cox, May, Tailor, Heins, Robertſon, and Redmayn, were appointed to examine all the Offices of the Church, and to conſider how far any of them needed amendment. Biſhops and Divines examine the Offices of the Church.

The thing they firſt examined was the Sacrament of the Euchariſt; which being the chief Symbole of Chriſtian Communion, was thought to deſerve their chief care. And here they managed their Enquiries in the ſame manner that was uſed in the former Reign; in which when any thing was conſidered in order to a Change, it was put into ſeveral Queries, 1548. ries, to which every one in Commission was to give his Answer in writing. It is no wonder if the confusions, that followed in Queen Maries Reign, have deprived us of most of these Papers; yet there is one Set of them preserved, relating to some Questions about the Priests single communicating; Whether one Mans receiving it can be useful to another? What was the Oblation or Sacrifice that was made of Christ in the Mass? Wherein the Mass consisted? When the Priests receiving alone began? Whether it was convenient to retain that, and continue Masses satisfactory for departed Souls? Whether the Gospel ought to be taught at the time of the Mass? Whether it were convenient to have it all in a known Tongue or not? And when the reserving or hanging up of the Sacrament first began? To these the Bishops made their several Answers. Some answered them all: others answered only a few of them; it is like suspending their Opinions about those which they answered not. The Bishops of London, Worcester, Chichester, and Hereford, gave in their Answers once in one Paper together; but afterwards they joyned with the Bishops of Norwich, and St. Asaph, and all those six gave a joynt Answer in one Paper. Those are not all subscribed, as those which I inserted in the former Volume were; or at least the Papers I have, are not the Originals. But Cranmers Hand is over every one of them, marking the Name of the Bishop to whom they belonged; and Dr. Cox hath set his Hand and Seal to his Answer. By these, which are in the Collection, the Reader will perceive how generally the Bishops were addicted to the old Superstition, and how few did agree in all things with Cranmer. It may be thought that these Questions were given out before the Act of Parliament passed, in which the Priests single communicating is turned into a Communion of more. Yet by that Act it was only provided, That all who came to receive should be admitted, but Priests were not forbid to Consecrate if none were to Communicate, which was the thing now inquired into.

Number 25.

The Corruptions in the Office of the Communion examined.

It is certain there was no part of Worship more corrupted than this Sacrament was. The first Institution was so plain and Simple, that, except in the Words, This is my Body, there is nothing which could give a colour to the corruptions that were afterwards brought in. The Heathens had their Mysteries, which the Priests concealed with hard and dark words, and dressed up with much Pomp; and thereby supported their own esteem with the People; since they looked on these to be of so high a nature, that all those who had the ordering of them were accounted Sacred Persons. The Primitive Christians retained the first simplicity of Divine Institutions for some Ages. But afterwards, as their number encreased, they made use of some things not unlike those the Heathens had practised, to draw the Gentiles more easily into their belief; since external shews make deep impressions in the Vulgar. And those that were thus brought over, might afterwards come to like these things for their own sakes, which were at first made use of only to gain the World. Others finding some advantage in such Services, that were easie, and yet appeared very pompous, that they might cover great faults by countenancing and complying with the follies that were in vogue contributed liberally to the improvement of them. And after the Roman Emperors turned Christian, much of that vast Wealth, of which they and their People were Masters, was brought into the Church, and applied applied to these Superstitions. Yet it became not so universally corrupted, till by the Invasion of the Goths, Vandals, and other barbarous Nations, the Roman Empire was broken and divided into many Kingdoms. These new Conquerors were rude and ignorant, wholly given to sensible things, and Learning being universally extinguish'd, gross Superstition took place; for more refined Superstitions would not serve the turn of darker Ages: But as they grew in Ignorance they continued in the Belief and Practice of more absurd things. 1548.

The high opinion they justly had of this Sacrament being much raised by the Belief of the Corporal Presence of Christ in it, which came in afterwards, then the dull Wits of the Priests, and the Wealth of the People, were employed to magnifie it with all the pomp possible. All the Vessels and Garments belonging to it were consecrated and anointed with much devotion; the whole Office was in an unknown Tongue. A great part of it was to be secretly whispered, to make it appear the more wonderful charm. But chiefly the words of Consecration were by no means to be heard by the People; it being fabled, that when the words were spoken aloud, some Shepherds had repeated them over their Bread, which was thereupon presently turned into Flesh. Besides that it was but suitable that a Change which was not to be seen, should be made by words not to be heard. The Priest was not to approach it, but after so many Bowings, Crossings, and Kissings of the Altar; and all the while he went through with the Office, the People were only now and then blessed by a short Blessing, The Lord be with you, and even that in Latin. Then after Consecration, the Bread was lifted up, and all the People worshipped it, as if Christ had appeared in the Clouds. It was oft exposed on the Altar, and carried about in Processions, with the Ceremonies of carrying Flambeaux before it, which the greatest Persons accounted it an Honour to do; the Priest that carried it all the while going pompously under a rich Canopy.

This was also thought most effectual for all the accidents of life. And whereas it was first only intended to be a Commemoration and Communion of the Death of Christ; that seemed almost forgotten, but it was applied to all other ends imaginable. That which brought in most Custom was, Trentals, which was a Method of delivering Souls out of Purgatory, by saying 30 Masses a year for them. And whereas it was observed, that Men on the Anniversaries of their Birth-days, Wedding, or other happy accidents of their Lives, were commonly in better humour; so that favours were more easily obtained; they seemed to have had the same opinion of God and Christ. So they ordered it, that three of these should be said on Christmas day, three on Epiphany, three on the Purification of the Blessed Virgin, three on the Annunciation, three on the Resurrection, three on the Ascention, three on Whit-Sunday, three on Trinity-Sunday, three on the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and three on her Birth-day; hoping that these days would be the Mollia tempora, when God and Christ, or the Blessed Virgin, would be of easier access, and more ready to grant their desires. Yet the most unaccountable part of all, was the Masses on the Saints days, praying that the intercession of the Saint might make the Sacrifice acceptable, that the Saint, for whose Honour these Oblations were solemnly offered, would by his Merits procure them to be accepted, and that the Sacrifice might bring

1548. to them a greater Indulgence, being offered up by the Suffrages of the Saint. If the Sacrifice was of Jesus Christ, and was of its own Nature expiatory, how this should be done in honour to a Saint, and become of greater vertue by his Intercession, was a thing very hard to be understood. There were many Pieces of ridiculous Pagantry also used in it, as the laying the Host in the Sepulchre they made for Christ on Good-Friday; and that not only the Candles that were to burn at the Easter Celebration, but the very Fire that was to kindle them, was particularly consecrated on Easter Eve. Some Masses were believed to have a peculiar Vertue in them. For in the Mass-Book printed at London, Anno 1500. there is a Mass for avoiding sudden death; which Pope Clement made in the Colledge with all his Cardinals, and granted to all who heard it 270 days of Indulgence, charging them that they should hold in their Hand a burning Candle all the while it was saying, and for five days after should likewise hold a Candle, kneeling during the whole Mass: and to those that did so, sudden death should do no harm. And it is added, that this was certain, and approved, in Avignion, and all the neighbouring Places. All this I have opened the more largely, to let the Reader plainly understand, what things were then in this Sacrament that required Reformation: and I have gathered these things out of the Mass-Book, then most used in England, and best known by the Name of the Missa after the use of Sarum.

A new Office for the Communion set out.

The first step these deputed Bishops and Divines made, was to reform this. But they did not at once mend every thing that required it, but left the Office of the Mass as it was, only adding to it that which made it a Communion. It began first with an Exhortation, to be used the day before, which differs not much from that now used. Only after the advice given concerning Confession, it is added, That such as desired to make auricular Confession, should not censure those who were satisfied with a general Confession to God, and that those who used only Confession to God and to the Church should not be offended with those who used auricular Confession to a Priest; but that all should keep the Rule of Charity, every man being satisfied to follow his own Conscience, and not judging another Mans in things not appointed by God. After the Priest had received the Sacrament, he was to turn to the People and read an Exhortation to them; the same we now use, only a little varied in words. After that, followed a Denunciation against Sinners, requiring them who were such, and had not repented, to withdraw, lest the Devil should enter into them as he did into Judas. Then after a little pause, to see if any would withdraw; there was to follow a short exhortation, with a Confession of sins, and Absolution, the very same which we do yet retain. Then those Texts of Scripture were read, which we yet read; followed with the Prayer, We do not presume, &c. After this, the Sacrament was to be given in both kinds; first to the Ministers then present, and then to all the People, with these words, The Body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for thee, preserve thy Body unto Everlasting Life; and, The Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ which was shed for thee, preserve thy Soul unto Everlasting Life. When all was done, the Congregation was to be dismissed with a Blessing. The Bread was to be such as had been formerly used, and every one of the Breads so consecrated was to be broken in two or more pieces; and the People were to be taught taught that there was no difference in the quantity they received, whether it were ſmall, or great, but that in each of them they received the whole Body of Chriſt. If the Wine, that was at firſt conſecrated, did not ſerve, the Prieſt was to conſecrate more; but all to be without any Elevation. This Office, being thus finiſhed, was ſet forth with a Proclamation, reciting, That whereas the Parliament had Enacted that the Communion ſhould be given in both kinds to all the Kings Subjects, it was now ordered to be given in the Form here ſet forth, and all were required to receive it with due reverence, and Chriſtian behaviour, and with ſuch uniformity as might encourage the King to go on in the ſetting forth godly Orders for Reformation, which he intended moſt earneſtly to bring to effect by the help of God: Willing his Subjects, not to run before his direction, and ſo by their raſhneſs to hinder ſuch things; aſſuring them of the earneſt zeal he had to ſet them forth, hoping they would quietly and reverently tarry for it. 1548.

This was publiſhed on the 8*th.* of March, and on the 13*th.* Books were ſent to all the Biſhops of England, requiring them to ſend them to every Pariſh in their Dioceſs, that the Curates might have time, both to inſtruct themſelves about it, and to acquaint their People with it; ſo that by the next Eaſter it might be univerſally received in all the Churches of the Nation. This was variouſly cenſured. Thoſe that were for the old Superſtition, were much troubled to have Confeſſion thus left indifferent, and a general Confeſſion of ſins to be uſed, with which they apprehended the People would for the moſt part content themſelves. In the Scripture there was a Power of Binding and Looſing ſins given to the Apoſtles. And St. James exhorted thoſe to whom he wrote, to confeſs their faults to one another. Afterwards Penitents came to be reconciled to the Church, when they had given publick ſcandal, either by their Apoſtacy, or ill Life, by an open Confeſſion of their ſins; and after ſome time of ſeparation from the other pure Chriſtians in Worſhip, and an abſtention from the Sacrament, they were admitted again to their ſhare of all the Priviledges that were given in common to Chriſtians. But according to the nature of their ſins, they were, beſides the publick Confeſſion, put under ſuch Rules as might be moſt proper for curing theſe ill Inclinations in them: and according to the ſeveral Ranks of ſins the time and degrees of this Penitence was proportioned. And the Councils that met in the fourth and fifth Centuries made the regulating theſe penitentiary Canons the chief Subject of their Conſultations. In many Churches, there were penitentiary Prieſts, who were more expert in the knowledge of theſe Rules, and gave directions about them; which were taken away in Conſtantinople upon the indiſcretion of which one of them had been guilty. For ſecret ſins, there was no obligation to confeſs, ſince all the Canons were about publick ſcandals: yet for theſe, the devout People generally went to their Prieſts for their Counſel, but were not obliged to it; and ſo went to them for the diſtempers of their Minds, as they did to Phyſitians for the Diſeaſes of their Bodies.

It is variouſly cenſured.

Chiefly that Auricular Confeſſion was laid down.

About the end of the 5*th. Century*, they began in ſome Places to have ſecret Penances; either within Monaſteries, or other Places which the Prieſts had appointed: and upon a ſecret Confeſſion, and performing the Penance impoſed, Abſolution was alſo given ſecretly: whereas in former times, Confeſſion and Abſolution had been performed openly in the 1548. Church. In the 7th. Century it was every where practiſed, that there ſhould be ſecret Penance for ſecret ſins: which Theodore Arch-biſhop of Canterbury did firſt bring into a Method, and under Rules. But about the end of the 8th. Century, the commutation of Penance, and exchanging it for Money, or other Services to the Church, came to be practiſed: and then began Pilgrimages to Holy Places, and afterwards the going to the Holy War: and all the ſeverities of Penance were diſpenſed with to ſuch as undertook theſe. This brought on a great Relaxation of all Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline. Afterwards, Croiſadoes came in uſe, againſt ſuch Princes as were depoſed by Popes: and to theſe was likewiſe added, to encourage all to enter into them, that all Rules of Penitence were diſpenſed with two ſuch as put on that Croſs. But Penitence being now no more publick, but only private, the Prieſts managed it as they pleaſed, and ſo by Confeſſion entred into all Mens ſecrets, and by Abſolution had their Conſciences ſo intirely in their Power, that the People were generally governed by them. Yet becauſe the Secular Prieſts were commonly very ignorant, and were not put under ſuch an aſſociation as was needful to manage thoſe deſigns, for which this was thought an excellent Engine; therefore the Friars were employed every where to hear Confeſſions, and to give Abſolutions. And to bring in Cuſtomers to them, two new things were invented. The one was, a Reſerving of certain Caſes, in which ſuch as were guilty of them could not be abſolved but by the Popes, or thoſe deputed by them: and the Friars had faculties in the Popes Name to abſolve in theſe Caſes. The other was on ſome occaſion the uſe of certain new Secrets, by which Men were to obtain great Indulgences; either by ſaying ſuch Prayers, or performing ſuch Impoſitions; and theſe were all truſted to the Friars, who were to trade with them, and bring all the Money they could gather by that means to Rome. They being bred up to a voluntary Poverty, and expecting great Rewards for their Induſtry, ſold thoſe Secrets with as much cunning, as Mountebanks uſe in ſelling their Tricks: only here was the difference, that the ineffectualneſs of the Mountebanks Medicines was ſoon diſcovered, ſo their Trade muſt be but ſhort in one Place; whereas the other could not be ſo eaſily found out; the chief Piece of the Religion of thoſe Ages being to believe all that their Prieſts taught them. Of this ſort the Reader will find in the Collection an Eſſay of Indulgences as they were printed in the Hours after the uſe of Sarum, which were ſet down in Engliſh, though the Prayers be all Latin, that ſo all the People might know the value of ſuch Ware. Thoſe had been all by degrees brought from Rome, and put into Peoples Hands, and afterwards laid together in their Offices. By them, Indulgences of many years, Hundreds, Thouſands, and Millions of years, and of all ſins whatſoever, were granted to ſuch as devoutly ſaid ſuch Collects: but it was always underſtood that they muſt confeſs and be abſolved, which is the meaning of thoſe Expreſſions concerning their being in a ſtate of Grace. And ſo the whole buſineſs was a Cheat.

Collection Number 26.

And now all this Trade was laid aſide, and Confeſſion of ſecret ſins was left to all Mens free choice: ſince it was certain that the Confeſſion to a Prieſt was no where enjoyned in the Scriptures. It was a reaſonable Objection, that as ſecret Confeſſion and Private Penance had worn out the primitive practice of the publick cenſuring of ſcandalous Perſons,

ſo it had been well if the reviving of that Diſcipline had driven out theſe later Abuſes: but to let that lie unreſtored, and yet to let Confeſſion wear out, was to diſcharge the world of all outward reſtraints, and to leave them to their full liberty, and ſo to throw up that Power of Binding and Looſing, which ought to take place, chiefly, in admitting them to the Sacrament. This was confeſſed to be a great defect, and effectual endeavours were uſed to retrieve it, though without ſucceſs: and it was openly declared to be a thing which they would ſtudy to repair: But the total diſuſe of all publick cenſure had made the Nation ſo unacquainted with it, that without the effectual concurrence of the Civil Authority, they could not compaſs it. And though it was acknowledged to be a great diſorder in the Church, yet as they could not keep up the neceſſity of private Confeſſion, ſince it was not commanded in the Goſpel; ſo the generality of the Clergy being ſuperſtitious Men, whoſe chief influence on the People was by thoſe ſecret Practices in Confeſſion, they judged it neceſſary to leave that free to all People, and to repreſent it as a thing to which they were not obliged, and in the place of that ordered the general Confeſſion to be made in the Church, with the Abſolution added to it. For the Power of Binding and Looſing, it was by many thought to be only Declarative; and ſo to be exerciſed, when the Goſpel was preached, and a General Abſolution granted, according to the Ancient Forms. In which Forms, the Abſolution was a Prayer that God would abſolve; and ſo it had been ſtill uſed in the Abſolution which was given on Maundy-Thurſday: but the Formal Abſolution given by the Prieſt in his own Name, I abſolve thee, was a late invention to raiſe their Authority higher, and ſignified nothing diſtinct from thoſe other Forms that were anciently uſed in the Church. 1548.

Others cenſured the Words in diſtributing the two kinds in the Lords Supper: the Body being given for the preſerving the Body, and the Blood of Chriſt for preſerving the Soul. This was thought done on deſign to poſſeſs the People with an high value of the Chalice, as that which preſerved their Souls; whereas the Bread was only for the preſervation of their Bodies. But Cranmer being ready to change any thing for which he ſaw good reaſon, did afterwards ſo alter it, that in both it was ſaid, Preſerve thy Body and Soul. And yet it ſtands ſo in the Prayer, We do not preſume, &c. On all this I have digreſſed ſo long, becauſe of the importance of the matter, and for ſatisfying the Scruples that many ſtill have upon the laying aſide of Confeſſion in our Reformation.

Commiſſions were next given to examine the ſtate of the Chantries and Guildable Lands. The Inſtruction about them will be found in the Collection, of which I need give no abſtract here, for they were only about the Methods of enquiring into their value, and how they were poſſeſſed, or what Alienations had been made of them. Collection Number 27.

The Protector and Council were now in much trouble. The War with Scotland they found was like to grow chargable, ſince they ſaw it was ſupported from France. There was a Rebellion alſo broke out in Ireland, and the King was much indebted, nor could they expect any Subſidies from the Parliament; in which it had been ſaid that they gave the Chantry Lands, that they might be delivered from all Subſidies. Therefore the Parliament was prorogued till Winter. Upon this the 1548. whole Council did on the 17*th.* of April unanimouſly reſolve, that it was neceſſary to ſell 5000 l. a year of Chantry Lands for raiſing ſuch a Sum as the Kings occaſions required, and Sir Hen. Mildmay was appointed to treat about the Sail of them.

Gardiner falls into new Troubles.

The new Communion-Book was received over England without any oppoſition. Only complaints were brought of Gardiner, that he did ſecretly detract from the Kings Proceedings. Upon which the Council took occaſion to reflect on all his former behaviour. And here it was remembred, how at firſt upon his refuſing to receive the Kings Injunctions, he had been put in the Fleet; where he had been as well uſed, as if it had been his own Houſe; (which is far contrary to his Letters to the Protector, of which mention has been already made) and that he upon promiſe of Conformity had been diſcharged. But when he was come home, being forgetful of his Promiſes; he had raiſed much ſtrife and contention, and had cauſed all his Servants to be ſecretly armed and harneſſed, and had put publick affronts on thoſe whom the Council ſent down to preach in his Dioceſs; for in ſome Places, to diſgrace them, he went into the Pulpit before them, and warned the People to beware of ſuch Teachers, and to receive no other Doctrine but what he had taught them. Upon this he had been ſent for a ſecond time, but again upon his Promiſe of Conformity was diſcharged, and ordered to ſtay at his own Houſe in London. That there he had continued ſtill to meddle in publick Matters, of which being again admoniſhed, he deſired that he might be ſuffered to clear himſelf of all miſrepreſentations that had been made of him, in a Sermon which he ſhould preach before the King, in which he ſhould openly declare how well he was ſatisfied with his Proceedings: yet it is added, That in his Sermon, where there was a wonderful Audience, he did moſt arrogantly meddle with ſome Matters that were contrary to an expreſs command given him both by word of Mouth and by Letters; and in other Mattters uſed ſuch words as had almoſt raiſed a great Tumult in the very time, and had ſpoken very ſeditiouſly concerning the Policy of the Kingdom. So they ſaw that Clemency wrought no good effect on him; and it ſeeming neceſſary to terrifie others by their Proceedings with him, he was ſent to the Tower, and the door of his Cloſet was ſealed up. Thus it is entred in the Council-Book, Signed E. Somerſet, T. Cantuarien. W. St. Johns, J. Ruſſel, and T. Cheyney. Yet it ſeems this Order was not Signed when it was made, but ſome years after. For the Lord Ruſſel Signed firſt Bedford, but remembring that at the time when this Order was made he had not that Title, therefore he daſhed it out, (but ſo as it ſtill appears) and Signed, J. Ruſſel.

Fox's Acts and Monuments.

The account that Gardiner himſelf gives of this Buſineſs, is, That being diſcharged upon the Act of Pardon, he was deſired to promiſe that he would ſet forth the Homilies; and a Form was given him to which he ſhould ſet his Hand; but he, conſidering of it a fortnight, returned, and ſaid he could not ſubſcribe it: ſo he was confined to his Houſe. Then Ridley and Mr. Cecil, (afterwards the great Lord Burleigh, Lord Treaſurer to Queen Eliz. at that time Secretary to the Protector) were ſent to him, and ſo prevailed, that he did ſet his Hand to it. But upon ſome Complaints that were made of him, he was ſent for after Whit-Sunday, and accuſed, that he had carried Palms, had crept to the Croſs, and had a Sepulchre

Sepulchre on Good-Friday, which was contrary to the Kings Proclamations: all which he denied, and ſaid, he had and would ſtill give obedience to what the King ſhould command. That of affronting the Kings Preachers was objected to him, to which he anſwered telling matter of fact how it was done, but he does not in his Writing ſet it down. Then it was complained, that in a Sermon he had ſaid, The Apoſtles came away rejoycing from the Council, the Council, the Council, repeating it thus, to make it ſeem applicable to himſelf. This he denied. Then it was objected, That he preached the Real Preſence in the Sacrament, the Word Real not being in Scripture, and ſo it was not the ſetting forth the pure Word of God: He ſaid he had not uſed the Word Real, only he had aſſerted the Preſence of Chriſt, in ſuch words as he had heard the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury diſpute for it againſt Lambert, that had been burnt. He was commanded to tarry in London; but he deſired, that ſince he was not an Offender, he might be at his liberty. He complained much of the Songs made of him, and of the Books written againſt him, and particularly of one Philpot in Weſtminſter, whom he accounted a mad Man. 1548.

Then he relates, That Cecil came to him, and propoſed to him to preach before the King, and that he ſhould write his Sermon; and alſo brought him ſome Notes which he wiſhed him to put in his Sermon: he ſaid he was willing to preach, but would not write it, for that was to preach as an Offender: nor would he make uſe of Notes prepared by other Men. Then he was privately brought to the Protector, none but the Lord St. John being preſent, who ſhewed him a Paper containing the opinion of ſome Lawyers, of the Kings Power, and of a Biſhops Authority, and of the Puniſhment of diſobeying the King: but he deſired to ſpeak with thoſe Lawyers, and ſaid, no ſubſcription of theirs ſhould oblige him to preach otherwiſe than as he was convinced. The Protector ſaid, he ſhould either do that, or do worſe. Secretary Smith came to him to preſs him further in ſome Points, but what they were is not mentioned. Yet by the other Papers in that Buſineſs it appears, they related to the Kings Authority when under Age, and for juſtifying the Kings proceedings in what had been done about the Ceremonies, and that Auricular Confeſſion was indifferent. So the Conteſt between him and the Protector ended; and there was no writing required of him; but he left the whole matter to him, ſo that he ſhould treat plainly of thoſe things mentioned to him by Cecil. He choſe St. Peters day, becauſe the Goſpel agreed to his purpoſe. Cecil ſhewed him ſome Notes, written with the Kings Hand, of the Sermons preached before him; eſpecially what was ſaid of the Duty of a King; and warned him, that when ever he named the King he ſhould add, and his Council. To this he made no Anſwer; for though he thought it wiſely done of a King to uſe his Council, yet being to ſpeak of the Kings Power according to Scripture, he did not think it neceſſary to add any thing of his Council: and hearing by a confuſed report ſome ſecret matter, he reſolved not to meddle with it. Two days before he preached, the Protector ſent him a Meſſage, not to meddle with thoſe Queſtions about the Sacrament; that were yet in controverſie among Learned Men; and that therefore he was reſolved there ſhould be no publick determination made of them before-hand in the Pulpit. He ſaid, he could not forbear to ſpeak of the Maſs, for he looked on it as the 1548. the chief foundation of Christian Religion: but he doubted not that he should so speak of it, as to give them all content. So the day following the Protector writ to him, (as will be found in the Collection) requiring him in the Kings Name, not to meddle with these points, but to preach concerning the Articles given him, and about Obedience, and good Life, which would afford him matter enough for a long Sermon: since the other points were to be reserved to a publick Consultation. The Protector added, That he held it a great part of his Duty under the King, not to suffer wilful Persons to dissuade the People from receiving such Truths as should be set forth by others. But Gardiner pretended that there was no Controversie about the Presence of Christ. And so the next day he took his Text out of the Gospel for the day, Thou art Christ, &c. In his Sermon (of which I have seen large Notes) he expressed himself very fully concerning the Popes Supremacy as justly abolished, and the Suppression of Monasteries and Chantries; he approved of the Kings Proceedings; he thought Images might have been well used, but yet they might be well taken away. He approved of the Sacrament in both kinds, and the taking away that great number of Masses satisfactory, and liked well the new Order for the Communion. But he asserted largely the Presence of Christs Flesh and Blood in the Sacrament: Upon which many of the Assembly, that were indiscreetly hot on both sides, cried out, some approving, and others disliking it. Of the Kings Authority under Age, and of the Power of the Council in that Case, he said not a word: and upon that he was imprisoned.

Parkers MSS. Ex C. Ch. Col. Cant.

He preached before the King.

The occasion of this was, the Popish Clergy began generally to have it spread among them, that though they had acknowledged the Kings Supremacy, yet they had never owned the Councils Supremacy. That the Council could only see to the execution of the Laws and Orders that had been made, but could not make new ones; and that therefore the Supremacy could not be exercised, till the King, in whose Person it was vested, came to be of Age to consider of Matters himself. Upon this, the Lawyers were consulted; who did unanimously resolve, that the Supremacy being annexed to the Regal Dignity, was the same in a King under Age, when it was executed by the Council, that it was in a King at full Age; and therefore, things ordered by the Council now, had the same Authority in Law that they could have when the King did act himself. But this did not satisfie the greater part of the Clergy. Some of whom, by the high Flatteries that had been given to Kings in King Henry's time, seemed to fancy that there were degrees of Divine Illumination derived unto Princes, by the anointing them at the Coronation; and these not exerting themselves till a King attained to a ripeness of understanding, they thought the Supremacy was to lie dormant while he was so young. The Protector and Council endeavoured to have got Gardiner to declare against this, but he would not meddle in it. How far he might set forward the other Opinion, I do not know. These Proceedings against him were thought too severe, and without Law; but he being generally hated, they were not so much censured, as they had been, if they had fallen on a more acceptable Man.

And thus were the Orders made by the Council generally obeyed; many being terrified with the usage Gardiner met with, from which others inferred what they might look for, if they were refractory, when so great a Bishop was so treated.

The

The next thing Cranmer ſet about, was the compiling of a Catechiſm or large inſtruction of young Perſons in the Grounds of the Chriſtian Religion. In it, he reckons the two firſt Commandments but one; though, he ſays, many of the Ancients divided them in two. But the diviſion was of no great conſequence, ſo no part of the Decalogue were ſuppreſſed by the Church. He ſhewed that the excuſes the Papiſts had for Images, were no other than what the Heathens brought for their Idolatry; who alſo ſaid, they did not worſhip the Image, but that only which was repreſented by it. He particularly takes notice of the Image of the Trinity. He ſhews how St. Peter would not ſuffer Cornelius, and the Angel would not ſuffer St. John to worſhip them. The believing that there is a vertue in one Image more than in another, he accounts plain Idolatry. Ezekias broke the Brazen Serpent, when abuſed, though it was a Type or Image of Chriſt, made by Gods command, to which a miraculous Vertue had been once given. So now there was good reaſon to break Images, when they had been ſo abuſed to ſuperſtition and Idolatry; and when they gave ſuch ſcandal to Jews and Mahometans, who generally accounted the Chriſtians Idolaters on that account. He aſſerts, beſides the two Sacraments, of Baptiſm, and the Lords Supper, the power of reconciling Sinners to God, as a third; and fully owns the Divine Inſtitution of Biſhops and Prieſts; and wiſhes that the Canons and Rites of it publick Penence were again reſtored; and exhorts much to Confeſſion, and the Peoples dealing with their Paſtors about their Conſciences, that ſo they might, upon knowledge, bind and looſe according to the Goſpel. Having finiſhed this eaſie, but moſt uſeful work, he dedicated it to the King. And in his Epiſtle to him, complains of the great neglect, that had been in former times, of Catechiſing; and that Confirmation had not been rightly adminiſtred, ſince it ought to be given only to theſe of Age, who underſtood the Principles of the Chriſtian Doctrine, and did upon knowledge, and with ſincere minds, renew their Baptiſmal Vow. From this it will appear, that from the beginning of this Reformation, the practice of the Roman Church in the matter of Images was held Idolatrous. Cranmer's zeal for reſtoring the Penitentiary Canons is alſo clear: and it is plain, that he had now quite laid aſide thoſe ſingular opinions which he formerly held of the Eccleſiaſtical Functions; for now, in a Work which was wholly his own, without the concurrence of any others, he fully ſets forth their Divine Inſtitution.

1548. Cranmer ſets out a Catechiſm.

All theſe things made way for a greater Work, which theſe ſelected Biſhops and Divines, who had laboured in the ſetting forth of the Office of the Communion, were now preparing; which was the entire Reformation of the whole Service of the Church. In order to this, they brought together all the Offices uſed in England. In the Southern Parts, thoſe after the uſe of Sarum were univerſally received, which were believed to have been compiled by Oſmund Biſhop of Sarum. In the North of England, they had other Offices, after the uſe of York. In South-Wales they had them after the uſe of Hereford. In North-Wales after the uſe of Bangor. And in Lincoln, another ſort of an Office proper to that See.

A General Reformation of all the Offices of the Church is ſet about.

In the primitive Church, when the extraordinary Gifts ceaſed, the Biſhops of the ſeveral Churches put their Offices and Prayers into ſuch a Method, 1547. Method, as was neareſt to what they had heard or remembred from the Apoſtles. And theſe Liturgies were called by the Apoſtles Names from whoſe Forms they had been compoſed; as that at Jeruſalem carried the Name of St. James, and that of Alexandria the Name of St. Mark; though thoſe Books that we have now under theſe Names are certainly ſo interpolated, that they are of no great Authority: But in the fourth Century we have theſe Liturgies firſt mentioned. The Council of Laodicea appointed the ſame Office of Prayers to be uſed in the Mornings and Evenings. The Biſhops continued to draw up new Additions, and to put old Forms into other Methods. But this was left to every Biſhops care, nor was it made the Subject of any publick Conſultation, till St. Auſtins time; when in their dealings with Hereticks, they found they took advantages from ſome of the Prayers that were in ſome Churches. Upon this he tells us, it was ordered, that there ſhould be no Prayers uſed in the Church, but upon common advice: after that the Liturgies came to be more carefully conſidered. Formerly the Worſhip of God was a pure and ſimple thing, and ſo it continued, till Superſtition had ſo infected the Church that thoſe Forms were thought too naked, unleſs they were put under more Artificial Rules, and dreſſed up with much Ceremony. Gregory the Great was the firſt that took much care to make the Church Muſick very regular, and he did alſo put the Liturgies in another Method than had been formerly uſed. Yet he had no ſuch fondneſs of his own compoſures; but left it to Auſtin the Monk, whom he ſent over into England, when he conſulted him in it, either to uſe the Roman or French Rituals, or any other, as he ſhould find they were moſt likely to edifie the People. After this, in moſt Sees there were great variations; for as any Prelate came to be Canonized, or held in high eſteem by the People, ſome private Collects or particular Forms that he had uſed, were practiſed in his, or perhaps, as his Fame ſpread in the neighbouring Dioceſes. In every Age there were notable Additions made: and all the Writers almoſt, in the 8th. and 9th. Centuries, employed their Fancies to find out myſtical ſignifications for every Rite that was then uſed; and ſo, as a new Rite was added, it was no hard matter to add ſome Myſtery to it. This had made the Offices ſwell out of meaſure, and there was a great variety of them, Miſſals, Breviaries, Rituals, Pontificals, Portoiſes, Pies, Gradualls, Antiphonalls, Pſalteries, Hours, and a great many more. Every Religious Order had likewiſe their peculiar Rites, with the Saints days that belonged to their Order, and Services for them; and the underſtanding how to officiate was become ſo hard a piece of the Trade, that it was not eaſie to learn it exactly, without a long practice in it. So now it was reſolved to correct and examine theſe.

It was reſolved there ſhould be a new Liturgy.

I do not find it was ever brought under conſideration, whether they ſhould compoſe a Form for all the Parts of Divine Worſhip, or leave it to the ſudden and extemporary heats of thoſe who were to officiate, which ſome have called ſince that time, The worſhiping by the Spirit: Of this way of ſerving God, they did not then dream; much leſs that the appointing of Forms of Prayer was an encroaching on the Kingly Office of Chriſt, but thought, what ever praying in the Spirit might have been in the Apoſtles time, (where yet every man brought his Pſalms, which are a ſort of Prayers, as well as Praiſes, and theſe look like ſome written written Compoſures, as St. Paul expreſſes it) that now to pray with warm affection and ſincere devotion was Spiritual Worſhip: and that where it was the ſame thing that was to be daily asked of God, the uſing the ſame expreſſions, was the ſign of a ſteady devotion, that was fixed on the thing prayed for; whereas the heat that new words raiſed, looked rather like a warmth in the fancy. Nor could it agree with the Principles of a Reformation, that was to deveſt the Church-men of that unlimited Authority which they had formerly exerciſed over Mens Conſciences, to leave them at liberty to make the People pray after them, as they pleaſed; this being as great a reſignation of the People, when their devotion depended on the ſudden heats of their Paſtors, as the former Superſtition had made of their Faith and Conſcience to them. So it being reſolved to bring the whole Worſhip of God under ſet Forms, they ſet one General Rule to themſelves, (which they afterwards declared) of changing nothing for novelties ſake, or meerly becauſe it had been formerly uſed. They reſolved to retain ſuch things as the Primitive Church had practiſed, cutting off ſuch abuſes as the later ages had grafted on them, and to continue the uſe of ſuch other things, which, though they had been brought in not ſo early, yet were of good uſe to beget devotion; and were ſo much recommended to the People by the practice of them, that the laying theſe aſide would perhaps have alienated them from the other changes they made. And therefore they reſolved to make no change without very good and weighty reaſons. In which they conſidered the practice of our Saviour; who did not only comply with the Rites of Judaiſm himſelf, but even the Prayer he gave to his Diſciples, was framed according to their Forms; and his two great Inſtitutions of Baptiſm, and the Euchariſt, did conſiſt of Rites that had been uſed among the Jews. And ſince he who was delivering a new Religion, and was authorized in the higheſt manner that ever any was, did yet ſo far comply with received Practices, as from them to take thoſe which he ſanctified for the uſe of his Church; it ſeemed much fitter for thoſe who had no ſuch extraordinary warrant to give them Authority in what they did, when they were reforming abuſes, to let the World ſee, they did it not from the wanton deſire of change, or any affectation of novelty: and with thoſe reſolutions they entred on their Work. 1548.

In the ſearch of the former Offices, they found an infinite deal of ſuperſtition, in the Conſecrations, of Water, Salt, Bread, Incenſe, Candles, Fire, Bells, Churches, Images, Altars, Croſſes, Veſſels, Garments, Palms, Flowers; all looked like the Rites of Heatheniſm, and ſeemed to ſpring from the ſame Fountain. When the Water or Salt were bleſſed, it was expreſſed to be to this end, that they might be health both to Soul and Body, and Devils (who might well laugh at theſe tricks which they had taught them) were adjured not to come to any place where they were ſprinkled: and the Holy Bread was bleſſed, to be a defence againſt all Diſeaſes, and ſnares of the Devil: and the Holy Incenſe, that Devils might not come near the ſmoak of it, but that all who ſmelled at it might perceive the Vertue of the Holy Ghoſt: and the Aſhes were bleſſed ſo, that all who were covered with them, might deſerve to obtain the remiſſion of their ſins. All thoſe things had drawn the People to ſuch confidence in them, that they generally thought that, without thoſe harder terms of true holineſs, they might upon ſuch ſuperſtitious 1548. observances be sure of Heaven. So all these they resolved to cast out, as things which had no warrant in Scripture, and were vain devices to draw Men away from a lively application to God through Christ, according to the method of the Gospel. Then the many Rites in Sacramental Actions were considered, all which had swelled up to an infinite heap. And as some of these, which had no foundation in Scripture, were thrown out; so the others were brought back to a greater simplicity. In no part of Religion was the corruption of the former Offices more remarkable, than in the Priests granting Absolution to the Living, and the Dead. To such as confessed, the Absolution was thus granted; I absolve thee in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. To which this was added. And I grant to thee that all the Indulgences, given, or to be given thee, by any Prelate, with the Blessings of them, all the Sprinklings of Holy Water, all the Devout Beatings of thy Breast, the Contritions of thy Heart, this Confession, and all thy other devout Confessions, all thy Fastings, Abstinencies, Almsgivings, Watchings, Disciplines, Prayers, and Pilgrimages, and all the good thou hast done, or shall do, and all the evils thou hast suffered, or shall suffer, for God; the Passions of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Merits of the Glorious and Blessed Virgin Mary, and of all other Saints, and the suffrages of all the Holy Catholick Church, turn to thee for the remission of these, and all other thy sins, the encrease of thy Merits, and the attainment, of Everlasting Rewards. When Extream Unction was given to dying Persons, they applied it to the Ears, Lips, Nose, and other Parts, with this Prayer; By this Holy Unction, and his own most tender Mercy, and by the Intercession of the Blessed Virgin, and all the Saints, may God pardon thee whatever thou hast sinned, by thy Hearing, Speaking, or Smelling, and so in the other Parts. And when the dead Body was laid in the Grave, this Absolution was said over it; The Lord Jesus Christ, who gave to St. Peter and his other Disciples power to bind and loose, absolve thee from all the guilt of thy sins; and in so far as is committed to my weakness, be thou absolved before the Tribunal of our Lord, and may thou have Eternal Life, and live for evermore. This was thought the highest abuse possible; when in giving the hopes of Heaven, and the pardon of sins, which were of all the other parts of Religion the most important, there were such mixtures: and that which the Scriptures had taught could be only attained by Jesus Christ, and that upon the sincere belief and obedience of his Gospel, was now ascribed to so many other procuring Causes. These things had possessed the World with that conceit that there was a trick for saving Souls, besides that plain method which Christ had taught; and that the Priests had the secret of it in their Hands; so that those who would not come under the Yoak of Christ, and be saved that way, needed only to apply themselves to Priests, and purchase their favour, and the business would be done.

There were two other changes, which run through the whole Offices. The one was, The translating them into a Vulgar Tongue. The Jewish Worship was either in Hebrew, or, after the Captivity, in the Syriack, the Vulgar Tongues of Palestine. The Apostles always officiated in the Tongues that were best understood: So that St. Paul did copiously censure those who in Prayers or Psalms, used any Language that was not understood. And Origen, Basil, with all the Fathers that had occasion to mention this, this, took notice, that every one in their own Tongue worſhipped God. After the renting of the Roman Empire by the Goths, and other barbarous Nations, the Roman Tongue did ſlowly mix with their Tongues, till it was much changed, and altered from it ſelf by degrees; yet it was ſo long a doing that, that it was not thought neceſſary to tranſlate the Liturgy into their Languages. But in the ninth Century, when the Slavons were converted, it being deſired that they might have Divine Offices in their own Language; while ſome oppoſed it, a Voice was ſaid to be heard, Let every Tongue praiſe God; Upon which, Pope John the 8*th*. writ to Methodius their Biſhop, that it might be granted, and founded it on St. Pauls Epiſt. to the Cor. and on theſe words of David, Let every Tongue praiſe the Lord. And in the fourth Council of Lateran it was decreed, that Biſhops who lived in Places where they were mixed with Greeks, ſhould provide fit Prieſts for performing Divine Offices, according to the Rites and Language of thoſe to whom they miniſtred. But the Roman Church, though ſo merciful to the Greeks, and Slavons, was more cruel to the reſt of Europe; and ſince only Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, had been written on the Croſs of Chriſt by Pilate, they argued that theſe Languages were thereby conſecrated: though it is not eaſie to apprehend what Holineſs could be derived into theſe Tongues by Pilate, who ordered theſe Inſcriptions. It was alſo pretended, that it was a part of the Communion of Saints, that every where the Worſhip ſhould be in the ſame Tongue. But the truth was, they had a mind to raiſe the value of the Prieſtly Function, by keeping all Divine Offices in a Tongue not underſtood; which in People otherwiſe well ſeaſoned with ſuperſtition, might have that effect; but it did very much alienate the reſt of the World from them. There was alſo a vaſt number of Holy-days, formerly obſerved, with ſo many Prayers and Hymns belonging to them, and ſo many Leſſons that were to be read; which were many of them ſuch impudent Forgeries, that the whole Breviary and Miſſal being full of theſe, a great deal was to be left out. There is in the whole Breviary ſcarce one Saint, but the Leſſons concerning him contain ſome ridiculous Legend, ſuch as indeed could not be well read in a Vulgar Tongue without the ſcorn and laughter of the Hearers; and for moſt part the Prayers and Hymns do relate to theſe lying Stories. Many of the Prayers and Hymns were alſo in ſuch a Style, that the pardon of Sin, Grace, and Heaven, were immediately deſired from the Saints; as if theſe things had come from their Bounty, or by their Merits; or were given by them only, of which the Reader ſhall have a little taſt in the Collection, in ſome of the Addreſſes made to them. 1548.

Collection. Number 29.

The Reformers having thus conſidered the corruptions of the former Offices, were thereby better prepared to frame new ones. But the Prieſts had officiated in ſome Garments, which were appropriated to that uſe, as Surplices, Copes, and other Veſtments; and it was long under conſideration whether theſe ſhould continue. It was objected, that theſe Garments had been parts of the Train of the Maſs, and had been ſuperſtitiouſly abuſed, only to ſet it off with the more pomp. On the other hand it was argued, That as White was anciently the Colour of the Prieſts Garments in the Moſaical diſpenſation, ſo it was uſed in the African Churches in the fourth Century: And it was thought a natural expreſſion of the purity and decency that became Prieſts: beſides the 1548. Clergy were then generally extream poor, so that they could scarce afford themselves decent Cloaths; the People also running from the other Extream of submitting too much to the Clergy, were now as much enclined to despise them, and to make light of the Holy Function; so that if they should officiate in their own mean Garments, it might make the Divine Offices grow also into contempt. And therefore, it was resolved to continue the use of them; and it was said, that their being blessed, and used superstitiously, gave as strong an Argument against the use of Churches, and Bells; but that St. Paul had said, That every Creature of God was good, and even the Meat of the Sacrifice offered to an Idol, than which there could be no greater abuse, might lawfully be eaten; therefore they saw no necessity because of a former abuse to throw away Habits, that had so much decency in them, and had been formerly in use.

In the compiling the Offices, they began with Morning and Evening Prayer. These were put in the same Form they are now; only there was no Confession nor Absolution; the Office beginning with the Lords Prayer. In the Communion Service, the Ten Commandments were not said, as they are now; but in other things, it was very near what it is now. All that had been in the Order of the Communion formerly mentioned was put into it. The Offertory was to be made of Bread and Wine mixed with Water. Then was said the Prayer for the state of Christs Church, in which they gave thanks to God for his wonderful Grace declared in his Saints, in the blessed Virgin, the Patriarchs, Apostles, Prophets, and Martyrs; and they commended the Saints departed to Gods Mercy and Peace, that at the day of the Resurrection we with them might be set on Christs Right Hand. To this, the consecratory Prayer which we now use, was joyned as a part of it; only with these words that are since left out, With thy Holy Spirit vouchsafe to Bless, and Sanctifie, these thy Gifts and Creatures of Bread and Wine, that they may be unto us the Body and Blood of thy most dearly beloved Son, &c. To the Consecration was also joyned the Prayer of Thanksgiving now used. After the Consecration, all Elevation was forbidden, which had been first used as a Rite expressing how Christ was lifted up on the Cross; but was, after the belief of the Corporal Presence, made use of to shew the Sacrament, that the People might all fall down and worship it. And it was ordered, That the whole Office of the Communion, except the Consecratory Prayer, should be used on all Holy-days, when there was no Communion, to put People in mind of it, and of the Sufferings of Christ. The Bread was to be unleavened, round, but no print on it, and somewhat thicker than it was formerly. And though it was anciently put in the Peoples Hands, yet because some might carry it away, and apply it to superstitious uses, it was ordered to be put by the Priest into their Mouths. It is clear that Christ delivered it into the Hands of the Apostles, and it so continued for many Ages, as appears by several remarkable Stories of Holy Men carrying it with them in their Journeys. In the Greek Church where the Bread and Wine were mingled together, some began to think it more decent to receive it in little Spoons of Gold, than in their Hands; but that was condemned by the Council in Trullo: Yet soon after they began in the Latin Church to appoint Men to receive it with their Hands, but Women to take it in a Linnen

Linnen Cloth, which was called their Dominical. But when the belief of the Corporeal Preſence was received, then a new way of receiving was invented among other things to ſupport it: the People were now no more to touch that which was conceived to be the Fleſh of their Saviour, and therefore the Prieſts Thumb and Fingers were particularly anointed, as a neceſſary diſpoſition for ſo holy a Contact, and ſo it was by them put into the Mouths of the People. A Letany was alſo gathered, conſiſting of many ſhort Petitions, interrupted by Suffrages between them: and was the ſame that we ſtill uſe, only they had one Suffrage that we have not, to be delivered from the tyranny of the Biſhop of Rome, and all his deteſtable enormities. 1548.

In Baptiſm there was, beſides the Forms which we ſtill retain, a Croſs at firſt made on the Childs Forehead, and Breaſt, with an adjuration of the Devil to go out of him, and come at him no more. Then the Prieſt was to take the Child by the Right Hand, and to place him within the Font: there he was to be dipt thrice, once on the right ſide, once on the left, and once on the Breaſt; which was to be diſcreetly done: but if the Child were weak, it was ſufficient to ſprinkle Water on his Face. Then was the Prieſt to put a White Veſtment or Chryſome on him, for a token of Innocence, and to anoint him on the Head, with a Prayer for the Unction of the Holy Ghoſt. In Confirmation, thoſe that came, were to be Catechiſed, which having in it a formal engagement to make good the Baptiſmal Vow, was all that was asked: (The Catechiſm then was the ſame that is now, only there is ſince added an Explanation of the Sacraments:) This being ſaid, the Biſhop was to Sign them with the Croſs, and to lay his Hands on them, and ſay, I Sign thee with the Sign of the Croſs, and lay my Hands on thee, in the Name of the Father, &c. The Sick, who deſired to be anointed, might have the Unction on their Forehead, or their Breaſt only; with a Prayer, that as their Body was outwardly anointed with Oyl, ſo they might receive the Holy Ghoſt, with Health, and victory over Sin, and Death. At Funerals, they recommended the Soul departed to Gods Mercy, and prayed that his ſins might be pardoned, that he might be delivered from Hell, and carried to Heaven, and that his Body might be raiſed at the laſt day.

They alſo took care that thoſe who could not come, or be brought to Church, ſhould not therefore be deprived of the uſe of the Sacraments. The Church of Rome had raiſed the belief of the indiſpenſable neceſſity of the Sacraments ſo high, that they taught they did ex opere operato by the very action it ſelf without inward acts, juſtifie and confer Grace, unleſs there were a barr put to it by the Receiver: and the firſt riſe of the Queſtions about Juſtification ſeems to have come from this: For that Church teaching that Men were juſtified by Sacramental Actions, the Reformers oppoſed this, and thought Men were juſtified by the Internal Acts of the Mind: If they had held at this, the Controverſie might have been managed with much greater advantages; which they loſt in a great meaſure by deſcending to ſome minuter ſubtleties. In the Church of Rome purſuant to their belief concerning the neceſſity of the Sacraments, Women were allowed in extream Caſes to Baptize: and the Midwives commonly did it; which might be the beginning of their being licenſed by Biſhops to exerciſe that Calling. And they alſo believed that a ſimple attrition with the Sacraments was ſufficient for Salvation in thoſe 1548. thoſe who were grown up, and upon theſe Grounds the Sacraments were adminiſtred to the Sick.

In the Primitive Church they ſent Portions of the Sacrament to thoſe who were ſick, or in Priſon: and did it not only without Pomp or Proceſſions, but ſent it often by the hands of Boys and other Laicks, as appears from the famed Story of Serapion: which as it ſhews they did not then believe it was the very Fleſh and Blood of Chriſt; ſo when that Doctrine was received it was a natural effect of that belief, to have the Sacrament carried by the Prieſt himſelf with ſome Pomp and Adoration. The Ancients thought it more decent and ſutable to the Communion of Saints to conſecrate the Elements only in the Church, and to ſend Portions to the Sick, thereby expreſſing their Communion with the reſt. The Reformers conſidering theſe things ſteered a middle courſe: They judged the Sacraments neceſſary, where they could be had; as appointments inſtituted by Chriſt: and though they thought it more expedient to have all Baptiſms done in the Church at the Fonts, than in private Houſes; thereby ſignifying that the Baptized were admitted to the Fellowſhip of that Church; yet ſince our Saviour had ſaid, That where two or three are gathered together he will be in the midſt of them: they thought it favoured too much of a Superſtition to the Walls or Fonts of Churches, to tie this Action ſo to theſe, that where Children, either through infirmity, or the ſharpneſs of Weather, could not be, without danger, carried to Church, they ſhould be denied Baptiſm. But ſtill they thought publick Baptiſm more expreſſive of the Communion of the Saints, ſo that they recommended it much, and only permitted the other in Caſes of neceſſity. This has ſince grown to a great abuſe; many thinking it a piece of ſtate to have their Children Baptized in their Houſes; and ſo bringing their pride with them even into the moſt Sacred Performances. There may be alſo a fault in the Miniſters, who are too eaſily brought to do it. But it is now become ſo univerſal, that all the endeavours of ſome of our Biſhops have not been able to bring it back, to the firſt deſign of not Baptizing in private Houſes; excepting only where there was ſome viſible danger in carrying the Children to Church.

As for the other Sacrament, it was thought by our Reformers, that according to the mind of the Primitive Church, none ſhould be denied it in their extremities: it never being more neceſſary, than at that time, to uſe all means that might ſtrengthen the faith, and quicken the devotion of dying perſons; it being alſo moſt expedient that they ſhould then profeſs their dying in the Faith, and with a good Conſcience, and in Charity with all Men; Therefore they ordered the Communion to be given to the Sick, and that before it was ſo given, the Prieſt ſhould examine their Conſciences; and upon the ſincere profeſſion of their Faith, and the Confeſſion of ſuch ſins as oppreſſed their Conſciences, with the doing of all that was then in their power, for the compleating of their Repentance, as the forgiving injuries, and dealing juſtly with all People, he ſhould give them the Peace of the Church in a formal Abſolution, and the Holy Euchariſt. But that they might avoid the pomp of vain Proceſſions on the one hand, and the indecencies of ſending the Sacrament by common Hands on the other, they thought it better to gather a Congregation about the Sick Perſon, and there to conſecrate and give give the Sacrament to that ſmall Aſſembly: where, as Chriſts Promiſe, of being in the midſt of two or three that were gathered together in his Name, ſhould have put an end to the weak exceptions ſome have made to theſe private Communions; ſo on the other hand it is to be feared, that the greater part retain ſtill too much of the Superſtition of Popery; as if the Prieſts Abſolution with the Sacrament, and ſome ſlight ſorrow for ſin, would be a ſure paſs-port for their admittance to Heaven: which it is certain can only be had, upon ſo true a Faith as carries a ſincere Repentance with a change of Heart and Life along with it: for to ſuch only the Mercies of God through the Merits of Jeſus Chriſt are applied in all ordinary Caſes. 1548.

The Preface to the Book of Common-Prayer.

To all this they prefixed a Preface concerning Ceremonies, the ſame that is ſtill before the Common-Prayer-Book. In which Preface they make a difference between thoſe Ceremonies that were brought in with a good intent, and were afterwards abuſed; and others that had been brought in out of a vanity and ſuperſtition at firſt, and grew to be more abuſed: The one they had quite rejected, the other they had reformed, and retained, for decency and edification. Some were ſo ſet on their old Forms, that they thought it a great matter to depart from any of them; others were deſirous to innovate in every thing; between both which they had kept a mean. The burthen of Ceremonies in St. Auſtins days was ſuch that he complained of them, then as intollerable, by which the ſtate of Chriſtians was worſe than that of the Jews; but theſe were ſwelled to a far greater number ſince his days, which did indeed darken Religion and had brought Chriſtians under a heavy Yoke. Therefore they had only reſerved ſuch as were decent, and apt to ſtir up Mens Minds with ſome good ſignification. Many Ceremonies had been ſo abuſed by ſuperſtition and avarice, that it was neceſſary to take them quite away: But ſince it was fit to retain ſome, for decency and order, it ſeemed better to keep thoſe which were old, than to ſeek new ones. But theſe that were kept, were not thought equal with Gods Law, and ſo were upon juſt cauſes to be altered: they were alſo plain, and eaſie to be underſtood, and not very ſubject to be abuſed. Nor did they in retaining theſe, condemn other Nations, or preſcribe to any but their own People. And thus was this Book made ready againſt the next meeting of Parliament.

Reflections made on the new Liturgy.

In it, the uſe of the Croſs was retained, ſince it had been uſed by the ancient Chriſtians, as a publick declaration that they were not aſhamed of the Croſs of Chriſt. Though they acknowledged this had been ſtrangely abuſed in the later Ages, in which the bare uſe of the Croſs was thought to have ſome Magical Vertue in it: and this had gone ſo far, that in the Roman Pontifical it was declared, that the Croſier Staff was to be worſhiped with that ſupream degree of Adoration, called Latria. But it was thought fit to retain it in ſome parts of Worſhip; and the rather, becauſe it was made uſe of among the People to defame the Reformers, that they had no Veneration for the Croſs of Chriſt. And therefore as an outward expreſſion of that, in the Sacrament of Baptiſm, and in the Office of Confirmation, and in the conſecration of the Sacramental Elements, it was ordered to be retained, but with this difference, that the Sign of the Croſs was not made with the opinion of any vertue or efficacy in it to drive away evil Spirits, or to preſerve one out of dangers;

1548. gers, which were thought Vertues that followed the uſe of it in the Roman Church; for in Baptiſm, as they uſed the Sign of the Croſs, they added an Adjuration to the evil Spirit not to violate it, and in the making it ſaid, Receive the Sign of the Croſs both in thy Forehead and in thy Heart, and take the Faith of the Heavenly Precepts. Thus a Sacramental Vertue was pretended to be affixed to it; which the Reformers thought could not be done without a Warrant from a Divine Inſtitution, of which it is plain there was none in Scripture. But they thought the uſe of it only as an expreſſion of the Belief of the Church, and as a Badge of Chriſtianity, with ſuch words added to it as could import no more, was liable to no exception. This ſeems more neceſſary to be well explained, by reaſon of the Scruples that many have ſince raiſed againſt ſignificant Ceremonies, as if it were too great a preſumption in any Church to appoint ſuch; ſince theſe ſeem to be of the nature of Sacraments. Ceremonies that ſignifie the Conveyance of a Divine Grace, and Vertue, are indeed Sacraments, and ought not to be uſed without an expreſs Inſtitution in Scripture: but Ceremonies that only ſignifie the ſenſe we have, which is ſometimes expreſſed as ſignificantly in dumb ſhows as in words, are of another kind; and it is as much within the power of the Church to appoint ſuch to be uſed, as it is to order Collects or Prayers, words and ſigns being but different ways of expreſſing our thoughts. The belief of Chriſts Corporal Preſence was yet under conſideration. And they obſerving wiſely how the Germans had broken, by their running too ſoon into Conteſts about that, reſolved to keep up ſtill the old general Expreſſions, of the Sacraments being the whole and true Body of Chriſt, without coming to a more particular explanation of it. The uſe of Oyl on ſo many occaſions, was taken from the Ancient Chriſtians, who, as Theophilus ſays, began early to be anointed; and underſtood thoſe words of St. Paul, of Gods anointing and ſealing, literally. It was alſo anciently applied to the receiving of Penitents. But it was not uſed about the Sick, from the Apoſtles times till about the 10*th. Century.* And then, from what St. James writ to thoſe in the Diſperſion, of ſending for the Elders to come to ſuch as were ſick, who ſhould anoint them with Oyl, and their ſins ſhould be forgiven them, and they ſhould recover; they came to give it to thoſe that were dying; but not while there was any hope of Life left in them. Though it is clear, that what St. James writ, related to that extraordinary Gift of Healing, by impoſition of Hands, and anointing with Oyl, which yet continued in the Church when he writ that Epiſtle. And it is plain, that this Paſſage in St. James was not ſo underſtood by the Ancients, as it is now in the Roman Church; ſince the Ancients, though they uſed Oyl on many other occaſions, yet applied it not at all to the Sick, till after ſo many Ages, that groſs Superſtition had ſo diſpoſed the World to new Rites, that there could be no diſcovery or invention more acceptable, than the addition of a new Ceremony; though they were then much oppreſſed with the old ones.

The Changes that were made, and thoſe that were deſigned to be made, occaſioned great heats every where. And the Pulpits generally contending with one another; to reſtrain that claſhing, the power of granting Licences to Preach, was taken from the Biſhops of each Dioceſs, ſo that none might give them, but the King and the Arch-biſhop of of Canterbury. Yet that not proving an effectual reſtraint, on the 23*d*. of September a Proclamation is ſaid to have come out, ſetting forth, That whereas according to former Proclamations none was to preach, but ſuch as had obtained Licenſes from the King or the Arch biſhop; yet ſome of thoſe that were ſo licenſed, had abuſed that permiſſion, and had carried themſelves irreverently contrary to the Inſtructions that were ſent them. Therefore the King intending to have ſhortly an uniform Order over all the Kingdom, and to put an end to all Controverſies in Religion; about which ſome Biſhops and other Learned Men were then aſſembled; and though many of the Preachers ſo licenſed had carried themſelves wiſely, to the Honour of God, and the Kings great contentation; yet till the Order now preparing ſhould be ſet forth, he did inhibit all manner of Perſons to preach in any publick Audience; to the intent that the Clergy might apply themſelves to Prayer, for a Bleſſing on what the King was then about to do: not doubting but the People would be employed likewiſe in Prayer, and hearing the Homilies read in their Churches, and be ready to receive that uniform Order that was to be ſet forth: and the inferior Magiſtrates were required to ſee to the execution of this. I never met with any footſtep of this Proclamation, neither in Records, nor in Letters, nor in any Book written at that time. But Mr. Fuller has printed it, and Dr. Heylin has given an Abſtract of it from him. If Fuller had told how he came by it, it might have been further examined. But we know not whether he ſaw the printed Proclamation, or only a Copy of it. And if he ſaw but a Copy, we have reaſon to doubt of it; for that might have been only the Eſſay of ſome projecting Man's Pen. But becauſe I found it in thoſe Authors, I thought beſt to ſet it down as it is, and leave the Reader to judge of it. 1548. All Preaching was for a time reſtrained.

Having thus given an account of the Progreſs of the Reformation this Summer, I ſhall now turn to tranſactions of State, and ſhall firſt look towards Scotland. The Scots gaining time the laſt Winter, and being in daily expectation of Succours from France, were reſolved to carry on the War. The Governour began the Year with the Siege of Broughty Caſtle, a little below Dundee. But the Engliſh that were in it defended themſelves ſo well, that after they had been beſieged three Months, the Siege was raiſed, and only ſo many were left about it as might cover the Country from their excurſions. The Engliſh on the other ſide had taken, and fortified, Hadingtoun; and were at work alſo at Lauder to make it ſtrong. The former of theſe, lying in a Plain, and in one of the moſt fruitful Counties of Scotland, within twelve Miles of Edenburgh, was a very fit Place to be kept as a Curb upon the Country. About the end of May 6000 Men were ſent from France under the Command of Deſſe: 3000 of theſe were Germans, commanded by the Rhinegrave; 2000 of them were French, and a Thouſand were of other Nations. They landed at Lieth; and the Governour having gathered 8000 Scots to joyn with them, they ſate down before Hadingtoun; and here the Scottiſh Nobility entred into a long Conſultation about their Affairs. The Affairs in Scotland this Year.

The Protector had ſent a Propoſition to them, that there might be a Truce for Ten Years. (But whether he offered to remove the Gariſons, does not appear.) This he was forced to upon many accounts. He ſaw the War was like to laſt long, and to draw on great expence, and would certainly end in another War with France; he durſt not any more go from 1548. Court, and march himself at the Head of the Army, and leave the King to the Practices of his Brother: There were also great discontents in England, many were offended with the Changes made in Religion; the Commons complained generally of oppression, and of the enclosing of Grounds, of which the sad effects broke out next Year: He began to labour under the envy of the Nobility; the Clergy were almost all displeased with him; and the state of Affairs in Germany made it necessary to joyn with the King of France against the Emperour. All this made him very desirous of such a Peace with Scotland, as might at least preserve the Queen from being disposed of, for Ten Years. In that time, by Treaty and Pensions, they might hope to gain their ends; more certainly than by a War, which only inflamed the Scots against them; according to the witty Saying of one of the Scots, who being asked what he thought of the Match with England, said, he knew not how he should like the Marriage, but he was sure he did not like the way of wooing. On the other hand, the French pressed the Scots to send their young Queen into France, in the Ships that had brought over their Forces; who should be married to the Dolphin, and then they might depend on the Protection of France. Many were for accepting the Proposition from England, (particularly all those who secretly favoured the Reformation) they thought it would give them present quiet, and free them from all the distractions, which they either felt, or might apprehend, from a lasting War with so powerful an Enemy: whereas the sending away of their Queen would put them out of a capacity of obtaining a Peace, if the War this year proved as unsuccessful as it was the last; and the defence they had from France was almost as bad as the Invasions of the English, for the French were very insolent, and committed great disorders. But all the Clergy were so apprehensive of their ruine by the Marriage with England, that they never judged themselves safe till this thing was out of their power, by the sending their Queen into France. And it was said, that when once the English saw the hopes of the Marriage irrecoverably lost, they would soon grow weary of the War: for then the King of France would engage in the defence of Scotland with his whole Force, so that nothing would keep up the War so much as having their Queen still among them. To this many of the Nobility yielded, being corrupted by Money from France; and the Governour consented to it, for which he was to be made Duke of Chastelherault in France, and to have an Estate of 12000 Livres a year. And so it was agreed to send their Queen away. This being gained, the French Ships set sail to Sea, as if they had been to return to France; but sailed round Scotland by the Isles of Orkney, and came into Dunbriton Frith, near to which the Queen was kept in Dunbriton Castle; and receiving her from thence, with an Honourable Convoy that was sent to attend on her, they carried her over to Britaigne in France, and so by easie Journeys she was brought to Court, where her Unkles received her with great joy, hoping by her means to raise and establish their Fortunes in France.

The Scottish Queen is sent to France.

In the mean time the Siege of Hadingtoun was carried on with great valour, on both sides. The French were astonished at the courage, the nimbleness, and labours, of the Scotch Highlanders; who were half naked; but capable of great hardships, and used to run on with marvellous swiftswiftneſs. In one Sally which the Beſieged made, one of thoſe got an Engliſh Man on his Shoulders, and carried him away, with that quickneſs that nothing could ſtop him: and though the Engliſh Man bit him ſo in the Neck, that as ſoon as he had brought him into the Camp, he himſelf fell down as dead, yet he carried him off; for which he was nobly rewarded by Deſſie. The Engliſh defended themſelves no leſs couragiouſly; and though a Recruit of about 1000 Foot and 300 Horſe, that was ſent from Berwick, led by Sir Robert Bowes, and Sir Tho. Palmer, was ſo fatally intercepted, that they were almoſt all to a Man killed, yet they loſt no Heart. Another Party, of about 300, eſcaped the Ambuſh laid for them, and got into the Town, with a great deal of Ammunition and Proviſions, of which the Beſieged were come to be in want. But at the ſame time both Home Caſtle and Faſcaſtle were loſt. The former was taken by treachery: for ſome coming in as deſerters, ſeeming to be very zealous for the Engliſh quarrel, and being too much truſted by the Governour, and going often out to bring intelligence, gave the Lord Home notice, that on that ſide where the Rock was, the Engliſh kept no good Watches, truſting to the ſteepneſs of the Place; ſo they agreed that ſome ſhould come and climb the Rock, to whom they ſhould give aſſiſtance; which was accordingly done, and ſo it was ſurprized in the night. The Governour of Faſcaſtle had ſummoned the Country People to bring him in Proviſions; upon which (by a common Stratagem) Soldiers, coming as Country-men, threw down their Carriages at the Gates, and fell on the Sentinels: and ſo the Signal being given, ſome, that lay concealed near at hand, came in time to aſſiſt them, and took the Caſtle. 1548.

The Protector, till the Army was gathered together, ſent a Fleet of Ships to diſturb the Scots, by the deſcents they ſhould make in divers places: and his Brother being Admiral, he commanded him to go to his charge. He landed firſt in Fife, at St. Mimins, but there the Queens natural Brother, James, afterwards Earl of Murray, and Regent of Scotland, gathered the Country People together, and made Head againſt them. The Engliſh were 1200, and had brought their Cannon to Land; but the Scots charged them ſo home, that they forced them to their Ships: Many were drowned, and many killed; the Scots reckoned the number of the ſlain to be 600, and a hundred Priſoners taken. The next deſcent they made was no more proſperous to them. For landing in the night at Mountroſs, Erskin of Dun gathered the Country together, and divided them in three Bodies, ordering one to appear ſoon after the former had engaged: the Enemy, ſeeing a ſecond, and a third Body come againſt them, apprehending greater numbers, run back to their Ships; but with ſo much loſs, that of 800 who had landed, the third Man got not ſafe to the Ships again. So the Admiral returned, having got nothing but loſs and diſgrace by the Expedition. A Fleet ſent againſt Scotland. But was not ſucceſsful.

But now the Engliſh Army came into Scotland, commanded by the Earl of Shrewsbury: though both the Scotch Writers and Thuanus ſay, the Earl of Lennox had the chief command; but he only came with the Earl of Shrewsbury, as knowing the Country and People beſt, and ſo being the fitter both to get intelligence, and to negotiate, if there was room for it. The Scots were by this time gone home for the moſt part; and the Nobility with Deſſie agreed that it was not fit to put all to hazard, and therefore raiſed the Siege of Hadingtoun, and marched back to Edenburgh. The Lord Gray with a great part of the Engliſh Army followed him in the Rear, but did not engage him into any great Action: by which a good opportunity was loſt, for the French were in great diſorder. The Engliſh Army came into Hadingtoun. They conſiſted of about 17000 Men: of which Number 7000 were Horſe; and 3000 of the Foot were German Landsknights, whom the Protector had entertained in his Service. Theſe Germans were ſome of the broken Troops of the Proteſtant Army, who, ſeeing the ſtate of their own Country deſperate, offered their Service to the Protector. He too eaſily entertained them; reckoning, that being Proteſtants, they would be ſure to him, and would depend wholly on himſelf. But this proved a fatal Counſel to him; the Engliſh having been always jealous of a ſtanding, but much more of a Forreign Force about their Prince: ſo there was great occaſion given by this to thoſe who traded in ſowing Jealouſies among the People. The Engliſh, having victualled Hadingtoun, and repaired the Fortifications, returned back into their own Country. But had they gone on to Edenburgh, they had found things there in great confuſion. For Deſſie, when he got thither, having loſt 500 of his Men in the Retreat, went to quarter his Soldiers in the Town; but the Provoſt, (ſo is the chief Magiſtrate there called) oppoſed it. The French broke in with force, and killed him and his Son, with all they found in the Streets, Men, Women, and Children: and as a Spie, whom the Engliſh had in Edenburgh, gave them notice, the Scots were now more alienated from the French than from the Engliſh. The French had carried it very gently till the Queen was ſent away; but reckoned Scotland now a Conquered Country, and a Province to France. So the Scots began, though too late, to repent the ſending away of the Queen. But it ſeems the Engliſh had orders not to venture too far; for the hopes of the Marriage were now gone, and the Protector had no mind to engage in a War with France. Theſe things happened in the beginning of October. Deſſie, apprehending that at Hadingtoun they were now ſecure, the Siege being ſo lately raiſed, reſolved to try if he could carry the Place by ſurprize. The Engliſh from thence had made Excurſions as far as Edenburgh; in one of which the French fell on them, purſued them, and killed about 200, and took ſixſcore Priſoners, almoſt within their Works. Soon after, Deſſie marched in the night, and ſurprized one of their Out-works, and was come to the Gates; where the Place had been certainly loſt, if it had not been for a French Deſerter, who knew, if he were taken, what he was to expect. He therefore fired one of the great Cannon, which being diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of the French, killed ſo many, and put the reſt in ſuch diſorder, that Deſſie was forced to quit the Attempt. From thence he went and fortified Lieth, which was then but a mean Village; but the ſituation of the Place being recommended by the ſecurity it now had, it ſoon came to be one of the beſt Peopled Towns in Scotland. From thence he intended to have gone on, to take Broughty Caſtle, and to recover Dundee, which were then in the Hands of the Engliſh, but he was ordered by the Queen Regent to make an Inroad into England. There, after ſome ſlight Engagements, in which the Engliſh had the worſt, the Scotch and French came in as far as Newcaſtle, and returned loaded with Spoil: which the French divided among themthemſelves, allowing the Scots no ſhare of it. An Engliſh Prieſt was taken, who bore that diſgrace of his Country ſo heavily, that he threw himſelf on the ground, and would not eat, nor ſo much as open his Eyes, but lay thus proſtrate till he died. This the French, who ſeldom let their misfortunes afflict them, look'd on with much aſtoniſhment. But at that time, the Engliſh had fortified Inch-keith, an Iſland in the Frith, and put 800 Men in it. Seventeen days after that, Deſſie brought his Forces from Leith, and recovered it; having killed 400 Engliſh, and forced the reſt to ſurrender. 1548.

Thus ended this Year, and with it Deſſie's Power in Scotland. For the Queen Mother and the Governour had made great complaints of him at the Court of France, that he put the Nation to vaſt charge to little purpoſe; ſo that he was more uneaſie to his Friends than his Enemies: and his laſt diſorder at Edenburgh, had on the one hand ſo raiſed the inſolence of the French Soldiers, and on the other hand ſo alienated and inflamed the People, that unleſs another were ſent to command, who ſhould govern more mildly, there might be great danger of a defection of a whole Kingdom. For now, the Seeds of their diſtaſt of the French Government were ſo ſown, that Men came generally to condemn their ſending the Queen away; and to hate the Governour for conſenting to it, but chiefly, to abhor the Clergy, who had wrought it for their own ends. Diſcontents in Scotland.

Monſieur de Thormes was ſent over to command; and Monluc Biſhop of Valence came with him to govern the Councils, and be Chancellor of the Kingdom. He had lately returned from his Ambaſſy at Conſtantinople. He was one of the wiſeſt Men of that time, and was always for moderate Councils in Matters of Religion: which made him be ſometime ſuſpected of hereſie. And indeed the whole ſequel of his life declared him to be one of the greateſt Men of that Age: only his being ſo long, and ſo firmly, united to Queen Katharine Medici's Intereſt, takes off a great deal of the high Character which the reſt of his Life has given of him. But he was at this time unknown, and ill repreſented, in Scotland; where they that looked for advantages from their alliance with France, took it ill to ſee a French Man ſent over to enjoy the beſt Office in the Kingdom. The Queen Mother her ſelf was afraid of him: So to avoid new grounds of diſcontent, he left the Kingdom, and returned into France. Monluc ſent thither to be Lord Chancellor. But was not well received.

Thus ended the War between Scotland and England this Year, in almoſt an equal mixture of good and bad ſucceſs. The Engliſh had preſerved Hadingtoun, which was the chief matter of this Years Action. But they had been at great charge in the War, in which they were only on the defenſive: they had loſt other Places, and been unſucceſsful at Sea: and which was worſt of all, they had now loſt all hopes of the Marriage, and were almoſt engaged in a War with France, which was like to fall on the King, when his Affairs were in an ill condition, his People being divided and diſcontented at home, and his Treaſure much exhauſted by this War.

The ſtate of Germany was at this time moſt deplorable: The Pope and Emperor continued their quarrelling about the tranſlation of the Council. Mendoza at Rome, and Velaſco at Bologna, declared in the Emperors Name, that a Council being called by his great and long endeavours The Affairs of Germany.

1548. deavours for the quieting of Germany, and he being engaged in a War to get it to be received; and having procured a ſubmiſſion of the Empire to the Council, it was, upon frivolous and feigned cauſes, removed out of Germany, to one of the Popes Towns: by which the Germans thought themſelves diſengaged of their promiſe, which was to ſubmit to a Council in Germany: and therefore that he proteſted againſt it, as an unlawful Meeting, to whoſe Decrees he would not ſubmit; and that if they did not return to Trent, he would take care of ſetling Religion ſome other way. But the Pope, being encouraged by the French King, was not ill pleaſed to ſee the Emperor anew embroil himſelf with the Germans: and therefore intended the Council ſhould be continued at Bologna. Upon this the Emperor ordered three Divines, Julius Flugius Biſhop of Naumburg, Michael Sidonius, and Iſtebius Agricola, to draw a Form of Religion. The two former had been always Papiſts, and the latter was formerly a Proteſtant, but was believed to be now corrupted by the Emperor, that the Name of one of the Ausburg Confeſſion might make what they were to ſet out, paſs the more eaſily. They drew up all the Points of Religion in a Book which was beſt known by the Name of the Interim, becauſe it was to laſt during that Interval, till a General Council ſhould meet in Germany. In it, all the Points of the Romiſh Doctrine were ſet forth in the ſmootheſt terms poſſible: only married Men might officiate as Prieſts, and the Communion was to be given in both kinds. The Book being thus prepared, a Diet was ſummoned to Ausburg in Feb. where the firſt thing done was the ſolemn Inveſtiture of Maurice in the Electorate of Saxony. He had been declared Elector laſt year by the Emperor before Wittenberg; but now it was performed with great Ceremony on the 24*th.* of Feb. which was the Emperors Birth-day: John Frederick looking on with his uſual conſtancy of mind. All he ſaid, was, "Now they triumph in that Dignity, of which they have a-"gainſt Juſtice and Equity ſpoiled me: God grant they may enjoy it "peaceably and happily, and may never need any aſſiſtance from me or "my Poſterity. And without expreſſing any further concern about it, he went to his Studies, which were almoſt wholly employed in the Scriptures.

The Emperor being diſpleaſed with the Tranſlation of the Council, orders the Interim to be drawn.

Feb. Diet at Ausburg.

Feb. 24. Maurice made Elector of Saxony.

The Book of the Interim being prepared, the Elector of Brandenburgh ſent for Martin Bucer, who was both a learned and moderate Divine; and ſhewed it him. Bucer having read it, plainly told him, that it was nothing but downright Popery, only a little diſguiſed: at which the Elector was much offended, for he was pleaſed with it; and Bucer not without great danger returned back to Strasburg. On the 15*th.* of March, the Book was propoſed to the Diet: and the Elector of Mentz, without any order, did in all the Princes Names, give the Emperor thanks for it: which he interpreted as the aſſent of the whole Diet; and after that would not hear any that came to him to ſtop it, but publiſhed it as agreed to by the Diet.

March 15. The Interim received in the Diet.

The Papiſts offended at it as well as the Proteſtants.

At Rome, and Bologna, it was much condemned, as an high attempt in the Emperor to meddle with Points of Religion; ſuch as diſpenſing with the Marriage of Prieſts, and the Communion in both kinds. Wherefore ſome of that Church writ againſt it. And Matters went ſo high, that wiſe Men of that ſide began to fear the Breach between the Emperor and them might, before they were aware, be paſt reconciling: for they had had not forgot that the laſt Popes ſtiffneſs had loſt England, and they were not a little afraid they might now loſe the Emperor. But if the Pope were offended for the conceſſions in theſe two Particulars, the Proteſtants thought they had much greater cauſe to diſlike it; ſince in all other controverted Points it was againſt them. So that ſeveral of that ſide writ likewiſe againſt it. But the Emperor was now ſo much exalted with his ſucceſs, that he reſolved to go through with it, little regarding the oppoſition of either hand. The new Elector of Saxony went home, and offered it to his Subjects. But they refuſed to receive it, and ſaid, (as Sir Philip Hobbey, then Ambaſſador from England at the Emperors Court, writ over) that they had it under the Emperors Hand and Seal, that he ſhould not meddle with Matters of Religion, but only with reforming the Common-wealth: and that if their Prince would not protect them in this matter, they ſhould find another, who would defend them from ſuch oppreſſion. An Exhortation for the receiving of it was read at Ausburg; but they alſo refuſed it. Many Towns ſent their Addreſſes to the Emperor, deſiring him not to oppreſs their Conſciences. But none was of ſuch a nature as that from Linda, a little Town near Conſtance, which had declared for the Emperor in the former War. They returned anſwer, That they could not agree to the Interim, without incurring Eternal Damnation: but to ſhew their ſubmiſſion to him in all other things, they ſhould not ſhut their Gates, nor make reſiſtance, againſt any he ſhould find, though it were to ſpoil and deſtroy their Town. This let the Emperor and his Council ſee how difficult a work it would be to ſubdue the Conſciences of the Germans. But his Chancellor Granvell preſſed him to extream Councils, and to make an example of that Town, who had ſo peremptorily refuſed to obey his Commands. Yet he had little reaſon to hope he ſhould prevail on thoſe who were at liberty, when he could work ſo little on his Priſoner the Duke of Saxe. For he had endeavoured by great offers to perſwade him to agree to it: but all was in vain, for he always told them that kept him, that his Perſon was in their Power, but his Conſcience was in his own, and that he would not on any terms depart from the Ausburg Confeſſion. Upon this he was ſeverely uſed, his Chaplain was put from him, with moſt of his Servants; but he continued ſtill unmoved, and as cheerful as in his greateſt Proſperity. The Lutheran Divines entred into great diſputes how far they might comply. Melanchthon thought that the Ceremonies of Popery might be uſed, ſince they were of their own nature indifferent. Others, as Amſtorfius, Illiricus, with the greateſt part of the Lutherans, thought the receiving the Ceremonies would make way for all the errors of Popery; and though they were of their own nature indifferent, yet they ceaſed to be ſo, when they were enjoyned as things neceſſary to Salvation. But the Emperor going on reſolutely, many Divines were driven away; ſome concealed themſelves in Germany, others fled into Switzerland, and ſome came over into England.

Cotton Library Titus B. 2.

When the news of the Changes that were made here in England were carried beyond Sea, and after Peter Martyr's being with Cranmer, were more copiouſly written by him to his friends; Calvin, and Mar. Bucer, who began to think the Reformation almoſt oppreſt in Germany, now turned their Eyes more upon England. Calvin writ to the Protector on the 29*th.* of October, encouraging him to go on notwithſtanding the Wars: as Calvin writ to the Protector.

Heze-

1548. Hezekias had done in his Reformation. He lamented the heats of ſome that profeſſed the Goſpel, but complained that he heard there were few lively Sermons preached in England; and that the Preachers recited their diſcourſes coldly. He much approves a ſet-form of Prayers, whereby the conſent of all the Churches did more manifeſtly appear. But he adviſes a more compleat Reformation: he taxed the Prayers for the Dead, the uſe of Chriſme and Extream Unction, ſince they were no where recommended in Scripture. He had heard that the reaſon why they went no further was, becauſe the Times could not bear it; but this was to do the Work of God by Political Maximes; which though they ought to take place in other things, yet ſhould not be followed in Matters in which the Salvation of Souls was concerned. But above all things he complained of the great impieties and vices that were ſo common in England; as Swearing, Drinking, and Uncleanneſs; and prayed him earneſtly that theſe things might be looked after.

Bucer writ againſt Gardiner.

Martin Bucer writ alſo a Diſcourſe, congratulating the Changes then made in England, which was tranſlated into Engliſh by Sir Philip Hobbey's Brother. In it he anſwered the Book that Gardiner had written againſt him; which he had formerly delayed to do, becauſe King Henry had deſired he would let it alone, till the Engliſh and Germans had conferr'd about Religion. That Book did chiefly relate to the Marriage of the Clergy: Bucer ſhewed from many Fathers, that they thought every Man had not the Gift of Chaſtity, which Gardiner thought every one might have that pleaſed. He taxed the open lewdneſs of the Romiſh Clergy, who being much ſet againſt Marriage, which was Gods Ordinance, did gently paſs over the impurities which the forbidding it had occaſioned among themſelves. He particularly taxed Gardiner himſelf, that he had his Rents payed him out of Stews. He taxed him alſo for his ſtate and pompous way of living, and ſhewed how indecent it was for a Churchman to be ſent in Ambaſſies: and that St. Ambroſe, though ſent to make Peace, was aſhamed of it, and thought it unbecoming the Prieſthood. Both Fagius, and he, being forced to leave Germany, upon the buſineſs of the Interim, Cranmer invited them over to England; and ſent them to Cambridge, as he had done Peter Martyr to Oxford. But Fagius, not agreeing with this Air, died ſoon after, a Man greatly learned in the Oriental Tongues, and a good Expounder of the Scripture.

Nov. 24. Parliament ſits.

This being the ſtate of Affairs both abroad and at home, a Seſſion of Parliament was held in England on the 24*th*. of November, to which day it had been prorogued from the 15*th*. of October, by reaſon of the Plague then in London. The firſt Bill that was finiſhed, was that about the Marriage of the Prieſts. It was brought into the Houſe of Commons the 3*d*. of December, read the ſecond time on the 5*th*, and the third time the 6*th*. But this Bill being only that married Men might be made Prieſts, a new Bill was framed, that, beſides the former Proviſion, Prieſts might marry: This was read the firſt time the 7*th*, the ſecond time the 10*th*, and was fully argued on the 11*th*, and agreed on the 12*th*, and ſent up to the Lords on the 13*th*. of December. In that Houſe it ſtuck as long, as it had been ſoon diſpatched, by the Commons. It lay on the Table till the 9*th*. of February. Then it was read the firſt time, and the 11*th*. the ſecond time; on the 16*th*. it was committed to the Biſhops of Ely

Ely and Weſtminſter, the Lord Chief-Juſtice, and the Attorney-General: and on the 19*th.* of Feb. it was agreed to; the Biſhops of London, Dureſme, Norwich, Carliſle, Hereford, Worceſter, Briſtol, Chicheſter, and Landaff; and the Lords Morley, Dacres, Windſor, and Wharton, diſſenting. It had the Royal Aſſent, and ſo became a Law. The Preamble ſets forth, "That it were better for Prieſts and other Miniſters of the "Church to live chaſt and without Marriage; whereby they might bet- "ter attend to the Miniſtry of the Goſpel, and be leſs diſtracted with "ſecular cares, ſo that it were much to be wiſhed, that they would of "themſelves abſtain. But great filthineſs of living, with other incon- "veniences, had followed on the Laws that compelled Chaſtity, and "prohibited Marriage, ſo that it was better they ſhould be ſuffered to "marry, than be ſo reſtrained Therefore all Laws and Canons that "had been made againſt it, being only made by humane Authority, are "repealed. So that all Spiritual Perſons of what degree ſoever might "lawfully marry, providing they married according to the Order of the "Church. But a Proviſo was added, that becauſe many Divorces of Prieſts "had been made after the ſix Articles were enacted, and that the Women "might have thereupon married again, all theſe Divorces with every thing "that had followed on them, ſhould be confirmed, There was no Law that paſſed in this Reign with more contradiction and cenſure than this, and therefore the Reader may expect the larger account of this matter. 1548. An Act about the Marriage of the Clergy.

The unmarried ſtate of the Clergy had ſo much to be ſaid for it, as being a courſe of life that was more diſengaged from ſecular cares, and pleaſures; that it was caſt on the Reformers every where as a foul reproach, that they could not reſtrain their appetites, but engaged in a life that drew after it domeſtick cares, with many other diſtractions. This was an Objection ſo eaſie to be apprehended, that the People had been more prejudiced againſt the Marriage of the Clergy, if they had not felt greater inconveniences by the debaucheries of Prieſts; who being reſtrained from Marriage, had defiled the Beds, and deflow'red the Daughters of their Neighbours, into whoſe Houſes they had free and unſuſpected acceſs, and whom under the Cloak of receiving Confeſſions they could more eaſily entice. This made them that they were not ſo much wrought on by the noiſe of Chaſtity, (when they ſaw ſo much and ſo plainly to the contrary) as otherwiſe they would have been, by a thing that ſounded ſo well. But on the other hand, there was no Argument which the Reformers had more conſidered. There were two things upon which the Queſtion turned: The one was, the Obligation that Prieſthood brought with it to live unmarried; the other was, the tie they might be under by any Vow they had made. For the former, they conſidered, that God having ordained a Race of Men to be Prieſts under Moſes Law, who ſhould offer up expiatory Sacrifices for the ſins of the Jews, did not only not forbid Marriage, but made it neceſſary, for that office was to deſcend by inheritance; ſo that Prieſthood was not inconſiſtent with that ſtate. In the New Teſtament ſome of the qualifications of a Biſhop and Deacon are their being the Husband of one Wife, and their having well ordered their Houſe, and brought up their Children: St. Peter and other Apoſtles were married; it was thought St. Paul was ſo likewiſe; Aquila was certainly married to Priſcilla, and carried her about with him. Our Saviour, ſpeaking of the help that an unmarried ſtate was to the Kingdom Which was much enquired into. Arguments for it from Scripture.

1548. of God, recommended it equally to all Ranks of Men as they could bear it. St. Paul said, Let every Man have his own Wife; It is better to marry than to burn; and, Marriage is honourable in all; and the forbidding to marry is reckon'd by him a mark of the Apostacy of the latter times; so that the matter seemed clear from the Scriptures.

And from the Fathers. In the first Ages Saturninus, Basilides, Montanus, Novatus, and the Encratites condemned Marriage as a state of liberty more than was fit for Christians. Against those was asserted by the Primitive Fathers the lawfulness of Marriage to all Christians without discrimination: and they who entring into Holy Orders forsook their Wives, were severely condemned by the Apostolical Canons, and by the Council of Gangra in the beginning of fourth, and the Council in Trullo in the fifth Age. Many great Bishops in these times lived still with their Wives, and had Children by them, as namely both Nazianzen's and Basil's Fathers: and Hilary of Poictiers, when banished to Phrygia and very old, writing to his own Daughter Abra, bid her ask her Mother the meaning of those things which she by reason of her Age understood not; by which it appears that his Daughter was then very young, and by consequence born to him after he was Bishop. In the Council of Nice, it being proposed that Clergy-men should depart from their Wives, Paphnutius, though himself unmarried, opposed it as an unreasonable Yoke. And Heliodorus Bishop of Trica, the Author of the first of those Love-Fables, now known by the Name of Romances, being suspected of too much lasciviousness, and concerned to clear himself of that charge, did first move that Clergy-men should be obliged to live single, which the Historian says they were not tied to before, but Bishops as they pleased lived still with their Wives. The Fathers in those times extolled a single life very high, and yet they all thought a Man once married might be a Bishop though his Wife were yet living; they did not allow it indeed to him that had married twice; but for this they had a distinction, that if a Man had been once married before his Baptism, and again after his Baptism, he was to be understood to be in the state of a single Marriage. So that Jerome, who writ warmly enough against second Marriages, yet says, Ad Oceanum, that the Bishops in his Age who were but once married in that sence were not to be numbred, and that more of these could be reckoned than were at the Council of Ariminum, who are said to have been 800 Bishops. It is true that in that Age they began to make Canons against the Marriages of those who were in Orders, especially in the Roman and African Churches; but those were only Positive Laws of the Church, and the frequent repeating of those Canons shews that even there, they were not generally obeyed. Of Synesius we read, that when he was ordained Priest, he declared that he would not live secretly with his Wife as some did, but that he would dwell publickly with her, and wisht that he might have many Children by her. In the Eastern Church all their Clergy below the Order of Bishops are usually married before they be ordained, and afterward live with their Wives, and have Children by them, without any kind of Prohibition. In the Western Church the Married Clergy are taken notice of in many of the Spanish and Gallican Synods, and the Bishops and Priests Wives are called Episcopæ and Presbyteræ. In most of the Cathedrals of England the Clergy were married in the Saxon times, but as was shewn, Page 22. of the first Part, because they would not

not quit their Wives they were put out, not of Sacred Orders, but only out of the Seats they were then in, and thoſe were given to the Monks. When Pope Nicolas had preſſed the Cœlibate of the Clergy in the 9th. Century, there was great oppoſition made to it, chiefly by Huldericus Biſhop of Ausburg, who was held a Saint notwithſtanding this oppoſition. Reſtitutus Biſhop of London lived openly with his Wife: nor was the Cœlibate of the Clergy generally impoſed till Pope Gregory the 7th's time in the eleventh Century, who projecting to have the Clergy depend wholly on himſelf, and ſo to ſeparate them from the Intereſts of thoſe Princes in whoſe Dominions they lived, conſidered that by having Wives and Children they gave Pledges to the State where they lived, and reckoned that if they were free from this incumbrance, then their Perſons being Sacred, there would be nothing to hinder, but that they might do as they pleaſed in obedience to the Popes, and oppoſition to their own Princes Orders. The Writers near Gregory the 7th's time called this a new thing, againſt the Mind of the Holy Fathers, and full of raſhneſs in him thus to turn out married Prieſts. Lanfranc Arch-biſhop of Canterbury did not impoſe Cœlibate on the Clergy in the Villages, but only on thoſe that lived in Towns, and on Prebendaries. But Anſelm carried it further, and ſimply impoſed it on all the Clergy: yet himſelf laments that Sodomy was become then very common, and even publick, which was alſo the complaint of Petrus Damiani in Pope Gregories time. Bernard ſaid that, that ſin was frequent among the Biſhops in his time, and that this with many other abominations was the natural effect of prohibiting Marriage. This made Abbot Panormitan wiſh that it were left to Mens liberty to marry if they pleaſed. And Pius the ſecond ſaid there might have been good reaſons for impoſing Cœlibate on the Clergy, but he believed there were far better Reaſons for taking away theſe Laws that impoſed it. Yet even ſince thoſe Laws have been made, Petrarch had a Licenſe to marry, and keep his Preferments ſtill. Boniface Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, Richard Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Geofrey Biſhop of Ely are ſaid to have had Wives; and though there were not ſo many Inſtances of Prieſts marrying after Orders, yet if there were any thing in the nature of Prieſthood inconſiſtent by the Law of God with Marriage, then it was as unlawful for them to continue in their former Marriages as to contract a new one. Some few Inſtances were alſo gathered out of Church Hiſtory of Biſhops and Prieſts marrying after Orders: but as theſe were few, ſo there was juſt reaſon to controvert them. 1548

Upon the whole matter it was clear that the Cœlibate of the Clergy flowed from no Law of God, nor from any general Law of the Church; but the contrary, of Clergy-mens living with their Wives, was univerſally received for many Ages. As for Vows, it was much queſtioned how far they did bind in ſuch Caſes. It ſeemed a great ſin to impoſe ſuch on any, when they were yet young, and did not well know their own diſpoſitions. Nor was it in a Mans power to keep them. For, Continence being none of thoſe Graces that are promiſed by God to all that ask it, as it was not in a Mans power without extreme ſeverities on himſelf to govern his own conſtitution of Body, ſo he had no reaſon to expect God ſhould interpoſe when he had provided another remedy for ſuch Caſes. Beſides, the promiſe made by Clergy-men, according to The Vows and other Reaſons againſt it examined.

1548. the Rites of the Roman Pontifical, did not oblige them to Cœlibate. The words were, Wilt thou follow Chaſtity and Sobriety? to which the Sub-Deacon anſwered, I will. By Chaſtity was not to be underſtood a total abſtinence from all, but only from unlawful embraces; ſince a Man might live chaſt in a ſtate of Marriage, as well as out of it. But whatever might be in this, the Engliſh Clergy were not concerned in it: for there was no ſuch Queſtion nor Anſwer made in the Forms of their Ordination. So they were not by any Vow precluded from Marriage. And for the Expediency of it, nothing was more evident, than that theſe Laws had brought in much uncleanneſs into the Church, and thoſe who preſſed them moſt had been ſignally noted for theſe Vices. No Prince in the Engliſh Hiſtory lewder than Edgar that had ſo promoted it. The Legate that in King Henry the ſecond's time got that ſevere Decree made, that put all the married Clergy from their Livings, was found the very night after (for the credit of Cœlibate) in bed with a Whore. On this Subject many undecent Stories were gathered, eſpecially by Bale, who was a learned Man, but did not write with that temper and diſcretion that became a Divine. He gathered all the lewd Stories that could be raked together to this purpoſe; and the many abominable things found in the Monaſteries were then freſh in all Mens memories. It was alſo obſerved, that the unmarried Clergy had been, as much as the married could be, intent upon the raiſing Families, and the enriching of their Nephews and Kindred, (and ſometimes of their Baſtards, witneſs the preſent Pope Paul the third, and not long before him Alexander the 6th) ſo that the married Clergy could not be tempted to more covetouſneſs than had appeared in the unmarried. And for the Diſtraction of Domeſtick Affairs, the Clergy had formerly given themſelves up to ſuch a ſecular courſe of Life, that it was thought nothing could encreaſe it; but if the married Clergy ſhould ſet themſelves to raiſe more than a decent maintenance for their Children, ſuch as might fit them for Letters or Callings, and ſhould neglect Hoſpitality, become covetous, and accumulate Livings and Preferments, to make Eſtates for their Children; this might be juſtly curbed by new Laws, or rather the renewing of the ancient Canons, by which Clergy-men were declared to be only entruſted with the Goods of the Church for publick ends, and were not to apply them to their own private uſes, nor to leave them to their Children and Friends.

Thus had this matter been argued in many Books that were written on this Subject, by Poinet, and Parker, the one afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the other Arch-biſhop of Canterbury; alſo by Bale Biſhop of Oſſory, with many more. Dr. Ridley, Dr. Taylor, (afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln) Dr. Benſon, and Dr. Redmayn, appeared more confidently in it, than many others; being Men that were reſolved never to marry themſelves; who yet thought it neceſſary, and therefore pleaded, (according to the Pattern that Paphnutius had ſet them) that all ſhould be left to their liberty in this matter.

The Debate about it was brought into the Convocation, where Dr. Redmayn's Authority went a great way. He was a Man of great Learning and Probity, and of ſo much greater weight, becauſe he did not in all Points agree with the Reformers: but being at this time ſick, his opinion was brought under his Hand, which will be found in the Collection, copied copied from the Original. It was to this purpoſe, "That though the "Scriptures exhorted Prieſts to live chaſt, and out of the cares of the "World; yet the Laws forbidding them Marriage, were only Canons "and Conſtitutions of the Church; not founded on the Word of God: "and therefore he thought that a Man once married might be a Prieſt: "and he did not find the Prieſts in the Church of England had made any "Vow againſt Marriage; and therefore he thought that the King and "the higher Powers of the Church, might take away the Clog of per- "petual continence from the Prieſts, and grant that ſuch as could not or "would not contain, might marry once, and not be put from their "holy Miniſtration. It was oppoſed by many in both Houſes, but car- ried at laſt by the Major Vote. All this I gather from what is printed con- cerning it: For I have ſeen no Remains of this, or of any of the other Convocations that came afterwards in this Reign; the Regiſters of them being deſtroyed in the fire of London. This Act ſeemed rather a conni- vance, and permiſſion of the Clergy to marry, than any direct allowance of it. So the Enemies of that ſtate of life continued to reproach the married Clergy ſtill: and this was much heightned by many undecent Marriages, and other light behaviour of ſome Prieſts. But theſe things made way for a more full Act concerning this matter about three years after. 1548.

The next Act that paſſ'd in this Parliament was about the publick Ser- vice; which was put into the Houſe of Commons on the 9th. of December, and the next day was alſo put into the Houſe of Lords: It lay long be- fore them, and was not agreed to till the 15th. of Jan. The Earl of Derby, the Biſhops of London, Dureſme, Norwich, Carliſle, Hereford, Worceſter, Weſtminſter, and Chicheſter, and the Lords, Dacres, and Windſor, proteſting. The Preamble of the Act ſets forth, "That there "had been ſeveral Forms of Service, and that of late there had been great "difference in the Adminiſtration of the Sacraments, and other parts of "Divine Worſhip: and that the moſt effectual endeavours could not ſtop "the Inclinations of many to depart from the former Cuſtoms, which "the King had not puniſhed, believing they flowed from a good zeal. But "that there might be an uniform way over all the Kingdom, the King, "by the advice of the Lord Protector and his Council, had appointed "the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, with other learned and diſcreet Biſhops "and Divines, to draw an Order of Divine Worſhip, having reſpect to "the pure Religion of Chriſt taught in the Scripture, and to the practice "of the Primitive Church, which they by the aid of the Holy Ghoſt, "had with one uniform agreement concluded on; wherefore the Par- "liament having conſidered the Book, and the things that were altered or "retained in it, they gave their moſt humble thanks to the King for his "care about it: and did pray that all who had formerly offended in theſe "matters, except ſuch as were in the Tower of London, or the Priſon "of the Fleet, ſhould be pardoned; and did Enact, that from the Feaſt "of Whit-Sunday next, all Divine Offices ſhould be performed accor- "ding to it, and that ſuch of the Clergy as ſhould refuſe to do it, or con- "tinue to officiate in any other manner, ſhould upon the firſt conviction "be impriſoned ſix Months, and forfeit a years profit of their Bene- "fice: For the ſecond offence forfeit all their Church Preferments, and "ſuffer a years Impriſonment: And for the third offence ſhould be impri- "ſoned 1548. "soned during life., And all that should write, or put out things in print "against it, or threaten any Clergy-men for using it, were to be fined in "10 l. for the first offence, 20 for the second, and to forfeit all their "Goods, and be imprisoned for life, upon a third offence. Only at the "Universities they might use it in Latin and Greek, excepting the Office "of the Communion. It was also lawful to use other Psalms or Prayers "taken out of the Bible, so these in the Book were not omitted, This Act was variously censured by those who disliked it. Some thought it too much, that it was said the Book was drawn by the Aid of the Holy Ghost. But others said this was not to be so understood, as if they had been inspired by extraordinary assistance; for then there had been no room for any correction of what was now done: and therefore it was only to be understood in that sence, as all good Motions and Consultations are directed or assisted by the secret influences of Gods Holy Spirit; which do oft help good Men, even in their imperfect actions, where the good that is done is justly ascribed to the Grace of God. Others censured it, because it was said to be done by uniform agreement, though four of the Bishops that were employed in the drawing of it, protested against it. These were the Bishops of Norwich, Hereford, Chichester, and Westminster; but these had agreed in the main parts of the Work, though in some few Particulars they were not satisfied, which made them dissent from the whole.

An Act con- firming the Liturgy.

The Censures passed upon it.

Singing of Psalms brought in.

The Proviso for the Psalms and Prayers taken out of the Bible, was for the Singing Psalms, which were translated into Verse, and much sung by all who loved the Reformation, and were in many Places used in Churches. In the Ancient Church the Christians were much exercised in repeating the Psalms of David: many had them all by heart, and used to be reciting them when they went about their Work; and those who retired into a Monastical course of life, spent many of their hours in repeating the Psalter. Apollinaris put them in verse, as being easier for the memory. Other devout Hymns came to be also in use. Nazianzen among the Greeks, and Prudentius among the Latines, laboured on that Argument with the greatest success. There were other Hymns that were not put in verse, the chief of which were, that most ancient Hymn which we use now after the Sacrament, and the Celebrated Ambrosian Hymn that begins Te Deum Laudamus. But as when the Worship of the departed Saints came to be dressed up with much pomp, Hymns were also made for their honour: and the Latin Tongue, as well as Prosody, being then much decayed, these came to be cast into Rithmes, and were written generally in a fantastical affected Style: So now at the Reformation, some Poets, such as the times afforded, translated Davids Psalms into verse; and it was a sign by which Mens affections to that Work were every where measured, whether they used to sing these, or not. But as the Poetry then was low, and not raised to that justness to which it is since brought, so this Work, which then might pass for a tolerable composure, has not been since that time so reviewed or changed as perhaps the thing required: hence it is that this piece of Divine Worship, by the meanness of the Verse, has not maintained its due esteem. Another thing, that some thought deserved to be considered in such a Work, was, that many of the Psalms, being such as related more specially to Davids Victories, and contained Passages in them not easily understood, it seemed better better to leave out these, which it was not so easie to sing with Devotion, because the meaning of them either lay hid, or did not at all concern Christians. 1548.

The Parliament was adjourned from the 22*d.* of December to the second of Jan. On the 7*th.* of Jan. the Commons sent an Address to the Protector to restore Latimer to the Bishoprick of Worcester: but this took no effect, for that good old Man did choose rather to go about and preach, than to engage in a matter of Government, being now very ancient. A Bill was put in by the Lords for appointing of Parks, and agreed to, the Earl of Arundel only dissenting; but being sent down to the Commons, it was upon the second reading thrown out, yet not so unanimously but that the House was divided about it. 1549. Jour. Proc.

On the fourth of Feb. a Bill was put in against eating Flesh in Lent, and on Fasting days; it was committed to the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Ely, Worcester, and Chichester; and sent to the Commons on the 16*th*, who sent it up on the 7*th.* of March, with a Proviso, to which the Lords agreed. In the Preamble it is said, "That though "it is clear by the Word of God, that there is no Day, nor kind of "Meat, purer than another, but that all are in themselves alike; yet "many out of sensuality had contemned such abstinence, as had been "formerly used; and since due abstinence was a mean to vertue, and to "subdue Mens Bodies to their Soul and Spirit, and was also necessary to "encourage the Trade of Fishing, and for saving of Flesh; therefore all "former Laws about Fasting and Abstinence were to be after the first of "May repealed, and it was Enacted, That from the first of May, none "should eat Flesh on Fridays, Saturdays, Ember-days, in Lent, or any "other days that should be declared Fish-days, under several Penalties. "A Proviso was added for excepting such as should obtain the Kings Li-"cence, or were Sick, or weak, or that none should be indicted but "within three Months after the offence. An Act about Fasts.

Christ had told his Disciples, that when he should be taken from them, then they should fast. Accordingly the Primitive Christians used to fast oft, more particularly before the Anniversary of the Passion of Christ, which ended in a high Festivity at Easter. Yet this was differently observed, as to the number of days. Some abstained 40 days in imitation of Christs Fast, others only that Week, and others had only an entire Fast from the time of Christs death till his Resurrection. On these Fasts they eat nothing till the Evening, and then they eat most commonly Herbs and Roots. Afterwards the Fridays were kept as Fasts, because on that day Christ suffered. Saturdays were also added in the Roman Church, but not without contradiction. Ember-weeks came in afterwards, being some days before those Sundays, in which Orders were given. And a General Rule being laid down, that every Christian Festival should be preceded by a Fast, thereupon the Vigils of Holy-days came, though not so soon, into the Number. But this, with the other good Institutions of the Primitive times, became degenerate; even in St. Austins time, Religion came to be placed in these observances, and anxious Rules were made about them. Afterwards in the Church of Rome they were turned into a Mockery; for, as on Fast-days they dined, which the Ancients did not, so the use of the most delicious Fish, dress't in the most 1549. most exquisite manner, with the richest Wines that could be had, was allowed, which made it ridiculous. So now they resolved to take off the severities of the former Laws, and yet to keep up such Laws about Fasting and Abstinence, as might be agreeable to its true end: which is, to subdue the Flesh to the Spirit, and not to gratifie it by a change of one sort of diet into another, which may be both more delicate, and more inflaming. So fond a thing is Superstition, that it will help Men to deceive themselves by the slightest Pretences that can be imagined.

It was much lamented then, and there is as much cause for it still, that carnal men have taken advantages from the abuses that were formerly practised, to throw off good and profitable Institutions: since the frequent use of Fasting, with Prayer and true Devotion joyned to it, is perhaps one of the greatest helps that can be devised, to advance one to a spiritual temper of Mind, and to promote a holy course of Life: And the mockery that is discernable in the way of some Mens Fasting, is a very slight excuse for any to lay aside the use of that which the Scriptures have so much recommended.

Some Bills were rejected.

There were other Bills put in into both Houses, but did not pass. One was, for declaring it Treason to marry the Kings Sisters without consent of the King and his Council: but it was thought that King Henry's Will, disabling them from the Succession in that case, would be a stronger restraint; and so it was laid aside. Another Bill was put in for Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. Great Complaints were made of the abounding of Vices and Immorallities, which the Clergy could neither restrain nor punish, and so they had nothing left but to preach against them, which was done by many with great freedom. In some of these Sermons, the Preachers expressed their apprehensions of signal and speedy Judgments from Heaven, if the People did not repent, but their Sermons had no great effect, for the Nation grew very corrupt, and this brought on them severe punishments. The Temporal Lords were so jealous of putting power in Church-mens hands, especially to correct those vices of which themselves perhaps were most guilty, that the Bill was laid aside. The pretence of opposing it, was, that the greatest part of the Bishops and Clergy were still Papists in their Hearts; so that if Power were put into such Mens hands, it was reasonable to expect, they would employ it chiefly against those who favoured the Reformation, and would vex them on that score, though with Pretences fetcht from other things.

A design for digesting the Common Law into a Body.

There was also put into the House of Commons a Bill for reforming of Processes at Common Law, which was sent up by the Commons to the Lords, but it fell in that House. I have seen a large discourse written then upon that Argument; in which it is set forth, that the Law of England was a barbarous kind of Study, and did not lead Men into a finer sort of Learning, which made the Common Lawyers to be generally so ignorant of Forreign Matters, and so unable to negotiate in them; therefore it was proposed, that the Common and Statute Laws, should be, in imitation of the Roman Law, digested into a Body under Titles and Heads, and put in good Latin. But this was too great a Design to be set on, or finished under an Infant King. If it was then necessary, it will be readily acknowledged to be much more so now, the Volume of our Statutes being so much swell'd since that time; besides the vast number of Reports, and Cases, and the Pleadings growing much much longer than formerly: yet whether this is a thing to be much expected or desired, I refer it to the learned and wise Men of that Robe. 1549.

The only Act that remains of this Session of Parliament, about which I shall inform the Reader, is the Attainder of the Admiral. The Queen Dowager that had married him died in September last, not without suspition of Poison. She was a good and vertuous Lady, and in her whole Life had done nothing unseemly, but the marrying him so indecently, and so soon after the Kings death. There was found among her Papers a Discourse written by her concerning her self; entituled, The Lamentation of a Sinner, which was published by Cecil, who writ a Preface to it. In it, she, with great sincerity, acknowledges the sinful course of her Life for many years, in which she, relying on external Performances, such as Fasts, and Pilgrimages, was all that while a Stranger to the Internal and True Power of Religion: which she came afterwards to feel by the study of the Scripture, and the calling upon God for his Holy Spirit. She explains clearly the Notion she had of Justification by Faith, so that Holiness necessarily followed upon it: but lamented the great scandal given by many Gospellers: So were all these called who were given to the reading of the Scriptures. The Admirals Attainder.

She being thus dead, the Admiral renewed his Addresses to the Lady Elizabeth, but in vain; for as he could not expect that his Brother and the Council would consent to it, so if he had married her without that, the possibility of succeeding to the Crown was cut off by King Henry's Will. And this Attempt of his occasioned that Act to be put in, which was formerly mentioned, for declaring the marrying the Kings Sisters, without consent of Council, to be Treason. Seeing he could not compass that design, he resolved to carry away the King to his House of Holt in the Country; and so to displace his Brother, and to take the Government into his own hands. For this end, he had laid in Magazines of Arms, and listed about 10000 Men in several Places: and openly complained, that his Brother intended to enslave the Nation, and make himself Master of all; and had therefore brought over those German Souldiers. He had also entred into Treaty with several of the Nobility, that envied his Brothers greatness, and were not ill pleased to see a breach between them, and that grown to be irreconcilable. To these he promised that they should be of the Council, and that he would dispose of the King in Marriage to one of their Daughters: the Person is not named. The Protector had often told him of these things, and warned him of the danger into which he would throw himself by such ways; but he persisted still in his designs; though he denied and excused them as long as was possible. Now his restless ambition seeming incurable, he was on the 19*th*. of Jan. sent to the Tower. The original Warrant, Signed by all the Privy Council, is in the Council-Book formerly mentioned; where the Earl of Southampton Signs with the rest; who was now, in outward appearance reconciled to the Protector. On the day following the Admirals Seal of his Office was sent for, and put into Secretary Smiths Hands. And now many things broke out against him; and particularly a Conspiracy of his with Sir W. Sharington, Vice-Treasurer of the Mint at Bristol, who was to have furnished him with 10000 l. and had already coined about 12000 l. false Money, and had clipt a great deal more, to The Queen Dowager dying, he courted the Lady Eliz. Jan. 19. The Admiral sent to the Tower.

1549. the value of 40000 l. in all; for which he was attainted by a Proceſs at Common Law, and that was confirmed in Parliament. Fowler alſo, that waited in the Privy Chamber, with ſome few others, were ſent to the Tower: Many complaints being uſually brought againſt a ſinking Man, the Lord Ruſſel, the Earl of Southampton, and Secretary Petre, were ordered to receive their Examinations. And thus the buſineſs was let alone till the 28*th.* of Feb. in which time his Brother did again try if it were poſſible to bring him to a better temper: And as he had, ſince their firſt breach, granted him 800 l. a year in Land, to gain his friendſhip; ſo means were now uſed to perſwade him to ſubmit himſelf, and to withdraw from Court, and from all employment. But it appeared that nothing could be done to him that could cure his ambition, or the hatred he carried to his Brother. And therefore on the 22*d.* of Feb. a full report was made to the Council of all the things that were informed againſt him; conſiſting not only of the Particulars formerly mentioned, but of many foul miſdemeanours in the diſcharge of the Admiralty: ſeveral Pirates being entertained by him, who gave him a ſhare of their Robberies, and whom he had protected, notwithſtanding the Complaints made by other Princes, by which the King was in danger of a War from the Princes ſo complaining. The whole Charge conſiſts of 33 Articles, which will be found in the Collection. The Particulars, as it is entred in the Council-Book, were ſo manifeſtly proved, not only by Witneſſes, but by Letters under his own Hand, that it did not ſeem poſſible to deny them. Yet he had been ſent to, and examined, by ſome of the Council, but refuſed to make a direct Anſwer to them, or to Sign thoſe Anſwers that he had made. So it was ordered, that the next day, all the Privy Council except the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and Sir John Baker, Speaker to the Houſe of Commons, who was engaged to attend in the Houſe, ſhould go to the Tower, and examine him. On the 23*d.* the Lord Chancellor, with the other Councellors, went to him, and read the Articles of his Charge, and earneſtly deſired him to make plain Anſwers to them, excuſing himſelf where he could, and ſubmitting himſelf in other things: and that he would ſhew no obſtinacy of Mind. He anſwered them, That he expected an open Trial, and his Accuſers to be brought face to face. All the Councellors endeavoured to perſwade him to be more tractable, but to no purpoſe. At laſt the Lord Chancellor required him on his Allegiance to make his Anſwer. He deſired they would leave the Articles with him, and he would conſider of them, otherwiſe he would make no Anſwer to them. But the Councellors reſolved not to leave them with him on thoſe terms. On the 24*th.* of Feb. it was reſolved in Council, that the whole Board ſhould after Dinner acquaint the King with the ſtate of that Affair, and deſire to know of him whether he would have the Law to take place; and ſince the thing had been before the Parliament, whether he would leave it to their determination: ſo tender they were of their young King in a Caſe that concerned his Unkles Life. But the King had begun to diſcern his ſeditious temper, and was now much alienated from him.

Collection Number 31.

The Council deſired the King to refer the Matter to the Parliament.

When the Councellors waited on him, the Lord Chancellor opened the Matter to the King, and delivered his Opinion for leaving it to the Parliament. Then every Councellor by himſelf ſpake his mind, all to the ſame purpoſe. Laſt of all the Protector ſpake; he proteſted this was

moſt ſorrowful buſineſs to him, that he had uſed all the means in his power to keep it from coming to this extremity; but were it Son or Brother, he muſt prefer his Majeſties ſafety to them, for he weighed his Allegiance more than his Blood: and that therefore he was not againſt the requeſt that the other Lords had made; and ſaid, if he himſelf were guilty of ſuch offences, he ſhould not think he were worthy of life; and the rather becauſe he was of all Men the moſt bound to his Majeſty, and therefore he could not refuſe Juſtice. The King anſwered them in theſe words. "We perceive that there are great things objected and laid to "my Lord Admiral my Unkle, and they tend to Treaſon, and We per- "ceive that you require but Juſtice to be done. We think it reaſonable, "and We Will, that you proceed according to your Requeſt. Which "words, (as it is marked in the Council-Book) coming ſo ſuddenly from "his Graces Mouth, of his own motion, as the Lords might well perceive, "they were marvellouſly rejoyced, and gave the King moſt hearty praiſe "and thanks: yet reſolved that ſome of both Houſes ſhould be ſent to the "Admiral, before the Bill ſhould be put in againſt him, to ſee what "he could or would ſay. All this was done to try if he could be brought to a Submiſſion. So the Lord Chancellor, the Earls of Shrewsbury, Warwick, and Southampton, and Sir John Baker, Sir Tho. Cheyney, and Sir Anth. Denny, were ſent to him. He was long obſtinate, but after much perſwaſion was brought to give an Anſwer to the firſt three Articles, which will be found in the Collection at the end of the Articles: and then on a ſudden he ſtopt, and bade them be content, for he would go no further: and no entreaties would work on him, either to anſwer the reſt, or to ſet his Hand to the Anſwers he had made. 1549. Who conſented to it.

On the 25*th.* of Feb. the Bill was put in for attainting him, and the Peers had been ſo accuſtomed to agree to ſuch Bills in King Henry's time, that they did eaſily paſs it. All the Judges, and the Kings Council, delivered their Opinions, that the Articles were Treaſon. Then the Evidence was brought, many Lords gave it ſo fully, that all the reſt with one Voice conſented to the Bill; only the Protector, for natural pities ſake, as is in the Council-Book, deſired leave to withdraw. On the 27*th.* the Bill was ſent down to the Commons, with a Meſſage, That if they deſired to proceed as the Lords had done, thoſe Lords that had given their Evidence in their own Houſe, ſhould come down and declare it to the Commons. But there was more oppoſition made in the Houſe of Commons. Many argued againſt Attainders in abſence, and thought it an odd way that ſome Peers ſhould riſe up in their Places in their own Houſe, and relate ſomewhat to the ſlander of another, and that he ſhould be thereupon attainted: therefore it was preſſed, that it might be done by a Trial, and that the Admiral ſhould be brought to the Barr, and be heard plead for himſelf. But on the fourth of March a Meſſage was ſent from the King, that he thought it was not neceſſary to ſend for the Admiral: and that the Lords ſhould come down and renew before them the Evidence they had given in their own Houſe. This was done: and ſo the Bill was agreed to by the Commons in a full Houſe, judged about 400, and there were not above ten or twelve that voted in the negative. The Royal aſſent was given on the 5*th.* of March. On the 10*th.* of March, the Council reſolved to preſs the King that Juſtice might be done on the Admiral: and ſince the Caſe was ſo heavy and lamentable The Bill paſſed in both Houſes.

1549. to the Protector, (so it is in the Council-Book) though it was also sorrowful to them all, they resolved to proceed in it, so that neither the King, nor he, should be further troubled with it. After Dinner they went to the King, the Protector being with them. The King said, he had well observed their Proceedings, and thanked them for their great care of his safety, and commanded them to proceed in it without further molesting him or the Protector: and ended, I pray you my Lords do so. Upon this they ordered the Bishop of Ely to go to the Admiral, and to instruct him in the things that related to another Life: and to prepare him to take patiently his deserved Execution. And on the 17th. of March, he having made report to them of his Attendance on the Admiral, the Council Signed a Warrant for his Execution, which will be found in the Collection, to which both the Lord Protector and the Archbishop of Canterbury set their Hands. And on the 20th. his Head was cut off. What his behaviour was on the Scaffold I do not find.

Collection Number 32.

March 20. The Admiral beheaded.

Thus fell Tho. Lord Seimour, Lord high Admiral of England, a Man of high thoughts, of great violence of temper, and ambitious out of measure. The Protector was much censured for giving way to his Execution, by those who looked only at that relation between them, which they thought should have made him still preserve him. But others, who knew the whole Series of the affair, saw it was scarce possible for him to do more for the gaining his Brother, than he had done. Yet the other being a popular Notion, that it was against Nature for one Brother to destroy another, was more easily entertain'd by the Multitude, who could not penetrate into the Mysteries of State. But the way of Proceeding was much condemned; since to attaint a Man without bringing him to make his own defence, or to object what he could say to the Witnesses that were brought against him, was so illegal and unjust, that it could not be defended. Only this was to be said for it, that it was a little more regular than Parliamentary Attainders had been formerly: for here the Evidence upon which it was founded was given before both Houses.

Censures past upon it.

One Particular seemed a little odd, that Cranmer Signed the Warrant for his Execution; which being in a Cause of Blood, was contrary to the Canon Law. In the Primitive Times, Church-men had only the Cure of Souls lying on them, together with the reconciling of such differences as might otherwise end in Suits of Law before the Civil Courts which were made up of Infidels. When the Empire became Christian these Judgments, which they gave originally on so charitable an account, were by the Imperial Laws made to have great Authority; but further than these, or the care of Widows and Orphans, they were forbid both by the Council of Chalcedon, and other lesser Councils, to meddle in secular Matters. Among the Endowments made to some Churches, there were Lands given, where the Slaves, according to the Roman Law, came within the Patrimony of these Churches, and by that Law Masters had Power of Life and Death over their Slaves.

And on Cranmers signing the Warrant for his Execution.

In some Churches this Power had been severely exercised, even to maiming and death, which seemed very indecent in a Church-man. Besides, there was an Apprehension that some severe Church-men, who were but Masters for life, might be more profuse of the Lives of such Slaves, than those that were to transmit them to their Families. Therefore to prevent the waſt that ſhould be made in the Churches Patrimony, it was agreed on that Church-men ſhould not proceed capitally againſt any of their Vaſſals or Slaves. And in the Confuſions that were in Spain, the Princes that prevailed, had appointed Prieſts to be Judges, to give the greater reputation to their Courts. This being found much to the prejudice of the Church, it was decreed in the fourth Council of Toledo, that Prieſts who were choſen by Chriſt to the Miniſtry of Salvation, ſhould not judge in Capital Matters, unleſs the Prince ſhould ſwear to them, that he would remit the puniſhment: and ſuch as did otherwiſe, were held guilty of Blood-ſhedding, and were to loſe their Degree in the Church. This was ſoon received over all the Weſtern Church; and Arguments were found out afterwards by the Canoniſts to prove the neceſſity of continuing it; from Davids not being ſuffered to build the Temple, ſince he was a Man of Blood; and from the qualification required by St. Paul in a Biſhop, That he ſhould be no ſtriker, ſince he ſeemed to ſtrike, that did it either in Perſon, or by one whom he deputed to do it. But when afterwards Charls the Great, and all the Chriſtian Princes in the Weſt, gave their Biſhops great Lands and Dominions; they obliged them to be in all their Councils, and to do them ſuch Services as they required of them by vertue of their Tenures. The Popes, deſigning to ſet up a Spiritual Empire, and to bring all Church-lands within it; required the Biſhops to ſeparate themſelves from a dependance on their Princes, as much as it was poſſible: And theſe Laws formerly made about Caſes of Blood, were judged a Colour good enough why they ſhould not meddle in ſuch Trials: ſo they procured theſe Caſes to be excepted. But it ſeems Cranmer thought his Conſcience was under no tie from thoſe Canons, and ſo judged it not contrary to his Function to Sign that Order. 1549.

The Parliament was on the 14*th.* of March Prorogued to the 4*th.* of Nov. the Clergy having granted the King a Subſidy of 6*s.* in the Pound to be paid in three Years. In the Preamble of the Bill of Subſidy they acknowledged the great quietneſs they enjoyed under him, having no Let nor Impediment in the Service of God. But the Laity ſet out their Subſidy with a much fuller Preamble, of the great happineſs they had by the true Religion of Chriſt; declaring that they were ready to forſake all things rather than Chriſt; as alſo to aſſiſt the King in the Conqueſt of Scotland, which they call a part of his Dominion; therefore they give 12 d. in the Pound of all Mens Perſonal Eſtates to be paid in three Years. Subſidies granted by the Clergy and Laity.

But now to look into Matters of Religion, there was, immediately after the Act of Uniformity paſs'd, a new Viſitation, which, it is probable went in the ſame Method that was obſerved in the former. There were two things much complained of; the one was, that the Prieſts read the Prayers generally with the ſame tone of Voice that they had uſed formerly in the Latin Service: ſo that, it was ſaid, the People did not underſtand it much better than they had done the Latin formerly. This I have ſeen repreſented in many Letters; and it was very ſeriouſly laid before Cranmer by Martin Bucer. The courſe taken in it, was, that in all Pariſh Churches the Service ſhould be read in a plain audible Voice; but that the former way ſhould remain in Cathedrals, where they were great Quires, who were well acquainted with that Tone, and where it agreed better with the Muſick that was uſed in the Anthems. Yet even A new Viſitation.

there,

1549. there many thought it no proper way in the Letany, where the greateſt gravity was more agreeable to ſuch humble Addreſſes, than ſuch a modulation of the Voice, which to thoſe unacquainted with it ſeemed light, and for others that were more accuſtomed to it, it ſeemed to be rather uſe that had reconciled them to it, than the natural decency of the thing, or any fitneſs in it to advance the devotion of their Prayers. But this was a thing judged of leſs importance: It was ſaid that thoſe who had been accuſtomed to read in that voice, could not eaſily alter it: but as thoſe dropt off and died, others would be put in their Places, who would officiate in a plainer Voice. Other Abuſes were more important. Some uſed in the Communion-Service many of the old Rites, ſuch as kiſſing the Altar, croſſing themſelves, lifting the Book from one Place to another, breathing on the Bread, ſhewing it openly before the diſtribution, with ſome other of the old Ceremonies. The People did alſo continue the uſe of their praying by Beads, which was called an Innovation of Peter the Hermite in the 12*th. Century*. By it, ten Aves went for one Pater Noſter, and the reciting theſe ſo oft in Latin, had come to be almoſt all the Devotion of the Vulgar: and therefore the People were ordered to leave that unreaſonable way of Praying, it ſeeming a moſt unaccountable thing that the reciting the Angels Salutation to the bleſſed Virgin, ſhould be ſuch a high piece of Divine Worſhip. And that this ſhould be done ten times, for one Prayer to God, looked ſo like preferring the Creature to the Creator, that it was not eaſie to defend it from an appearance of Idolatry. The Prieſts were alſo ordered to exhort the People to give to the Poor. The Curates were required to preach and declare the Catechiſm, at leaſt every ſixth Week. And ſome Prieſts continuing ſecretly the uſe of Soul Maſſes, in which, for avoiding the cenſure of the Law, they had one to communicate with them, but had many of theſe in one day; It was ordered, that there ſhould be no ſelling of the Communion, in Trentals, and that there ſhould be but one Communion in one Church, except on Eaſter-day and Chriſtmas; in which the People coming to the Sacrament in greater Numbers, there ſhould be one Sacrament in the Morning, and another near Noon. And there being great abuſes in Churches, and Church-yards, in which in the times of Popery, Markets had been held, and Bargains made, that was forbid, chiefly in the time of Divine Service or Sermon.

Theſe Inſtructions, which the Reader will find in the Collection, were given in charge to the Viſitors. Cranmer had alſo a Viſitation about the ſame time, in which the Articles he gave out are all drawn according to the Kings Injunctions. By ſome Queſtions in them, they ſeem to have been ſent out before the Parliament, becauſe the Book of Service is not mentioned: but the laſt Queſtion ſave one, being of ſuch as contemned married Prieſts, and refuſed to receive the Sacrament at their hands, I conceive that theſe were compiled after the Act concerning their Marriage was paſs'd, but before the Feaſt of Whit-Sunday following, for till then the Common-Prayer-Book was not to be received. There were alſo Orders ſent by the Council to the Biſhop of London, to ſee that there ſhould be no ſpecial Maſſes in St. Pauls Church; which being the Mother-Church in the chief City of the Kingdom, would be an example to all the reſt; and that therefore there ſhould be only one Communion at the great Altar, and that at the time when the high Maſs was wont to be celebrated, unleſs

ſome

ſome deſired a Sacrament in the Morning, and then it was to be celebrated at the high Altar. Bonner, who reſolved to comply in every thing, ſent the Councils Letter to the Dean and Reſidentiaries of St. Pauls, to ſee it obeyed: and indeed all England over the Book was ſo univerſally received, that the Viſitors did return no complaint from any corner of the whole Kingdom. Only the Lady Mary continued to have Maſs ſaid in her Houſe, of which the Council being advertiſed, writ to her to conform her ſelf to the Laws, and not to caſt a reproach on the Kings Government; for the nearer ſhe was to him in Blood, ſhe was to give the better example to others: and her diſobedience might encourage others to follow her in that contempt of the Kings Authority. So they deſired her to ſend to them, her Comptroller, and Dr. Hopton her Chaplain, by whom ſhe ſhould be more fully advertiſed of the King and Councils Pleaſure. Upon this ſhe ſent one to the Emperor to interpoſe for her, that ſhe might not be forced to any thing againſt her Conſcience. 1549.

All received the new Service except the Lady Mary.

At this time there was a Complaint made at the Emperors Court, of the Engliſh Ambaſſador Sir Philip Hobby, for uſing the new Common-Prayer-Book there: To which he anſwered, He was to be obedient to the Laws of his own Prince and Country; and as the Emperors Ambaſſador had Maſs at his Chappel at London, without diſturbance, though it was contrary to the Law of England, ſo he had the ſame reaſon to expect the like liberty. But the Emperor eſpouſing the Intereſt of the Lady Mary, both Paget, (who was ſent over Ambaſſador Extraordinary to him upon his coming into Flanders) and Hobby promiſed in the Kings Name that he ſhould diſpenſe with her, for ſome time, as they afterwards declared upon their Honours, when the thing was further queſtioned: though the Emperor and his Miniſters pretended, that without any Qualification it was promiſed that ſhe ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of her Religion. The Emperor was now grown ſo high with his ſucceſs in Germany, and that at a time when a War was coming on with France, that it was not thought adviſable to give him any offence. There was likewiſe a Propoſition ſent over by him to the Protector and Council, for the Lady Mary to be married to Alphonſo, Brother to the King of Portugal. The Council entertained it: and though the late King had left his Daughters but 10000 l. a-piece, yet they offered to give with her 100000 Crowns in Money, and 20000 Crowns worth of Jewels. The Infant of Portugal was about her own Age, and offered 20000 Crowns Jointure. But this Propoſition fell, on what hand I do not know. The Lady Mary writ on the 22*d.* of June to the Council, that ſhe could not obey their late Laws; and that ſhe did not eſteem them Laws, as made when the King was not of Age, and contrary to thoſe made by her Father, which they were all bound by Oath to maintain. She excuſed the not ſending her Comptroller, (Mr. Arundel) and her Prieſt: the one did all her buſineſs, ſo that ſhe could not well be without him; the other was then ſo ill that he could not travel. Upon this the Council ſent a peremptory Command to theſe, requiring them to come up, and receive their Orders. The Lady Mary wrote a ſecond Letter to them on the 27*th.* of June, in which ſhe expoſtulated the matter with the Council. She ſaid, She was ſubject to none of them, and would obey none of the Laws they made; but proteſted great Obedience and Subjection to the King. When her Officers came to Court, they were commanded to declare to the Lady Mary,

The Ambaſſador at the Emperors Court not ſuffered to uſe it.

Cotton lib. Galba B. 12.

She writ to the Council concerning the new Service.

1549. Mary, that though the King was young in Perſon, yet his Authority was now as great as ever: that thoſe who have his Authority and act in his Name are to be obeyed; and though they as ſingle Perſons were her humble Servants, yet when they met in Council, they acted in the Kings Name, and ſo were to be conſidered by all the Kings Subjects as if they were the King himſelf: they had indeed ſworn to obey the late Kings Laws, but that could bind them no longer than they were in force; and being now repealed, they were no more Laws; other Laws being made in their room: There was no exception in the Laws, all the Kings Subjects were included in them; and for a Reformation of Religion made when a King was under Age, one of the moſt perfect that was recorded in Scripture was ſo carried on, when Joſiah was much younger than their King was: therefore they gave them in charge to perſwade her Grace, (for that was her Title) to be a good example of obedience, and not to encourage peeviſh and obſtinate Perſons, by her ſtiffneſs. But this Buſineſs was for ſome time laid aſide.

Who required her to obey as other Subjects did.

And now the Reformation was to be carried on to the eſtabliſhing of a Form of Doctrine, which ſhould contain the chief Points of Religion. In order to which, there was this Year great enquiry made into many particular Opinions, and chiefly concerning the Preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament. There was no Opinion, for which the Prieſts contended more ignorantly and eagerly, and that the People generally believed more blindly and firmly, as if a ſtrong belief were nothing elſe but winking very hard. The Prieſts, becauſe they accounted it the chief ſupport now left of their falling Dominion, which being kept up, might in time retrieve all the reſt. For while it was believed, that their Character qualified them for ſo ſtrange and mighty a Performance, they muſt needs be held in great reverence. The People, becauſe they thought they received the very Fleſh of Chriſt, and ſo (notwithſtanding our Saviours expreſs Declaration to the contrary, that the Fleſh profiteth nothing) looked on thoſe who went about to perſwade them otherwiſe, as Men that intended to rob them of the greateſt Priviledge they had. And therefore it was thought neceſſary to open this fully, before there ſhould be any change made in the Doctrine of the Church.

The manner of Chriſts Preſence in the Sacrament examined.

The Lutherans ſeemed to agree with that which had been the Doctrine of the Greek Church, that in the Sacrament there was both the Subſtance of Bread and Wine, and Chriſts Body likewiſe. Only many of them defended it by an Opinion that was thought a-kin to the Eutychian Hereſie, that his humane Nature by vertue of the union of the God-head, was every where: though even in this way it did not appear that there was any ſpecial Preſence in the Sacrament, more than in other things. Thoſe of Switzerland had on the other hand, taught that the Sacrament was only an Inſtitution to commemorate the Sufferings of Chriſt. This, becauſe it was intelligible, was thought by many too low and mean a thing, and not equal to the high expreſſions that are in the Scripture, of its being the Communion of the Body and Blood of Chriſt. The Princes of Germany ſaw what miſchief was like to follow on the diverſity of Opinions in explaining the Sacrament: and as Luther, being impatient in his temper, and too much given to dictate, took it very ill to ſee his Doctrine ſo rejected; ſo by the undecent way of writing in matters of Controverſie, to which the Germans are too much inclined, this difference rence turned to a direct breach among them. The Landgrave of Hesse had laboured much to have these diversities of Opinion laid asleep, since nothing gave their common Enemies such advantage, as their quarrelling among themselves. Martin Bucer was of a moderate temper, and had found a middle Opinion in this matter, though not so easie to be understood. He thought there was more than a Remembrance, to wit, a Communication of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament, that in general a Real Presence ought to be asserted, and that the way of explaining it ought not to be anxiously enquired into: and with him Calvin agreed, that it was truly the Body and Blood of Christ, not figuratively, but really present. The advantage of these general Expressions was, that thereby they hoped to have silenced the Debates between the German and Helvetian Divines, whose Doctrine came likewise to be received by many of the Cities of the Empire, and by the Elector Palatine. And among Martin Bucers Papers, I met with an Original Paper of Luthers, (which will be found in the Collection) in which he was willing to have that difference thus settled: "Those of the Ausburg "Confession should declare, that in the Sacrament there was truly Bread "and Wine, and those of the Helvetian Confession should declare, that "Christs Body was truly present, and so without any further curiosities "in the way of explaining it, in which Divines might use their liberty, "the difference should end. But how this came to take no effect, I do not understand. It was also thought that this way of expressing the Doctrine would give least offence; for the People were scarce able to bear the Opinion of the Sacraments being only a Figure: but wherein this Real Presence consisted, was not so easie to be made out. Some explained it more intelligibly in a sense of Law that in the Sacrament there was a real application of the Merit of Christs Death, to those who received it worthily: so that Christ as crucified was really present: and these had this to say for themselves, that the words of the Institution do not call the Elements simply Christs Body and Blood, but his Body broken, and his Blood shed, and that therefore Christ was really present, as he was crucified, so that the importance of Really was Effectually. Others thought all ways of explaining the manner of the Presence were needless curiosities, and apt to beget differences: that therefore the Doctrine was to be established in general words, and to save the labour both of explaining and understanding it, it was to be esteemed a Mystery. This seems to have been Bucers Opinion, but Peter Martyr inclined more to the Helvetians.

Collection Numb. 34.

There were publick Disputations held this Year both at Oxford and Cambridge upon this Matter. At Oxford the Popish Party did so encourage themselves by the Indulgence of the Government, and the gentleness of Cranmers temper, that they became upon this Head insolent out of measure. Peter Martyr had read in the Chair concerning the Presence of Christ in the Sacrament, which he explained according to the Doctrine of the Helvetian Churches: Dr. Smith did upon this resolve to contradict him openly in the Schools, and challenge him to dispute on these Points: and had brought many thither, who should by their Clamours and Applauses run him down: yet this was not so secretly laid, but a friend of P. Martyrs brought him word of it before he had come from his House, and perswaded him not to go to the Schools that day, and Publick Disputations about it.

1549. ſo diſappoint Smith. But he looked on that as ſo mean a thing, that he would by no means comply with it. So he went to the Divinity Schools; on his way one brought him a Challenge from Smith to diſpute with him, concerning the Euchariſt. He went on and took his place in the Chair, where he behaved himſelf with an equal meaſure of courage and diſcretion: He gravely check'd Smiths preſumption, and ſaid, he did not decline a diſpute; but was reſolved to have his Reading that day, nor would he engage in a publick Diſpute without leave from the Kings Council: Upon this a Tumult was like to riſe; ſo the Vice-Chancellor ſent for them before him: P. Martyr ſaid he was ready to defend every thing that he had read in the Chair, in a Diſpute: but he would manage it only in Scripture Terms, and not in the Terms of the Schools.

This was the beating the Popiſh Doctors out of that which was their chief ſtrength; for they had little other Learning, but a ſlight of toſſing ſome Arguments from hand to hand, with a gibberiſh kind of Language, that ſounded like ſomewhat that was ſublime; but had really nothing under it. By conſtant practice they were very nimble at this ſort of Legerdemain, of which both Eraſmus and Sir Thomas More, with the other learned Men of that Age, had made ſuch ſport, that it was become ſufficiently ridiculous: and the Proteſtants laid hold on that advantage which ſuch great Authorities gave them to diſparage it. They ſet up another way of diſputing from the original Text of the Scripture in Greek and Hebrew, which ſeemed a more proper thing in matters of Divinity, than the Metaphyſical Language of the School-men.

This whole Matter being referred to the Privy-Council, they appointed ſome Delegates to hear and preſide in the Diſputation: but Dr. Smith being brought in ſome trouble, either for this Tumult, or upon ſome other account, was forced to put in Sureties for his good behaviour: he deſiring that he might be diſcharged of any further proſecution, made the moſt humble ſubmiſſion to Cranmer that was poſſible: and being thereupon ſet at liberty, he fled out of the Kingdom, it is ſaid he went firſt to Scotland, and from thence to Flanders. But not long after this Peter Martyr had a Diſputation before the Commiſſioners ſent by the King, who were the Biſhop of Lincoln, Dr. Cox, then Chancellor of the Univerſity, and ſome others; in which Treſham, Chadſey, and Morgan diſputed againſt thoſe three Propoſitions: 1. In the Sacrament of Thanksgiving there is no Tranſubſtantiation of Bread and Wine in the Body and Blood of Chriſt. 2. The Body or Blood of Chriſt is not Carnally or Corporally in the Bread and Wine, nor as others uſe to ſay, under the Bread and Wine. 3. The Body and Blood of Chriſt are united to the Bread and Wine Sacramentally. Ridley was ſent alſo to Cambridge with ſome others of the Kings Commiſſioners, where, on the 20*th*, 24*th* and 27*th*. of June, there were publick Diſputations on theſe two Poſitions.

"Tranſubſtantiation cannot be proved by the plain and manifeſt
"words of Scripture; nor can it be neceſſarily collected from it; nor yet
"confirmed by the conſent of the Ancient Fathers.

"In the Lords Supper there is none other Oblation and Sacrifice, than
"of a Remembrance of Chriſts Death, and of Thankſgiving.

Dr. Madew defended theſe, and Glyn, Langdale, Sedgwick, and Young diſputed againſt them the firſt day; and the ſecond day Glyn defended the the contrary Propoſitions, and Peru, Grindal, Geſt, and Pilkington, diſputed againſt them. On the third day the diſpute went on, and was ſummed up in a learned Determination by Ridley againſt the Corporal Preſence. There had been alſo a long Diſputation in the Parliament on the ſame Subject; but of this we have nothing remaining, but what King Edward writ in his Journal. Ridley had, by reading Bertrams Book of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, been firſt ſet on to examine well the old Opinion concerning the Preſence of Chriſts very Fleſh and Blood in the Sacrament: and wondering to find that in the 9th. Century that Opinion was ſo much controverted, and ſo learnedly writ againſt by one of the moſt eſteemed Men of that Age, began to conclude, that it was none of the ancient Doctrines of the Church, but lately brought in, and not fully received, till after Bertrams Age. He communicated the Matter with Cranmer, and they ſet themſelves to examine it with more than ordinary care. Cranmer afterwards gathered all the Arguments about it into the Book which he writ on that Subject, to which Gardiner ſet out an Anſwer under the diſguiſed Name of Marcus Conſtantius; and Cranmer replied to it, I ſhall offer the Reader in ſhort, the Subſtance of what was in theſe Books, and of the Arguments uſed in the Diſputations, and in many other Books which were at that time written on this Subject. 1549.

The manner of the Preſence explained according to the Scripture.

Chriſt in the Inſtitution took Bread, and gave it. So that his words, This is my Body, could only be meant of the Bread: Now the Bread could not be his Body literally. He himſelf alſo calls the Cup, The Fruit of the Vine. St. Paul calls it, The Bread that we break, and the Cup that we bleſs; and ſpeaking of it after it was bleſſed, calls it, That Bread and that Cup. For the reaſon of that Expreſſion, This is my Body; it was conſidered that the Diſciples, to whom Chriſt ſpoke thus, were Jews; and that they being accuſtomed to the Moſaical Rites, muſt needs have underſtood his words in the ſame ſenſe they did Moſes's words, concerning the Paſchal Lamb, which is called the Lords Paſſover. It was not that literally, for the Lords Paſſover was the Angels paſſing by the Iſraelites when he ſmote the firſt-born of the Egyptians; ſo the Lamb was only the Lords Paſſover as it was the Memorial of it: and thus Chriſt ſubſtituting the Euchariſt to the Paſchal Lamb, uſed ſuch an Expreſſion, calling it his Body, in the ſame manner of ſpeaking as the Lamb was called the Lords Paſſover. This was plain enough, for his Diſciples could not well underſtand him in any other ſenſe than that to which they had been formerly accuſtomed. In the Scripture many ſuch Figurative Expreſſions occur frequently. In Baptiſm, the other Sacrament inſtituted by Chriſt, he is ſaid to Baptize with the Holy Ghoſt and with Fire: and ſuch as are Baptized, are ſaid to put on Chriſt: which were Figurative Expreſſions: As alſo in the Sacrament of the Lords Supper, the Cup is called the New Teſtament in Chriſts Blood, which is an Expreſſion full of Figure. Farther it was obſerved, that that Sacrament was inſtituted for a Remembrance of Chriſt, and of his death: which implied that he was to be abſent at the time when he was to be remembred. Nor was it ſimply ſaid, that the Elements were his Body and Blood; but that they were his Body broken, and his Blood ſhed, that is, they were theſe as ſuffering on the Croſs; which as they could not be underſtood literally, for Chriſt did Inſtitute this Sacrament before he had 1549. suffered on the Cross; so now Christ must be present in the Sacrament, not as glorified in Heaven, but as suffering on his Cross. From those Places where it is said, that Christ is in Heaven, and that he is to continue there; they argued, that he was not to be any more upon Earth. And those words in the 6th. of St. John, of eating Christs Flesh, and drinking his Blood, they said were to be understood not of the Sacrament: since many receive the Sacrament unworthily, and of them it cannot be said that they have Eternal Life in them; but Christ there said of them that received him in the sence that was meant in that Chapter, that all that did so eat his Flesh had Eternal Life in them; therefore these words can only be understood Figuratively of receiving him by Faith, as himself there explains it: And so in the end of that Discourse, finding some were startled at that way of expressing himself, he gave a Key to the whole, when he said his Words were Spirit and Life, and that the Flesh profited nothing, it was the Spirit that quickned. It was ordinary for him to teach in Parables; and the receiving of any Doctrine, being oft expressed by the Prophets, by the Figure of eating and drinking, he, upon the occasion of the Peoples coming to him after he had fed them with a few Loaves, did discourse of their believing, in these dark Expressions; which did not seem to relate to the Sacrament, since it was not then Instituted. They also argued from Christs appealing to the Senses of his Hearers, in his Miracles, and especially in his discourses upon his Resurrection, that the Testimony of Sense was to be received, where the Object was duly applied, and the Sense not vitiated. They also alledged natural Reasons against a Bodies being in more Places than one, or being in a Place in the manner of a Spirit, so that the Substance of a compleat Body, could be in a crumb of Bread or drop of Wine: and argued, that since the Elements after Consecration, would nourish, might putrifie, or could be poisoned, these things clearly evinced, That the Substance of Bread and Wine remained in the Sacrament.

And from the Fathers. From this they went to examine the Ancient Fathers. Some of them called it Bread and Wine; others said it nourished the Body, as Justin Martyr; others, that it was digested in the Stomach, and went into the draught, as Origen. Some called it a Figure of Christs Body, so Tertullian, and St. Austin; others called the Elements Types and Signs, so almost all the Ancient Liturgies, and the Greek Fathers generally. In the Creeds of the Church it was professed, that Christ still sate on the Right Hand of God; the Fathers argued from thence, that he was in Heaven, and not on Earth. And the Marcionites, and other Heretick, denying that Christ had a true Body, or did really suffer; the Fathers appealed in that to the Testimony of Sense, as Infallible. And St. Austin giving Rules concerning Figurative Speeches in Scripture; one is this, that they must be taken Figuratively, where in the literal sence the thing were a Crime; which he applies to these Words of eating Christs Flesh, and drinking his Blood. But that on which they put the stress of the whole cause, as to the Doctrine of the Fathers, was the reasoning that they used against the Eutychians, who said that Christs Body and Humane Nature was swallowed up by his Divinity. The Eutychians, arguing from the Eucharists being called Christs Body and Blood, in which they said Christs Presence did convert the Substance of the Bread and Wine into his own Flesh and Blood; so in like manner, said they, his Godhead had converted the

the Manhood into it ſelf: Againſt this, Gelaſius Biſhop of Rome, and Theodoret, one of the learnedeſt Fathers of his Age, argue in plain words, That the Subſtance of the Bread and Wine remained, as it was formerly, in its own Nature, and Form; and from their Opinion of the Preſence of Chriſts Body in it without converting the Elements, they turned the Argument to ſhew how the Divine and Humane Nature can be together in Chriſt, without the ones being changed by the other. Peter Martyr had brought over with him the Copy of a Letter of St. Chryſoſtomes, which he found in a MS. at Florence, written to the ſame purpoſe, and on the ſame Argument: which was the more remarkable, becauſe that Chryſoſtome had ſaid higher things in his Sermons and Commentaries concerning Chriſts being preſent in the Sacrament than any of all the Fathers; but it appeared by this Letter, that thoſe high Expreſſions were no other than Rhetorical Figures of Speech to beget a great reverence to this Inſtitution: and from hence it was reaſonable to judge that ſuch were the like Expreſſions in other Fathers, and that they were nevertheleſs of Chryſoſtomes mind touching the Preſence of Chriſt in this Sacrament. That Epiſtle of his does lie ſtill unpubliſhed, though a very learned Man now in France has procured a Copy of it: but thoſe of that Church know the conſequence that the printing of it would have, and ſo it ſeems are reſolved to ſuppreſs it if they can. From all theſe things it was plain that though the Fathers believed there was an extraordinary Vertue in the Sacrament, and an unaccountable Preſence of Chriſt in it, yet they thought not of Tranſubſtantiation nor any thing like it. But when darkneſs and ignorance crept into the Church, the People were apt to believe any thing that was incredible: and were willing enough to ſupport ſuch opinions as turned Religion into external Pageantry. The Prieſts alſo knowing little of the Scriptures, and being only or chiefly converſant in thoſe Writings of the Ancients that had highly extolled the Sacrament; came generally to take up the Opinion of the Corporal Preſence, and being ſoon apprehenſive of the great eſteem it would bring to them, cheriſhed it much. In the 9th. Century Bertram, Rabanus Maurus, Amalarius, Alcuinus, and Joannes Scotus, all writ againſt it: nor were any of them cenſured or condemned for theſe Opinions. It was plainly and ſtrongly contradicted by ſome Homilies that were in the Saxon Tongue, in which not a few of Bertrams words occur: particularly in that which was to be read in the Churches on Eaſter day. But in the 11th. or 12th. Century it came to be univerſally received; as indeed any thing would have been that much advanced the Dignity of Prieſthood. And it was farther advanced by Pope Innocent the third, and ſo eſtabliſhed in the fourth Council of Lateran; That ſame Council, in which the rooting out of Hereticks, and the Popes Power of depoſing Heretical Princes, and giving their Dominions to others, were alſo decreed. 1549.

But there was another curious Remark made of the Progreſs of this Opinion. When the Doctrine of the Corporal Preſence was firſt received in the Weſtern Church, they believed that the whole Loaf was turned into one entire Body of Jeſus Chriſt; ſo that in the diſtribution one had an Eye, a Noſe, or an Ear, another a Tooth, a Finger, or a Toe, a third a Collop, or a piece of Tripe; and this was ſupported by pretended Miracles ſuited to that Opinion, for ſometimes the Hoſt was 1549. ſaid to bleed, Parts of it were alſo ſaid to be turned to pieces of Fleſh. This continued to be the Doctrine of the Church of Rome for near 300 Years. It appears clearly in the Renunciation which they made Berengarius ſwear. But when the School-men began to form the Tenets of that Church by more artificial and ſubtil Rules; as they thought it an ungentle way of treating Chriſt to be thus mangling his Body, and eating it up in Gobbets, ſo the Maxims they ſet up about the Extenſion of matter, and of the manner of Spirits filling a ſpace, made them think of a more decent way of explaining this Prodigious Myſtery. They taught that Chriſt was ſo in the Hoſt and Chalice, that there was one entire Body in every crumb and drop; ſo that the Body was no more broken, but upon every breaking of the Hoſt, a new whole Body flew off from the other parts, which yet remained an entire Body, notwithſtanding that diminution. And then the former Miracles being contrary to this conceit, were laid aſide, and new ones invented, fitted for this Explanation, by which Chriſts body was believed preſent after the manner of a Spirit. It was given out, that he ſometimes appeared as a Child all in Raies upon the Hoſt, ſometimes with Angels about him, or ſometimes in his Mothers Arms. And that the Senſes might give as little contradiction as was poſſible, in ſtead of a Loaf they bleſſed then only Wafers, which are ſuch a ſhadow of Bread as might more eaſily agree with their Doctrine of the accidents of Bread being only preſent: and leaſt a larger meaſure of Wine might have encouraged the People to have thought it was Wine ſtill, by the ſenſible effects of it, that came alſo to be denied them.

This was the Subſtance of the Arguments that were in thoſe Writings. But an opinion that had been ſo generally received, was not of a ſudden to be altered. Therefore they went on ſlowly in diſcuſſing it, and thereby did the better diſpoſe the People to receive what they intended afterwards to eſtabliſh concerning it. And this was the ſtate of Religion for this Year.

Proceedings againſt Anabaptiſts.

At this time there were many Anabaptiſts in ſeveral parts of England. They were generally Germans, whom the Revolutions there had forced to change their Seats. Upon Luthers firſt preaching in Germany, there aroſe many, who building on ſome of his Principles, carried things much further than he did. The chief Foundation he laid down was, That the Scripture was to be the only Rule of Chriſtians. Upon this many argued, that the Myſteries of the Trinity, and Chriſts Incarnation and Sufferings, of the Fall of Man, and the Aids of Grace, were indeed Philoſophical Subtilties, and only pretended to be deduced from Scripture, as almoſt all Opinions of Religion were; and therefore they rejected them. Among theſe, the Baptiſm of Infants was one. They held that to be no Baptiſm, and ſo were re-baptiz'd: but from this, which was moſt taken notice of, as being a viſible thing, they carried all the general name of Anabaptiſts. Of theſe there were two ſorts moſt remarkable. The one was of thoſe who only thought that Baptiſm ought not to be given but to thoſe who were of an Age capable of Inſtruction, and who did earneſtly deſire it. This Opinion they grounded on the ſilence of the New Teſtament about the Baptiſm of Children; they obſerved, that our Saviour commanding the Apoſtles to baptize, did joyn Teaching with it; and they ſaid, the great decay of Chriſtianity flowed from from this way of making Children Christians before they understood what they did. These were called the gentle or moderate Anabaptists. But others who carried that Name, denied almost all the Principles of the Christian Doctrine, and were Men of fierce and barbarous tempers. They had broke out into a general revolt over Germany, and raised the War called The Rustick War: and possessing themselves of Munster, made one of their Teachers, John of Leyden, their King, under the Title of the King of the new Jerusalem. Some of them set up a fantastical unintelligible way of talking of Religion, which they turned all into Allegories: These being joyned in the common Name of Anabaptists with the other, brought them also under an ill Character. 1549.

On the 12*th*. of April there was a Complaint brought to the Council, that with the Strangers that were come into England, some of that Perswasion had come over, and were disseminating their Errors, and making Proselites: So a Commission was ordered for the Arch bishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Ely, Worcester, Westminster, Chichester, Lincoln, and Rochester, Sir William Petre, Sir Tho. Smith, Dr. Cox, Dr. May, and some others, three of them being a Quorum, to examine and search after all Anabaptists, Hereticks, or Contemners of the Common-Prayer. They were to endeavour to reclaim them, to enjoyn them Penance, and give them Absolution: or if they were obstinate, to excommunicate and imprison them, and to deliver them over to the Secular Power to be farther proceeded against. Some Tradesmen in London were brought before these Commissioners in May, and were perswaded to abjure their former Opinions: which were, "That a Man regenerate could "not sin; that though the outward Man sinned, the inward Man sinned "not; That there was no Trinity of Persons; that Christ was only a "Holy Prophet, and not at all God; That all we had by Christ, was that "he taught us the way to Heaven; That he took no Flesh of the Virgin; "and that the Baptism of Infants was not profitable. One of those who thus abjured was commanded to carry a Faggot next Sunday at St. Pauls, where there should be a Sermon setting forth his Heresie. But there was another of these extream obstinate, Joan Bocher, commonly called Joan of Kent. "She denied that Christ was truly incarnate of the Virgin, "whose Flesh being sinful, he could take none of it: but the Word by "the consent of the inward Man in the Virgin, took Flesh of her: these were her words. They took much pains about her, and had many Conferences with her; but she was so extravagantly conceited of her own Notions, that she rejected all they said with scorn: whereupon she was adjudged an obstinate Heretick, and so left to the Secular Power: The Sentence against her will be found in the Collection. This being returned to the Council, the good King was moved to Sign a Warrant for burning her, but could not be prevailed on to do it: he thought it a piece of cruelty too like that which they had condemned in Papists, to burn any for their Consciences. And in a long Discourse he had with Sir Jo. Cheek, he seemed much confirmed in that Opinion. Cranmer was employed to perswade him to Sign the Warrant. He argued from the Law of Moses, by which Blasphemers were to be stoned: He told the King he made a great difference between Errors in other Points of Divinity, and those which were directly against the Apostles Creed: that these were impieties against God, which a Prince, as being Gods Deputy, ought to punish; 1549. as the Kings Deputies were obliged to puniſh offences, againſt the Kings Perſon. Theſe Reaſons did rather ſilence than ſatisfie the young King, who ſtill thought it a hard thing (as in truth it was) to proceed ſo ſeverely in ſuch Caſes: ſo he ſet his hand to the Warrant, with Tears in his Eyes, ſaying to Cranmer, That if he did wrong, ſince it was in ſubmiſſion to his Authority, he ſhould anſwer for it to God. This ſtruck the Arch-biſhop with much horror, ſo that he was very unwilling to have the Sentence executed. And both he, and Ridley, took the Woman then in cuſtody to their Houſes, to ſee if they could perſwade her. But ſhe continued, by Jeers and other Inſolences, to carry her ſelf ſo contemptuouſly, that at laſt the Sentence was executed on her, the ſecond of May the next Year, Biſhop Scory preaching at her burning: ſhe carried her ſelf then as ſhe had done in the former parts of her Proceſs, very undecently, and in the end was burnt.

An Anabaptiſt burnt.

This Action was much cenſured, as being contrary to the clemency of the Goſpel; and was made oft uſe of by the Papiſts, who ſaid it was plain that the Reformers were only againſt Burning, when they were in fear of it themſelves. The Womans carriage made her be look'd on as a frantick Perſon, fitter for Bedlam than a Stake. People had generally believed that all the Statutes for burning Hereticks had been repealed: but now, when the thing was better conſidered, it was found that the burning of Hereticks was done by the Common Law, ſo that the Statutes made about it were only for making the Conviction more eaſie, and the Repealing the Statutes did not take away that which was grounded on a Writ at Common Law. To end all this matter at once; two years after this, one George Van Pare, a Dutch-man, being accuſed for ſaying that God the Father was only God, and that Chriſt was not very God, he was dealt with long to abjure: but would not: ſo on the 6th. of April 1551. he was condemned in the ſame manner that Joan of Kent was, and on the 25th. of April was burnt in Smithfield. He ſuffered with great conſtancy of mind, and kiſſed the Stake and Faggots, that were to burn him. Of this Pare I find a Popiſh Writer ſaying, That he was a Man of moſt wonderful ſtrict Life, that he uſed not to eat above once in two days, and before he did eat would lie ſometime in his devotion proſtrate on the ground. All this they made uſe of to leſſen the credit of thoſe who had ſuffered formerly; for it was ſaid, they ſaw now that Men of harmleſs Lives, might be put to death for Hereſie, by the confeſſion of the Reformers themſelves: And in all the Books publiſhed in Queen Mary's days, juſtifying her ſeverity againſt the Proteſtants, theſe Inſtances were always made uſe of: and no part of Cranmers Life expoſed him more than this did. It was ſaid he had conſented both to Lamberts and Anne Askews death, in the former Reign, who both ſuffered for Opinions which he himſelf held now: and he had now procured the death of theſe two Perſons, and when he was brought to ſuffer himſelf afterwards it was called a juſt retaliation on him. One thing was certain, that what he did in this matter flowed from no cruelty of temper in him, no Man being further from that black diſpoſition of Mind; but it was truly the effect of thoſe Principles by which he governed himſelf.

Another burnt.

This was much cenſured.

For the other ſort of Anabaptiſts, who only denied Infants Baptiſm, I find no ſeverities uſed to them: but ſeveral Books were written againſt them, to which they wrote ſome Anſwers. It was ſaid that Chriſt allowed allowed little Children to be brought to him, and ſaid, of ſuch was the Kingdom of Heaven, and bleſſed them: Now if they were capable of the Kingdom of Heaven, they muſt be regenerated, for Chriſt ſaid none but ſuch as were born of Water and of the Spirit could enter into it. St. Paul had alſo called the Children of believing Parents Holy, which ſeemed to relate to ſuch a conſecration of them as was made in Baptiſm. And Baptiſm being the Seal of Chriſtians, in the room of Circumciſion among the Jews, it was thought the one was as applicable to Children as the other. And one thing was obſerved, that the whole World in that Age having been baptized in their Infancy, if that Baptiſm was nothing, then there were none truly baptized in being; but all were in the ſtate of meer Nature: Now it did not ſeem reaſonable that Men who were not baptized themſelves ſhould go and baptize others: and therefore the firſt Heads of that Sect, not being rightly baptized themſelves, ſeemed not to act with any Authority when they went to baptize others. The Practice of the Church, ſo early begun, and continued without diſpute for ſo many Ages, was at leaſt, a certain confirmation of a thing which had (to ſpeak moderately) ſo good foundations in Scripture for the lawfulneſs, though not any peremptory, but only probable Proof for the practice of it. 1549.

The Doctrine of Predeſtination much abuſed.

Theſe are all the Errors in Opinion that I find were taken notice of at this time. There was another ſort of People, of whom all the good Men in that Age made great complaints. Some there were called Goſpellers, or Readers of the Goſpel, who were a ſcandal to the doctrine they profeſſed. In many Sermons I have oft met with ſevere Expoſtulations with theſe, and heavy Denunciations of Judgments againſt them. But I do not find any thing objected to them, as to their belief; ſave only that the Doctrine of Predeſtination having been generally taught by the Reformers, many of this Sect began to make ſtrange Inferences from it; reckoning, that ſince every thing was decreed, and the Decrees of God could not be fruſtrated, therefore Men were to leave themſelves to be carried by theſe Decrees. This drew ſome into great impiety of Life, and others into deſperation. The Germans ſoon ſaw the ill effects of this Doctrine. Luther changed his mind about it, and Melanchthon openly writ againſt it: and ſince that time the whole ſtream of the Lutheran Churches has run the other way. But both Calvin and Bucer were ſtill for maintaining the Doctrine of theſe Decrees; only they warned the People not to think much of them, ſince they were Secrets which Men could not penetrate into; but they did not ſo clearly ſhew how theſe conſequences did not flow from ſuch Opinions. Hooper, and many other good Writers, did often dehort People from entring into theſe curioſities; and a Caveat to that ſame purpoſe was put afterwards into the Article of the Church about Predeſtination.

Tumults in England.

One ill effect of the diſſoluteneſs of Peoples manners broke out violently this Summer, occaſioned by the Incloſing of Lands. While the Monaſteries ſtood, there were great numbers of People maintained about theſe Houſes; their Lands were eaſily let out, and many were relieved by them. But now, the Numbers of the People encreaſed much, Marriage being univerſally allowed; they alſo had more time than formerly, by the abrogation of many Holy-days, and the putting down of Proceſſions and Pilgrimages; ſo that as the Numbers encreaſed, they 1549. had more time than they knew how to beſtow. Thoſe who bought in the Church-Lands, as they every where raiſed their Rents, of which old Latimer made great Complaints in one of his Court Sermons, ſo they reſolved to encloſe their Grounds, and turn them to Paſture: for Trade was then riſing faſt, and Corn brought not in ſo much Money as Wooll did. Their Flocks alſo being kept by few Perſons in Grounds ſo encloſed, the Landlords themſelves enjoyed the Profit which formerly the Tenants made out of their Eſtates: and ſo they intended to force them to ſerve about them at any ſuch Rates as they would allow. By this means the Commons of England ſaw they were like to be reduced to great miſery. This was much complained of, and ſeveral little Books were written about it. Some propoſed a ſort of Agrarian Law, that none might have Farms above a ſet value, or Flocks above a ſet number of 2000 Sheep; which Propoſal I find the young King was much taken with, as will appear in one of the Diſcourſes he wrote with his own Hand. It was alſo repreſented that there was no care taken of the educating of Youth, except of thoſe who were bred for Learning; and many things were propoſed to correct this: but in the mean time the Commons ſaw the Gentry were like to reduce them to a very low condition.

The Protector ſeemed much concerned for the Commons, and often ſpoke againſt the oppreſſion of Landlords. He was naturally juſt and compaſſionate, and ſo did heartily eſpouſe the Cauſe of the poor People, which made the Nobility and Gentry hate him much. The former year, the Commons about Hampton-Court, petitioned the Protector and Council, complaining, that whereas the late King in his Sickneſs had encloſed a Park there, to divert himſelf with private eaſie Game, the Deer of that Park did overlay the Country, and it was a great burden to them; and therefore they deſired that it might be diſparked. The Council conſidering that it was ſo near Windſor, and was not uſeful to the King, but a charge rather, ordered it to be diſparked, and the Deer to be carried to Windſor; but with this Proviſo, that if the King when he came of Age deſired to have a Park there, what they did ſhould be no prejudice to him. There was alſo a Commiſſion iſſued out to enquire about Incloſures and Farms, and whether thoſe who had purchaſed the Abbey-Lands kept Hoſpitality, to which they were bound by the Grants they had of them, and whether they encouraged Husbandry. But I find no effect of this. And indeed there ſeemed to have been a general deſign among the Nobility and Gentry to bring the inferior ſort to that low and ſervile ſtate to which the Peaſants in many other Kingdoms are reduced. In the Parliament an Act was carried in the Houſe of Lords for imparking Grounds, but was caſt out by the Commons: yet Gentlemen went on every where taking their Lands into their own Hands, and encloſing them.

Many are eaſily quieted.

In May the Commons did riſe firſt in Wilt-ſhire; where Sir William Herbert gathered ſome reſolute Men about him, and diſperſed them, and ſlew ſome of them. Soon after that, they roſe in Suſſex, Hampſhire, Kent, Glocester-ſhire, Suffolk, Warwick-ſhire, Eſſex, Hartford-ſhire, Leiceſter-ſhire, Worceſter-ſhire, and Rutland-ſhire; but by fair perſwaſions the fury of the People was a little ſtopt, till the matter ſhould be repreſented to the Council. The Protector ſaid, he did not wonder the Commons were in ſuch diſtempers, they being ſo oppreſſed, that it was eaſier easier to die once than to perish for want: and therefore he set out a Proclamation, contrary to the mind of the whole Council, against all new Inclosures; with another, indempnifying the People for what was past, so they carried themselves obediently for the future. Commissions were also sent every where, with an unlimitted Power to the Commissioners, to hear and determine all Causes about Inclosures, High-ways, and Cottages. The vast Power these Commissioners assumed was much complained of; the Landlords said it was an Invasion of their Property, to subject them thus to the pleasure of those who were sent to examine the Matters, without proceeding in the ordinary Courts according to Law. The Commons being encouraged by the favour they heard the Protector bore them, and not able to govern their heat, or stay for a more peaceable issue, did rise again, but were anew quieted. Yet the Protector being opposed much by the Council, he was not able to redress this Grievance so fully as the People hoped. So in Oxford-shire and Devon-shire they rose again, and also in Norfolk and York-shire. Those in Oxford-shire were dissipated by a Force of 1500 Men, led against them by the Lord Gray. Some of them were taken and hanged by Martial Law, as being in a state of War; the greatest part ran home to their Dwellings. 1549.

In Devon-shire the Insurrection grew to be better formed; for that County was not only far from the Court, but it was generally inclined to the former superstition, and many of the old Priests run in among them. They came together on the 10*th.* of June, being Whit-Sunday; and in a short time they grew to be 10000 strong. At Court it was hoped this might be as easily dispersed as the other risings were: but the Protector was against running into extremities, and so did not move so speedily as the thing required. He, after some days, at last sent the Lord Russel with a small Force to stop their Proceedings. And that Lord, remembring well how the Duke of Norfolk had with a very small Army broken a formidable Rebellion in the former Reign, hoped that time would likewise weaken and dis-unite these; and therefore he kept at some distance, and offered to receive their complaints, and to send them to the Council. But these delays gave advantage and strength to the Rebels; who were now led on by some Gentlemen: Arundel of Cornwal being in chief Command among them; and in answer to the Lord Russel, they agreed on fifteen Articles, the Substance of which was as follows. But those of Devon shire grew formidable.

1. "That all the General Councils, and the Decrees of their Fore- "fathers, should be observed. Their Demands.

2. "That the Act of the Six Articles should be again in force.

3. "That the Mass should be in Latin, and that the Priests alone "should receive.

4. That the Sacrament should be hanged up, and worshipped; and "those who refused to do it should suffer as Hereticks.

5. That the Sacrament should only be given to the People at Easter "in one kind.

6. "That Baptism should be done at all times.

7. "That Holy Bread, Holy Water, and Palms be again used; "and that Images be set up, with all the other ancient Ceremo- "nies.

1549. 8. "That the new Service should be laid aside, since it was like a "Christmas Game: and the old Service again should be used with the "Procession in Latin.

9. "That all Preachers in their Sermons, and Priests in the Mass, "should pray for the Souls in Purgatory.

10. "That the Bible should be called in, since otherwise the Clergy "could not easily confound the Hereticks.

11. "That Dr. Moreman, and Crispin, should be sent to them, and "put in their Livings.

12. "That Cardinal Pool should be restored, and made of the Kings "Council.

13. "That every Gentleman might have only one Servant for every "hundred Marks of yearly Rent that belonged to him.

14. "That the half of the Abbey and Church-Lands should be taken "back, and restored to two of the chief Abbeys in every County: and "all the Church Boxes for seven years should be given to such Houses, "that so devout Persons might live in them, who should pray for the "King and the Common-wealth.

15. "And that for their particular grievances, they should be redres-"sed, as Humphrey Arundel and the Major of Bodmyn should inform the "King, for whom they desired a safe conduct.

These Articles being sent to the Council, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury was ordered to draw an Answer to them, which I have seen corrected with his own Hand. The Substance of it was, That their Demands were insolent, such as were dictated to them by some seditious Priests: they did not know what General Councils had decreed; nor was there any thing in the Church of England contrary to them, though many things had been formerly received which were so: and for the Decrees, they were framed by the Popes to enslave the World, of which he gave several Instances.

Cranmer drew an Answer to them. Ex MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.

For the Six Articles, he says, They had not been carried in Parliament if the late King had not gone thither in Person, and procured that Act; and yet of his own accord he slackened the execution of it.

To the third, it was strange that they did not desire to know in what terms they worshipped God: and for the Mass, the ancient Canons required the People to communicate in it, and the Prayers in the Office of the Mass did still imply that they were to do it.

For the hanging up and adoring the Host, it was but lately set up by Pope Innocent, and Honorius, and in some Places it had never been received.

For the fifth, the Ancient Church received that Sacrament frequently and in both kinds.

To the sixth, Baptism in Cases of necessity was to be administred at any time: but out of these Cases it was fit to do it solemnly; and in the Ancient Church it was chiefly done on the Eves of Easter and Whit-Sunday, of which usages some Footsteps remained still in the old Offices.

To the seventh, these were late superstitious devices: Images were contrary to the Scriptures, first set up for remembrance, but soon after made Objects of Worship.

To

To the eight, The old Service had many ludicrous things in it; the new was ſimple and grave: if it appeared ridiculous to them, it was as the Goſpel was long ago, fooliſhneſs to the Grecks. 1549.

To the ninth, The Scriptures ſay nothing of it: it was a ſuperſtitious Invention derogatory to Chriſts death.

To the tenth, The Scriptures are the Word of God, and the readieſt way to confound that which is Hereſie indeed.

To the eleventh, Theſe were ignorant, ſuperſtitious and deceitful Perſons.

To the twelfth, Pool had been attainted in Parliament for his ſpiteful Writings and Doings againſt the late King.

To the thirteenth, It was fooliſh and unreaſonable: one Servant could not do a Man's buſineſs; and by this, many Servants would want employment.

To the fourteenth, This was to rob the King, and thoſe who had theſe Lands of him; and would be a means to make ſo foul a Rebellion be remembred in their Prayers.

To the fifteenth, Theſe were notorious Traitors, to whom the Kings Council was not to ſubmit themſelves.

After this, they grew more moderate, and ſent eight Articles: 1. Concerning Baptiſm. 2. About Confirmation. 3. Of the Maſs. 4. For reſerving the Hoſt. 5. For Holy Bread and Water. 6. For the old Service. 7. For the ſingle Lives of Prieſts. 8. For the Six Articles: and concluded, God ſave the King, for they were His, both body and Goods. To this there was an Anſwer ſent in the Kings Name, on the 8th. of July, (ſo long did the Treaty with them hold) in which, after Expreſſions of the Kings affection to his People, he taxes their riſing in Arms againſt him their King as contrary to the Laws of God: He tells them, That they are abuſed by their Prieſts, as in the Inſtance of Baptiſm, which according to the Book might, neceſſity requiring it, be done at all times: that the Changes that had been ſet out, were made after long and great conſultation; and the Worſhip of this Church, by the advice of many Biſhops and Learned Men, was reformed, as near to what Chriſt and his Apoſtles had taught and done, as could be: and all things had been ſetled in Parliament. But the moſt ſpecious thing that miſled them being that of the Kings Age, it was ſhewed them that his Blood, and not his Years, gave him the Crown: and the ſtate of Government requires, that at all times there ſhould be the ſame Authority in Princes, and the ſame Obedience in the People. It was all penned in a high threatning Style, and concluded with an earneſt Invitation of them to ſubmit to the Kings Mercy, as others that had riſen had alſo done, to whom he had not only ſhewed Mercy, but granted Redreſs of their juſt grievances: otherwiſe they might expect the utmoſt ſeverity that Traitors deſerved. They make new Demands. Which were alſo rejected.

But nothing prevailed on this enraged Multitude, whom the Prieſts inflamed with all the Artifices they could imagine: and among whom the Hoſt was carried about by a Prieſt on a Cart, that all might ſee it. But when this Commotion was thus grown to a Head, the Men of Norfolk roſe the 6th. of July, being led by one Ket a Tanner. Theſe pretended nothing of Religion, but only to ſuppreſs aud deſtroy the Gentry, and to raiſe the Commons, and to put new Councellors about the King. The Rebellion in Norfolk headed by Ket a Tanner.

They

1549. They encreaſed mightily, and became 20000 ſtrong, but had no Order nor Diſcipline, and committed many horrid outrages. The Sheriff of the County came boldly to them, and required them in the King's Name to diſperſe, and go home; but had he not been well mounted, they had put him cruelly to death. They came to Mouſhold Hill above Norwich, and were much favoured by many in that City. Parker, afterwards Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, came among them, and preached very freely to them, of their ill Lives, their Rebellion againſt the King, and the Robberies they daily committed: by which he was in great danger of his Life. Ket aſſumed to himſelf the Power of Judicature, and under an old Oak, called from thence the Oak of Reformation, did ſuch Juſtice as might be expected from ſuch a Judge, and in ſuch a Camp. The Marqueſs of Northampton was ſent againſt them, but with Orders to keep at a diſtance from them, and to cut off their Proviſions; for ſo it was hoped that without the ſhedding much Blood they might come to themſelves again. When the news of this Riſing came into York-ſhire, the Commons there roſe alſo; being further encouraged by a Prophecy; That there ſhould be no King nor Nobility in England, that the Kingdom ſhould be ruled by four Governours choſen by the Commons, who ſhould hold a Parliament, in commotion, to begin at the South and North Seas. This they applied to the Devon-ſhire Men on the South Sea, and themſelves on the North Seas. They at their firſt riſing fired Beacons, and ſo gathered the Country, as if it had been for the defence of the Coaſt; and meeting two Gentlemen, with two others with them, they without any provocation murthered them, and left their naked Bodies unburied. At the ſame time that England was in this Commotion, the News came that the French King had ſent a great Army into the Territory of Bulloigne, ſo that the Government was put to moſt extraordinary ſtraits.

A Faſt at Court, where Cranmer preached. Ex MS. Col. C. C. Cantab.

There was a Faſt proclaimed in and about London. Cranmer preached on the Faſt-day at Court. I have ſeen the greateſt part of his Sermon under his own Hand: and it is the only Sermon of his I ever ſaw. It is a very plain unartificial Diſcourſe, no ſhews of Learning, or conceits of Wit in it, but he ſeverely expoſtulated in the Name of God with his Hearers, for their ill Lives, their Blaſphemies, Adulteries, mutual Hatred, Oppreſſion, and Contempt of the Goſpel: and complained of the ſlackneſs in puniſhing theſe ſins, by which the Government became in ſome ſort guilty of them. He ſet many Paſſages of the Jewiſh Story before them of the Judgments ſuch ſins drew on, and of Gods Mercy in the unexpected deliverances they met with upon their true Repentance. But he chiefly lamented the ſcandal given by many who pretended a zeal for Religion, but uſed that for a Cloak to diſguiſe their other Vices: He ſet before them the freſh Example of Germany, where People generally loved to hear the Goſpel, but had not amended their Lives upon it; for which God had now, after many years forbearance, brought them under a ſevere ſcourge, and intimated his apprehenſions of ſome ſignal ſtroke from Heaven upon the Nation, if they did not repent.

Exeter beſieged.

The Rebels in Devon-ſhire went and beſieged Exeter, where the Citizens reſiſted them with great courage: they ſet fire to the Gates of the City, which thoſe within fed with much Fuel, for hindring their entry till they had raiſed a Rampart within the Gates, and when the Rebels can-came to enter, the Fire being ſpent, they killed many of them. The Rebels alſo wrought a Mine, but the Citizens Countermined, and pour'd in ſo much Water as ſpoiled their Powder. So finding they could do nothing by force, they reſolved to lie about the Town, reckoning that the want of Proviſion would make it ſoon yield. The Lord Ruſſel, having but a ſmall Force with him ſtayed a while for ſome Supplies, which Sir William Herbert was to bring him from Briſtol. But being afraid that the Rebels ſhould incloſe him, he marched back from Honnington where he lay; and finding they had taken a Bridge behind him he beat them from it, killing 600 of them without any loſs on his ſide. By this he underſtood their ſtrength, and ſaw they could not ſtand a brisk Charge, nor rally when once in diſorder. So the Lord Gray, and Spinola that commanded ſome Germans, joyning him, he returned to raiſe the Siege of Exeter, which was much ſtraitned for want of Victuals. The Rebels had now ſhut up the City twelve dayes, they within had eat their Horſes, and endured extream Famine, but reſolved to periſh rather than fall into the Hands of thoſe Savages; for the Rebels were indeed no better. They had block'd up the Ways, and left 2000 Men to keep a Bridge which the Kings Forces were to paſs. But the Lord Ruſſel broke thorough them, and killed about 1000 of them; upon that the Rebels raiſed the Siege, and retired to Lanceſton. The Lord Ruſſel gave the Citizens of Exeter great thanks in the Kings Name for their Fidelity and Courage: and purſued the Rebels, who were now going off in Parites, and were killed in great numbers. Some of their Heads, as Arundel, and the Major of Bodmyne, Temſon, and Barret, two Prieſts, with ſix or ſeven more, were taken and hanged. And ſo this Rebellion was happily ſubdued in the Weſt, about the beginning of Auguſt, to the great Honour of the Lord Ruſſel; who with a very ſmall Force had ſaved Exeter, and diſperſed the Rebels Army, with little or no loſs at all. 1549.

But is relieved, and the Rebels defeated by the Lord Ruſſel.

But the Marqueſs of Northampton was not ſo ſucceſsful in Norfolk. He carried about 1100 Men with him, but did not obſerve the Orders given him, and ſo marched on to Norwich. The Rebels were glad of an occaſion to engage with him, and fell in upon him the next day with great fury, and the Town not being ſtrong, he was forced to quit it, but loſt 100 of his Men in that Action, among whom was the Lord Sheffield, who was much lamented. The Rebels took about 30 Priſoners, with which they were much lifted up. This being underſtood at Court, the Earl of Warwick was ſent againſt them, with 6000 Foot and 1500 Horſe that were prepared for an Expedition to Scotland: He came to Norwich, but was ſcarce able to defend it; for the Rebels fell often in upon him, neither was he well aſſured of the Town. But he cut off their Proviſions, ſo that the Rebels, having waſted all the Country about them, were forced to remove. And then he followed them with his Horſe. They turned upon him, but he quickly routed them, and killed 2000 of them, and took Ket their Captain, with his Brother, and a great many more. Ket was hanged in Chains at Norwich next January.

Warwick diſperſes the Rebels at Norfolk.

The Rebels in York-ſhire had not become very numerous, not being above 3000 in all: but hearing of the defeating of thoſe in other Parts, they accepted of the offer of Pardon that was ſent them: only ſome few 1549. few of the chief Ring-leaders continued to make new ſtirs, and were taken, and hanged, in York, the September following.

When theſe Commotions were thus over, the Protector preſſed that there might be a general and free Pardon ſpeedily proclaimed, for quieting the Country, and giving their affairs a reputation abroad. This was much oppoſed by many of the Council, who thought it better to accompliſh their ſeveral ends, by keeping the People under the laſh, than by ſo profuſe a Mercy: But the Protector was reſolved on it, judging the ſtate of affairs required it. So he gave out a general pardon of all that had been done before the 21*ſt.* of Auguſt, excepting only thoſe few whom they had in their hands, and reſolved to make publick Examples. Thus was England delivered from one of the moſt threatning Storms that at any time had broke out in it: in which deliverance the great prudence and temper of the Protector ſeems to have had no ſmall ſhare. Of this whole Matter Advertiſement was given to the Forreign Miniſters, in a Letter which will be found in the Collection.

A general Pardon.

Collection Number 36.

There was this Year a Viſitation of the Univerſity of Cambridge. Ridley was appointed to be one of the Viſitors, and to preach at the opening of it: he thereupon writ to May Dean of St. Pauls, to let him know what was to be done at it, that ſo his Sermon might be adjuſted to their buſineſs. He received Anſwer, That it was only to remove ſome ſuperſtitious Practiſes and Rites, and to make ſuch Statutes as ſhould be found needful. But when he went to Cambridge, he ſaw the Inſtruction went further. They were required to procure a reſignation of ſome Colledges, and to unite them with others; and to convert ſome Fellowſhips appointed for encouraging the Study of Divinity, to the ſtudy of the Civil Law. In particular Clare-Hall was to be ſuppreſſed. But the Maſter and Fellows would not reſign, and after two days labouring to perſwade them to it, they abſolutely refuſed to do it. Upon this Ridley ſaid he could not with a good Conſcience go on any further in that matter: the Church was already ſo robbed and ſtript, that it ſeemed there was a deſign laid down by ſome, to drive out all Civility, Learning, and Religion out of the Nation: therefore he declared he would not concurre in ſuch things, and deſired leave to be gone. The other Viſitors complained of him to the Protector, that he had ſo troubled them with his barking, (ſo indecently did they expreſs that ſtrictneſs of Conſcience in him) that they could not go on in the Kings Service: and becauſe Clare-hall was then full of Northern People, they imputed his unwillingneſs to ſuppreſs that Houſe, to his partial affection to his Countrymen, for he was born in the Biſhoprick of Dureſme. Upon this the Protector writ a chiding Letter to him. To it he writ an Anſwer ſo ſumble to what became a Biſhop, who would put all things to hazard rather than do any thing againſt his Conſcience, that I thought it might do no ſmall right to his Memory to put it with the Anſwer which the Protector writ to him in the Collection. Theſe with many more I found among his Majeſties Papers of State, in that Repoſitory of them commonly called the Paper-Office. To which I had a free acceſs by a Warrant which was procured to me from the King, by the Right Honourable the Earl of Sunderland, one of the Principal Secretaries of State, who very cheerfully and generouſly expreſſed his readineſs to aſſiſt me in any thing that might compleat the Hiſtory of our Reformation. That Office was firſt ſet up the care of the Earl of Salisbury, when he was Secretary of State in King James's time: which though it is a copious and certain Repertory for thoſe that are to write our Hiſtory ever ſince the Papers of State were laid up there, yet for the former times it contains only ſuch Papers as that great Miniſter could then gather together, ſo that it is not ſo compleat in the Tranſactions that fall within the time of which I writ. 1549.

There was alſo a ſettlement made of the Controverſie concerning the Greek Tongue. There had been in King Henry's time a great Conteſt raiſed concerning the Pronunciation of the Greek Vowels. That Tongue was but lately come to any perfection in England, and ſo no wonder the Greek was pronounced like Engliſh, with the ſame ſound and apertures of the Mouth: To this Mr. Cheek, then Reader of that Tongue in Cambridge, oppoſed himſelf, and taught other Rules of Pronunciation. Gardiner was it ſeems ſo afraid of every Innovation, though ever ſo much in the right, that he contended ſtifly to have the old Pronunciation retained: and Cheek perſiſting in his Opinion, was either put from the Chair, or willingly left it to avoid the indignation of ſo great and ſo ſpiteful a Man as Gardiner was, who was then Chancellor of the Univerſity: Cheek wrote a Book in vindication of his way of pronouncing Greek; of which this muſt be ſaid, That it is very ſtrange to ſee how he could write with ſo much Learning and Judgment on ſo bare a Subject. Redmayn, Poinet, and other learned Men were of his ſide, yet more covertly: but Sir Tho. Smith, now Secretary of State, writ three Books on the ſame Argument, and did ſo evidently confirm Cheeks Opinion, that the Diſpute was now laid aſide, and the true way of pronouncing the Greek took place; the rather becauſe Gardiner was in diſgrace, and Cheek and Smith were in ſuch Power and Authority: So great an Influence had the Intereſts of Men in ſupporting the moſt ſpeculative and indifferent things. A conteſt about pronouncing the Greek.

Soon after this, Bonner fell into new troubles, he continued to oppoſe every thing, as long as it was ſafe for him to do it, while it was under debate, and ſo kept his Intereſt with the Papiſts: but he complied ſo obediently with all the Laws and Orders of Council, that it was not eaſie to find any matter againſt him. He executed every Order that was ſent him, ſo readily, that there was not ſo much as ground for any Complaint; yet it was known he was in his Heart againſt every thing they did, and that he cheriſhed all that were of a contrary mind. The Council being informed, that upon the Commotions that were in England, many in London withdrew from the Service and Communion, and frequented Maſſes, which was laid to his charge, as being negligent in the execution of the Kings Laws and Injunctions; they writ to him on the 23*d.* of July, to ſee to the correcting of theſe things, and that he ſhould give good example himſelf. Upon which, on the 26*th.* following, he ſent about a Charge to execute the Order in this Letter, which he ſaid he was moſt willing and deſirous to do. Yet it was ſtill obſerved, that whatſoever obedience he gave, it was againſt his Heart. And therefore he was called before the Council the 11*th.* of Auguſt. There a Writing was deliver'd to him, complaining of his remiſſneſs; and particularly that whereas he was wont formerly on all high Feſtivals to officiate himſelf, yet he had ſeldom or never done it, ſince the New Service was ſet out: as alſo that Adultery was openly practiſed in his Dioceſs, which he took Bonner falls into trouble. Injunctions are given him.

1549. no care according to his Pastoral Office to restrain or punish: therefore he was strictly charged to see these things reformed. He was also ordered to preach on Sunday come three weeks at St. Pauls Cross: and that he should preach there once a quarter for the future, and be present at every Sermon made there, except he were sick: that he should officiate at St. Pauls at every high Festival, such as were formerly called Majus duplex, and give the Communion: that he should proceed against all who did not frequent the Common-Prayer, nor receive the Sacrament once a year; or did go to Mass: that he should search out and punish Adulterers: that he should take care of the reparation of Churches, and paying Tythes in his Dioceſs, and should keep his residence in his House in London. As to his Sermon, he was required to preach against Rebellion, setting out the hainousness of it; he was also to shew what was true Religion, and that external Ceremonies were nothing in themselves; but that in the use of them Men ought to obey the Magistrate, and joyn true devotion to them, and that the King was no less King, and the People no less bound to obey, when he was in Minority, than when he was of full Age.

In his Sermon he did not set forth the Kings Power under Age as he had been required to do.

On the first of September, being the day appointed for him to preach, there was a great Assembly gathered to hear him. He touched upon the Points that were enjoyned him, excepting that about the Kings Age, of which he said not one word. But since the manner of Christs Presence in the Sacrament was a thing which he might yet safely speak of, he spent most of his Sermon on the asserting the Corporal Presence: which he did with many sharp reflections on those who were of another mind. There were present among others William Latimer, and John Hooper, soon after Bishop of Gloceſter, who came and informed against him; that as he had wholly omitted that about the Kings Age, so he had touched the other Points but slightly, and did say many other things which tended to stir up disorder and dissention. Upon this there was a Commission issued out to Cranmer, and Ridley, with the two Secretaries of State, and Dr. May Dean of St. Pauls, to examine that matter. They or any two of them had full power by this Commission to suspend, imprison or deprive him, as they should see cause. They were to proceed in the Summary way, called in their Courts De plano.

Rot. Pat. 11. Par. 3. Reg.

He is proceeded against.

On the 10*th*. of September Bonner was summoned to appear before them at Lambeth. As he came into the place where they sate, he carried himself as if he had not seen them, till one pulled him by the sleeve to put off his Cap to the Kings Commissioners; upon which he protested he had not seen them; which none of them could believe. He spake slightingly to them of the whole matter, and turned the discourse off to the Mass, which he wished were had in more reverence. When the Witnesses were brought against him, he jeered them very undecently, and said the one talked like a Goose, and the other like a Woodcock, and denied all they said. The Arch-bishop asked him, whether he would refer the matter in proof to the People that heard him? and so asked whether any there present had heard him speak of the Kings Authority when under Age? Many answered, No, No. Bonner looked about, and laughed, saying, Will you believe this fond People? Some he called Dunces, and others Fools, and behaved himself more like a Mad-man than a Bishop. The next day he was again brought before them. Then the Commission was read. The Arch-bishop opened the Matter,

His insolent behaviour.

Matter, and desired Bonner to answer for himself: He read a Protestation which he had prepared, setting forth, that since he had not seen the Commission, he reserved to himself power to except, either to his Judges, or to any other Branch of the Commission, as he should afterwards see cause. In this he called it a pretended Commission, and them pretended Judges, which was taxed as irreverent: but he excused it, alledging that these were terms of Law which he must use, and so not be precluded from any Objections he might afterwards make use of. The Bill of Complaint was next read, and the two Informers appeared with their Witnesses to make it good. But Bonner objected against them, that they were notorious Hereticks, and that the ill Will they bore him, was because he had asserted the true Presence of Christ in the Sacrament of the Altar: that Hooper in particular had in his Sermon, that very day on which he had preached, denied it; and had refuted and mis-recited his Sayings, like an Asse, as he was an Asse indeed; so ill did he govern his Tongue: Upon this Cranmer asked him, whether he thought Christ was in the Sacrament with Face, Mouth, Eyes, Nose, and the other Lineaments of his Body? and there passed some words between them on that Head: but Cranmer told him that was not a time and place to dispute, they were come to execute the Kings Commission. So Bonner desired to see both it, and the denunciation; which were given him, and the Court adjourned till the 13*th*. 1549.

Secretary Smith sate with them at their next Meeting, which he had not done the former day, though his Name was in the Commission; Upon this Bonner protested, that according to the Canon Law none could act in a Commission, but those who were present the first day in which it was read. But to this it was alleadged, that the constant practice of the Kingdom had been to the contrary: that all whose Names were in any Commission, might sit and judge, though they had not been present at the first opening of it. This Protestation being rejected, he read his Answer in writing to the Accusation. He first objected to his Accusers, that they were Hereticks in the matter of the Sacrament: and so were, according to the Laws of the Catholick Church, under Excommunication, and therefore ought not to be admitted into any Christian Company. Then he denied that the Injunctions given to him had been signed, either with the Kings Hand or Signet, or by any of his Council. But upon the whole matter he said he had in his Sermon condemned the late Rebellion in Cornwall, Devon-shire, and Norfolk, and had set forth the Sin of Rebellion according to several Texts of Scripture: He had also preached for obedience to the Kings Commands; and that no Ceremonies that were contrary to them ought to be used; in particular he had exhorted the People to come to Prayers, and to the Communion, as it was appointed by the King, and wondered to see them so slack in coming to it: which he believed flowed from a false opinion they had of it. And therefore he taught, according to that which he conceived to be the duty of a faithful Pastor, the true Presence of Christs Body and Blood in the Sacrament: which was the true Motive of his Accusers in their prosecuting him thus. But though he had forgot to speak of the Kings Power under Age, yet he had said that which necessarily inferred it; for he had condemned the late Rebels, for rising against their lawful King, and had applied many Texts of Scripture to them, which clearly implied, His Defence.

1549. that the Kings Power was then entire, otherwise they could not be Rebels.

These are rejected. But to all this it was answered, That it was of no great consequence who were the Informers, if the Witnesses were such that he could not except against them: besides, they were impow'red by their Commission to proceed ex Officio; so that it was not necessary for them to have any to accuse. He was told that the Injunctions were read to him in Council by one of the Secretaries, and then were given to him by the Protector himself; that afterwards they were called for, and that Article concerning the Kings Power before he came to be of Age being added, they were given him again by Secretary Smith; and he promised to execute them. He was also told, that it was no just excuse for him to say he had forgot that about the Kings Power; since it was the chief thing pretended by the late Rebels, and was mainly intended by the Council in their Injunctions; so that it was a poor shift for him to pretend he had forgot it, or had spoken of it by a consequence.

The Court adjourned to the 16th. day. And then Latimer and Hooper offered to purge themselves of the Charge of Heresie, since they had never spoken nor written of the Sacrament, but according to the Scripture: and whereas Bonner had charged them, that on the first of September they had entred into consultation and confederacy against him, they protested, they had not seen each other that day, nor been known to one another till some days after. Bonner upon this read some Passages of the Sacrament out of a Book of Hoopers, whom he called the Varlet. But Cranmer cut off the discourse, and said, it was not their business to determine that Point, and said to the People, that the Bishop of London was not accused for any thing he had said about the Sacrament. Then Bonner, turning to speak to the People, was interrupted by one of the Delegates, who told him, he was to speak to them, and not to the People: at which some laughing, he turned about in great fury, and said, Ah Woodcocks! Woodcocks! But to the chief Point, he said he had prepared Notes of what he intended to say about the Kings Power in his Minority; from the Instances in Scripture, of Achaz, and Osias, who were Kings at Ten, of Solomon, and Manasses, who Reigned at Twelve, and of Josias, Joachim, and Joas, who began to Reign when they were but Eight years old. He had also gathered out of the English History that Henry the third, Edward the third, Richard the second, Henry the sixth, and Edward the fifth, were all under Age: and even their last King was but eighteen when he came to the Crown: and yet all their acts were obeyed as much before, as after they were of full Age. But these things had escaped his memory, he not having been much used to preach. There had been also a long Bill sent him from the Council to be read, of the defeat of the Rebels, which he said, had disordered him: and the Book in which he had laid his Notes, fell out of his hands, when he was in the Pulpit: for this he appealed to his two Chaplains, Bourn and Harpsfield, whom he had desired to gather for him the Names of those Kings who Reigned before they were of Age. For the other Injunctions, he had taken care to execute them, and had sent Orders to his Arch-deacons to see to them: and as far as he understood, there were no Masses nor Service in Latin within his Dioceſs, except at the Lady Maries, or in the Chappels of Ambassadors. But the Delegates required him positively tively to anſwer, whether he had obeyed that Injunction about the Kings Authority or not; otherwiſe they would hold him as guilty: and if he denied it, they would proceed to the examination of the Witneſſes. He refuſing to anſwer otherwiſe than he had done, they called the Witneſſes, who were Sir John Cheek and four more, who had their Oaths given them: and Bonner deſiring a time to prepare his Interrogatories, it was granted. So he drew a long Paper of twenty Interrogatories, every one of them containing many Branches in it; full of all the niceties of the Canon Law: a teſt of which may be had from the third in number, which is indeed the moſt material of all. The Interrogatory was, "Whether they, or any of them, were preſent at his Sermon, where "they ſtood, and near whom, when they came to it, and at what part of "his Sermon, how long they tarried, at what part they were offended, "what were the formal Words, or Subſtance of it, who with them did "hear it, where the other Witneſſes ſtood, and how long they tarried, or "when they departed? 1549.

The Court adjourned to the 18*th.* of September: And then there was read a Declaration from the King, explaining their former Commiſſion, chiefly in the Point of the Denunciation, that they might proceed either that way, or ex Officio, as they ſaw cauſe: giving them alſo Power finally to determine the matter, cutting off all ſuperfluous delays. Bonner gave in alſo ſome other Reaſons, why he ſhould not be obliged to make a more direct Anſwer to the Articles objected againſt him: The chief of which was, That the Article about the Kings Age was not in the Paper given him by the Protector, but afterwards added by Secretary Smith of his own Head. Cranmer admoniſhed him of his irreverence, ſince he called them always his pretended Judges. Smith added, That though Proctors did ſo in common matters, for their Clients, yet it was not to be endured in ſuch a Caſe, when he ſaw they acted by a ſpecial Commiſſion from the King. New Articles were given him more explicite and plain than the former, but to the ſame purpoſe. And five Witneſſes were ſworn upon theſe, who were all the Clerks of the Council, to prove that the Article about the Kings Age was ordered by the whole Council, and only put in writing by Secretary Smith, at their Command. He was appointed to come next day, and make his Anſwer. But on the 19*th.* two of his Servants came, and told the Delegates, that he was ſick, and could not attend. It was therefore ordered, That the Knight-Marſhal ſhould go to him; and if he were ſick, let him alone; but if it were not ſo, ſhould bring him before them next day. On the 20*th. Bonner* appearing, anſwered as he had done formerly; only he proteſted, that it was his opinion, that the King was as much a King, and the People as much bound to obey him, before he was of Age, as after it: And after that, Secretary Smith having taken him up more ſharply than the other Delegates, he proteſted againſt him as no competent Judge, ſince he had expreſſed much paſſion againſt him, and had not heard him patiently, but had compared him to Thieves and Traitors, and had threatned to ſend him to the Tower to ſit with Ket and Arundel; and that he had added ſome things to the Injunctions given him by the Protector, for which he was now accuſed, and did alſo proceed to judge him, notwithſtanding his Proteſtation, grounded on his not being preſent when the Commiſſion was firſt opened and received by the Court. But this Proteſtation alſo 1549. was rejected by the Delegates; and Smith told him, That whereas he took exception at his saying that he acted as Thieves and Traitors do, it was plainly visible in his doings: upon which, Bonner, being much inflamed, said to him, That as he was Secretary of State, and a Privy Councellor, he honoured him; but as he was Sir Tho. Smith, he told him, he lied, and that he defied him. At this the Arch-bishop chid him, and said, he deserved to be sent to Prison for such irreverent carriage. He answered, he did not care whither they sent him, so they sent him not to the Devil, for thither he would not go: he had a few Goods, a poor Carkass, and a Soul: the two former were in their power, but the last was in his own. After this, being made to withdraw, he, when called in again, put in an Appeal from them to the King, and read an Instrument of it, which he had prepared at his own House that Morning: and so would make no other answer, unless the Secretary should remove. For this contempt he was sent to the Prison of the Marshalsea; and as he was led away, he broke out in great passion, both against Smith, and also at Cranmer, for suffering Hereticks to infect the People, which he required him to abstain from, as he would answer for it to God, and the King.

On the 23*d.* he was again brought before them, where, by a second Instrument, he adhered to his former Appeal. But the Delegates said, they would go on, and judge him, unless there came a Supersedeas from the King, and so required him to answer those Articles which he had not yet answered, otherwise they would proceed against him as Contumax, and hold him as Confessing. But he adhered to his Appeal, and so would answer no more. New matter was also brought, of his going out of St. Pauls in the midst of the Sermon on the 15*th.* of the Month, and so giving a publick disturbance and scandal: and of his writing next day to the Lord Major, not to suffer such Preachers to sow their ill Doctrine. This was occasioned by the Preachers speaking against the Corporal Presence of Christ in the Sacrament: But he would give the Court no account of that matter; so they adjourned to the 27*th*, and from that to the first of October. In that time great endeavours were used to perswade him to submit, and to behave himself better for the future; and upon that condition he was assured he should be gently used. But he would yield to nothing. So on the first of October, when he was brought before them, the Arch-bishop told him, they had delayed so long, being unwilling to proceed to extremities with him, and therefore wished him to submit. But he read another Writing, by which he protested, that he was brought before them by force, and that otherwise he would not have come, since, that having appeal'd from them, he looked on them as his Judges no more. He said, that he had also written a Petition to the Lord Chancellor, complaining of the Delegates, and desiring that his Appeal might be admitted; and said, by that Appeal it was plain, that he esteemed the King to be cloathed with his full Royal Power, now that he was under Age, since he thus appealed to him. Upon which the Arch-bishop, the Bishop of Rochester, Secretary Smith, and the Dean of St. Pauls, gave Sentence against him; that since he had not declared the Kings Power, while under Age, in his Sermon, as he was commanded by the Protector and Council, therefore the Arch-bishop, with the Consent and Assent of his Colleagues, did deprive him of the Bishoprick of London.

He is deprived from his Bishoprick.

don. Sentence being thus given, he appealed again by word of mouth. The Court did alſo order him to be carried to Priſon, till the King ſhould conſider further of it. This account of his Trial is drawn from the Regiſter of London, where all theſe Particulars are inſerted. From thence it was that Fox printed them. For Bonner, though he was afterward Commiſſioned by the Queen to deface any Records that made againſt the Catholick Cauſe, yet did not care to alter any thing in this Regiſter after his re-admiſſion in Queen Maries time. It ſeems he was not diſpleaſed with what he found recorded of himſelf in this matter. 1549.

Thus was Bonner deprived of his Biſhoprick of London. This Judgment, as all ſuch things are, was much cenſured: It was ſaid, it was not Canonical, ſince it was by a Commiſſion from the King, and ſince Secular Men were mixed with Clergy-men in the cenſure of a Biſhop. To this it was anſwered, That the Sentence being only of deprivation from the See of London, it was not ſo entirely an Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure, but was of a mixed nature, ſo that Lay-men might joyn in it: and ſince he had taken a Commiſſion from the King for his Biſhoprick, by which he held it only during the Kings pleaſure, he could not complain of this deprivation, which was done by the Kings Authority. Others who looked further back, remembred that Conſtantine the Emperor had appointed Secular Men to enquire into ſome things objected to Biſhops, who were called Cognitores, or Triers: and ſuch had examined the buſineſs of Cecilian Biſhop of Carthage, even upon an Appeal, after it had been tried in ſeveral Synods; and given Judgment againſt Donatus and his Party. The ſame Conſtantine had alſo by his Authority put Euſtathius out of Antioch, Athanaſius out of Alexandria, and Paul out of Conſtantinople: and though the Orthodox Biſhops complained of theſe Particulars, as done unjuſtly at the falſe ſuggeſtion of the Arrians; yet they did not deny the Emperors Authority in ſuch Caſes. Afterwards the Emperors uſed to have ſome Biſhops attending on them in their Comitatus or Court, to whoſe Judgment they left moſt Cauſes, who acted only by Commiſſion from the Emperor. So Epiphanius was brought to condemn Chryſoſtome at Conſtantinople, who had no Authority to judge him by the Canons. Others objected, that it was too ſevere to deprive Bonner for a defect in his memory; and that therefore they ſhould have given him a new Tryal in that Point, and not have proceeded to cenſure him on ſuch an omiſſion; ſince he proteſted it was not on deſign, but a pure forgetfulneſs; and all people perceived clearly it had been before hand reſolved to lay him aſide, and that therefore they now took him on this diſadvantage, and ſo deprived him. But it was alſo well known, that all the Papiſts infuſed this Notion into the People, of the Kings having no Power till he came to be of Age; and he being certainly one of them, there was reaſon to conclude, that what he ſaid for his defence, was only a Pretence; and that it was of deſign that he had omitted the mentioning the Kings Power when under Age. The adding of Impriſonment to his Deprivation was thought by ſome to be an extream accumulation of Puniſhments. But that was no more than what he drew upon himſelf by his rude and contemptuous behaviour. However it ſeems that ſome of theſe Objections wrought on Secretary Petre, for he never ſate with the Delegates after the firſt day, and he was now turning about to another Party. Cenſures paſs'd upon it.

On

1549. On the other hand, Bonner was little pitied by most that knew him. He was a cruel and fierce Man: he understood little of Divinity, his Learning being chiefly in the Canon Law. Besides, he was looked on generally as a Man of no Principles. All the obedience he gave either to the Laws, or the Kings Injunctions, was thought a compliance against his Conscience, extorted by fear. And his undecent carriage during his process had much exposed him to the People: so that it was not thought to be hard dealing, though the Proceedings against him were summary and severe. Nor did his carriage afterward during his imprisonment discover much of a Bishop or a Christian. For he was more concerned to have Puddings and Pears sent him, than for any thing else. This I gather from some original Letters of his to Richard Leechmore Esq; in Worcester-shire, (which were communicated to me by his Heir Lineally descended from him, the Worshipful Mr. Leechmore, now the Senior Bencher of the Middle-Temple;) of which I transcribed the latter part of one, that will be found in the Collection. In it he desires a large quantity of Pears and Puddings to be sent him: otherwise he gives those to whom he writes an odd sort of Benediction, very unlike what became a Man of his Character, he gives them to the Devil, to the Devil, and to all the Devils, if they did not furnish him well with Pears and Puddings. It may perhaps be thought indecent to print such Letters, being the privacies of friendship, which ought not to be made publick; but I confess, Bonner was so brutish, and so bloody a Man, that I was not ill pleased to meet with any thing that might set him forth in his natural Colours to the World.

Forreign Affairs. Thus did the Affairs of England go on this Summer within the Kingdom; but it will be now necessary to consider the state of our Affairs in Forreign Parts. The King of France finding it was very chargeable to carry on the War wholly in Scotland, resolved this year to lessen that Expence, and to make War directly with England, both at Sea and Land. So he came in person with a great Army, and fell into the Country of Bulloigne, where he took many little Castles about the Town; as Sellaque, Blackness, Hambletue, Newhaven, and some lesser ones. The English Writers say, those were ill provided, which made them be so easily lost: but Thuanus says, they were all very well stored. In the night they assaulted Bullingberg, but were beat off: then they designed to burn the Ships that were in the Harbour, and had prepared Wild-fire with other combustible Matter, but were driven away by the English. At the same time the French Fleet met the English Fleet at Jersey, but, as King Edward writes in his Diary, they were beat off with the loss of 1000 Men; though Thuanus puts the loss wholly on the English side. The French King sate down before Bulloign, in September, hoping that the disorders then in England, would make that place be ill supplied, and easily yielded: the English finding Bullingberg was not tenable, razed it, and retired into the Town: but the Plague broke into the French Camp, so the King left it under the command of Chastilion. He endeavoured chiefly to take the Pierre, and so to cut off the Town from the Sea, and from all communication with England: and after a long Battery he gave the Assault upon it, but was beat off. There followed many Skirmishes between him and the Garrison, and he made many attempts to close up the Channel, and thought to have sunk a Galley full of Stones and Gravel in it; but in all all these he was still unsuccessful. And therefore Winter coming on, the Siege was raised; only the Forts about the Town, which the French had taken, were strongly garrisoned: so that Bulloigne was in danger of being lost the next year. 1549.

In Scotland also, the English Affairs declined much this year. Thermes, before the Winter was ended, had taken Broughty Castle, and destroyed almost the whole Garrison. In the Southern Parts there was a change made of the Lords Wardens of the English marches. Sir Robert Bowes was complained of, as negligent in relieving Hadingtoun the former year; so the Lord Dacres was put in his room. And the Lord Gray, who lost the great advantage he had when the French raised the Siege of Hadingtoun, was removed, and the Earl of Rutland was sent to command. The Earl made an Inroad into Scotland, and supplied Hadingtoun plentifully with all sorts of Provisions, necessary for a Siege. He had some Germans, and Spaniards with him: but a Party of Scotch Horse surprised the Germans Baggage; and Romero with the Spanish Troop was also fallen on, and taken, and almost all his Men were cut off. The Earl of Warwick was to have marched with a more considerable Army this Summer into Scotland, had not the disorders in England diverted him, as it has been already shewn. Thermes did not much more this Year. He intended once to have renewed the Siege of Hadingtoun; but when he understood how well they were furnished, he gave it over. But the English Council, finding how great a charge the keeping of it was, and the Country all about it being destroyed, so that no Provisions could be had, but what were brought from England, from which it was 28 Miles distant, resolved to withdraw their Garrison, and quit it, which was done on the first of October: so that the English having now no Garrison within Scotland, but Lauder, Thermes sate down before that, and pressed it, so that had not the Peace been made up with France, it had fallen into his Hands. The English unsuccessful in Scotland.

Things being in this disorder both at home and abroad, the Protector had nothing to depend on, but the Emperors Aid; and he was so ill satisfied with the Changes that had been made in Religion, that much was not to be expected from him. The confusions this year occasioned that Change to be made in the Office of the daily Prayers; where the Answer to the Petition, Give Peace in our time O Lord, which was formerly, and is still continued, was now made, Because there is none other that fighteth for us but only thou O God. For now the Emperor having reduced all the Princes, and most of the Cities, of Germany to his obedience, none but Magdeburg and Breame standing out, did by a mistake, incident to great Conquerors, neglect those advantages which were then in his hands, and did not prosecute his Victories; but leaving Germany, came this Summer into the Netherlands, whither he had ordered his Son Prince Philip to come from Spain to him, through Italy and Germany, that he might put him into possession of these Provinces, and make them swear Homage to him. Whether at this time the Emperor was beginning to form the design of retiring, or whether he did this only to prevent the Mutinies and Revolts that might fall out upon his death, if his Son were not in actual possession of them, is not so certain. One thing is memorable, in that Transaction that was called the Lætus Introitus, or the terms upon which he was received Prince of Brabant, to which the other Provinces The state of Germany.

1549. had been formerly united into one Principality; after many Rules and Limitations of Government, in the matter of Taxes, and publick Assemblies, the not keeping up of Forces, and governing them not by Strangers, but by Natives, it was added, "That if he broke these Condi-"tions, it should be free for them not to obey him or acknowledge him "any longer, till he returned to govern according to their Laws. This was afterwards the chief ground on which they justified their shaking off the Spanish Yoke, all these Conditions being publickly violated.

Jealousies arise in the Emperors Family.

At this time there were great jealousies in the Emperors Family. For as he intended to have had his Brother resign his Election to be King of the Romans, that it might be transferred on his own Son; so there were designs in Flanders, which the French cherished much, to have Maximilian, Ferdinands Son, the most accomplish'd and vertuous Prince that had been for many Ages, to be made their Prince. The Flemings were much disgusted with the Queen Regents Government, who, when there was need of Money, sent to Bruges, and Antwerp, ordering Deputies to be sent her from Flanders, and Brabant: and when they were come, she told them what Money must be raised: and if they made any objections, she used to bid them give over merchandizing with the Emperor, for he must and would have the Money he asked: so that nothing remained to them, but to see how to raise what was thus demanded of them, rather than desired from them. This, as the English Ambassador writ from Bruges, seemed to be the reason that moved the Emperor to make his Son swear to such Rules of Government; which, the Sequel of his Life shewed, he meant to observe in the same manner that his Father had done before him. At the same time, in May this year, I find a secret Advertisement was sent over from France to the English Court, that there was a private Treaty set on foot between that King and the Princes of Germany, for restoring the liberty of the Empire: but that the King of France was resolved to have Bulloigne in his Hands before he entred on new Projects. Therefore it was proposed to the Protector, to consider whether it were not best to deliver it up by a Treaty, and so to leave the King of France free to the defence of their Friends in the Empire: for I find the consideration of the Protestant Religion was the chief measure of our Councils all this Reign.

A great Faction against the Protector.

Upon this there was great distraction in the Councils at home. The Protector was inclined to deliver up Bulloigne for a Sum of Money, and to make Peace both with the French and Scots. The Kings Treasure was exhausted, Affairs at home were in great confusion, the defence of Bulloigne was a great charge, and a War with France was a thing of that consequence, that in that state of Affairs it was not to be adventured on. But on the other hand, those who hated the Protector, and measured Councils more by the bravery than the solidity of them, said, it would be a reproach to the Nation to deliver up a Place of that consequence which their late King, in the declining of his days, had gained with so much loss of Men and Treasure: and to sell this for a little Money was accounted so sordid, that the Protector durst not adventure on it. Upon this occasion I find Sir William Paget (being made Comptroller of the Kings Houshold, which was then thought an advancement from the Office of a Secretary of State) made a long Discourse, and put it in Writing. The substance of it was, to ballance the dangers in which England was at that time. The Buſineſs of Scotland and Bulloigne drew France into a Quarrel againſt it. On the account of Religion, it had no reaſon to expect much from the Emperor. The Intereſt of England was then to preſerve the Proteſtants of Germany; and therefore to unite with France, which would be eaſily engaged in that Quarrel againſt the Emperor. He propoſed a firm Alliance with the Venetians, who were then jealous of the Emperors Progreſs in Italy, and would be ready to joyn againſt him, if he were throughly engaged in Germany; and by their means, England was to make up an agreement with France. On the other hand, William Thomas, then a Clerk of the Council, writ a long Diſcourſe of other Expedients: He agreed with Paget, as to the ill ſtate of England, having many Enemies, and no Friends. The North of England was waſted by the incurſion of the Scots. Ireland was alſo in an ill condition; for the Natives there did generally joyn with the Scots, being addicted to the old Superſtition. The Emperor was ſo ſet on reducing all to one Religion, that they could expect no great Aid from him, unleſs they gave him ſome hope of returning to the Roman Religion. But the continuance of the War would undo the Nation: for if the War went on, the People would take advantage from it to break out into new diſorders: it would be alſo very diſhonourable to deliver up, or rather to ſell, the late Conqueſts in France. Therefore he propoſed, that to gain time, they ſhould treat with the Emperor, and even give him hopes of re-examining what had been done in Religion: though there was danger even in that, of diſheart'ning thoſe of Magdeburg, and the few remaining Proteſtants in Germany; as alſo they might expect the Emperor would be highly enraged when he ſhould come to find that he had been deluded: but the gaining of time was then ſo neceſſary, that the preſervation of the Nation depended on it. For Scotland he propoſed, that the Governour of that Kingdom ſhould be preſſed to pretend to the Crown; ſince their Queen was gone into a ſtrange Country: by this means Scotland would be for that whole Age ſeparated from the Intereſts of France, and obliged to depend on England: and the French were now ſo hated in Scotland, that any who would ſet up againſt them would have an eaſie Work, eſpecially being aſſiſted by the nearneſs of England. And for Ireland, he propoſed, that the chief Heads of Families ſhould be drawn over, and kept at Court. And that England thus being reſpited from Forreign War, the Nation ſhould be armed, and exerciſed, the Coin reformed, Treaſure laid up, and things in the Government at home that were uneaſie ſhould be corrected.

Thus I have opened the Councils at that time, as I found them laid before me in theſe Authentick Papers, from which I drew them. The reſult of their Conſultation was to ſend over Sir William Paget to joyn with Sir Philip Hobbey, then Reſident at the Emperors Court. His Inſtructions will be found in the Collection. The Subſtance of them was, That the Treaty between the Emperor and the late King ſhould be renewed with this King, and confirmed by the Prince and the States of Flanders: that ſome ambiguous Paſſages in it ſhould be cleared: that the Emperor would comprehend Bulloigne within the League defenſive, and ſo protect it, England being ready to offer any thing reciprocal in the room of it. He was alſo to ſhew their readineſs to agree to the 1549. Emperor concerning the Lady Maries Marriage, to adjust some differences occasioned by the complaints made of the Admiralty, and about Trade: to shew the reason of the Messages that passed between them and France; and to engage, that if the Emperor would heartily assist them, they would never agree with France. Paget was also to propose, as of himself, that Bulloigne should be put into the Emperors Hands upon a reasonable recompence. Thus was Paget instructed, and sent over in June this Year. But the Emperor put him off with many delays, and said, The carrying of his Son about the Towns in Flanders and Brabant, with the many Ceremonies add Entertainments that followed it, made it not easie for him to consider of Matters that required such deep consultation. He put him off from Brussels to Gaunt, and from Gaunt to Bruges. But Paget growing impatient of such delays since the French were marched into the Bulloignese; the Bishop of Arras (Son to Granvell that had been long the Emperors chief Minister) who was now like to succeed in his Fathers room that was old and infirm, and the two Presidents of the Emperors Councils, St. Maurice and Viglius, came to Sir William Paget, and had a long communication with him and Hobbey, an account whereof will be found in the Collection in a Dispatch from them to the Protector.

Collection Number 39.

He meets with the Emperors Ministers.

They first treated of an explanation of some ambiguous words in the Treaty, to which the Emperors Ministers promised to bring them an Answer. Then they talked long of the Matters of the Admiralty, the Emperors Ministers said, no justice was done in England upon the Merchants complaints: Paget said, every Mariner came to the Protector and if he would not sollicite their business, they run away with a Complaint that there was no Justice; whereas he thought, that as they meddled with no private matters, so the Protector ought to turn all these over upon the Courts that were the competent Judges. But the Bishop of Arras said, There was no Justice to be had in the Admiralty Courts who were indeed Parties in all these Matters: Paget said, There was as much Justice in the English Admiralty Courts as was in theirs and the Bishop confessed, there were great corruptions in all these Courts So Paget proposed, that the Emperor should appoint two of his Council to hear and determine all such Complaints, in a Summary way, and the King should do the like in England. For the Confirmation of the Treaty, the Bishop said, the Emperor was willing his Son should confirm it; but that he would never sue to his Subjects to confirm his Treaties: and he said, when it was objected that the Treaty with France was confirmed by the three Estates, that the Prerogative of the French Crown was so restrained that the King could alienate nothing of his Patrimony without the Parliament of Paris and his three Estates. He believed the King of England had a greater Prerogative: he was sure the Emperor was not so bound up: he had fifteen or sixteen several Parliaments, and what work must he be at if all these must descant on his Transactions? When this general discourse was over, the two Presidents went away: but the Bishop of Arras staid with him in private. Paget proposed the Business of Bulloigne: but the Bishop having given him many good words in the general, excepted much to it, as dishonourable to the Emperor; since Bulloigne was not taken when the League was concluded between the Emperor and England: so that if he should now include it in the League, it would be a breach of Faith and Treaties with France: and he ſtood much on the Honour and Conſcience of obſerving theſe Treaties inviolably. So this Converſation ended; in which the moſt remarkable Paſſage is, that concerning the Limitations on the French Crown, and the Freedoms of the Engliſh; for at that time the Kings Prerogative in England was judged of that extent, that I find in a Letter written from Scotland, one of the main Objections made to the marrying their Queen to the King of England was, That an Union with England would much alter the conſtitution of their Government, the Prerogatives of the Kings of England being of a far larger extent than thoſe in Scotland. 1549.

Two or three days after the former Converſation, the Emperors Miniſters returned to Pagets Lodging, with anſwer to the Propoſitions which the Engliſh Ambaſſadors had made: of which a full account will be found in the Collection in the Letter which the Ambaſſadors writ upon it into England. The Emperor gave a good anſwer to ſome of the Particulars, which were ambiguous in former Treaties. For the Confirmation of the Treaty, he offered, that the Prince ſhould joyn in it; but ſince the King of England was under Age, he thought it more neceſſary that the Parliament of England ſhould confirm it. To which Paget anſwered, That their Kings, as to the Regal Power, were the ſame in all the Conditions of Life: and therefore when the Great Seal was put to any agreement, the King was abſolutely bound by it. If his Miniſters engaged him in ill Treaties, they were to anſwer for it at their Perils; but howſoever the King was tied by it. They diſcourſed long about the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, but ended in nothing. And as for the main buſineſs about Bulloigne, the Emperor ſtood on his Treaties with the French, which he could not break: upon which Paget ſaid to the Biſhop, that his Father had told him, they had ſo many Grounds to quarrel with France, that he had his Sleeve full of them, to produce when there ſhould be occaſion to make uſe of them. But finding the Biſhops Anſwers were cold, and that he only gave good words, he told him that England would then ſee to their own ſecurity: and ſo he took that for the Emperors final Anſwer, and thereupon reſolved to take his leave, which he did ſoon after, and came back into England. But at home the Councils were much divided, of which the ſad Effects broke out ſoon afterward. Collection Number 40.

It was propoſed in Council, that the War with Scotland ſhould be ended. For it having been begun, and carried on, only on deſign to obtain the Marriage, ſince the hopes of that were now ſo far gone, that it was not in the power of the Scots themſelves to retrieve them, it was a vain and needleſs expence both of Blood and Money to keep it up; and ſince Bulloigne was by the Treaty, after a few more years, to be delivered up to the French, it ſeemed a very unreaſonable thing, in the low ſtate to which the Kings Affairs were driven, to enter on a War; in which they had little reaſon to doubt but they ſhould loſe Bulloigne, after the new expence of a Siege and another years War. The Protector had now many Enemies, who laid hold on this conjuncture to throw him out of the Government. The Earl of Southampton was brought into the Council, but had not laid down his ſecret hatred of the Protector; and did all he could to make a Party againſt him. The Earl of Warwick was the Debates in Council concerning Peace.

1549. the fitteſt Man to work on: him therefore he gained over to his ſide, and having formed a confidence in him, he ſhewed him, that he had really got all theſe Victories for which the Protector triumphed: he had won the Field of Pinkey near Muſſelburgh, and had ſubdued the Rebels of Norfolk: and as he had before defeated the French, ſo if he were ſent over thither, new Triumphs would follow him: but it was below him to be ſecond to any. So he engaged him to quarrel in every thing with the Protector, all whoſe wary motions were aſcribed to fear or dulneſs. To others he ſaid, What friendſhip could any expect from a Man who had no pity on his own Brother? But that which provoked the Nobility moſt, was the partiality the Protector had for the Commons in the Inſurrections that had been this Summer. He had alſo given great Grounds of jealouſie, by entertaining Forreign Troops in the Kings Wars; which, though it was not objected to him, becauſe the Council had conſented to it, yet it was whiſpered about, that he had extorted that Conſent. But the noble Palace he was raiſing in the Strand, (which yet carries his Name) out of the ruines of ſome Biſhops Houſes, and Churches, drew as publick an envy on him as any thing he had done. It was ſaid, that when the King was engaged in ſuch Wars, and when London was much diſordered by the Plague, that had been in it for ſome Months, he was then bringing Architects from Italy, and deſigning ſuch a Palace as had not been ſeen in England. It was alſo ſaid, That many Biſhops and Cathedrals had reſigned many Mannours to him, for obtaining his favour. Though this was not done without leave obtained from the King; for in a Grant of ſome Lands made to him by the King on the 11*th* of July, in the ſecond year of his Reign, it is ſaid, That theſe Lands were given him as a Reward of his Services in Scotland, for which he was offered greater Rewards; but that he refuſing to accept of ſuch Grants as might too much impoveriſh the Crown, had taken a Licence to the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, for his alienating ſome of the Lands of that Biſhoprick to him: he is in that Patent called by the Grace of God Duke of Somerſet, which had not of late years been aſcribed to any but Sovereign Princes. It was alſo ſaid, That many of the Chantry Lands had been ſold to his Friends at eaſie rates; for which they concluded he had great Preſents: and a courſe of unuſual greatneſs had raiſed him up too high; ſo that he did not carry himſelf towards the Nobility with that equality that they expected from him.

Rot. Pat. 4. Par. 2. Reg.

All theſe things concurred to beget him many Enemies, and he had very few Friends, for none ſtuck firmly to him, but Paget, and Secretary Smith, and eſpecially Cranmer, who never forſook his Friend. All that favoured the old Superſtition were his Enemies: and ſeeing the Earl of Southampton heading the Party againſt him, they all run in to it. And of the Biſhops, that were for the Reformation, Goodrich of Ely likewiſe joyned to them: He had attended on the Admiral in his Preparations for death, from whom, it ſeems, he drank in ill impreſſions of the Protector. All his Enemies ſaw, and he likewiſe ſaw it himſelf, that the continuance of the War muſt needs deſtroy him; and that a Peace would confirm him in his Power, and give him time and leiſure to break thorough the Faction, that was now ſo ſtrong againſt him, that it was not probable he could maſter it without the help of ſome time. So in the Council his Adverſaries delivered their Opinions againſt all motions motions for Peace: and though upon Pagets return from Flanders, it appeared to be very unreasonable to carry on the War; yet they said, Paget had secret Instructions to procure such an Answer, that it might give a colour to so base a Project. The Officers that came over from these Places that the French had taken, pretended, as is common for all Men in such Circumstances, that they wanted things necessary for a Siege; and though in truth it was quite contrary, (as we read in Thuanus) yet their Complaints were cherished and spread about among the People. The Protector had also, against the mind of the Council, ordered the Garrison to be drawn out of Hadingtoun; and was going, notwithstanding all their opposition, to make Peace with France; and did in many things act by his own Authority, without asking their advice, and often against it. This was the assuming a Regal Power, and seemed not to be endured by those who thought they were in all Points his equals. It was also said, That when, contrary to the late Kings Will, he was chosen Protector, it was with that special condition, that he should do nothing without their consent: and though by the Patent he had for his Office, his Power was more enlarged; (which was of greater force in Law, than a private Agreement at the Council Table) yet even that was objected to him, as an high presumption in him to pretend to such a vast Power. Thus all the Month of September there were great Heats among them: several Persons interposed to mediate, but to no effect: for the Faction against him was now so strong, that they resolved to strip him of his exorbitant Power, and reduce him to an equality with themselves. The King was then at Hampton-Court, where also the Protector was, with some of his own Retainers and Servants about him; which encreased the Jealousies; for it was given out, that he intended to carry away the King. So on the 6th. of October some of the Council met at Ely House: the Lord St. John President, the Earls of Warwick, Arundel, and Southampton, Sir Edw. North, Sir Richard Southwell, Sir Edmund Pecham, Sir Edw. Wotton, and Dr. Wotton; and Secretary Petre being sent to them in the Kings Name, to ask what they met for, joyned himself likewise to them. They sate as the Kings Council, and entred their Proceedings in the Council-Book, from whence I draw the account of this Transaction.

Most of the Council separate from him.

These being met together, and considering the disorders that had been lately in England, the losses in Scotland and France, laid the blame of all on the Protector, who they said, was given up to other Councils, so obstinately, that he would not hearken to the advices they had given him, both at the Board, and in private; and they declared, that having intended that day to have gone to Hampton-Court, for a friendly communication with him, he had raised many of the Commons to have destroyed them, and had made the King set his Hand to the Letters he had sent for raising Men; and had also dispersed seditious Bills against them; therefore they intended to see to the safety of the King and the Kingdom. So they sent for the Lord Major and Aldermen of London, and required them to obey no Letters sent them by the Protector, but only such as came from themselves. They also writ many Letters to the Nobility and Gentry over England, giving them an account of their Designs and Motives, and requiring their assistance. They also sent for the Lieutenant of the Tower, and he submitted to their Orders. Next day, the 1549. the Lord Chancellor, the Marqueſs of Northampton, the Earl of Shrewſbury, Sir Tho. Cheyney, Sir John Gage, Sir Ralph Sadler, and the Lord Chief-Juſtice Montague, joyned with them. Then they wrote to the King a Letter, (which is in the Collection) full of expreſſions of their duty and care of his Perſon, complaining of the Duke of Somerſet's not liſtening to their Councils, and of his gathering a Force about him for maintaining his wilful doings: they owned that they had cauſed Secretary Petre to ſtay with them, and in it they endeavoured to perſwade the King that they were careful of nothing ſo much as of his preſervation. They alſo wrote to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and to Sir William Paget, to ſee to the Kings Perſon, and that his own Servants ſhould attend on him, and not thoſe that belonged to the Duke of Somerſet. But the Protector, hearing of this diſorder, had removed the King to Windſor in all haſte; and had taken down all the Armour that was either there, or at Hampton Court, and had armed ſuch as he could gather about him for his preſervation.

The Council at London complained much of this, that the King ſhould be carried to a Place where there were no Proviſions fit for him. So they ordered all things that he might need to be ſent to him from London. And on the 8th. of October they went to Guild-hall, where they gave an account of their Proceedings to the Common-Council of the City: and aſſured them, they had no thoughts of altering the Religion, as was given out by their Enemies, but intended only the ſafety of the King, and the Peace of the Kingdom; and for theſe ends deſired their aſſiſtance. The whole Common-Council with one Voice, declared, they thanked God for the good intentions they had expreſſed, and aſſured them they would ſtand by them with their Lives and Goods. At Windſor, when the Protector underſtood, that not only the City but the Lieutenant of the Tower, of whom he had held himſelf aſſured, had forſaken him, he reſolved to ſtruggle no longer: and though it is not improbable, that he, who was chiefly accuſed for his protecting the Commons, might have eaſily gathered a great Body of Men for his own preſervation; yet he reſolved rather to give way to the Tide that was now againſt him. So he proteſted before the King and the few Counſellors then about him, that he had no deſign againſt any of the Lords; and that the Force he had gathered was only to preſerve himſelf from any violent attempt that might be made on his Perſon: he declared, that he was willing to ſubmit himſelf; and therefore propoſed, that two of thoſe Lords ſhould be ſent from London, and they, with two of thoſe that were yet about the King, ſhould conſider what might be done, in whoſe determination he would acquieſce: and deſired, that whatſoever was agreed on, ſhould be confirmed in Parliament. Hereupon there was ſent to London a Warrant under the Kings Hand, for any two of the Lords of the Council that were there to come to Windſor with twenty Servants a-piece, who had the Kings Faith for their ſafety in coming and going: and Cranmer, Paget, and Smith, wrote to them to diſpoſe them to end the matter peaceably, and not follow cruel Councils, nor to be miſled by them who meant otherwiſe than they profeſſed, of which they knew more than they would then mention. This ſeemed to point at the Earl of Southampton.

On

On the 9*th.* of October the Council at London encreaſed by the acceſſion of the Lord Ruſſel, the Lord Wentworth, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Ant. Wingfield, and Sir John Baker, the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. For now thoſe who had ſtood off a while; ſeeing the Protector was reſolved to yield, came and united themſelves with the prevailing Party: ſo that they were in all two and twenty. They were informed, that the Protector had ſaid, that if they intended to put him to death, the King ſhould die firſt; and if they would famiſh him, they ſhould famiſh the King firſt: and that he had armed his own Men, and ſet them next to the Kings Perſon, and was deſigning to carry him out of Windſor, and as ſome reported, out of the Kingdom: upon which they concluded, that he was no more fit to be Protector. But of thoſe words no proofs being mentioned in the Council-Books, they look like the forgeries of his Enemies to make him odious to the People. The Council ordered a Proclamation of their Proceedings to be printed, and writ to the Lady Mary, and the Lady Elizabeth, acquainting them with what they had done. They alſo wrote to the King (as will be found in the Collection) acknowledging the many bonds that lay on them in gratitude both for his Fathers goodneſs to them, and his own, to take care of him. They deſired he would conſider, they were his whole Council, except one or two; and were thoſe whom his Father had truſted with the Government: that the Protector was not raiſed to that Power by his Fathers Will, but by their choice, with that condition, that he ſhould do all things by their advice; which he had not obſerved, ſo that they now judged him moſt unworthy of theſe Honours: therefore they earneſtly deſired they might be admitted to the Kings Preſence, to do their duties about him, and that the Forces gathered about his Perſon might be ſent away, and the Duke of Somerſet might ſubmit himſelf to the Order of Council. They alſo wrote to the Arch-biſhop and Sir William Paget, (which is in the Collection) charging them as they would anſwer it, that the Kings Perſon might be well looked to, that he ſhould not be removed from Windſor, and that he ſhould be no longer guarded by the Duke of Somerſets Men, (as they ſaid he had been, of which they complained ſeverely) but by his own ſworn Servants; and they required them to concur in advancing the deſire they had ſignified by their Letter to the King, proteſting that they would do with the Duke of Somerſet, as they would deſire to be done by, and with as much moderation and favour as in honour they could: ſo that there was no reaſon to apprehend from them ſuch cruelty as they had mentioned in their Letters. Theſe were ſent by Sir Philip Hobbey, who was returned from Flanders, and had been ſent by the King to London on the day before. Upon this, Cranmer, and Paget, (as is entred in the Council-Book) perſwaded both the King and the Protector to grant their deſire. The Protectors Servants were diſmiſſed, and the Kings were ſet about his Perſon. And Cranmer, Paget, and Smith, wrote to the Council at London, that all they had propoſed ſhould be granted: They deſired to know whether the King ſhould be brought to London, or ſtay at Windſor: and that three of the Lords might be ſent thither, who ſhould ſee all things done according to their minds: and for other things they referred them to Hobbey that carried the Letter, (which is in the Collection) upon this the Council ſent Sir Anthony Wingfield, Sir Anthony St. Liege, and Sir J. Williams, to Windſor, with a charge to ſee that the

Smith* the Secretary, Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir John Thynn, Edw. Wolfe, and William Cecil, should be restrained to their Chambers, till they examined them. On the 12*th.* of October the whole Council went to Windsor, and coming to the King, they protested that all they had done was out of the zeal and affection they had to his Person and Service. The King received them kindly, and thanked them for their care of him, and assured them that he took all they had done in good part. On the 13*th.* day they sate in Council, and sent for those who were ordered to be kept in their Chambers; only Cecil was let go. They charged them, that they had been the chief Instruments about the Duke of Somerset in all his wilful Proceedings; therefore they turned Smith out of his Place of Secretary, and sent him with the rest to the Tower of London. On the day following, the Protector was called before them, and Articles of Misdemeanours and high Treason were laid to his charge, (which will be found in the Collection.) The Substance of them was, That being made Protector, on condition that he should do nothing without the consent of the other Executors, he had not observed that Condition, but had treated with Ambassadors, made Bishops and Lord-Lieutenants, by his own Authority: and that he had held a Court of Requests in his own House; and had done many things contrary to Law, had embased the Coin, had in the Matter of Inclosures set out Proclamations, and given Commissions against the mind of the whole Council: that he had not taken care to suppress the late Insurrections, but had justified and encouraged them: that he had neglected the Places the King had in France, by which means they were lost: that he had perswaded the King that the Lords who met at London intended to destroy him, and had desired him never to forget it, but to revenge it, and had required some young Lords to keep it in his remembrance; and had caused those Lords to be proclaimed Traitors: that he had said, If he should die, the King should die too: that he had carried the King so suddenly to Windsor, that he was not only put in great fear, but cast into a dangerous disease: that he had gathered the People, and armed them for War; and had armed his Friends and Servants; and left the King's Servants unarmed: and that he intended to fly to Jersey, or Garnsey. So he was sent to the Tower, being conducted thither by the Earls of Sussex, and Huntington. That day the King was carried back again to Hampton-Court; and an Order was made, that six Lords should be the Governours of his Person: who were the Marquess of Northampton, the Earls of Warwick, and Arundel, the Lords St. John, Russel, and Wentworth. Two of those were in their course to attend constantly on the King.

Censures passed upon him. And thus fell the Duke of Somerset from his high Offices and great Trust. The Articles objected to him seem to say as much for his justification, as the Answers could do, if they were in my Power. He is not accused of rapine, cruelty, or bribery; but only of such things as are incident to all Men that are of a sudden exalted to a high and disproportioned greatness. What he did about the Coin, was not for his own advantage, but was done by a common mistake of many Governours, who, in the necessity of their Affairs, fly to this as their last shift, to draw out their business as long as is possible; but it ever rebounds on the

the Government to its great prejudice and loſs. He bore his Fall more equally than he had done his Proſperity: and ſet himſelf in his impriſonment to ſtudy, and reading: and falling on a Book that treated of Patience, both from the Principles of Moral Philoſophy, and of Chriſtianity; he was ſo much taken with it, that he ordered it to be tranſlated into Engliſh, and writ a Preface to it himſelf, mentioning the great comfort he had found in reading it, which had induced him to take care that others might reap the like benefit from it. Peter Martyr writ him alſo a long conſolatory Letter, which was printed, both in Latin, and in an Engliſh Tranſlation: and all the Reformed, both in England, and abroad, looked on his fall as a publick loſs to that whole Intereſt, which he had ſo ſteadily ſet forward. 1549.

The Papiſts much lifted up.

But on the other hand, the Popiſh Party were much lifted up at his Fall; and the rather, becauſe they knew the Earl of Southampton, who they hoped ſhould have directed all Affairs, was entirely theirs. It was alſo believed, that the Earl of Warwick had given them ſecret Aſſurances: So it was underſtood at the Court of France, as Thuanus writes. They had alſo, among the firſt things they did, gone about to diſcharge the Duke of Norfolk of his long impriſonment, in conſideration of his great Age, his former Services, and the extremity of the Proceedings againſt him, which were ſaid to have flowed chiefly from the ill Offices the Duke of Somerſet had done him. But this was ſoon laid aſide. So now the Papiſts made their Addreſſes to the Earl of Warwick. The Biſhop of Wincheſter wrote to him a hearty Congratulation, rejoycing that the late Tyranny (ſo he called the Duke of Somerſet's Adminiſtration) was now at an end: he wiſhed him all proſperity, and deſired, that when he had leiſure from the great Affairs, that were in ſo unſetled a condition, ſome regard might be had of him. The Biſhop of London, being alſo in good hopes, ſince the Protector, and Smith, whom he eſtemed his chief Enemies, were now in diſgrace, and Cranmer was in cold, if not in ill terms, with the Earl of Warwick, ſent a Petition that his Appeal might be received, and his Proceſs reviewed. Many alſo began to fall off from going to the Engliſh Service, or the Communion; hoping that all would be quickly undone that had been ſetled by the Duke of Somerſet. But the Earl of Warwick, finding the King ſo zealouſly addicted to the carrying on of the Reformation, that nothing could recommend any one ſo much to him, as the promoting it further would do, ſoon forſook the Popiſh Party, and was ſeemingly the moſt earneſt on a further Reformation that was poſſible. I do not find that he did write any Anſwer to the Biſhop of Wincheſter. He continued ſtill a Priſoner. And for Bonners Matter, there was a new Court of Delegates appointed to review his Appeal, conſiſting of four Civilians, and four Common Lawyers; who having examined it, reported, that the Proceſs had been legally carried on, and the Sentence juſtly given, and that there was no good reaſon why the Appeal ſhould be received, and therefore they rejected it. This being reported to the Council, they ſent for Bonner in the beginning of February, and declared to him, that his Appeal was rejected, and that the Sentence againſt him was in full force ſtill.

But their hopes ſoon vaniſh.

But the Buſineſs of Bulloigne was that which preſſed them moſt. They miſdoubting, as was formerly ſhewn, that Paget had not managed that matter 1549. matter dexterously and earnestly with the Emperor, sent on the 18*th.* of October Sir Tho. Cheyny, and Sir Phil. Hobbey to him, to entreat him to take Bulloign into his Protection; they also sent over the Earl of Huntington to command it, with the addition of a thousand Men for the Garrison. When the Ambassadors came to the Emperor, they desired leave to raise 2000 Horse and 3000 Foot in his Dominions for the preservation of Bulloigne. The Emperor gave them very good words, but insisted much on his League with France: and referred them to the Bishop of Arras, who told them plainly the thing could not be done. So Sir Tho. Cheyney took his leave of the Emperor, who at parting desired him to represent to the Kings Council, how necessary it was to consider matters of Religion again, that so they might be all of one mind; for, to deal plainly with them, till that were done, he could not assist them so effectually as otherwise he desired to do. And now the Council saw clearly, they had not been deceived by Paget in that Particular, and therefore resolved to apply themselves to France for a Peace. But now the Earl of Warwick falling off wholly from the Popish Party, the Earl of Southampton left the Court in great discontent. He was neither restored to his Office of Chancellor, nor made Lord Treasurer, (that Place, which was vacant by the Duke of Somersets Fall, being now given to the Lord St. John, who soon after, was made Earl of Wilt shire;) nor was he made one of those who had charge of the Kings Person. So he began to lay a Train against the Earl of Warwick; but he was too quick for him, and discovered it: upon which he left the Court in the night, and it was said, he poisoned himself, or pined away with discontent, for he died in July after.

A new Office for Ordinations.

So now the Reformation was ordered to be carried on: and there being one part of the Divine Offices not yet reformed, that is, concerning the giving Orders, some Bishops and Divines, brought now together by a Session of Parliament, were appointed to prepare a Book of Ordination.

A Session of Parliament.

But now I turn to the Parliament, which sate down on the 4*th.* of November. In it a severe Law was made against unlawful Assemblies: that if any, to the number of twelve should meet together unlawfully, for any matter of State, and being required by any lawful Magistrate, should not disperse themselves, it should be Treason: and if any broke Hedges, or violently pulled up Pales, about Inclosures, without lawful Authority, it should be Felony. It was also made Felony to gather the People together without Warrant, by ringing of Bells, or sound of Drums and Trumpets, or the firing of Beacons. There was also a Law made against Propheſies concerning the King or his Council, since by these the People were disposed to sedition: for the first offence it was to be punished by Imprisonment for a year, and 10 l. Fine: For the second, it was Imprisonment during Life, with the forfeiture of Goods and Chattels. All this was on the account of the Tumults the former year, and not with any regard to the Duke of Somersets security, as some have without any reason fancied: for he had now no interest in the Parliament, nor was he in a condition any more to apprehend Tumults against himself, being stript of his so much envied greatness. Another Law was made against Vagabonds, relating, That the former Statute made in this Reign being too severe, was by that means not executed: so it was repealed, and the the Law made in King Henry the 8*th*'s. Reign put in force: Proviſions were laid down for relieving the Sick and Impotent, and ſetting the Poor, that were able, to work: That once a month there ſhould be every where a Viſitation of the Poor, by thoſe in Office, who ſhould ſend away ſuch as did not belong to that Place, and thoſe were to be carried from Conſtable to Conſtable, till they were brought to ſuch Places as were bound to ſee to them. There was a Bill brought in for the repealing of a Branch of the Act of Uniformity, but it went no further than one reading. 1549.

The Biſhops move for a reviving of Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures.

On the 14*th*. of November the Biſhops made a heavy complaint to the Lords, of the abounding of vice and diſorder, and that their Power was ſo abridged, that they could puniſh no ſin, nor oblige any to appear before them, or to obſerve the Orders of the Church. This was heard by all the Lords with great regret, and they ordered a Bill to be drawn about it. On the 18*th*. of November a Bill was brought in, but rejected at firſt reading, becauſe it ſeemed to give the Biſhops too much Power. So a ſecond Bill was appointed to be drawn by a Committee of the Houſe. It was agreed to, and ſent down to the Commons, who laid it aſide after the ſecond reading. They thought it better to renew the deſign that was in the former Reign, of two and thirty Perſons being authorized to compile the Body of Eccleſiaſtical Laws; and when that was prepared, it ſeemed more proper, by confirming it, to eſtabliſh Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, than to give the Biſhops any Power, while the Rules of their Courts were ſo little determined or regulated: So an Act paſſed, empow'ring the King to name ſixteen Perſons of the Spiritualty, of whom four ſhould be Biſhops, and ſixteen of the Temporalty, of whom four ſhould be common Lawyers, who within three years ſhould compile a Body of Eccleſiaſtical Laws; and thoſe, being nothing contrary to the Common and Statute Laws of the Land, ſhould be publiſhed by the Kings Warrant, under the Great Seal, and have the force of Laws in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. Thus they took care that this ſhould not be turn'd over to an uncertain Period, as it had been done in the former Reign, but deſigned that it ſhould be quickly finiſhed. The Biſhops of that time were generally ſo backward in every ſtep to a Reformation, that a ſmall number of them was made neceſſary to be of this Commiſſion. The effect that it had ſhall be afterwards opened.

There was a Bill brought into the Houſe of Commons, That the Preaching and holding of ſome Opinions ſhould be declared Felony: it paſſed with them, but was laid aſide by the Lords. A Bill for the Form of Ordaining Miniſters was brought into the Houſe of Lords, and was agreed to, the Biſhops of Dureſme, Carliſle, Worceſter, Chicheſter, and Weſtminſter, proteſting againſt it. The Subſtance of it was, That ſuch Forms of Ordaining Miniſters as ſhould be ſet forth by the advice of ſix Prelates and ſix Divines, to be named by the King, and Authorized by a Warrant under the Great Seal, ſhould be uſed after April next, and no other. On the ſecond of January a Bill was put in againſt the Duke of Somerſet, of the Articles formerly mentioned, with a Confeſſion of them Signed by his Hand. This he was prevailed with to do, upon aſſurances given that he ſhould be gently dealt with, if he would freely confeſs, and ſubmit himſelf to the Kings mercy. But it was ſaid by ſome of the Lords, that they did not know whether that Confeſſion was not drawn from him 1550.

1550. him by force: and that it might be an ill Preſident to paſs Acts upon ſuch Papers, without examining the Party, whether he had ſubſcribed them freely and uncompelled: ſo they ſent four Temporal Lords, and four Biſhops, to examine him concerning it. And the day following, the Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield made the Report, that he thanked them for that kind Meſſage, but that he had freely ſubſcribed the Confeſſion that lay before them. He had made it on his Knees before the King and Council, and had Signed it on the 13*th.* of December. He proteſted his offences had flowed from raſhneſs and indiſcretion, rather than malice, and that he had no treaſonable deſign againſt the King or his Realms. So he was fined by Act of Parliament in 2000 l. a year of Land, and he loſt all his Goods and Offices. Upon this he wrote to the Council, acknowledging their favour, in bringing off his Matter by a Fine: he confeſſed that he had fall'n into the frailties that often attend on great Places, but what he had done amiſs was rather for want of true Judgment, than from any malicious meaning: he humbly deſired they would interpoſe with the King for a moderation of his Fine, and that he might be pardoned and reſtored to favour; aſſuring them, that for the future he ſhould carry himſelf ſo humbly and obediently, that he ſhould thereby make amends for his former follies: This was much cenſured by many, as a ſign of an abject Spirit: others thought it was wiſely done in him once to get out of Priſon on any terms, ſince the greatneſs of his former condition gave ſuch jealouſie to his Enemies, that unleſs he had his pardon, he would be in continual danger, as long as he was in their hands. So on the 6*th.* of February he was ſet at liberty, giving Bond of 10000 l. for his good behaviour; and being limited that he ſhould ſtay at the Kings Houſe of Sheen, or his own of Zion, and ſhould not go ſo far Miles from them, nor come to the King or the Council, unleſs he were called: He had his Pardon on the 16*th.* of February, and carried himſelf after that ſo humbly, that his behaviour, with the Kings great kindneſs to him, did ſo far prevail, that on the 10*th.* of April after, he was reſtored into favour, and ſworn of the Privy-Council. And ſo this ſtorm went over him much more gently than was expected; but his carriage in it was thought to have ſo little of the Hero, that he was not much conſidered after this.

The Reformation is ſet on vigorouſly.

But to go on with the buſineſs of the Parliament; reports had been ſpread, that the old Service would be again ſet up: and theſe were much cheriſhed by thoſe who ſtill loved the former ſuperſtition: who gave out that a change was to be expected, ſince the New Service had been only the Act of the Duke of Somerſet. Upon this the Council wrote on Chriſtmas day a Letter to all the Biſhops of England, to this effect. "That whereas the Engliſh Service had been deviſed by Learned Men "according to the Scripture, and the uſe of the Primitive Church; there- "fore, for putting away thoſe vain expectations, all Clergy-men were "required, to deliver to ſuch as ſhould be appointed by the King to re- "ceive them, all Antiphonales, Miſſals, Grayles, Proceſſionals, Ma- "nuals, Legends, Pies, Portuaſles, Journals, and Ordinals, after the uſe "of Sarum, Lincoln, York, or any other private uſe: requiring them "alſo to ſee to the obſerving one uniform Order in the Service ſet forth "by the common conſent of the Realm: and particularly to take care that "there ſhould be every where proviſion made of Bread and Wine for « Communion on Sunday. This will be found in the Collection. But to give a more publick declaration of their zeal, an Act was brought into Parliament about it, and was agreed to by all the Lords; except the Earl of Darby, the Biſhops of Dureſme, Coventry and Litchfield, Carliſle, Worceſter, Weſtminſter, and Chicheſter, and the Lords Morley, Stourton, Windſor, and Wharton. By it, not only all the Books formerly mentioned were to be deſtroyed, but all that had any Image that had belonged to any Church or Chappel, were required to deface it before the laſt of June, and in all the Primers ſet out by the late King, the Prayers to the Saints were to be daſhed out. There was alſo an Act for a Subſidy to be payed in one year, for which there was a Releaſe granted of a Branch of the Subſidy formerly given. Laſt of all came the Kings general Pardon, out of which thoſe in the Tower, or other Priſons, on the account of the State, as alſo all Anabaptiſts were excepted. 1550. Collection Number 46.

Thus were all Matters ended, and on the firſt of February the Parliament was prorogued. Only in the Houſe of Commons there was a Debate that deſerves to be remembred. It ſeems that before this time the Eldeſt Sons of Peers were not Members of the Houſe of Commons: and Sir Francis Ruſſel, becoming, by the death of his elder Brother, Heir apparent to the Lord Ruſſel; it was on the 21*ſt*. of Jan. carried upon a Debate, That he ſhould abide in the Houſe as he was before. So it is entred in the Original Journal of the Houſe of Commons, which was communicated to me by Mr. Surle, and Mr. Clark, in whoſe Hands it is now, and is the firſt Journal that ever was taken in that Houſe.

But it may be expected that I ſhould next give an account of the Forms of Ordination now agreed on. Twelve were appointed by the Council to prepare the Book; among whom, Heath Biſhop of Worceſter was one, but he would not conſent to the Reformations that were propoſed in it: So on the 8*th*. of February he was called before the Council, and required to agree to that which all the reſt had conſented to. But he could not be prevailed with to do it. Wherefore on the fourth of March he was committed to the Fleet, becauſe (as it is entred in the Council Books) that he obſtinately denied to ſubſcribe the Book for the making of Biſhops and Prieſts. He had hitherto oppoſed every thing done towards Reformation in Parliament, though he had given an entire obedience to it when it was enacted. He was a Man of a gentle temper and great prudence, that underſtood Affairs of State better than Matters of Religion. But now it was reſolved to rid the Church of thoſe Compliers, who ſubmitted out of fear, or intereſt, to ſave their Benefices, but were ſtill ready upon any favourable conjuncture, to return back to the old ſuperſtition. Heath Biſhop of Worceſter put in Priſon for not agreeing with the others appointed to draw the Book for Ordinations.

As for the Forms of Ordination, they found, that the Scripture mentioned only the Impoſition of Hands and Prayer. In the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, In the fourth Council of Carthage, and in the pretended Works of Denis the Areopagite, there was no more uſed. Therefore all thoſe additions, of Anointing, and giving them Conſecrated Veſtments, were later Inventions. But moſt of all the conceit, which from the time of the Council of Florence was generally received, that the Rites by which a Prieſt was ordained, were the delivering him the Veſſels for conſecrating the Euchariſt, with a Power to offer Sacrifice to God for the 1550. the dead and the living. This was a vain Novelty, only ſet up to ſupport the belief of Tranſubſtantiation: and had no ground, in the Scriptures, nor the Primitive Practice. So they agreed on a Form of ordaining Deacons, Prieſts, and Biſhops, which is the ſame we yet uſe, except in ſome few words, that have been added ſince in the Ordination of a Prieſt, or Biſhop. For there was then no expreſs mention made in the words of Ordaining them, that it was for the one, or the other Office: In both it was ſaid, Receive thou the Holy Ghoſt, in the Name of the Father, &c. But that having been ſince made uſe of to prove both Functions the ſame, it was of late years altered, as it is now. Nor were theſe words, being the ſame in giving both Orders, any ground to infer that the Church eſteemed them one Order; the reſt of the Office ſhewing the contrary very plainly. Another difference between the Ordination Book ſet out at that time, and that we now uſe, was, that the Biſhop was to lay his one Hand on the Prieſts Head, and with his other to give him a Bible, with a Chalice and Bread in it, ſaying the words now ſaid at the delivery of the Bible. In the Conſecration of a Biſhop there was nothing more than what is yet in uſe, ſave that a Staff was put into his Hand, with this Bleſſing, Be to the Flock of Chriſt a Shepherd. By the Rule of this Ordinal, a Deacon was not to be ordained before he was 21, a Prieſt before he was 24, nor a Biſhop before he was 30 years of Age.

The Additions brought into the Church of Rome in giving Orders.

In this Ritual all thoſe ſuperadded Rites were cut off, which the later Ages had brought in, to dreſs up theſe Performances with the more pomp: whereof we have ſince a more perfect account, than it was poſſible for them then to have. For in our Age Morinus, a learned Prieſt of the Oratorian Order, has publiſhed the moſt ancient Rituals he could find; by which it appears how theſe Offices ſwelled in every Age by ſome new addition. About the middle of the ſixth Century, they anointed and bleſſed the Prieſts Hands in ſome parts of France: though the Greek Church never uſed anointing; nor was it in the Roman Church two Ages after that: for Pope Nicolaus the firſt plainly ſays, it was never uſed in the Church of Rome. In the 8th. Century, the Prieſts Garments were given with a ſpecial Benediction, for the Prieſts offering expiatory Sacrifices: It was no ancienter that that Phraſe was uſed in ordinations: and in that ſame Age there was a ſpecial Benediction of the Prieſts Hands, uſed before they were anointed: and then his Head was anointed. This was taken partly from the Levitical Law, and partly becauſe the People believed that their King derived the Sacredneſs of their Perſons, from their being anointed: So the Prieſts having a mind to have their Perſons ſecured and exempted from all Secular Power, were willing enough to uſe this Rite in their Ordinations: and in the 10th Century, when the belief of Tranſubſtantiation was received, the delivering of the Veſſels for the Euchariſt, with the Power of offering Sacrifices, was brought in, beſides a great many other Rites. So that the Church did never tie it ſelf to one certain Form of Ordinations: nor did it always make them with the ſame Prayers; for what was accounted anciently the Form of Ordination, was in the later Ages but a preparatory Prayer to it.

Interrogations and Sponſions in the new Book.

The moſt conſiderable addition that was made in the Book of Ordinations, was the putting Queſtions to the Perſons to be ordained: which by anſwering theſe, make ſolemn Declarations of Sponſions and Vows to God. The firſt Queſtion when one is preſented to Orders, is, Do you truſt that you are inwardly moved by the Holy Ghoſt, to take upon you this Office and Miniſtration, to ſerve God, for the promoting his Glory, and for the edifying of his People? To which he is to anſwer, He truſts he is. It has been oft lamented, that many come to receive Orders before ever they have ſeriouſly read over theſe Queſtions, and examined themſelves whether they could with a good Conſcience make the Anſwers there preſcribed: ſince it is ſcarce credible that Men of common honeſty would lie in the Preſence of God, on ſo great an occaſion: and yet it is too viſible, that many have not any ſuch inward vocation, nor have ever conſidered ſeriouſly what it is. If it were well apprehended, that heat that many have to get into Orders would ſoon abate; who perhaps have nothing in their Eye, but ſome place of Profit, or Benefice, to which way muſt be made by that preceding Ceremony: and ſo enter into Orders, as others are aſſociated into Fraternities and Corporations, with little previous ſenſe of that Holy Character, they are to receive, when they thus dedicate their Lives and Labours to the Service of God, in the Goſpel. In the Primitive Church the apprehenſion of this made even good and holy Men afraid to enter under ſuch Bonds: and therefore they were oft to be dragg'd almoſt by force, or catched at unawares, and be ſo initiated: as appears in the lives of theſe two Greek Fathers Nazianzen and Chryſoſtom. If Men make their firſt ſtep to the Holy Altar, by ſuch a lye, as is their pretending to a motion of the Holy Ghoſt, concerning which they know little, but that they have nothing at all of it; they have no reaſon to expect that Bleſſing which otherwiſe attends on ſuch Dedications. And it had been happy for the Church if all thoſe that are authorized to confer Orders, had ſtood on this more critically; and not been contented with a bare putting theſe Queſtions to thoſe who come to be ordained; but had uſed a due ſtrictneſs before hand, ſutable to that grave admonition of St. Pauls to Timothy, Lay Hands ſuddenly on no Man, and be not partaker of other Mens ſins. 1550.

In the Sponſions made by the Prieſts, they bind themſelves to teach the People committed to their charge, to baniſh away all erroneous Doctrines, and to uſe both publick and private Monitions, and Exhortations, as well to the Sick, as the Whole, within their Cures, as need ſhall require, and as occaſion ſhall be given. Such as remember that they have plighted their Faith for this to God, will feel the Paſtoral care to be a Load indeed, and ſo be far enough from relinquiſhing it, or hiring it out perhaps to a looſe or ignorant Mercenary. Theſe are the blemiſhes and ſcandals that lie on our Church, brought on it partly by the corruption of ſome Simoniacal Patrons, but chiefly by the negligence of ſome, and the faultineſs of other Clergy-men: Which could never have loſt ſo much ground in the Nation, upon ſuch trifling accounts, as are the Conteſts ſince raiſed about Ceremonies; if it were not that the People, by ſuch palpable faults in the Perſons and behaviour of ſome Church-men, have been poſſeſſed with prejudices, firſt againſt them, and then upon their account againſt the whole Church: ſo that theſe corrupt Church-men are not only to anſwer to God for all thoſe Souls within their charge, that have periſhed through their neglect, but in a great degree for all the miſchief of the Schiſm among us; to the nouriſhing whereof they have given ſo great 1550. and palpable occaſion. The importance of thoſe things made me judge they deſerved this digreſſion, from which I now turn to other Affairs.

The Buſineſs of Bulloigne lay heavy on the Council. The French had ſtopt all communication between Calais and it; ſo that it was not eaſie to ſupply it from thence. The Council, to rid the Nation of the Forreigners, ſent them all to Calais with 3000 Engliſh, and reſolved to force a way through, if it came to extremities: but at this time both the French and Engliſh were well diſpoſed to a Peace. The King of France knew the Emperor intended to go into Germany next Summer; ſo he longed to be at liberty to wait on his Motions. The Engliſh Council, that oppoſed the delivery of Bulloigne, chiefly to throw off the Duke of Somerſet, that being done, were all convinced that it was not worth the coſt and danger of a War: only they ſtood on the indecency of yielding it; eſpecially they having raiſed ſuch clamours againſt the Protector, when he went about the delivering it up. So they made great ſhews of preparations to defend it: but at the ſame time were not unwilling to liſten to Propoſitions of Peace. One Guidotti, a Florentine that lived in England, was employed by the Conſtable of France, Mountmorancy, to ſet on a Treaty; yet he was to do it without owning he had any orders from that King. He went often to and again between Paris and London, and at laſt it was reſolved on both ſides that there ſhould be a Treaty. But at this time there was a great change of Affairs in Italy. Pope Paul the third having held that See fifteen years, died the 10*th*. of November, in the 82*d*. Year of his Age: much broken in mind at the calamity of his Family, the killing of his Son, the loſs of Placentia, and the ingratitude of his Grand-child. Upon his death all the Cardinals, being gathered from Bologna, Trent, and other neighbouring Places entred the Conclave: where one that is to have ſuch a ſhare in the following part of this Work, was ſo much concerned, that it will be no impertinent digreſſion to give an account of it. There were great animoſities between the Imperialiſts and the French: Cardinal Farneſe had alſo many Votes that followed him: ſo that theſe three Factions were either of them ſtrong enough to exclude any that was unacceptable to them. Cardinal Pool was ſet up by Farneſe, as a moderate Imperialiſt, who had carried it ſo well at Trent, that they ſaw he would not blindly follow the Emperor. He had lived many years at Viterbo, where he was made Legate, after he had given over his Practices againſt England. There he gave himſelf wholly to the Study of Divinity, not without ſome imputations of favouring Hereſie. For one Antonino Flaminio, that was alſo ſuſpect of Lutheraniſme, lived with him. Tremellius that learned Jew, who had been Baptized in his Houſe, was alſo known to incline that way: and many, who left their Monaſteries and went to Germany, uſed to ſtay ſome time with him on their way, and were well received by him: nor would he proceed againſt any ſuſpected of Hereſie. There was cauſes enough to raiſe ſuſpicion in a leſs jealous People than Italians. Yet the vaſt zeal that he had ſhewn for the exaltation of the Papacy, made all thoſe things be over-looked. He was ſent one of the Popes Legates to Trent, where he aſſerted the German Doctrine of Juſtification by Faith: But upon the Emperors ſetting out the Interim he wrote freely againſt it. He was indeed a Man of an eaſie and gene-generous temper, but much in the Power of thoſe whom he loved and truſted. Farneſe therefore looking on him as one that would be governed by him, and that was acceptable to the Imperialiſts, and not much hated by the French, the Cardinal of Guiſe being his Friend, reſolved to promote him: and by the ſcrutiny they made, it was found that they were within two of the number that was requiſite. But he ſeemed ſo little concerned at it himſelf, that he deſired them not to make too much haſte in a thing of that nature: for that dignity was rather to be undertaken with fear, than to be ambitiouſly deſired. The Cardinals, who had heard of ſuch things among the Ancient Romans, but had ſeen few ſuch modern Inſtances, and who valued Men by nothing more than their imbitious aſpiring, imputed this either to duſneſs, or hypocriſie: He himſelf ſeemed nothing affected with it, and did not change his behaviour, and carried it with an equality of mind, that became one who had divided his time between Philoſophy and Divinity. Caraffa that hated him, did all he could to alienate the Conclave from him: he objected to him, not only Hereſie, but alſo the ſuſpition of incontinence, ſince he bred up a Nun who was believed to be his Daughter. Of theſe things he coldly purged himſelf; he ſhew'd that he had ſuffered ſo much on the account of Religion in his own Country, that he was beyond the ſuſpition of Hereſie: and he proved that the Girl whom he maintained among the Nuns, was an Engliſh-man's Daughter, to whom he had aſſigned an allowance. Caraffa prevailed little, and the next night the number was compleat: ſo that the Cardinals came to adore him; and make him Pope; but he receiving that, with his uſual coldneſs ſaid, it was night, and God loved light better than darkneſs, therefore he deſired to delay it till day came. The Italians who, what ever Judges they may be about the qualifications of ſuch a Pope as is neceſſary for their Affairs, underſtood not this temper of mind, which in better times would have recommended one with the higheſt advantages, ſhrunk all from him: and after ſome intrigues uſual on ſuch occaſions, choſe the Cardinal de Monte, afterwards Pope Julius the third, who gave a ſtrange Omen of what advancements he intended to make, when he gave his own Hat, according to the cuſtom of the Popes who beſtow their Hats before they go out of the Conclave, on a mean Servant of his, who had the charge of a Monkey that he kept: and being asked what he obſerved in him to make him a Cardinal, he anſwered, as much as the Cardinals had ſeen in him to make him Pope. But it was commonly ſaid, that the ſecret of this Promotion was an unnatural affection to him. Upon this occaſion I ſhall refer the Reader to a Letter which I have put in the Collection, written by Cardinal Woolſey upon the death of Pope Adrian the ſixth, to get himſelf choſen Pope; it ſets out ſo naturally the Intrigues of that Court on ſuch occaſions, that though it belongs to the former Volume, yet having fallen upon it ſince I publiſhed it, I thought it would be no unacceptable thing to inſert in this Volume, though it does not belong to it. It will demonſtrate how likely it is, that a Biſhop choſen by ſuch Arts, ſhould be the infallible Judge of Controverſies, and the Head of the Church. 1550. Collection Number 48.

And now to return to England; it was reſolved to ſend Ambaſſadors to France: who were, the Lord Ruſſel, Paget now made a Lord, Secretary Petre, and Sir John Maſon. Their Inſtructions will be found A Treaty between the Engliſh and French.

1550. in the Collection. The Subſtance of them was, they were not to ſtick about the Place of Treaty, but to have it at Calais, or Bulloigne, if it might be: they were to agree to the delivery up of Bulloigne, but to demand that the Scotch Queen ſhould be ſent back, for perfecting the Marriage formerly agreed on: That the Fortifications of Newhaven, and Blackneſs ſhould be ruinated: That the perpetual Penſion agreed to King Henry ſhould ſtill be payed, together with all Arrears that were due before the Wars: they were only to inſiſt on the laſt, if they ſaw the former could not be obtained: They were to agree the time and manner of the delivery of Bulloigne to be as honourable as might be. For Scotland, they being alſo in War with the Emperor, the King of England could not make Peace with them, unleſs the Emperor, his Ally, who had made War on them upon his account, were alſo ſatisfied: All Places there, were to be offered up, except Roxburgh, and Aymouth. If the French ſpoke any thing of the Kings marrying their Kings Daughter Elizabeth, they were to put it off; ſince the King was yet ſo young. They were alſo at firſt to agree to no more but a Ceſſation. So they went over on the 21*ſt*. of January; the French Commiſſioners appointed to treat with them were Rochpot, Chaſtilion, Mortier, and de Sanſy, who deſired the Meeting might be near Bulloigne, though the Engliſh endeavoured to have brought it to Guiſnes. Upon the Engliſh laying out their Demands, the French anſwered them roundly, that for delivering up the Queen of Scots, they would not treat about it; nor about a perpetual Penſion; ſince, as the King was reſolved to marry the Scotch Queen to the Dolphin, ſo he would give no perpetual Penſion, which was in effect to become a tributary Prince: but for a Sum of Money they were ready to treat about it. As to Scotland, they demanded, that all the Places that had been taken ſhould be reſtored, as well as Roxburgh, and Aymouth, as Lauder, and Dunglaſſe. The latter two were ſoon yielded to, but the Commiſſioners were limited as to the former. There was alſo ſome diſcourſe of razing the Fortifications of Alderney, and Sark, two ſmall Iſlands in the Channel, that belonged to England: the latter was in the Hands of the French, who were willing to yield it up, ſo the Fortifications both in it and Alderney were razed. Upon this there were ſecond Inſtructions ſent over from the Council, (which are in the Collection) that they ſhould ſo far inſiſt on the keeping of Roxburgh, and Aymouth, as to break up their Conference upon it; but if that did not work on the French, they ſhould yield it rather than give over the Treaty. They were alſo inſtructed to require Hoſtages from the French till the Money were all payed, and to offer Hoſtages on the part of England till Bulloigne was delivered; and to ſtruggle in the matter of the Iſles all they could, but not to break about it. Between the giving the firſt and ſecond Inſtructions, the Lord St. John was created Earl of Wilt-ſhire, as appears by his Subſcriptions. The Commiſſioners finiſhed their Treaty about the end of February, on theſe Articles. On condition that all Claims of either ſide ſhould be reſerved as they were at the beginning of the War. This was a temper between the Engliſh demand, of all the Arrears of King Henry's Penſion; and the French denial of it: for thus the King reſerved all the right he had before the War. Bulloigne was to be delivered within ſix Months, with all the Places about it, and the Ordnance, except what the Engliſh had caſt caſt ſince they had it: for which ſurrender the French were to pay 400000 Crowns, (then of equal value with the Engliſh Noble) the one half three days after the Town was in their Hands, and the other in the Auguſt after. There was to be a Peace with Scotland; and Roxburgh, and Aymouth, Lauder, and Dunglaſſe, were to be razed: and there was to be a free Trade between England, France, and Scotland. Six Hoſtages were to be given on either ſide: all the Engliſh were to be ſent back upon the delivery of the Town: and three of the French on the firſt, and the reſt on the ſecond Payment. The French Hoſtages were the Duke of Enghien, the Marqueſs de Mean, Son to the Duke of Guiſe, Monmorancy Son to the Conſtable, the Duke of Tremoville, the Vicedam of Chartres, and Henandy Son to Annebault, the Admiral. On the Engliſh ſide were, the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Hartford, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Arundels Son, the Lord Strange, and the Lord Matravers. So was the Peace concluded: all the Articles in it were duly performed, and the Hoſtages delivered back. It was proclaimed in London on the 29*th*. of March, being confirmed by both the Kings. Only it was much obſerved, that when it was to be confirmed in England, the Earl of Warwick, on pretence of ſickneſs, was abſent: thoſe who began to conceive great jealouſies of him, thought this was to make a ſhew to the People that he abhorred ſo diſhonourable a thing, as himſelf had oft called it during the Duke of Somerſets Adminiſtration, and that therefore he would not by his Preſence ſeem to conſent to it, though he had Signed all the Orders for it. 1550.

And now was the King entring in the fourth Year of his Reign, free from all Wars, which had hitherto much diſtracted his Government. So the Council was more at leiſure to ſettle the Affairs at home. But the Earl of Warwick, beginning to form great deſigns, reſolved firſt to make himſelf popular, by calling all that had medled in the Kings Affairs to a ſtrict account: and either to make them compound for great Sums, by which the Kings Debts ſhould be payed; or to keep them under the laſh till he made them ſubſervient to his ends. He began with the Earl of Arundel, to whoſe charge many things being laid, he ſubmitted himſelf to a Fine of 12000 l. to be paid in twelve years. This was the more taken notice of, becauſe Southampton, Arundel, and he, with Sir Richard Southwell Maſter of the Rolls, had been the chief contrivers of the Duke of Somerſets Fall: Southampton was driven away, Arundel fined, and Southwel was ſoon after put in the Fleet, for diſperſing ſome ſeditious Bills. This wrought much on the Vulgar, who imputed it to a ſecret Curſe on thoſe who had conſpired againſt the Duke of Somerſet: and the delivery of Bulloigne made it yet more plain, that the Charge againſt him was chiefly grounded on malice. After Arundels diſgrace, all the Duke of Somerſets Friends made their Compoſitions, and were diſcharged. Sir Tho. Smith, Sir Michael Stanhop, Tho. Fiſher, and William Gray, each of them acknowledged they owed the King 3000 l. and Sir Jo. Thynn ſubmitted to 6000 l. The Earl of Warwick governs the Councils.

But I ſhall next proſecute the Narration of what concerned the Church. It was now reſolved to fill the See of London: Ridley being eſteemed both the moſt learned, and moſt throughly zealous for the Reformation, was pitched on to be the Man. So on the 21*ſt*. of February he was writ for, and on the 24*th*. he was declared Biſhop of London and Weſtminſter, and Ridley made Biſhop of London.

1550. and was to have 1000 l. a year of the Rents of the Biſhoprick; and for his further Supply, was diſpenſed with to hold a Prebendary of Canterbury and Weſtminſter. It was thought needleſs to have two Biſhopricks ſo near one another; and ſome, gaping after the Lands of both, procured this Union. But I do not ſee any reaſon to think, that at any time in this Reign, the ſuppreſſion of the Deanries and Prebends in Cathedrals was deſigned. For neither in the ſuppreſſion of the Biſhopricks of Weſtminſter, Gloceſter, or Dureſme, was there any attempt made to put down the Deanries or Prebendaries in theſe Places: ſo that I look on this as a groundleſs conceit, among many others that paſs concerning this Reign. For Thirlcby of Weſtminſter, there was no cauſe given to throw him out; for he obeyed all the Laws and Injunctions when they came out, though he generally oppoſed them when they were making. So to make way for him, William Reps, the Biſhop of Norwich, was prevailed with to reſign, and he was promoted to that See, vacant (as his Patent has it) by the free reſignation of William the former Biſhop. And the ſame day, being the firſt of April, Ridley was made Biſhop of London and Weſtminſter. Both were, according to the common Form, to be Biſhops durante vita naturali during Life.

Proceedings againſt Gardiner.

The See of Wincheſter had been two years as good as vacant, by the long impriſonment of Gardiner, who had been now above two years in the Tower. When the Book of Common-Prayer was ſet out, the Lord St. John, and Secretary Petre, were ſent with it to him, to know of him whether he would conform himſelf to it, or not: and they gave him great hopes, that if he would ſubmit, the Protector would ſue to the King for mercy to him. He anſwered, That he did not know himſelf guilty of any thing that needed mercy: ſo he deſired to be tried, for what had been objected to him, according to Law. For the Book, he did not think that while he was a Priſoner he was bound to give his Opinion about ſuch things, it might be thought he did it, againſt his Conſcience to obtain his liberty; but if he were out of Priſon, he ſhould either obey it, or be liable to puniſhment according to Law. Upon the Duke of Somerſets Fall, the Lord Treaſurer, the Earl of Warwick, Sir William Herbert, and Secretary Petre, were ſent to him: (Fox ſays this was on the 9th. of July; but there muſt be an error in that, for Gardiner in his Anſwer ſays, That upon the Duke of Somerſets coming to the Tower, he looked to have been let out within two days, and had made his farewel Feaſt, but when theſe were with him a Month or thereabout had paſſed: ſo it muſt have been in November the former year.) They brought him a Paper, to which they deſired he would ſet his Hand. It contained firſt a Preface, which was an acknowledgment of former faults, for which he had been juſtly puniſhed: There were alſo divers Articles contained in it, which were, touching the Kings Supremacy; his Power of appointing or diſpencing with Holy-days and Faſts; that the Book of Common-Prayer ſet out by the King and Parliament was a moſt Chriſtian and Godly Book, to be allowed of by all Biſhops and Paſtors in England, and that he ſhould both in Sermons and Diſcourſes commend it to be obſerved; that the Kings Power was compleat now when under Age, and that all owed Obedience to him, now, as much as if he were thirty or forty years old; that the ſix Articles were juſtly abrogated; and that the King had full Authority to correct and reform what was amiſs in the Church both in England and Ireland. He only excepted to the Preface; and offered to Sign all the Articles, but would have had the Preface left out. They bid him rather write on the Margent his Exceptions to it; ſo he writ, that he could not with a good Conſcience agree to the Preface, and with that Exception he ſet his Hand to the whole Paper. The Lords uſed him with great kindneſs, and gave him hope that his troubles ſhould be quickly ended. Herbert, and Petre, came to him ſome time after that, but how ſoon is not ſo clear, and preſſed him to make the acknowledgment without exception; he refuſed it, and ſaid, he would never defame himſelf, for when he had done it, he was not ſure but it might be made uſe of againſt him as a Confeſſion. Two or three days after that, Ridley was ſent to him, together with the other two, and they brought him new Articles. In this Paper the acknowledgment was more general than in the former: It was ſaid here in the Preface, that he had been ſuſpected of not approving the Kings Proceedings, and being appointed to preach, had not done it as he ought to have done, and ſo deſerved the Kings diſpleaſure, for which he was ſorry: The Articles related to the Popes Supremacy, the ſuppreſſion of Abbies and Chantries, Pilgrimages, Maſſes, Images, the adoring the Sacrament, the Communion in both kinds, the aboliſhing the old Books, and bringing in the new Book of Service, and that for ordaining of Prieſts and Biſhops, the compleatneſs of the Scripture, and the uſe of it in the Vulgar Tongue, the lawfulneſs of Clergy-mens Marriage, and to Eraſmus's Paraphraſe that it had been on good conſiderations ordered to be ſet up in Churches. He read all theſe, and ſaid, he deſired firſt to be diſcharged of his impriſonment, and then he would freely anſwer them all, ſo as to ſtand by it, and ſuffer if he did amiſs: but he would trouble himſelf with no more Articles, while he remained in Priſon; ſince he deſired not to be delivered out of his troubles in the way of Mercy, but of Juſtice. After that, he was brought before the Council, and the Lords told him they ſate by a ſpecial Commiſſion to judge him, and ſo required him to ſubſcribe the Articles that had been ſent to him. He prayed them earneſtly to put him to a Trial for the grounds of his Impriſonment, and when that was over he would clearly anſwer them in all other things: but he did not think he could ſubſcribe all the Articles after one ſort; ſome of them being about Laws already made, which he could not qualifie, others of them being matters of Learning, in which he might uſe more freedom: In concluſion, he deſired leave to take them with him, and he would conſider how to anſwer them. But they required him to ſubſcribe them all, without any qualification; which he refuſed to do. Upon his the Fruits of this Biſhoprick were ſequeſtred; and he was required to conform himſelf to their Orders within three Months, upon pain of deprivation; and the liberty he had, of walking in ſome open Galleries, when the Duke of Norfolk was not in them, was taken from him: and he was again ſhut up in his Chamber.

But he refuſing to ſign them.

Was hardly uſed.

All this was much cenſured, as being contrary to the liberties of Engliſh-men, and the Forms of all legal Proceedings. It was thought very hard to put a Man in Priſon upon a complaint againſt him; and without any further enquiry into it, after two years durance to put Articles to him. And they which ſpoke freely, ſaid it ſavoured too much

But the Canon Law not being rectified, and the King being in the Popes room, there were some things gathered from the Canon Law, and the way of proceeding ex officio, which rather excused than justified this hard measure he met with. The sequel of this business shall be related in its proper place.

Latimers advice to the King concerning his Marriage.

This Lent old Latimer preached before the King. The discourse of the Kings marrying a Daughter of France had alarum'd all the Reformers, who rather inclined to a Daughter of Ferdinand King of the Romans. (To a Marriage with her it is no wonder they all wished well; for both Ferdinand and his Son Maximilian were looked upon as Princes that in their Hearts loved the Reformation, and the Son was not only the best Prince, but accounted one of the best Men of the Age.) But Latimer in his Sermon advised the King to marry in the Lord; and to take care that Marriages might not be made only as Bargains, which was a thing too frequently done, and occasioned so much Whoredom and Divorcing in the Nation. He run out in a sad lamentation of the vices of the time, the vanity of Women, the luxury and irregularity of Men, he complain'd, that many were Gospellers for love of the Abbey and Chantry Lands: he pressed that the discipline of the Church, and the excommunicating of scandalous Persons, might be again set up: he advised the King to beware of seeking his pleasure too much, and to keep none about him who would serve him in it: he said he was so old, that he believed he would never appear there more, and therefore he discharged his Conscience freely: he complained the Kings Debts were not paid, and yet his Officers lived high, made great Purchases, and built Palaces: he prayed them all to be good to the King, and not to defraud the poor Tradesmen that wrought for his Stores, who were ill payed. This I set down not so much to give an account of that Sermon, as of the state of the Court and Nation, which he so freely discoursed of.

Hooper is made Bishop of Glocester.

Wakeman, that had been Abbot of Tewksbury, and was after made Bishop of Glocester, died in December last year: and on the third of July this year, Hooper was by Letters Patents appointed to be his Successor. Upon which there followed a Contest that has since had such fatal consequences, that of it we may say with St. James, How great a matter hath a little fire kindled? It has been already shewn, that the Vestments used in Divine Service, were appointed to be retained in this Church: but Hooper refused to be consecrated in the Episcopal Vestments. The grounds he went on were, That they were humane Inventions, brought in by Tradition or Custom, not sutable to the simplicity of the Christian Religion: and all such Ceremonies were condemned by St. Paul as beggarly Elements: that these Vestments had been invented chiefly for celebrating the Mass, with much pomp, and had been consecrated for that effect: therefore he desired to be excused from the use of them. Cranmer, and Ridley, on the other hand, alledged, that Traditions in matters of Faith were justly rejected, but in matters of Rites and Ceremonies Custom was oft a good Argument for the continuance of that which had been long used. Those Places of St. Paul did only relate to the observance of the Jewish Ceremonies, which some in the Apostles times pleaded were still to be retained, upon the Authority of their first Institution by Moses: so this implying, that the Messias was not yet come, in whom all all these had their accomplishment, the Apostles did condemn the use of them on any such account; though when the bare observing them, without the opinion of any such necessity in them, was likely to gain the Jews, they both used Circumcision, and purified themselves in the Temple: If then they who had such absolute Authority in those matters, did condescend so far to the weakness of the Jews; it was much more becoming Subjects to give obedience to Laws in things indifferent. And the abuse that had been formerly, was no better reason to take away the use of these Vestments, than it was to throw down Churches, and take away the Bells, because the one had been consecrated, and the other baptized, with many superstitious Ceremonies. Therefore they required Hooper to conform himself to the Law. Cranmer, who, to his other excellent qualities, had joyned a singular modesty and distrust of himself, writ about this difference to Bucer, reducing it to these two plain Questions. Whether it was lawful and free from any sin against God, for the Ministers of the Church of England to use those Garments in which they did then officiate; since they were required to do it by the Magistrates command? And whether he that affirmed that it was unlawful, or on that account refused, to use those Vestments, did not sin against God; calling that unclean, which God had sanctified, and the Magistrate required; since he thereby disturbed the publick order of the Kingdom? To this Bucer writ a large Answer on the 8*th.* of December this Year. He thought that those who used these Garments ought to declare they did not retain them as parts of Moses Law, but as things commanded by the Law of the Land: he thought every Creature of God was good, and no former abuse could make it so ill, that it might not be retained; and since these Garments had been used by the Ancient Fathers before Popery, and might still be of good use to the weak when well understood, and help to maintain the Ministerial Dignity, and to shew that the Church did not of any lightness change old customs, he thought the retaining them was expedient: that so the People might, by seeing these Vestments, consider of the candor and purity that became them: and in this sense he thought, to the Pure all things were pure; and so the Apostles complied in many things with the Jews. Upon the whole matter, he thought they sinned who refused to obey the Laws in that particular. But he added, That since these Garments were abused by some to superstition, and by others to be matter of contention, he wished they were taken away, and a more compleat Reformation established: he also prayed that a stop might be put to the spoiling of Churches, and that Ecclesiastical Discipline against offenders might be set up: for, said he, unless these manifest and horrid Sacriledges be put down, and the compleat Kingdom of Christ be received, so that we all submit to his Yoke; how intolerably shall the wrath of God break out on this Kingdom? The Scriptures sets many such Examples before our Eyes, and Germany offers a most dreadful prospect of what England might look for.

Bucers Opinion concerning them.

He writ also to Hooper upon the same Argument. He wished the Garments were removed by Law; but argued fully for the use of them till then: he lamented the great corruptions that were among the Clergy, and wished that all good Men would unite their strength against these; and then lesser abuses would be more easily redressed. He also answered 1550 Hoopers Objections on the Principles formerly laid down. Peter Martyr was also writ to; and, as he writ to Bucer, he was fully of his mind, and approved of all he had writ about it. And he added these words, which I shall set down in his own terms, copied from the Original Letter:

Quæ de Hopero ad me scribis, non potuerunt non videri mira; Certè illis auditis obstupui. Sed bene habet, quod Episcopi Literas meas viderunt; unde invidia ego quidem sum liberatus. Ecce illius causa sic jacet, ut melioribus & piis nequaquam probetur. Dolet, dolet, idq; mihi gravissimè, talia inter Evangelii professores contingere. Ille toto hoc tempore, cum illi sit interdicta concio, non videtur posse quiescere: suæ fidei confessionem edidit, qua rursus multorum animos exacerbavit: deinde queritur de Consiliariis, & fortasse, quod mihi non refert, de nobis: Deus felicem Catastrophen non lætis actibus imponat. In English: What you wrote to me about Hooper could not but seem wonderful to me: when I heard it I was struck with it. It was well that the Bishops saw my Letters, by which I am freed from their displeasure. His business is now at that pass, that the best and most pious disprove of it. I am grieved, and sadly grieved, that such things should fall out among the Professors of the Gospel. All this while in which he is suspended from preaching, he cannot be at rest: he has set out a profession of his Faith, by which he has provoked many: he complains of the Privy-Councellors, and perhaps of us too, of which he says nothing to me. God give an happy issue to these uncomfortable beginnings. This I set down more fully, that it may appear how far either of these Divines were from cherishing such stiffness in Hooper. He had been Chaplain to the Duke of Somerset, as appear'd by his defence of himself in Bonners Process; yet he obtained so much favour of the Earl of Warwick, that he writ earnestly in his behalf to the Arch-bishop to dispence with the use of the Garments, and the Oath of Canonical Obedience at his Consecration. Cranmer wrote back, That he could not do it without incurring a Præmunire: So the King was moved to write to him, warranting him to do it, without any danger which the Law could bring on him for such an omission. But though this was done on the 4*th.* of August, yet he was not consecrated till March next year; and in the mean while it appears by Peter Martyrs Letters, that he was suspended from Preaching.

A Congregation of Germans in London.

This Summer John a Lasco, with a Congregation of Germans that fled from their Country upon the persecution raised there, for not receiving the Interim, was allowed to hold his Assembly at St. Austins in London. The Congregation was erected into a Corporation. John a Lasco was to be Superintendent, and there were four other Ministers associated with him. For the curiosity of the thing, I have put the Patents in the Collection Number 51. Collection. There were also 380 of the Congregation made Denizens of England, as appears by the Records of their Patents. But a Lasco did not carry himself with that decency that became a Stranger who was so kindly received: for he wrote against the Orders of this Church, both in the matter of the Habits, and about the posture in the Sacrament, being for sitting rather than kneeling.

Rot. Pat. 4. Ed. 6. 2. Part.

This Year Polidore Virgil, who had been now almost forty years in England, growing old, desired leave to go nearer the Sun. It was granted him on the second of June: and in consideration of the publick Service he was thought to have done the Nation by his History, he was permit-permitted to hold his Archdeaconry of Wells, and his Prebend of Nonnington, notwithſtanding his abſence out of the Kingdom. On the 26*th* of June Poinet was declared Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Coverdale was made Coadjutor to Veyſy Biſhop of Exeter. 1550.

About the end of this Year, or the beginning of the next, there was a review made of the Common-Prayer-Book. Several things had been continued in it, either to draw in ſome of the Biſhops, who by ſuch yielding might be prevailed on to concurre in it; or in compliance with the People, who were fond of their old Superſtitions. So now a review of it was ſet about. Martin Bucer was conſulted in it; and Aleſſe, the Scotch Divine mentioned in the former part, tranſlated it into Latin for his uſe. Upon which Bucer writ his Opinion, which he finiſhed, the fifth of January in the Year following. The Subſtance of it was, That he found all things in the Common-Service and daily Prayers were clearly according to the Scriptures. He adviſed, that in Cathedrals the Quire might not be too far ſeparated from the Congregation, ſince in ſome Places the People could not hear them read Prayers. He wiſhed there were a ſtrict diſcipline to exclude ſcandalous Livers from the Sacrament. He wiſhed the old Habits might be laid aſide, ſince ſome uſed them ſuperſtitiouſly, and others contended much about them, He did not like the half Office of Communion or Second-Service to be ſaid at the Altar, when there was no Sacrament. He was offended with the requiring the People to receive at leaſt once a year, and would have them preſs'd to it much more frequently. He diſliked that the Prieſts generally read Prayers with no devotion, and in ſuch a Voice that the People underſtood not what they ſaid. He would have the Sacrament delivered into the Hands, and not put into the Mouths of the People. He cenſured praying for the dead, of which no mention is made in the Scripture, nor by Juſtin Martyr an Age after. He thought that the Prayer, that the Elements might be to us the Body and Blood of Chriſt, favoured Tranſubſtantiation too much: a ſmall variation might bring it nearer to a Scripture Form. He complained that Baptiſm was generally in Houſes, which being the receiving Infants into the Church, ought to be done more publickly. The Hallowing of the Water, the Chriſme, and the White Garment he cenſured, as being too Scenical: He excepted to the exorciſing the Devil, and would have it turned to a Prayer to God: that authoritative way of ſaying I adjure not being ſo decent. He thought the God-fathers anſwering in the Childs Name not ſo well as to anſwer in their own, that they ſhould take care in theſe things, all they could. He would not have Confirmation given upon a bare recital of the Catechiſm; but would have it delayed till the Perſons did really deſire to renew the Baptiſmal Vow. He would have catechiſing every Holy-day, and not every ſixth Sunday: and that People ſhould be ſtill Catechized, after they were confirmed, to preſerve them from ignorance. He would have all Marriages to be made in the full Congregation. He would have the giving Unction to the Sick, and praying for the Dead, to be quite laid aſide; as alſo the offering the Chriſomes at the Churching of Women. He adviſed, that the Communion ſhould be celebrated four times a year. He ſadly lamented the want of faithful Teachers; and intreated the Arch-biſhop to ſee to the mending of this, and to think on ſome ſtricter ways of examining thoſe who were to be ordained, than 1550. barely the putting of some Questions to them. All this I have gathered out the more largely, that it may appear how carefully things were then considered: and that almost in every particular, the most material things which Bucer excepted to, were corrected afterwards.

But at the same time, the King having taken such care of him, that hearing he had suffered in his health last Winter by the want of a Stove, such as is used in Germany, he had sent him 20 l. to have one made for him; he was told that the King would expect a New-years-gift from him, of a Book made for his own use. So upon that occasion he writ a Book entituled, Concerning the Kingdom of Christ. He sets out in it the miseries of Germany, which he says were brought on them by their sins; for they would bear no discipline; nor were the Ministers so earnest in it, as was fitting: though in Hungary it was otherwise. He writes largely of Ecclesiastical Discipline; which was intended chiefly for separating ill Men from the Sacrament; and to make good Men avoid their company, whereby they might be ashamed. He presses much the Sanctification of the Lords-day, and of the other Holy-days, and that there might be many days of Fasting: but he thought Lent had been so abused, that other times for it might be more expedient. He complains much of Pluralities, and Non-residence, as a remainder of Popery, so hurtful to the Church, that in many Places there were but one or two, or few more Sermons in a whole year: but he thought that much was not to be expected from the greatest part of the Clergy, unless the King would set himself vigorously to reform these things. Lastly, he would have a compleat exposition of the Doctrine of the Church digested, and set out: and he proposed divers Laws to the Kings consideration; as,

Bucer writ a Book for the Kings use.

1. For Catechizing Children.
2. For sanctifying Holy-days.
3. For Preserving Churches for Gods Service, not to be made Places for walking, or for Commerce.
4. To have the Pastoral Function entirely restored to what it ought to be, that Bishops throwing off all Secular cares, should give themselves to their Spiritual Employments; he advises that Coadjutors might be given to some, and a Council of Presbyters be appointed for them all. It was plain, that many of them complied with the Laws against their minds, these he would have deprived. He advises Rural Bishops to be set over twenty or thirty Parishes, who should gather their Clergy often together, and inspect them closely: And that a Provincial Synod should meet twice a year, where a Secular Man in the Kings Name should be appointed to observe their Proceedings.
5. For restoring Church-Lands, that all who served the Church might be well provided: If any lived in luxury, upon their high Revenues, it was reasonable to make them use them better; but not to blame or rob the Church for their fault.
6. For the maintenance of the Poor, for whom anciently a fourth part of the Churches Goods was assigned.

The 7th. was about Marriage. That the prohibited degrees might be well setled; Marriage without consent of Parents annulled; and that a second Marriage might be lawful after a Divorce, which he thought might be made for Adultery, and some other reasons.

8. For

8. For the Education of Youth. 1550.

9. For reſtraining the exceſs of ſome Peoples living.

10. For reforming and explaining the Laws of the Land which his Father had begun.

11. To place good Magiſtrates; that no Office ſhould be ſold, and that Inferior Magiſtrates ſhould often give an account to the Superior, of the Adminiſtration of their Offices.

12. To conſider well who were made Judges.

13. To give order that none ſhould be put in Priſon upon ſlight offences.

The 14*th.* was for moderating of ſome puniſhments; chiefly, the putting of Thieves to death, which was too ſevere, whereas Adultery was too ſlightly paſſed over: though Adultery be a greater wrong to the ſuffering Party, than any Theft, and ſo was puniſhed with death by Moſes Law.

This Book was ſent to the young King. And he having received it, ſet himſelf to write a general Diſcourſe about a Reformation of the Nation, which is the ſecond among the Diſcourſes written by him, that follow the Journal of his Reign. In it he takes notice of the Corrections of the Book of the Liturgy which were then under conſideration; as alſo that it was neceſſary there ſhould be a Rule of Church-diſcipline, for the cenſure of ill Livers; but he thought that Power was not to be put into the Hands of all the Biſhops at that time. From thence he goes on to diſcourſe of the ill ſtate of the Nation, and of the remedies that ſeemed proper for it. The firſt he propoſes was the Education of Youth, next the Correction of ſome Laws, and there either broke it off, or the reſt of it is loſt. In which, as there is a great diſcovery of a marvellous probity of mind, ſo there are ſtrange hints, to come from one not yet fourteen years of Age. And yet it is all written with his own Hand, and in ſuch a manner, that any who ſhall look on the Original, will clearly ſee it was his own Work: The Stile is ſimple, and ſutable to a Child: few Men can make ſuch Compoſures, but ſomewhat above a Child will appear in their Stile, which makes me conclude it was all a device of his own

Col. K. Edw Remains, Number 2.

This Year the King began to write his Journal himſelf. The firſt three years of his Reign are ſet down in a ſhort way of recapitulating matters. But this Year he ſet down what was done every day, that was of any moment, together with the Forreign News that were ſent over. And oftentimes he called to mind Paſſages ſome dayes after they were done; and ſometime after the middle of a Month he tells what was done in the beginning of it. Which ſhews clearly it was his own Work; for if it had been drawn for him by any that were about him, and given him only to copy out for his memory, it would have been more exact; ſo that there remains no doubt with me but that it was his own originally. And therefore ſince all who have writ of that time have drawn their Informations from that Journal; and though they have printed ſome of the Letters he wrote, when a Child, which are indeed the meaneſt things that ever fell from him; yet, except one little fragment, nothing of it has been yet publiſhed; I have copied it out entirely, and ſet it before my Collection. I have added to it ſome other Papers that were alſo writ by him. The firſt of theſe is in French: It is a Collection of many paſſages out

Ridley visits his Diocess. There was nothing else done of moment this Year, in relation to the Church, save the Visitation made of the Dioceſs of London by Ridley their new Bishop. But the exact time of it is not set down in the Register. It was according to King Edwards Journal some time before the 26th. of June: for he writes, that on that day Sir Jo. Yates the high Sheriff of Essex was sent down with Letters to see the Bishop of London's Injunctions performed, which touched the plucking down of Superaltaries, Altars, and such like Ceremonies and Abuses: so that the Visitation must have been about the beginning of June. The Articles of it are in Bishop Sparrows Collection. They are concerning the Doctrine and Lives, and Labours, and Charities, of the Clergy; viz. Whether they spake in favour of the Bishop of Rome, or against the use of the Scripture, or against the Book of Common-Prayer? Whether they stirred up Sedition, or sold the Communion or Trentals, or used private Masses any where? Whether any Anabaptists or others used private Conventicles, with different Opinions and Forms from these established? Whether there were any that said the wickedness of the Minister took away the effect of the Sacraments, or denied Repentance to such as sinned after Baptism? Other Questions were about Baptisms, and Marriages. Whether the Curates did visit the Sick, and bury the Dead, and expound the Catechism, at least some part of it, once in six weeks? Whether any observed abrogated Holy-days, or the Rites that were now put down.

Collection Number 52. To these he added some Injunctions which are in the Collection. Most of them relate to the old Superstitions, which some of the Priests were still inclinable to practise, and for which they had been gently, if at all, reproved by Bonner. Such were, washing their Hands at the Altar, holding up the Bread, licking the Chalice, blessing their Eyes with the Patten or Sudary, and many other Relicks of the Mass. The Ministers were also required to charge the People oft to give Alms, and to come oft to the Communion, and to carry themselves reverently at Church. But that which was most new, was, that there having been great Contests about the Form of the Lords Board, whether it should be made as an Altar, or as a Table; therefore, since the Form of a Table was more like to turn the People from the Superstition of the Popish Mass, and to the right use of the Lords Supper, he exhorted the Curates and Churchwardens to have it in the fashion of a Table, decently covered: and to place it in such part of the Quire or Chancel as should be most meet, so that the Ministers and Communicants should be separated from the rest of the People: and that they should put down all By-Altars.

He orders all Altars to be turned to Tables for the Communion.

There are many passages among Ancient Writers, that shew their Communion-Tables were of Wood; and that they were so made as Tables, that those who fled into Churches for Sanctuary, did hide themselves under them. The Name Altar came to be given to these generally, because they accounted the Eucharist a Sacrifice of Praise, as also a Commemorative Sacrifice of the Oblation which Christ made of himself on the Croſs. From hence it was, that the Communion-Table was called alſo an Altar. But now it came to be conſidered, whether, as theſe terms had been on good reaſon brought in to the Church, when there was no thought of the corruptions that followed; ſo if it was not fit, ſince they did ſtill ſupport the belief of an expiatory Sacrifice in the Maſs, and the opinion of Tranſubſtantiation, and were always but Figurative Forms of Speech, to change them: and to do that more effectually, to change the Form and Place of them. Some have fondly thought, that Ridley gave this Injunction after the Letter which the Council writ to him, in the end of November following. But as there was no fit time to begin a Viſitation after that time this year, ſo the Stile of the Injunctions ſhews they were given before the Letter. The Injunction only exhorts the Curates to do it, which Ridley could not have done in ſuch ſoft words, after the Council had required and commanded him to do it: So it appears, that the Injunctions were given only by his Epiſcopal Power. And that afterwards the ſame matter being brought before the Council, who were inform'd, that in many Places there had been Conteſts about it, ſome being for keeping to their old Cuſtom, and others being ſet on a change, the Council thought fit to ſend their Letter concerning it to Ridley in the beginning of November following. The Letter ſets out, that Altars were taken away in divers Places, upon good and godly conſiderations, but ſtill continued in other Places; by which there roſe much contention among the Kings Subjects; therefore, for avoiding that, they did charge and command him to give ſubſtantial order through all his Dioceſs for removing all Altars, and ſetting up Tables every where for the Communion to be adminiſtred in ſome convenient part of the Chancel: And that theſe Orders might be the better received, there were Reaſons ſent with the Letters, which he was to cauſe diſcreet Preachers to declare, in ſuch Places as he thought fit, and that himſelf ſhould ſet them out in his own Cathedral, if conveniently he could. 1550

The Reaſons were, to remove the People from the ſuperſtitious Opinions of the Popiſh Maſs: and becauſe a Table was a more proper Name than an Altar, for that on which the Sacrament was laid. And whereas in the Book of Common-Prayer theſe terms are promiſcuouſly uſed, it is done without preſcribing any thing about the Form of them, ſo that the changing the one into the other did not alter any part of the Liturgy. It was obſerved, that Altars were erected for the Sacrifices under the Law, which ceaſing they were alſo to ceaſe: and that Chriſt had inſtituted the Sacrament not at an Altar, but at a Table. And it had been ordered by the Preface to the Book of Common-Prayer, that if any doubt aroſe about any part of it, the determining of it ſhould be referred to the Biſhop of the Dioceſs. Upon theſe Reaſons therefore was this change ordered to be made all over England, which was univerſally executed this year.

There began this year a Practice which might ſeem in it ſelf not only innocent, but good, of preaching Sermons and Lectures on the week days, to which there was great running from neighbouring Pariſhes. This as it begat emulation in the Clergy, ſo it was made uſe of as a Pretence for many to leave their labour, and gad idly about. Upon complaint therefore made of it, Ridley had a Letter ſent to him from the Coun- Sermons on working days forbidden.

1550. Council against all preaching on working-days, on which there should only be Prayers. How this was submitted to then, is not clear. But it cannot be denied, that there have been since that time excesses on all hands in this matter: while some have, with great sincerity and devotion, kept up these in Market-Towns; but others have carried them on with too much faction, and a design to detract from such as were not so eminent in their way of preaching. Upon these abuses, while some Rulers have studied to put all such performances down, rather than to correct the abuses in them, great contradiction has followed on it; and the People have have been possessed with unjust prejudices against them, as hinderers of the Word of God; and that opposition has kept up the zeal for these Lectures. Which nevertheless, since they have been more freely preach'd, have of late years produced none of the ill effects that did follow them formerly when they were endeavoured to be suppressed.

And thus I end the Transactions about Religion this Year. The rest of the Affairs at home were chiefly for the regulating of many abuses that had grown up and been nourish'd by a long continuance of War. All the Forreign Soldiers were dismissed. And though the Duke of Lunenburg had offered the King 10000 Men to his assistance, and desired to enter into a Treaty of Marriage for the Lady Mary: they only thanked him for the offer of his Soldiers, of which they, being now at peace with all their Neighbours, had no need; and since the Proposition for marrying the Lady Mary to the Infant of Portugal was yet in dependance, they could not treat in that kind with any other Prince till that Overture was some way ended. There were endeavours also for encouraging Trade, and reforming the Coin. And at the Court things began to put on a new visage: for there was no more any faction; The Duke of Somerset, and the Earl of Warwick, being now joyned into a near alliance; the Earls eldest Son, the Lord Lisle, marrying the Dukes Daughter; so that there was a good prospect of happy times.

The affairs of Scotland.

In Scotland, the Peace being proclaimed, the Government was now more entirely in the Hands of the Duke of Castelherault, who gave himself up wholly to the Counsels of his base Brother, who was Arch-bishop of St. Andrews. And he was so abandoned to his pleasures, that there was nothing so bad that he was ashamed of. He kept another Man's Wife openly for his Concubine. There were also many excesses in the Government. Which things, as they alienated all Peoples minds from the Clergy, so they disposed them to receive the new Doctrines, which many Teachers were bringing from England, and prepared them for the changes that followed afterwards. The Queen Mother went over into France in September, pretending it was to see her Daughter, and the rest of her Kindred there: where she laid down the Method for the wresting of the Government of Scotland out of the Governours Hands and taking it into her own.

And of Germany.

The Emperor appointed a Diet of the Empire to meet in the end of July, and required all to appear personally at it, except such as were hindered by sickness, of which they were to make Faith upon Oath. And at the same time he proscribed the Town of Magdeburg. But the Magistrates of that Town set out a large Manifesto for their own vindication, as they had done the former Year. They said, they were ready to

"to give him all the obedience, that they were bound to by the Laws of "the Empire: they very very apprehenſive of the miſchiefs of a Civil "War: they were not ſo blind as to think they were able to reſiſt the Em- "perors great Armies, lifted up with ſo many Victories, if they truſted "only to their own ſtrength: they had hitherto done no act of hoſtility "to any, but what they were forced to for their own defence. It was "viſible, the true ground of the War of Germany was Religion, to ex- "tinguiſh the Light of the Goſpel, and to ſubdue them again to the Pa- "pal Tyranny. For the Artifices that were formerly uſed to diſguiſe it did "now appear too manifeſtly; ſo that it was not any more denied. But it "would be too late to ſee it, when Germany was quite oppreſſed. In Civil "Matters, they ſaid, they would yield to the miſeries of the time. But "St. Peter had taught them that it was better to obey God than Man: and "therefore they were reſolved to put all things to hazard, rather than to "make Shipwrack of Faith and a good Conſcience. There were Tu- mults raiſed in Strasburg, and divers other Towns, againſt thoſe who ſet up the Maſs among them; and generally all Germany was diſpoſed to a Revolt, if they had had but a Head to lead them. 1550

The Emperor had alſo ſet out a very ſevere Edict in Flanders, when he left it; againſt all that favoured the new Doctrines, as they were cal- led. But the execution of this was ſtopt at the interceſſion of the Town of Antwerp, when they perceived the Engliſh were reſolved to remove from thence, and carry their Trade to ſome other Place. When the Diet was opened, the Emperor preſſed them to ſubmit to the Coun- cil which the new Pope had removed back to Trent. Maurice of Saxe anſwered, he could not ſubmit to it, unleſs all that had been done for- merly in it ſhould be reviewed, and the Divines of the Ausburg Confeſ- ſion were both hard and admitted to a Suffrage, and the Pope ſhould ſubject himſelf to their Decrees, and diſpence with the Oath which the Bi- ſhops had ſworn to him. On theſe terms he would ſubmit to it, and not o- therwiſe. This was refuſed to be entred into the Regiſters of the Diet by the Elector of Mentz; but there was no haſte, for the Council was not to ſit till the next year. The Emperor complained much, that the Interim was not generally received: to which it was anſwered by the Princes, that it was neceſſary to give the People time to overcome their former prejudices. All ſeemed to comply with him. And Maurice did ſo inſinuate himſelf into him, that the Siege of Magdeburg being now formed, and a great many Princes having gathered Forces againſt it, among whom the Duke of Brunſwick, and the Duke of Mekleburg were the moſt forward; yet he got himſelf declared by the Diet Gene- ral of the Empire, for the reduction of that Place, and he had 100000 Crowns for undertaking it, and 60000 Crowns a Month were appointed for the expence of the War. He ſaw well, that if Magdeburg were cloſely preſs'd, it would ſoon be taken, and then all Germany would be brought to the Emperors devotion: and ſo the War would end in a ſla- very. But he hoped ſo to manage this ſmall remainder of the War, as to draw great effects from it. This was a fatal ſtep to the Emperor, thus to truſt a Prince who was of a different Religion, and had a deep reſent- ment of the injury he had done him, in detaining his Father-in-law the Landgrave of Heſſe Priſoner, againſt the Faith he had given him. But the Emperor reckoned, that as long as he had John Duke of Saxe in 1550. his hands, Maurice durſt not depart from his Intereſts; ſince it ſeemed an eaſie thing for him to repoſſeſs the other of his Dominions and Dignity. Thus was the crafty Emperor deluded, and now put that, upon which the compleating of his great deſigns depended, into the Hands of one that proved too hard for him at that in which he was ſuch a Maſter, Cunning and Diſſimulation.

1551. In theſe Conſultations did this Year end. In the beginning of the next Year, there was a great complaint brought againſt Dr. Oglethorp, afterwards Biſhop of Carliſle under Queen Mary, and now Preſident of Magdalen Colledge in Oxford. But he, to ſecure himſelf from that part of the Complaint that related to Religion, being accuſed as one that was againſt the new Book of Service, and the Kings other Proceedings, Signed a Paper (which will be found in the Collection) in which he declared, "That he had never taught any thing openly againſt thoſe, but that "he thought them good, if well uſed: and that he thought the order of "Religion now ſet forth to be better and much nearer the uſe of the Apo- "ſtolical and Primitive Church than that which was formerly: and that in "particular, he did approve of the Communion in both kinds, the Peo- "ples communicating always with the Prieſt, the Service in Engliſh, and "the Homilies that had been ſet forth: and that he did reject the lately re- "ceived Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, as being not agreeable to the "Scriptures, or to Ancient Writers: but he thought there was an incon- "ceivable Preſence of Chriſts Body in the Sacrament, and that therefore "it ſhould be received not without great examination before hand. So compliant was he now, though he became of another mind in Queen Maries time; yet then he was more moderate, than the greateſt part of thoſe who did now comply moſt ſervily. In particular, Dr. Smith had written a Book for the Cælibate of Prieſts, and had oppoſed all the Changes that had been made: He was brought to London upon the Complaints that were ſent up againſt him from Oxford, but after a whiles imprisonment, he was ſet at liberty, giving Surety for his good behaviour, and carried himſelf ſo obediently after it, that Cranmer got his Sureties to be diſcharged, upon which he writ him a Letter as full of acknowledgment as was poſſible: which is in the Collection. "He proteſted he ſhould "retain the ſenſe of it as long as he lived: he wiſhed that he had never "written his Book of the Cælibate of Prieſts, which had been printed "againſt his Will: he found he was miſtaken in that which was the "foundation of it all, that the Prieſts of England had taken a Vow "againſt Marriage: he deſired to ſee ſome of the Collections Cranmer had "made againſt it. (It ſeems Cranmer was enquiring after a MS. of Ignatius's Epiſtles, for he tells him, "They were in Magdalen Colledge Li- "brary:) he acknowledged the Arch-biſhops great gentleneſs toward all "thoſe who had been complained of for Religion in that Univerſity, "and proteſted, that for his own part, if ever he could ſerve his baſeſt "Servant, he would do it; wiſhing that he might periſh if he thought "otherwiſe than he ſaid: and wiſhed him long Life for the propogation "and advancement of the Chriſtian Doctrine. Soon after he writ another Letter to Cranmer, in which he cited ſome Paſſages out of Auſtin concerning his Retractations; and profeſſes he would not be aſhamed to make the like, and to ſet forth Chriſts true Religion; and called, in St. Paul's Pauls words, God to be a Witneſs againſt his Soul if he lied. He had also in the beginning of this Reign made a Recantation Sermon of some Opinions he had held concerning the Maſs, but what theſe were, King Edwards Journal (from whence I gather it) does not inform us. Day Biſhop of Chicheſter did also now so far comply, as to preach a Sermon at Court againſt Tranſubſtantiation, though he had refuſed to ſet his Hand to the Book of Common-Prayer, before it was enacted by Law. For the Principle that generally run among the Popiſh Party, was, that though they would not conſent to the making of ſuch Alterations in Religion, yet being made, they would give obedience to them, which Gardiner plainly profeſſed: and it appeared in the practice of all the reſt. This was certainly a groſs ſort of compliance, in thoſe who retained the old Opinions, and yet did now declare againſt them; and in the Worſhip they offerd up to God, acted contrary to them; which was the higheſt degree of prevarication both with God and Man that was poſſible. But Cranmer was always gentle and moderate. He left their private Conſciences to God: but thought, that if they gave an external obedience, the People would be brought to receive the Changes more eaſily; whereas the proceeding ſeverely againſt them might have raiſed more oppoſition. He was also naturally a Man of Bowels and Compaſſion, and did not love to drive things to extremities: he conſidered that Men who had grown old in ſome errors could not eaſily lay them down, and ſo were by degrees to be worn out of them. Only in the Proceedings againſt Gardiner and Bonner, he was carried beyond his ordinary temper. But Gardiner he knew to be ſo inveterate a Papiſt, and ſo deep a Diſſembler, that he was for throwing him out, not ſo much for the Particulars objected to him, as upon the ill Character he had of him. Bonner had alſo deceived him ſo formerly, and had been ſo cruel a Perſecutor upon the Statute of the Six Articles, and was become ſo brutal and luxurious, that he judged it neceſſary to purge the Church of him. And the Sees of London, and Weſtminſter, were of ſuch conſequence, that he was induced, for having theſe well ſupplied, to ſtretch a little in theſe Proceedings againſt thoſe diſſembling Biſhops. 1551.

In the end of February he loſt his friend Martin Bucer, on whoſe aſſiſtance he had depended much, in what remained yet to be done. Bucer died of the Stone, and Griping of the Guts, on the 28*th.* of February. He lay ill almoſt all that Month, and expreſſed great deſire to die. Bradford, who will be mentioned in the next Book with much Honour, waited moſt on him in his ſickneſs. He lamented much the deſolate State of Germany, and expreſſed his apprehenſions of ſome ſuch ſtroke coming upon England, by reaſon of the great diſſoluteneſs of the Peoples Manners, of the want of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, and the general neglect of the Paſtoral Charge. He was very patient in all his pain, which grew violently on him; he lay oft ſilent, only after long intervals cried out ſometimes, Chaſtiſe me Lord, but throw me not off in my old Age. He was by order from Cranmer, and Sir John Cheek, buried with the higheſt Solemnities that could be deviſed, to expreſs the value the Univerſity had for him. The Vice-Chancellor, and all the Graduates, and the Major, with all the Town, accompanied his Funeral to St. Maries; where after Prayers, Haddon the Univerſity Orator made ſuch a Speech concerning him, and pronounced it with that affe- Bucers death.

1551. ctions, that almost the whole Assembly shed Tears. Next Dr. Parker, that had been his most intimate Friend, made an English Sermon in his praise, and concerning the sorrowing for our departed Friends. And the day following Dr. Redmayn, then Master of Trinity Colledge, made another Sermon concerning Death: and in it gave a full account of Bucers Life and Death. He particularly commended the great sweetness of his temper, to all, but remarkably to those who differed from him. Redmayn and he had differed in many things, both concerning Justification, and the Influences of the Divine Grace. But he said, as Bucer had satisfied him in some things, so he believed if he had lived he had satisfied him in more; and that he being dead, he knew none alive from whom he could learn so much. This Character given him by so grave and learned a Man, who was in many Points of a different perswasion from him, was a great commendation to them both. And Redmayn was indeed an extraordinary Person. All in the University, that were eminent either in Greek or Latin Poetry, did adorn his Coffin with Epitaphs: in which they expressed a very extraordinary sense of their loss: about which one Carr writ a copious and passionate Letter to Sir John Cheek. But Peter Martyr bore his death with the most sensible sorrow that could be imagined; having in him lost a Father, and the only intimate Friend he had in England. He was a very learned, judicious, pious, and moderate Person. Perhaps he was inferior to none of all the Reformers for Learning: but for Zeal, for true Piety, and a most tender care of preserving Unity among the Forreign Churches, Melancton and he, without any injury done the rest, may be ranked a part by themselves. He was much opposed by the Popish Party at Cambridge; who, though they complied with the Law, and so kept their Places, yet either in the way of Argument, as it had been for disputes sake, or in such Points as were not determined, set themselves much to lessen his esteem. Nor was he furnished naturally with the quickness that is necessary for a Dispute, from which they studied to draw advantages: and therefore Peter Martyr writ to him to avoid all publick Disputes with them. For they did not deal candidly on these occasions. They often kept up their Questions till the hour of the Dispute, that so the extemporary faculty of him who was to preside might be the more exposed; and right or wrong they used to make Exclamations, and run away with a Triumph: In one of his Letters to Bucer, he particularly mentions Dr. Smith for an Instance of this. It was that Smith he said who writ against the Marriage of Priests, and yet was believed to live in Adultery with his Mans Wife. This Letter was occasioned by the Disputes that were in August the former Year, between Bucer and Sedgwick, Young and Pern, about the Authority of the Scripture, and the Church. Which Disputes Bucer intending to publish, caused them to be writ out, and sent the Copy to them to be corrected, offering them, that if any thing was omitted that they had said, or if they had any thing else to say which was forgot in the Dispute, they might add it: but they sent back the Papers to him without vouchsafing to read them. At Ratisbone he had a Conference with Gardiner, who was then King Henry's Ambassador: in which Gardiner broke out into such a violent passion, that as he spared no reproachful words, so the Company thought he would have fall'n on Bucer and beat him: he was in such disorder, that the little Vein between his Thumb and Fore finger did ſwell and palpitate, which Bucer ſaid he had never before that obſerved in any Perſon in his life. 1551.

But as Bucer was taken away by death, ſo Gardiner was ſoon after put out, which was a kind of death; though he had afterwards a Reſurrection fatal to very many. There was a Commiſſion iſſued out, to the Arch-biſhop, the Biſhops of London, Ely, and Lincoln, Secretary Petre, Judge Hales, Griffith, and Leyſon, two Civilians, and Goodrick, and Goſnold, two Maſters of Chancery, to proceed againſt Gardiner for his contempt in the matters formerly objected to him. He put in a Compurgation, by which he endeavoured to ſhew there was malice born to him, and Conſpiracies againſt him, as appeared by the Buſineſs of Sir Hen. Knevet, mentioned in the former Part, and the leaving him out of the late Kings Will, which he ſaid was procured by his Enemies. He complained of his long Impriſonment without any Trial, and that Articles of one ſort after another were brought to him: ſo that it was plain he was not detained for any Crime, but to try if ſuch uſage could force him to do any thing, that ſhould be impoſed on him. He declared, that what Order ſoever were ſet out by the Kings Council, he ſhould never ſpeak againſt it, but to the Council themſelves: and that though he could not give conſent to the Changes before they were made, he was now well ſatisfied to obey them; but he would never make any acknowledgment of any fault. The things chiefly laid againſt him, were, that being required, he refuſed, to preach concerning the Kings Power when he was under Age; and that he had affronted Preachers ſent by the King into his Dioceſs; and had been negligent in obeying the Kings Injunctions; and continued, after all, ſo obſtinate, that he would not confeſs his fault, nor ask the King mercy. His Crimes were aggravated by this, that his timely aſſerting the Kings Power under Age, might have been a great mean for preventing the Rebellion and Effuſion of Blood; which had afterwards happened, chiefly on that pretence, to which his obſtinacy had given no ſmall occaſion. Upon this, many Witneſſes were examined; chiefly the Duke of Somerſet, the Earls of Wilt-ſhire, and Bedford, who depoſed againſt him. But to this he anſwered, That he was not required to do it by any Order of Council, but only in a private Diſcourſe, to which he did not think himſelf bound to give obedience. Other Witneſſes were alſo examined on the other Particulars. But he appealed from the Delegates to the King in Perſon. Yet his Judges, on the 18*th.* of April, gave ſentence againſt him; by which, for his diſobedience and contempt, they deprived him of his Biſhoprick. Upon that he renewed his Proteſtation and Appeal: and ſo his Proceſs ended, and he was ſent back to the Tower, where he lay till Queen Mary diſcharged him. Gardiner is deprived.

The ſame Cenſures, with the ſame Juſtifications, belong both to this, and Bonners Buſineſs: ſo I ſhall repeat nothing that was formerly ſaid. He had taken a Commiſſion, as well as Bonner, to hold his Biſhopſick only during the Kings Pleaſure; ſo they both had the leſs reaſon to complain which way ſoever the Royal Pleaſure was ſignified to them. Eight days after, on the 26*th.* of April, Poinet was tranſlated from Rocheſter to Wincheſter; and had 2000 Marks a Year in Lands aſſigned him out of that wealthy Biſhoprick for his Subſiſtence. Dr. Story was made Biſhop of Rocheſter. Veyſey Biſhop of Exeter did alſo reſign, pretending extream 1551. tream old Age; but he had reserved 485 l. a year in Pension for himself during Life, out of the Lands of the Bishoprick; and almost all the rest he had basely alienated, taking care only of himself, and ruining his Successors. Miles Coverdale was made Bishop of Exeter. So that now the Bishopricks were generally filled with Men well affected to the Reformation. The business of Hooper was now also setled. He was to be attired in the Vestments that were prescribed, when he was consecrated, and when he preached before the King, or in his Cathedral, or in any publick Place; but he was dispens'd with upon other occasions. On these Conditions he was consecrated in March: for the Writ for doing it bears date the 7th. of that Month. So now the Bishops being generally addicted to the purity of Religion, most of this Year was spent in preparing Articles, which should contain the Doctrine of the Church of England.

Hooper is consecrated upon his Conformity.

Many thought they should have begun first of all with those. But Cranmer upon good Reasons was of another mind, though much pressed by Bucer about it. Till the Order of Bishops was brought to such a Model, that the far greater part of them would agree to it, it was much fitter to let that design go on slowly, than to set out a Profession of their Belief, to which so great a part of the chief Pastors might be obstinately averse. The corruptions that were most important were those in the Worship, by which Men in their immediate Addresses to God, were necessarily involved in unlawful compliances, and these seemed to require a more speedy Reformation. But for speculative Points there was not so pressing a necessity to have them all explained, since in these, Men might, with less prejudice, be left to a freedom in their Opinions. It seemed also advisable to open and ventilate matters in publick Disputations and Books, written about them for some years, before they should go too hastily to determine them: lest if they went too fast in that Affair, it would not be so decent to make alterations afterwards; nor could the Clergy be of a sudden brought to change their old Opinions. Therefore upon all these Considerations that Work was delayed till this Year; in which they set about it, and finished it, before the Convocation met in the next February. In what Method they proceeded for the compiling of these Articles; whether they were given out to several Bishops and Divines to deliver their Opinions concerning them, as was done formerly, or not, it is not certain. I have found it often said, that they were framed by Cranmer and Ridley; which I think more probable; and that they were by them sent about to others, to correct or add to them as they saw cause. They are in the Collection with the differences between these, and those set out in Queen Elizabeths time, marked on the Margent.

Collection Number 55.

The Articles of Religion are prepared.

They began with the Assertion of the Blessed Trinity, the Incarnation of the Eternal Word, and Christs descent into Hell; grounding this last on these Words of St. Peter, of his Preaching to the Spirits that were in Prison. The next Article was about Christs Resurrection: The fifth about the Scriptures containing all things necessary to Salvation: so that nothing was to be held an Article of Faith that could not be proved from thence. The sixth, That the Old Testament was to be kept still.

The

The 7th. For the receiving the three Creeds, the Apoſtles, the Nicen, and Athanaſius Creed: in which they went according to the received Opinion, that Athanaſius was the Author of that Creed, which is now found not to have been compiled till near three Ages after him. 1551.

The 8th. makes Original Sin to be the corruption of the nature of all Men deſcending from Adam; by which they had fallen from Original Righteouſneſs, and were by nature given to evil: but they defined nothing about the derivation of guilt from Adams ſin.

The 9th. for the neceſſity of prevailing Grace, without which we have no free Will to do things acceptable to God.

The 10th. about Divine Grace, which changeth a Man, and yet puts no force on his Will.

The 11th. That Men are juſtified by Faith only; as was declared in the Homily.

The 12th. That Works done before Grace are not without ſin.

The 13th. Againſt all Works of Supererogation.

The 14th. That all Men, Chriſt only excepted, are guilty of ſin.

The 15th. That Men who have received Grace, may ſin afterwards, and riſe again by Repentance.

The 16th. That the blaſpheming againſt the Holy Ghoſt is, when Men out of malice and obſtinately rail againſt Gods Word, though they are convinced of it, yet perſecuting it: which is unpardonable.

The 17th. That Predeſtination is Gods free Election of thoſe, whom he afterwards juſtifies: which though it be matter of great comfort to ſuch as conſider it aright, yet it is a dangerous thing for curious and carnal Men to prie into: and it being a Secret, Men are to be governed by Gods revealed Will: they added not a word of Reprobation.

The 18th. That only the Name of Chriſt, and not the Law or Light of Nature, can ſave Men.

The 19th. That all Men are bound to keep the Moral Law.

The 20th. That the Church is a Congregation of Faithful Men, who have the Word of God Preached, and the Sacraments rightly Adminiſtred: and that the Church of Rome, as well as other particular Churches, have erred in matters of Faith.

The 21ſt. That the Church is only the Witneſs and Keeper of the Word of God: but cannot appoint any thing contrary to it, nor declare any Articles of Faith without Warrant from it.

The 22d. That General Councils may not be gathered without the conſent of Princes: that they may erre and have erred in matters of Faith: and that their Decrees in matters of Salvation have ſtrength only as they are taken out of the Scriptures.

The 23d. That the Doctrines of Purgatory, Pardons, Worſhiping of Images, and Relicks, and Invocation of Saints, are without any Warrant, and contrary to the Scriptures.

The 24th. That none may Preach or Miniſter the Sacraments, without he be lawfully called by Men who have lawful Authority.

The 25th. That all things ſhould be ſpoken in the Church in a Vulgar Tongue.

The 26th. That there are two Sacraments, which are not bare Tokens of our Profeſſion, but effectual Signs of Gods good Will to us: which 1551. which ſtrengthen our Faith, yet not by vertue only of the Work wrought, but in thoſe who receive them worthily.

The 27*th*. That the vertue of theſe does not depend on the Miniſter of them.

The 28*th*. That by Baptiſm we are the adopted Sons of God; and that Infant Baptiſm is to be commended, and in any ways to be retained.

The 29*th*. That the Lords Supper is not a bare token of love among Chriſtians; but is the Communion of the Body and Blood of Chriſt: that the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation is contrary to Scripture, and hath given occaſion to much Superſtition: that a Body being only in one place, and Chriſts Body being in Heaven, therefore there cannot be a real and bodily Preſence of his Fleſh and Blood in it: and that this Sacrament is not to be kept, carried about, lifted up, nor worſhiped.

The 30*th*. That there is no other Propitiatory Sacrifice, but that which Chriſt offered on the Croſs.

The 31*ſt*. That the Clergy are not by Gods command obliged to abſtain from Marriage.

The 32*d*. That Perſons rightly excommunicated are to be looked on as Heathens, till they are by Penance reconciled, and received by a Judge competent.

The 33*d*. It is not neceſſary that Ceremonies ſhould be the ſame at all times: but ſuch as refuſe to obey lawful Ceremonies, ought to be openly reproved as offending againſt Law and Order, giving ſcandal to the weak.

The 34*th*. That the Homilies are Godly and wholeſom, and ought to be read.

The 35*th*. That the Book of Common-Prayer is not repugnant, but agreeable to the Goſpel; and ought to be received by all.

The 36*th*. That the King is Supream Head under Chriſt: that the Biſhop of Rome hath no Juriſdiction in England: that the Civil Magiſtrate is to be obeyed for Conſcience ſake: that Men may be put to death for great offences: and that it is lawful for Chriſtians to make War.

The 37*th*. That there is not to be a community of all Mens Goods: but yet every Man ought to give to the Poor according to his ability.

The 38*th*. That though raſh ſwearing is condemned: yet ſuch as are required by the Magiſtrate may take an Oath.

The 39*th*. That the Reſurrection is not already paſt, but at the laſt day Men ſhall riſe with the ſame Bodies they now have.

The 40*th*. That departed Souls do not die, nor ſleep with their Bodies, and continue without ſenſe till the laſt day.

The 41*ſt*. That the Fable of the Millenaries, is contrary to Scripture and a Jewiſh dotage.

The laſt condemned thoſe who believed that the damned, after ſome time of ſuffering, ſhall be ſaved.

Thus was the Doctrine of the Church, caſt into a ſhort and plain Form: in which they took care both to eſtabliſh the poſitive Articles of Religion, and to cut off the errors formerly introduced in the time of

Popery,

Popery, or of late broached by the Anabaptiſts and Enthuſiaſts of Germany: avoiding the niceties of School-men, or the peremptorineſs of the Writers of Controverſie: leaving in matters that are more juſtly controvertible, a liberty to Divines to follow their private Opinions, without thereby diſturbing the Peace of the Church. 1551.

There was in the Ancient Church a great ſimplicity in their Creeds, and the Expoſition of the Doctrine. But afterwards, upon the breaking out of the Arrian, and other Hereſies, concerning the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt; as the Orthodox Fathers were put to find out new Terms to drive the Hereticks out of the equivocal uſe of theſe formerly received; ſo they too ſoon grew to love niceties, and to explain Myſteries, with Similies, and other ſubtilties which they invented: and Councils afterwards were very liberal in their Anathematiſmes againſt any who did not agree in all Points to their Terms, or ways of Explanation. And though the Council of Epheſus decreed, That there ſhould be no Additions made to the Creed, they underſtood that not of the whole Belief of Chriſtians, but only of the Creed it ſelf: and did alſo load the Chriſtian Doctrine with many Curioſities. But though they had exceeded much, yet the School-men getting the management of the Doctrine, ſpun their Thread much finer: and did eaſily procure Condemnations, either by Papal Bulls, or the Decrees of ſuch Councils as met in theſe times, of all that differed from them in the leaſt matter. Upon the progreſs of the Reformation, the German Writers, particularly Oſiander, Illiricus, and Amſtorfius, grew too peremptory, and not only condemned the Helvetian Churches, for differing from them in the manner of Chriſts Preſence in the Sacrament, but were ſevere to one another for leſſer Punctilio's, and were at this time exerciſing the patience of the great and learned Melanchon, becauſe he thought that in things of their own Nature indifferent, they ought to have complied with the Emperor. This made thoſe in England reſolve on compoſing theſe Articles with great temper, in many ſuch Points. Only one Notion that has been ſince taken up by ſome, ſeems not to have been then thought of; which is, That theſe were rather Articles of Peace than of Belief: ſo that the ſubſcribing was rather a Compromiſe not to teach any Doctrine contrary to them, than a Declaration that they believed according to them. There appears no reaſon for this conceit, no ſuch thing being then declared: ſo that thoſe who ſubſcribed, did either believe them to be true, or elſe they did groſly prevaricate.

The next Buſineſs in which the Reformers were employed this Year, was the correcting the Common-Prayer-Book, and the making ſome Additions, with the changing of ſuch Particulars as had been retained only for a time. The moſt conſiderable Additions were, That in the daily Service they prepared a ſhort, but moſt ſimple and grave, Form of a general Confeſſion of ſins; in the uſe of which they intended that thoſe who made this Confeſſion ſhould not content themſelves with a bare recital of the Words, but ſhould joyn with them in their Hearts, a particular Confeſſion of their private ſins to God. To this was added a General Abſolution, or Pronouncing in the Name of God, the pardon of ſin to all thoſe who did truly repent, and unfeignedly believe the Goſpel. For they judged, that if the People did ſeriouſly practiſe this, it would keep up in their thoughts frequent reflections on their ſins; and

Some Corrections made in the Common-Prayer Book.

1551. it was thought that the pronouncing a Pardon upon theſe Conditions might have a better effect on the People, than that abſolute and unqualified Pardon which their Prieſts were wont to give in Confeſſion. By which Abſolution in times of Popery the People were made to believe that their ſins were thereupon certainly forgiven; than which nothing could be invented that would harden them into a more fatal ſecurity; when they thought a full Pardon could be ſo readily purchaſed. But now they heard the terms, on which they could only expect it, every day promulgated to them. The other Addition was alſo made upon good conſideration, in the Office of the Communion; to which the People were obſerved to come without due ſeriouſneſs or preparation: therefore for awakening their Conſciences more feelingly, it was ordered that the Office of the Communion ſhould begin with a ſolemn pronouncing of the Ten Commandments: all the Congregation being on their Knees: as if they were hearing that Law a-new: and a ſtop to be made at every Commandment, for the Peoples devotion, of imploring mercy for their paſt offences, and Grace to obſerve it for the time to come. This ſeemed as effectual a Mean as they could deviſe, till Church-penitence were again ſet up, to beget in Men deep reflections on their ſins, and to prepare them thereby to receive that Holy Sacrament worthily. The other Changes were, the removing of ſome Rites which had been retained in the former Book; ſuch as the uſe of Oyl in Confirmation and Extream Unction, the Prayers for Souls departed, both in the Communion-Service, and in the Office of Burial, the leaving out ſome Paſſages in the Conſecration of the Euchariſt that ſeemed to favour the Belief of the Corporal Preſence, with the uſe of the Croſs, in it, and in Confirmation, with ſome ſmaller variations. And indeed they brought the whole Liturgy to the ſame Form in which it is now, except ſome few conſiderable variations that have been ſince made for the clearing of ſome Ambiguities.

An Account of kneeling in the Communion.

In the Office of the Communion, they added a Rubrick concerning the poſture of kneeling, which was appointed to be ſtill the geſture of Communicants. It was hereby declared, that that geſture was kept up as a moſt reverent and humble way of expreſſing our great ſenſe of the Mercies of God in the death of Chriſt there communicated to us: but that thereby there was no adoration intended to the Bread and Wine which was groſs Idolatry: nor did they think the very Fleſh and Blood of Chriſt were there preſent; ſince his Body, according to the nature of all other Bodies, could be only in one place at once; and ſo he being now in Heaven, could not be corporally preſent in the Sacrament. This was by Queen Elizabeth ordered to be left out of the Common-Prayer Book; ſince it might have given offence to ſome, otherwiſe inclined to the Communion of the Church, who yet retained the belief of the Corporal Preſence. But ſince his preſent Majeſties Reſtoration, many having excepted to the Poſture, as apprehending ſome thing like Idolatry or Superſtition might lie under it, if it were not rightly explained; the Explication which was given in King Edwards time, was again inſerted in the Common-Prayer-Book.

For the Poſture, it is moſt likely that the firſt Inſtitution was in the Table-geſture, which was, lying along on one ſide. But it was apparent in our Saviours Practice, that the Jewiſh Church had changed the Poſture of that Inſtitution of the Paſſover, in whoſe room the Euchariſt came. For though Moſes had appointed the Jews to eat their Paſchal Lamb, ſtanding with their Loins girt, with Staves in their Hands, and Shooes on their Feet; yet the Jews did afterwards change this into the Common-Table-Poſture: of which change, though there is no mention in the Old Teſtament, yet we ſee it was ſo in our Saviours time; and ſince he complied with the common Cuſtom, we are ſure that Change was not criminal. It ſeemed reaſonable to allow the Chriſtian Church the like Power in ſuch things with the Jewiſh: and as the Jews thought their coming into the Promiſed Land, might be a Warrant to lay aſide the Poſture appointed by Moſes, which became Travellers beſt; ſo Chriſt being now exalted, it ſeemed fit to receive this Sacrament with higher Marks of outward reſpect, than had been proper in the firſt Inſtitution, when he was in the ſtate of Humiliation, and his Divine Glory not yet ſo fully revealed. Therefore in the Primitive Church they received ſtanding and bending their Body, in a poſture of Adoration. But how ſoon that Geſture of kneeling came in, is not ſo exactly obſerved, nor is it needful to know. But ſurely there is a great want of ingenuity in them that are pleaſed to apply theſe Orders of ſome later Popes for kneeling at the Elevation, to our kneeling; when ours is not at one ſuch part, which might be more liable to exception, but during the whole Office: by which it is one continued Act of Worſhip, and the Communicants kneel all the while. But of this no more needs to be ſaid, than is expreſt in the Rubrick, which occaſioned this Digreſſion. 1551.

Thus were the Reformations both of Doctrine and Worſhip prepared: To which all I can add of this Year, is, that there were ſix eminent Preachers choſen out to be the Kings Chaplains in Ordinary: two of thoſe were always to attend at Court; and four to be ſent over England to preach and inſtruct the People. In the firſt year, two of theſe were to go into Wales, and the other two into Lancaſhire: the next year two into the Marches of Scotland, and two into York-ſhire; the third year two into Devon-ſhire, and two into Hamp-ſhire; and the fourth year, two into Norfolk, and two into Kent and Suſſex. Theſe were Bill, Harle, Pern, Grindal, Bradford, the Name of the ſixth is ſo daſhed in the Kings Journal, that it cannot be read. Theſe, it ſeems, were accounted the moſt zealous and readieſt Preachers of that time; who were thus ſent about, as Itinerants to ſupply the defects of the greateſt part of the Clergy, who were generally very faulty. Some Orders given to the Kings Chaplains.

The Buſineſs of the Lady Mary was now taken up with more heat than formerly. The Emperors earneſt ſuit, that ſhe might have Maſs in her Houſe, was long rejected: for it was ſaid, that as the King did not interpoſe in the matters of the Emperors Government, ſo there was no reaſon for the Emperor to meddle in his Affairs. Yet the ſtate of England making his friendſhip at that time neceſſary to the King, and he refuſing to continue in his League, unleſs to Kinſwoman obtained that favour, it was promiſed, that for ſome time, in hope ſhe would reform, there ſhould be a forbearance granted. The Emperors Ambaſſadors preſſed to have a Licenſe for it under the Great Seal. It was anſwered, That being againſt Law, it could not be done: Then they deſired to have it certified under the Kings Hand, in a Letter to the Emperor; but even that was refuſed. So that they only gave a Promiſe for ſome time by The Lady Mary continued to have Maſs ſaid in her Chappel.

1551. word of mouth, and Paget, and Hobby, who had been the Ambassadors with the Emperor, declared they had spoke of it to him with the same limitations. But the Emperor, who was accustomed to take for absolute what was promised only under conditions, writ to the Lady Mary, that he had an absolute Promise for the free exercise of her Religion: and so she pretended this, when she was at any time questioned about it. The two Grounds she went on, were, that she would follow the ancient and universal way of Worship, and not a new invention that lay within the four Seas: and that she would continue in that Religion, in which her Father had instructed her. To this, the King sent an answer, telling her, That she was a part of this Church and Nation, and so must conform her self to the Laws of it; that the way of Worship now set up, was no other than what was clearly consonant to the pure Word of God; and the King's being young, was not to be pretended by her, lest she might seem to agree with the late Rebels. After this, she was sent for to Court, and pains was taken to instruct her better. But she refused to hear any thing, or to enter into any reasonings, but said, she would still do as she had done. And she claimed the Promise that was said to be made to the Emperor. But it was told her, that it was but temporary and conditional. Whereupon the last Summer she was designing to fly out of England; and the King of France gave Sir John Mason, the English Resident notice, that the Regent of Flanders had hired one Scipper who should Land on the Coast of Essex, as if it had been to victual his Ship, and was to have conveyed her away. Upon this Information, order was given to see well to the Coast; so the design being discovered, nothing could be effected. It was certainly a strange advice to carry her away, and no less strange in the Kings Ministers to hinder it, if there was at that time any design formed to put her by her Succession. For if she had been beyond Sea at the Kings death, it is not probable that she could have easily come to the Crown. The Emperors Ambassador solicited for her violently, and said he would presently take leave, and protest, that they had broken their Faith to his Master, who would resent the usage of the Lady Mary as highly as if it were done immediately to himself. The Counsellors, having no mind to draw a new War on their Heads, especially from so victorious a Prince, were all inclined to let the matter fall. There was also a years Cloath lately sent over to Antwerp; and 1500 Cinqtails of Powder, with a great deal of Armour, bought there for the Kings use, was not come over. So it was thought by no means advisable to provoke the Emperor, while they had such effects in his Ports; nor were they very willing to give higher provocations to the next Heir of the Crown. Therefore they all advised the King not to do more in that matter at present, but to leave the Lady Mary to her discretion, who would certainly be made more cautious by what she had met with, and would give as little scandal as was possible by her Mass. But the King could not be induced to give way to it, for he thought the Mass was impious and idolatrous; so he would not consent to the continuance of such a sin. Upon this the Council ordered Cranmer, Ridley, and Poinet, to discourse about it with him. They told him, that it was always a sin in a Prince to permit any sin; but to give a connivance, that is, not to punish, was not always a sin: since sometimes a lesser evil connived at might prevent a greater. He was overcome by this; yet not so easily, but but that he burſt forth in Tears, lamenting his Siſters obſtinacy, and that he muſt ſuffer her to continue in ſo abominable a way of Worſhip, as he eſteemed the Maſs. So he anſwered the Emperors Agents, that he ſhould ſend over an Ambaſſador to clear that matter. And Dr. Wotton was diſpatched about it, who carried over Atteſtations from all the Council, concerning the qualifications of the Promiſe that had been made: and was inſtructed to preſs the Emperor, not to trouble the King in his Affairs at home in his own Kingdom. If the Lady Mary was his Kinſwoman, ſhe was the Kings Siſter, and Subject: he was alſo to offer, that the King would grant as much liberty for the Maſs in his Dominions as the Emperor would grant for the Engliſh Service in his Dominions. But the Emperor pretended, that when her Mother died, ſhe left her to his protection, which he had granted her, and ſo muſt take care of her. And the Emperor was ſo exalted with his ſucceſſes, that he did not eaſily bear any contradiction. But the Council being further offended with her for the project of going beyond Sea, and being now leſs in fear of the Emperor, ſince they had made Peace with France, reſolved to look more nearly to her. And finding that Dr. Mallet, and Barkley, her Chaplains, had ſaid Maſs in one of her Houſes, when ſhe was not in it, they ordered them to be proceeded againſt. Upon which, in December the laſt year, ſhe writ earneſtly to the Council to let it fall. By her Letter it appears, that Mallet uſed to be ſometimes at his Benefice, where it is certain he could officiate no other way but in that preſcribed by Law: ſo it ſeems his Conſcience was not very ſcrupulous. The Council writ her a long Anſwer, which being in the Stile of a Churchman, ſeems to have been penned either by Cranmer, or Ridley. In which Letter they fully clear'd the matter of the Promiſe: then they ſhewed how expreſs the Law was, with which they could not diſpenſe: and how ill grounded her Faith, as ſhe called it, was. They asked her what Warrant there was in Scripture, that the Prayers ſhould be in an unknown Tongue, that Images ſhould be in the Church, or that the Sacrament ſhould be offered up for the Dead. They told her, that in all Queſtions about Religion, St. Auſtin and the other ancient Doctors appealed to the Scripture; and if ſhe would look into theſe, ſhe would ſoon ſee the errors of the old Superſtition, which were ſupported by falſe Miracles and lying Stories, and not by Scripture or good Authority. They expreſt themſelves in terms full of ſubmiſſion to her, but ſaid they were truſted with the execution of the Kings Laws in which they muſt proceed equally. So they required her, if the Chaplains were in her Houſe, to ſend them to the Sheriff of Eſſex. But it ſeems they kept out of the way, and ſo the matter ſlept till the beginning of May this year, that Mallet was found, and put in the Tower, and convicted of his offence. Upon this there paſſed many Letters between the Council and her: ſhe earneſtly deſiring to have him ſet at liberty, and they as poſitively refuſing to do it.

The Council writ to her of it.

In July the Council ſent for Rocheſter, Inglefield, and Walgrave, three of her chief Officers; and gave them Inſtructions to ſignifie the Kings expreſs pleaſure to her, to have the new Service in her Family; and to give the like charge to her Chaplains, and all her Servants; and to return with an anſwer. In Auguſt they came back, and ſaid, ſhe was much indiſpoſed, and received the Meſſage very grievouſly. She ſaid, ſhe would 1551 would obey the King in all things, except where her Conscience was touched: but she charged them to deliver none of their Message to the rest of her Family; in which they being her Servants could not disobey her, especially when they thought it might prejudice her health. Upon this, they were sent to the Tower. The Lord Chancellor, Sir Ant. Wingfield, and Sir William Petre, were next sent to her, with a Letter from the King, and Instructions from the Council, for the charge they were to give to her and her Servants. They came to her House of Copthall in Essex. The Lord Chancellor gave her the Kings Letter, which she received on her Knees: and said, she payed that respect to the Kings Hand, and not to the matter of the Letter, which she knew proceeded from the Council: and when she read it, she said, Ah! Mr. Cecil took much pains here: (he was then Secretary of State in Dr. Wottons room.) So she turned to the Counsellors, and bid them deliver their Message to her. She wished them to be short, for she was not well at ease, and would give them a short answer, having writ her mind plainly to the King with her own Hand. The Lord Chancellor told her, that all the Council were of one mind, that she must be no longer suffered to have private Mass, or a Form of Religion different from what was established by Law. He went to read the Names of those who were of that mind; but she desired him to spare his pains, she knew they were all of a sort. They next told her, they had order to require her Chaplains to use no other Service, and her Servants to be present at no other, than what was according to Lay. She answered, She was the Kings most obedient Subject, and Sister; and would obey him in every thing, but where here Conscience held her, and would willingly suffer death to do him service: but she would lay her Head on a block, rather than use any other Form of Service, than what had been at her Fathers death: only she thought she was not worthy to suffer death on so good an account. When the King came to be of Age, so that he could order these things himself, she would obey his Commands in Religion: for although he, Good sweet King, (these were her words) had more knowledge than any of his years, yet he was not a fit judge in these matters; for if Ships were to be set to Sea, or any matter of Policy to be determined, they would not think him fit for it, much less could he be able to resolve Points of Divinity. As for her Chaplains, if they would say no Mass, she could hear none; and for her Servants, she knew they all desired to hear Mass: her Chaplains might do what they would, it was but a whiles imprisonment: but for the new Service, it should never be said in her House: and if any were forced to say it, she would stay no longer in the House. When the Counsellors spake of Rochester, Inglefield, and Walgrave, who had not fully executed their charge; she said, it was not the wisest Counsel, to order her Servants to controul her in her own House: and they were the honestest Men not to do such a thing against their Consciences. She insisted on the Promise made to the Emperor, which she had under his Hand, whom she believed better than them all: they ought to use her better for her Fathers sake, who had raised them all almost out of nothing. But though the Emperor were dead, or would bid her obey them; she would not change her mind, and she would let his Ambassador know how they used her. To this they answered, clearing the mistake about the Promise, to which she gave little heed.

And sent some to her.

But she was Intractable.

heed. They told her, they had brought one down to ſerve as her Comptroller in Rocheſters room: She ſaid, ſhe would chooſe her own Servants; and if they went to impoſe any on her, ſhe would leave the Houſe. She was ſick, but would do all ſhe could to live: but if ſhe died, ſhe would proteſt they were the cauſes of it: they gave her good words, but their deeds were evil. Then ſhe took a Ring from her Finger, and on her Knees gave it to the Lord Chancellor, to give to the King as a Token from her, with her humble Commendations; and proteſted much of her Duty to him; but ſhe ſaid, this will never be told him. The Counſellors went from her to her Chaplains, and delivered their Meſſage to them, who promiſed they would obey. Then they charged the reſt of the Servants in like manner, and alſo commanded them to give notice if thoſe Orders were broken. And ſo they went to go away. But as they were in the Court, the Lady Mary called to them from her Window, to ſend her Comptroller to her; for ſhe ſaid, that now ſhe her ſelf received the accounts of her Houſe, and knew how many Loaves were made of a Buſhel of Meal, to which ſhe had never been bred, and ſo was weary of that Office; but if they would needs ſend him to Priſon, ſhe ſaid, I beſhrew him if he go not to it merrily, and with a good Will; and concluded, I pray God to ſend you to do well in your Souls and Bodies, for ſome of you have but weak Bodies. This is the ſubſtance of the Report theſe Counſellors gave when they returned back to the Court on the 29*th.* of Auguſt. By which they were now out of all hopes of prevailing with her by perſwaſions or Authority: So it was next conſidered, whether it was fit to go to further extremities with her. How the matter was determined, I do not clearly find; it is certain the Lady Mary would never admit of the new Service, and ſo I believe ſhe continued to keep her Prieſts, and have Maſs; but ſo ſecretly, that there was no ground for any publick complaint. For I find no further mention of that matter, than what is made by Ridley, of a Paſſage that befel him in September next year. 1551.

Nor would ſhe hear Biſhop Ridley preach.

He went to wait on her, ſhe living then at Hunſden; where ſhe received him at firſt civilly, and told him, ſhe remembred of him in her Fathers time, and at Dinner ſent him to dine with her Officers: after Dinner, he told her, he came not only to do his Duty to her, but to offer to Preach before her next Sunday: She bluſhed, and once or twice deſired him to make the Anſwer to that himſelf. But when he preſſed her further, ſhe ſaid, the Pariſh-Church would be open to him if he had a mind to preach in it: but neither ſhe, nor any of her Family ſhould hear him. He ſaid, he hoped ſhe would not refuſe to hear Gods Word; ſhe ſaid, ſhe did not know what they called Gods Word; but ſhe was ſure that was not now Gods Word that was called ſo in her Fathers days. He ſaid, Gods Word was the ſame at all times. She anſwered, ſhe was ſure he durſt not for his Ears have avowed theſe things in her Fathers time, which he did now: and for their Books, as, ſhe thanked God, ſhe never had, ſo ſhe never would read them. She alſo uſed many reproachful words to him, and asked him, If he was of the Council; He ſaid not: She replied, He might well enough be, as the Council goes now a-days; and ſo diſmiſſed him, thanking him for coming to ſee her, but not at all for offering to preach before her. Sir Tho. Wharton, one of her Officers, carried him to a place where he deſired him to drink; which Ridley 1551. ley did: but reflecting on it, ſaid, He had done amiſs, to drink in a place where Gods Word was rejected: for if he had remembred his Duty, he ſhould upon that refuſal have ſhaken the duſt off his Feet, for a Teſtimony againſt the Houſe, and have departed immediately. Theſe words he was obſerved to pronounce with an extraordinary concern, and went away much troubled in his mind. And this is all I find of the Lady Mary during this Reign. For the Lady Elizabeth, ſhe had been always bred up to like the Reformation; and Dr. Parker, who had been her Mothers Chaplain, received a ſtrict charge from her Mother a little before her death, to look well to the inſtructing her Daughter in the Principles of true Religion; ſo that there is no doubt to be made of her chearful receiving all the changes that had been eſtabliſhed by Law.

The Deſigns of the Earl of Warwick.

And this is all that concerns Religion, that falls within this Year. But now a deſign came to be laid, which though it broke not out for ſome time, yet it was believed to have had a great influence on the Fall of the Duke of Somerſet. The Earl of Warwick began to form great Projects for himſelf, and thought to bring the Crown into his Family. The King was now much alienated from the Lady Mary; the Privy-Council had alſo embroiled themſelves ſo with her, that he imagined it would be no hard matter to exclude her from the Succeſſion. There was but one reaſon that could be pretended for it; which was, that ſhe ſtood illegitimated by Law; and that therefore the next Heirs in Blood could not be barred their right by her; ſince it would be a great blot on the Honour of the Engliſh Crown to let it devolve on a Baſtard. This was as ſtrong againſt the Lady Elizabeth, ſince ſhe was alſo illegitimated by a Sentence in the Spiritual Court, and that confirmed in Parliament: ſo if their jealouſie of the elder Siſters Religion, and the fear of her revenge, moved them to be willing to cut her off from the Succeſſion, the ſame reaſon that was to be uſed in Law againſt her, was alſo to take place againſt her Siſter. So he reckoned that theſe two were to be paſſed over, as being put both in the Act of Succeſſion, and in the late Kings Will, by one error. The next in the Will, were the Heirs of the French Queen by Charles Brandon, who were the Dutcheſs of Suffolk, and her Siſter. Though I have ſeen it often ſaid in many Letters, and Writings of that time, that all that Iſſue by Charles Brandon was illegitimated: ſince he was certainly married to one Mortimer, before he married the Queen of France; which Mortimer lived long after his Marriage to that Queen: ſo that all her Children were Baſtards: ſome ſay he was divorced from his Marriage to Mortimer, but that is not clear to me.

The Sweating Sickneſs.

This Year the Sweating Sickneſs, that had been formerly both in Henry the 7th. and the late Kings Reign, broke out with that violence in England, that many were ſwept away by it. Such as were taken with it, died certainly if they ſlept, to which they had a violent deſire: but if it took them not off in twenty four hours, they did ſweat out the venom of the diſtemper: which raged ſo in London, that in one week 800 died of it. It did alſo ſpread into the Countrey, and the two Sons of Charles Brandon by his laſt Wife, both Dukes of Suffolk, died within a day one of another. So that Title was fallen. Their Siſter by the half Blood was married to Gray Lord Marqueſs of Dorſet. So ſhe being the eldeſt Daughter to the French Queen, the Earl of Warwick reſolved to link himſelf to that Family; and to procure the Honour of the Duke-dome of Suffolk to be given the Marqueſs of Dorſet, who was a weak Man, and eaſily governed. He had three Daughters; the eldeſt was Jane, a Lady of as excellent qualities as any of that Age; of great Parts, bred to Learning, and much converſant in Scripture; and of ſo rare a temper of mind, that ſhe charmed all who knew her: in particular the young King, about whom ſhe was bred, and who had always lived with her in the familiarities of a Brother. The Earl of Warwick deſigned to marry her to Guilford his fourth Son, then living, his three elder being already married; and ſo to get the Crown to deſcend on them if the King ſhould die, of which it is thought he reſolved to take care. But apprehending ſome danger from the Lady Elizabeths Title, he intended to ſend her away. So an Ambaſſador was diſpatched to Denmark, to treat a Marriage for her with that Kings eldeſt Son. 1551.

To amuſe the King himſelf, a moſt ſplendid Embaſſy was ſent to France, to propoſe a Marriage for the King to that Kings Daughter Elizabeth, afterwards married to Philip of Spain. The Marqueſs of Northampton was ſent with this Propoſition, and with the Order of the Garter. With him went the Earls of Worceſter, Rutland, and Ormond; the Lords Liſle, Fitzwater, Bray, Abergaveny, and Evers; and the Biſhop of Ely, who was to be their Mouth: With them went many Gentlemen of Quality, who with their Train made up near 500. King Henry received the Garter with great expreſſions of Eſteem for the King. The Biſhop of Ely told him, They were come to deſire a more cloſe tie between theſe Crowns by Marriage, and to have the League made firmer between them in other Particulars. To which the Cardinal of Lorrain made anſwer, in his way of ſpeaking, which was always vain, and full of oſtentation. A Commiſſion was given to that Cardinal, the Conſtable, the Duke of Guiſe, and others, to treat about it. The King treats with the French King for a Marriage with his Daughter

The Engliſh began firſt, for Forms ſake, to deſire the Queen of Scots. But that being rejected, they moved for the Daughter of France, which was entertained; but ſo that neither Party ſhould be bound in Honour and Conſcience, till the Lady were twelve years of Age. Yet this never taking effect, it is needleſs to enlarge further about it; of which the Reader will find all the particulars in King Edwards Journal. The King of France ſent another very noble Embaſſy into England, with the Order of St. Michael to the King, and a very kind Meſſage, that he had no leſs love to him than a Father could bear to his own Son. He deſired the King would not liſten to the vain Rumors, which ſome malicious Perſons might raiſe, to break their friendſhip; and wiſhed, there might be ſuch a regulation on their Frontiers, that all differences might be amicably removed. To this the young King made anſwer himſelf, "That he thanked his good Brother for his Order, and for the Aſſurances "of his Love, which he would always requite. For Rumors, they were "not always to be credited, nor always to be rejected; it being no leſs "vain to fear all things, than it was dangerous to doubt of nothing: and "for any differences that might ariſe, he ſhould be always ready to deter-"mine them, by reaſon, rather than force; ſo far as his Honour ſhould "not be thereby diminiſhed. Whether this Anſwer was prepared beforehand, or not, I cannot tell; I rather think it was; otherways it was extraordinary for one of fourteen to talk thus on the ſudden.

But while all this was carrying on, there was a deſign laid to deſtroy the Duke of Somerſet. He had ſuch acceſs to the King, and ſuch freedoms with him, that the Earl of Warwick had a mind to be rid of him, leſt he ſhould ſpoil all his Projects. The Duke of Somerſet ſeemed alſo to have deſigned in April this Year to have got the King again in his power: and dealt with the Lord Strange, that was much in his favour, to perſwade him to marry his Daughter Jane, and that he would advertiſe him of all that paſſed about the King. But the Earl of Warwick, to raiſe himſelf and all his Friends higher, procured a great Creation of new Honours. Gray was made Duke of Suffolk, and himſelf Duke of Northumberland; for Henry Piercy, the laſt Earl of Northumberland, dying without Iſſue, his next Heirs were the Sons of Thomas Piercy, that had been attainted in the laſt Reign for the York-ſhire Rebellion. Paulet then Lord Treaſurer, and Earl of Wilt-ſhire, was made Marqueſs of Wincheſter; and Sir William Herbert, that had married the Marqueſs of Northampton's Siſter, was made Earl of Pembroke. The Lord Ruſſel had been made Earl of Bedford laſt year, upon his return from making the Peace with the French: Sir Tho. Darcy had alſo been made Lord Darcy. The new Duke of Northumberland could no longer bear ſuch a Rival in his greatneſs, as the Duke of Somerſet was, who was the only Perſon that he thought could take the King out of his Hands. So on the 17*th.* of October the Duke was apprehended, and ſent to the Tower; and with him the Lord Gray; Sir Ralph Vane, who had eſcaped over the River, but was taken in a Stable in Lambeth, hid under the Straw: Sir Tho. Palmer, and Sir Tho. Arundel, were alſo taken, yet not ſent at firſt to the Tower, but kept under Guards in their Chambers. Some of his followers, Hamond, Nudigate, and two of the Seimours, were ſent to Priſon. The day after, the Dutcheſs of Somerſet was alſo ſent to the Tower, with one Cram, and his Wife, that had been much about her, and two of her Chamberwomen. After theſe, Sir Tho. Holdcroft, Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Michael Stanhop, Wingfield, Banniſter, and Vaughan, were all made Priſoners. The Evidence againſt the Duke, was, That he had made a Party for getting himſelf declared Protector in the next Parliament; which the Earl of Rutland did poſitively affirm; and the Duke did ſo anſwer it, that it is probable it was true. But though this might well inflame his Enemies, yet it was no crime. But Sir Tho. Palmer, though impriſoned with him as a Complice, was the Perſon that ruined him. He had been before that brought ſecretly to the King, and had told him, that on the laſt St. Georges day, the Duke apprehending there was miſchief deſigned againſt him, thought to have raiſed the People, had not Sir William Herbert aſſured him he ſhould receive no harm: that lately he intended to have the Duke of Northumberland, the Marqueſs of Northampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, invited to Dinner at the Lord Pagets; and either to have ſet on them by the way, or to have killed them at Dinner: that Sir Ralph Vane had 2000 Men ready, that Sir Tho. Arundel had aſſured the Tower, and that all the Gandarmory were to be killed: The Duke of Somerſet, hearing Palmer had been with the King, challenged him of it, but he denied all. He ſent alſo for Secretary Cecil, and told him he ſuſpected there was an ill deſign againſt him: to which the Secretary anſwered, if he were not in fault, he might truſt to his innocency; but if he were, he had nothing to ſay but to lament him.

All this was told the King with such Circumstances, that he was induced to believe it; and the probity of his disposition wrought in him a great aversion to his Unkle; when he looked on him as a Conspirator against the Lives of the other Counsellors: and so he resolved to leave him to the Law. Palmer being a second time examined, said, That Sir Ralph Vane was to have brought 2000 Men, who, with the Duke of Somersets 100 Horse, where on a Muster-day to have set on the Gendarmory; that being done, the Duke resolved to have gone thorough the City, and proclaimed Liberty, Liberty: and if his attempt did not succed, to have fled to the Isle of Wight, or to Pool. Crane confirmed all that Palmer had said; to which he added, That the Earl of Arundel was privy to the Conspiracy: and that the thing had been executed, but that the greatness of the Enterprise had caused delays, and sometimes diversity of advice: and that the Duke, being once given out to be sick, had gone privately to London, to see what Friends he could make. Hamond being examined, confessed nothing, but that the Dukes Chamber at Greenwich had been guarded in the night, by many Armed Men. Upon this Evidence, both the Earl of Arundel, and the Lord Paget were sent to the Tower. The Earl had been one of the chief of those who had joyned with the Earl of Warwick to pull down the Protector; and being, as he thought, ill rewarded by him, was become his Enemy. So this part of the Information seemed very credible. The thing lay in suspence till the first of December, that the Duke of Somerset was brought to his Trial: where the Marques of Winchester was Lord Steward. The Peers that judged him, were twenty seven in number. The Dukes of Suffolk, and Northumberland, the Marques of Northampton, the Earls of Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bath, Sussex, Worcester, Pembroke, and the Viscount of Hereford, the Lords Abergaveny, Audley, Wharton, Evers, Latimer, Borough, Souch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcy, Sturton, Windsor, Cromwell, Cobham, and Bray. The Crimes laid against him, were cast into five several Indictments, as the King has it in his Journal; but the Record mentions only three, whether Indictments or Articles is not so clear. That he had designed to have seized on the Kings Person, and so have governed all Affairs, and that he with one hundred others intended to have imprisoned the Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, and that he had designed to have raised an Insurrection in the City of London. Now by the Act that passed in the last Parliament, if twelve Persons should have assembled together to have killed any Privy-Counsellor, and upon Proclamation they had not dispersed themselves, it was Treason: or if such Twelve had been by any malicious Artifice brought together, for any Riot, and being warned, did not disperse themselves, it was Felony, without benefit of Clergy or Sanctuary. It seemed very strange that the three Peers, Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke, who were his professed Enemies, and against the first of whom it was pretended in the Indictment that he had conspired, should sit his Judges: for though by the Law no Peer can be challenged in a Trial, yet the Law of Nations, that is Superior to all other Laws, makes, that a Man cannot be Judge in his own Cause: and which was very unusual, the Lord Chancellor, though then a Peer, was left out of the number; but it is like the Reconciliation between the Duke of Somerset and him was then suspected, which made him not be called to be one of his Judges.

He is brought to his Trial.

1551. The Duke of Somerset being, it seems, little acquainted with Law, did not desire Council to plead, or assist him in Point of Law; but only answered to matters of Fact. He prefaced, that he desired no advantage might be taken against him, for any idle or angry word that might have at any time fallen from him. He protested he never intended to have raised the Northern Parts, but had only upon some reports sent to Sir William Herbert to be his Friend: that he had never determined to have killed the Duke of Northumberland, or any other Person, but had only talked of it, without any intention of doing it: that for the design of destroying the Gendarmoury, it was ridiculous to think that he with a small Troop could destroy so strong a Body of Men, consisting of 900; in which, though he had succeeded, it could have signified nothing: that he never designed to raise any stirs in London, but had always looked on it as a Place where he was most safe: that his having Men about him in Greenwich was with no ill design, since when he could have done mischief with them, he had not done it; but upon his Attachment rendred himself a Prisoner, without any resistance. He objected also many things against the Witnesses, and desired they might be brought face to face. He particularly spake much against Sir Tho. Palmer, the chief Witness. But the Witnesses were not brought, only their Examinations were read: Upon this, the Kings Council pleaded against him, that to levy War was certainly Treason; that to gather Men with intention to kill Privy-Counsellors was also Treason; that to have Men about him to resist the Attachment was Felony; and to assault the Lords, or contrive their deaths, was Felony. Whether he made any defence in Law, or not, does not appear: For the material defence, is not mentioned in all the accounts I have seen of it; which was, that these Conspiracies, and gatherings of the Kings Subjects were only treasonable and felonious, after they had been required to disperse themselves, and had refused to give obedience. And in all this matter, that is never so much as alledged, no not in the Indictment it self, to have been done. It is plain it was not done: For if any such Proclamation, or Charge, had been sent him, it is probable he would either have obeyed it, or gone into London, or to the Country, and tryed what he could have done by force: but to have refused such a command, and so to have come within the guilt of Treason, and yet not to stir from his House, are not things consistent.

When the Peers withdrew, it seems the Proofs about his design of raising the North, or the City, or of the killing the Gendarmes, did not satisfie them. For all these had been without question treasonable. So they only held to that Point of conspiring to imprison the Duke of Northumberland. If he, with Twelve Men about him, had conspired to do that, and had continued together after Proclamation, it was certainly Felony. But that not being pretended, it seems there was no Proclamation made. The Duke of Suffolk was of opinion, that no contention among private Subjects should be on any account screwed up to be Treason. The Duke of Northumberland said, he would never consent that any practice against him, should be reputed Treason. After a great difference of Opinion, they all acquitted him of Treason. But the greater number found him guilty of Felony. When they returned him not guilty of Treason, all the People who were much concerned for his preſervation, ſhouted for joy, ſo loud, and ſo long, that they were heard at Charing-Croſs. But the joy laſted not long, when they heard that he was condemned of Felony, and Sentence was thereupon given that he ſhould die as a Felon. 1551.

The Duke had carried himſelf all the while of the Trial with great temper and patience; and though the Kings Council had, in their uſual way of Pleading, been very bitter againſt him; perhaps the rather, that thereby they might recommend themſelves to the Duke of Northumberland; yet he never took notice of theſe reflections, nor ſeemed much affected with them. When Sentence was given, he thanked the Lords for their favour, and asked pardon of the Duke of Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke, for his ill intentions againſt them; and made ſuit for his Life, and for his Wife, and Children. From thence he was carried back to the Tower. Whether this asking the Lords pardon, had in it a full Confeſſion of the Crime charged on him, or was only a complement to them, that they might not obſtruct his Pardon, is but a matter of conjecture. He confeſſed he had ſpoken of killing them, and this made it reaſonable enough for him to ask their Pardon; ſo that it does not imply a Confeſſion of the Crime. All People thought, that being acquitted of Treaſon, and there being no fellonious Action done by him, but only an intention of one, and that only of Impriſoning a Peer, proved; that one ſo nearly joyned to the King in Blood, would never be put to death on ſuch an occaſion. But to poſſeſs the King much againſt him, a Story was brought him, and put by him in his Journal; That at the Dukes coming to the Tower, he had confeſſed, that he had hired one Bartuile to kill the Lords; and that Bartuile himſelf acknowledged it; and that Hammond knew of it. But whether this was deviſed to alienate the King wholly from him, or whether it was true, I can give no aſſurance But though it was true, it was Felony in Bartuile, if he were the Kings Servant; but not in the Duke, who was a Peer. Yet no doubt this gave the King a very ill opinion of his Uncle, and ſo made him more eaſily conſent to his execution: ſince all ſuch Conſpiracies are things of that inhumane and barbarous cruelty, that it is ſcarce poſſible to puniſh them too ſeverely: But it is certain, that there was no Evidence at all of any deſign to kill the Duke of Northumberland, otherwiſe the Indictment had not been laid againſt him, only for deſigning to ſeize on, and impriſon him, as it was; the conſpiring to kill him not being ſo much as mentioned in the Indictment, but it was maliciouſly given out to poſſeſs the World, and chiefly the King againſt him.

See the Indictment. Cokes Entries, fol. 482.

The King alſo in his Letter to Barnaby Fitz-Patrick, who was like to be his favourite, and was then ſent over for his breeding into France, writ, that the Duke ſeemed to have acknowledged the Felony, and that after Sentence he had confeſſed it, though he had formerly vehemently ſworn the contrary. From whence it is plain, that the King was perſwaded of his being guilty. Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Tho. Arundel, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Miles Partridge, were next brought to their Trials. The firſt, and the laſt of theſe, were little pitied. For, as all great Men have People about them, who make uſe of their greatneſs only for their own ends, without regarding their Maſters Honour, or true Intereſt; ſo they were the Perſons upon whom the ill things which had been done by the Duke of Somerſet were chiefly caſt. But Sir Tho. Arundel was much pitied,

Some of his Friends alſo condemned.

1551. pitied, and had hard measure in his Trial, which began at seven a Clock in the Morning, and continued till Noon. Then the Jury went aside, and they did not agree on their Verdict, till next morning, when those who thought him not guilty, yet, for preserving their own Lives, were willing to yield to the fierceness of those who were resolved to have him found guilty. Sir Ralph Vane was the most lamented of them all. He had done great Services in the Wars, and was esteemed one of the bravest Gentlemen of the Nation. He pleaded for himself, that he had done his Country considerable Service during the Wars; though now in time of Peace, the Coward and the Couragious were equally esteemed. He scorned to make any submissions for Life. But this height of mind in him did certainly set forward his condemnation, and to add more infamy to him in the manner of his Death, he and Partridge were hanged, whereas the other two were beheaded.

The Seals are taken from the Lord Rich.

The Duke of Somerset was using means to have the King better informed, and disposed towards him; and engaged the Lord Chancellor to be his Friend: who thereupon sent him an Advertisement of somewhat designed against him by the Council, and being in hast, writ only on the back of his Letter, to the Duke; and bid one of his Servants carry it to the Tower, without giving him particular directions to the Duke of Somerset. But his Servant having known of the familiarities between his Master and the Duke of Norfolk, who was still in the Tower; and knowing none between him and the other Duke carried the Letter to the Duke of Norfolk. When the Lord Chancellor found the mistake at night, he knew the Duke of Norfolk, to make Northumberland his Friend, would certainly discover him; so he went in all hast to the King, and desired to be discharged of his Office, and thereby prevented the malice of his Enemies: and upon this he fell sick, either pretending he was ill, that it might raise the more pity for him, or perhaps the fright in which he was did really cast him into sickness. So the Seal was sent for, by the Marques of Winchester, the Duke of Northumberland, and the Lord Darcy, on the 21*st.* of December, and put into the Hands of the Bishop of Ely, who was made Keeper during pleasure: And when the Session of Parliament came on, he was made Lord Chancellor. But this was much censured: When the Reformation was first preached in England, Tindal, Barns, and Latimer, took an occasion, from the great Pomp and Luxury of Cardinal Wolsey, and the Secular Imployments of the other Bishops and Clergy-men, to represent them as a sort of Men that had wholly neglected the care of Souls, and those spiritual Studies and Exercises that disposed men to such Functions; and only carried the Names of Bishops and Church-men, to be a Colour to serve their Ambition and Covetousness. And this had raised great prejudices in the Minds of the People against those who were called their Pastors, when they saw them fill their Heads with cares, that were at least impertinent to their Callings if not inconsistent with the Duties that belonged to them. So now upon Goodrick's being made Lord Chancellor, that was a Reformed Bishop, it was said by their Adversaries, these Men only condemned Secular Imployments in the Hands of Church-men, because their Enemies had them, but changed their mind as soon as any of their own Party came to be advanced to them. But as Goodrick was raised by the Popish Interest in opposition to the Duke of Somerset, and to Cranmer, that was his firm Friend; ſo it appeared in the beginning of Queen Maries Reign, that he was ready to turn with every Tide: and that whether he joyned in the Reformation only in compliance to the time, or was perſwaded in his mind concerning it; yet he had not that ſenſe of it that became a Biſhop, and was one of theſe who reſolved to make as much advantage by it as he could, but would ſuffer nothing for it. So his practice in this matter is neither a Precedent to juſtifie the like in others, nor can it caſt a ſcandal on thoſe to whom he joyned himſelf. Chriſt being ſpoke to to divide an Inheritance between two Brethren, ſaid, Who made me a Judge, or a Divider? St. Paul, ſpeaking of Church-men, ſays, No Man that warreth intangleth himſelf with the Affairs of this Life: which was underſtood by St. Cyprian as a perpetual Rule againſt the Secular Imployments of the Clergy. There are three of the Apoſtolical Canons againſt it: and Cyprian reckoning upon the ſins of his time, that had provoked God to ſend a Perſecution on the Church, names this, that many Biſhops forſaking their Sees, undertook Secular Cares. In which he was ſo ſtrict, that he thought the being Tutor to Orphans was a diſtraction unſutable to their Character: ſo that one Prieſt leaving another Tutor to his Children, becauſe by the Roman Law, he to whom this was left was obliged to undergo it, The Prieſt's Name who made that Teſtament was appointed to be ſtruck out of the Liſt of thoſe Church-men who had died in the Faith, and were remembred in the daily Offices. Samoſatenus is repreſented as one of the firſt eminent Church-men that involved himſelf much in Secular Cares. Upon the Emperors turning Chriſtian, it was a natural effect of their Converſion for them to cheriſh the Biſhops much, and many of the Biſhops became ſo much in love with the Court and publick Imployments, that Canons were made againſt their going to Court, unleſs they were called, and the Canaliis or Road to the Court was kept by the Biſhop of Rome, ſo that none might go without his Warrant. Their medling in Secular Matters was alſo condemned in many Provincial Councils, but moſt copiouſly and amply by the General Council at Chalcedon. It is true, the Biſhops had their Courts for the Arbitration of Civil Differences: which were firſt begun upon St. Pauls Epiſtle to the Corinthians, againſt their going to Law before Unbelievers, and for ſubmitting their Sutes to ſome among themſelves. The Reaſons of this ceaſed when the Judges in the Civil Courts were become Chriſtians; yet theſe Epiſcopal Audiences were ſtill continued after Conſtantines time, and their Juriſdiction was ſometimes enlarged, and ſometimes abridged, as there was occaſion given. St. Auſtin, and many other Holy Biſhops, grew weary even of that, and found, that the hearing Cauſes, as it took up much of their time, ſo filled their Heads with thoughts of another nature than what properly belonged to them. 1551.

The Biſhops of Rome and Alexandria taking advantage from the greatneſs and Wealth of their Sees, began firſt to eſtabliſh a Secular Principality of the Church; and the Confuſions that fell out in Italy after the 5th. Century, gave the Biſhops of Rome great opportunities for it, which they improved to the utmoſt advantage. The Revolutions in Spain gave a Riſe to the Spaniſh Biſhops medling much in all Civil Matters. And when Charles the Great and his Son had given great Territories and large Juriſdictions to many Sees and Monaſteries, Biſhops and Abbots 1551. bots came after that not only to have a ſhare in all the publick Councils of moſt of the States of Europe, to which their Lands gave them a Right, but to be chiefly imployed in all Affairs and Offices of State. The Ignorance of theſe Ages made this in a manner neceſſary: and Church-Preferments were given as Rewards to Men who had ſerved in the State in Embaſſies, or in their Princes Courts of Juſtice. So that it was no wonder if Men advanced upon that merit continued in their former Method and courſe of Life. Thus the Biſhops became for the greateſt part only a ſort of Men who went in peculiar Habits, and upon ſome high Feſtivities performed a few Offices; but for the Paſtoral care, and all the Duties incumbent on them, they were univerſally neglected: and that ſerioufneſs, that abſtraction from the World, that application to Study and Religious Exerciſes, and chiefly the care of Souls, which became their Function, ſeemed inconſiſtent with that courſe of Life which Secular Cares brought on Men who purſued them. Nor was it eaſie to perſwade the World, that their Paſtors did very much aſpire to Heaven, when they were thruſting themſelves ſo indecently into the Courts of Princes, or ambitiouſly pretending to the Adminiſtration of Matters of State; and it was always obſerved, that Church-men who aſſumed to themſelves Imployments, and an Authority that was excentrick to their Callings, ſuffered ſo much in that Eſteem, and loſt ſo much of that Authority, which of right belonged to their Character and Office.

But to go on with the Series of Affairs. There was all poſſible care taken to divert and entertain the Kings Mind with pleaſing Sights, as will appear by his Journal, which it ſeems had the effect that was deſired, for he was not much concerned in his Unkles Preſervation.

1552. An Order was ſent for beheading the Duke of Somerſet on the 22d of January, on which day he was brought to the Place of Execution on Tower-hill. His whole deportment was very compoſed, and no way changed from what it had ordinarily been: he firſt kneeled down, and prayed; and then he ſpake to the People in theſe words.

The Duke of Somerſet's Speech at his Execution.

" Dearly beloved Friends, I am brought here to ſuffer death, albeit " that I never offended againſt the King neither by word nor deed; and " have been always as faithful and true to this Realm, as any Man hath " been. But, for ſo much as I am by Law condemned to die, I do ac" knowledge my ſelf, as well as others, to be ſubject thereto. Where" fore, to teſtifie my obedience which I owe unto the Laws, I am come
" hither to ſuffer death: whereunto I willingly offer my ſelf, with moſt
" hearty thanks to God, that hath given me this time of Repentance;
" who might through ſudden death have taken away my Life, that nei" ther I ſhould have acknowledged him, nor my ſelf. Moreover, there " is yet ſomewhat that I muſt put you in mind of, as touching Chriſtian
" Religion; which, ſo long as I was in Authority, I always diligently
" ſet forth, and furthered to my power; neither repent I me of my " doings, but rejoyce therein, ſith that now the State of Chriſtian Reli" gion cometh moſt near unto the Form and Order of the Primitive
" Church: which thing I eſteem as a great benefit given of God both
" to you and me; moſt heartily exhorting you all, that this which is " moſt purely ſet forth to you, you will with like thankfulneſs accept and " embrace, and ſet out the ſame in your living; which thing if you do " not, withoutdoubt greater miſchief and calamity will follow.

Anglia Protector, Avunculus, Capitc
Edwardi Regis truncatus 22 Jā: 1552

Printed for Richard Chiſwell at the Roſe and Crowne in St Pauls Church

When he had gone ſo far, there was an extraordinary noiſe heard, as if ſome Houſe had been blown up with Gun-powder; which frighted all the People, ſo that many run away, they knew not for what: and the Relator, who tarried ſtill, ſays, it brought into his remembrance the aſtoniſhment that the band was in that came to take our Saviour, who thereupon fell backwards to the ground. At the ſame time Sir Ant. Brown came riding towards the Scaffold, and they all hoped he had brought a Pardon; upon which there was a general ſhouting, Pardon, Pardon, God ſave the King; many throwing up their Caps; by which the Duke might well perceive how dear he was to the People. But as ſoon as theſe diſorders were over, he made a Sign to them with his Hand to compoſe themſelves, and then went on in his Speech thus. 1551.

"Dearly beloved Friends, there is no ſuch matter here in hand, as you "vainly hope or believe. It ſeemeth thus good unto Almighty God, "whoſe Ordinance it is meet and neceſſary that we all be obedient to. "Wherefore I pray you all to be quiet, and to be contented with my "Death; which I am moſt willing to ſuffer. And let us now joyn in "Prayer to the Lord for the preſervation of the Kings Majeſty, unto "whom hitherto I have always ſhewed my ſelf a moſt faithful and firm "Subject. I have always been moſt diligent about his Majeſty, in his Af-"fairs both at home and abroad; and no leſs diligent in ſeeking the com-"mon Commodity of the whole Realm; (upon this the People cried "out it was moſt true) unto whoſe Majeſty I wiſh continual health, "with all felicity, and all proſperous ſucceſs. Moreover, I do wiſh unto "all his Counſellors, the Grace and Favour of God, whereby they may "rule in all things uprightly with juſtice: unto whom I exhort you all "in the Lord to ſhew your ſelves obedient, as it is your bounden Duty, "under the pain of condemnation; and alſo moſt profitable for the pre-"ſervation and ſafeguard of the Kings Majeſty. Moreover, for as much "as heretofore I have had Affairs with divers Men, and hard it is to pleaſe "every Man, therefore if there have been any that have been offended "or injured by me, I moſt humbly require and ask him forgiveneſs; but "eſpecially Almighty God, whom throughout all my Life I have moſt "grievouſly offended: and all other whatſoever they be that have offen-"ded me, I do with my whole Heart forgive them. Then he deſired "them to be quiet, leſt their Tumults might trouble him; and ſaid, Al-"beit the Spirit be willing and ready, the Fleſh is frail and wavering; "and through your quietneſs I ſhall be much more quieter. Moreover, "I deſire you all to bear me witneſs, that I die here in the Faith of Jeſus "Chriſt, deſiring you to help me with your Prayers, that I may perſevere "conſtant in the ſame to my lives end.

Then Dr. Cox, who was with him on the Scaffold, put a Paper in his Hand, which was a Prayer he had prepared for him. He read it on his Knees, then he took leave of all about him, and undreſſed himſelf to be fitted for the Axe. In all which there appeared no change in him, only his Face was a little rudier than ordinary: he continued calling, Lord Jeſus ſave me, till the Executioner ſevered his Head from his Body. His Death.

Thus fell the Duke of Somerſet: a Perſon of great Vertues, eminent for Piety, humble, and affable in his greatneſs, ſincere and candid in all his Tranſactions. He was a better Captain, than a Counſellor: had been oft ſucceſsful in his undertakings, was always careful of the Poor and And Character.

1551 the Oppreſſed, and in a word, had as many Vertues, and as few faults, as moſt great Men, eſpecially when they were ſo unexpectedly advanced, have ever had. It was generally believed, that all this pretended Conſpiracy, upon which he was condemned, was only a forgery. For both Palmer, and Crane, the chief Witneſſes, were ſoon after diſcharged, as were alſo Bartuile, and Hamond, with all the reſt that had been made Priſoners on the pretence of this Plot. And the Duke of Northumberland continued after that in ſo cloſe a friendſhip with Palmer, that it was generally believed he had been corrupted to betray him. And indeed, the not bringing the Witneſſes into the Court, but only the Depoſitions, and the Parties ſitting Judges, gave great occaſion to condemn the Proceedings againſt him. For it was generally thought, that all was an Artifice of Palmers, who had put the Duke of Somerſet in fears of his Life, and ſo got him to gather Men about him for his own preſervation; and that he afterwards being taken with him, ſeemed through fear to acknowledge all that which he had before contrived. This was more confirmed by the death of the other four formerly mentioned, who were executed on the 26*th* of February, and did all proteſt they had never been guilty of any deſign, either againſt the King, or to kill the Lords. Vane added, That his Blood would make Northumberland's Pillow uneaſie to him. The People were generally much affected with this Execution; and many threw Handkerchiefs into the Duke of Somerſets Blood, to preſerve it in remembrance of him. One Lady, that met the Duke of Northumberland when he was led through the City in Queen Maries Reign, ſhaking one of theſe Bloody Handkerchiefs, ſaid, Behold the Blood of that worthy Man, that good Unkle of that excellent King, which was ſhed by thy malicious practice, doth now begin apparently to revenge itſelf on thee. Sure it is, that Northumberland, as having maliciouſly contrived this, was ever after hated by the People.

But on the other hand, great notice was taken that the Duke of Norfolk, (who, with his Son the Earl of Surrey, were believed to have fallen in all their miſery, by the Duke of Somerſets means,) did now out-live him, and ſaw him fall by a Conſpiracy of his own Servants, as himſelf and his Son had done. The Proceeding againſt his Brother was alſo remembred, for which many thought the Judgments of God had overtaken him. Others blamed him for being too apt to convert things Sacred to his own uſe, and becauſe a great part of his Eſtate was raiſed out of the Spoils of many Churches: and ſome late Writers have made an Inference from this, upon his not claiming the Benefit of Clergy, that he was thus left of God not to plead that Benefit, ſince he had ſo much invaded the Rights and Revenues of the Church. But in this they ſhewed their ignorance. For by the Statute, that Felony of which he was found guilty, was not to be purged by Clergy. Thoſe who pleaſed themſelves in comparing the events in their own times, with the Tranſactions of the former Ages, found out many things to make a parallel between the Duke of Somerſet, and Humphrey the good Duke of Gloceſter in Henry the 6*th*'s time; but I ſhall leave the Reader in that to his own obſervation.

Now was the Duke of Northumberland abſolute at Court, all Offices being filled with thoſe that were his Aſſociates. But here I ſtop to give a general view of Affairs beyond Sea this year, though I have a little tranſgreſſed greſſed the bounds of it, to give an account of the Duke of Somerſets Fall altogether. The Siege of Magdeburg went on in Germany. But it was coldly followed by Maurice, who had now other deſigns. He had agreed with the French King, who was both to give him aſſiſtance, and to make War on the Emperor, at the ſame time when he ſhould begin. Ferdinand was alſo not unwilling to ſee his Brothers greatneſs leſſened; for he was preſſing him, not without threatnings, to lay down his Dignity; as King of the Romans, and thought to have eſtabliſhed it on his Son. All the other Princes of Germany were alſo oppreſſed by him, ſo that they were diſpoſed to enter into any alliance for the ſhaking off of that Yoke. Maurice did alſo ſend over to try the inclinations of England; if they would joyn with him, and contribute 400000 Dollars towards the expence of a War, for the preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, and recovering the liberty of Germany. The Ambaſſadors were only ſent to try the Kings mind, but were not empow'red to conclude any thing. They were ſent back with a good Anſwer, That the King would moſt willingly joyn in alliance with them that were of the ſame Religion with himſelf; but he deſired, that the matter of Religion might be plainly ſet down, leſt under the pretence of that, War ſhould be made for other Quarrels. He deſired them alſo to communicate their deſigns with the other Princes, and then to ſend over others more fully empow'red. Maurice, ſeeing ſuch Aſſiſtances ready for him, reſolved, both to break the Emperors deſigns, and by leading on a new League againſt him, to make himſelf more acceptable to the Empire, and thereby to ſecure the Electoral Dignity in his Family. So after Magdeburg had endured a long Siege, he, giving a ſecret intimation to ſome Men in whom they confided, perſwaded them about the end of November to ſurrender to him; and then broke up his Army: but they fell into the Dominions of ſeveral of the Popiſh Princes, and put them under very heavy Contributions. This alarumed all the Empire, only the Emperor himſelf, by a fatal ſecurity, did not apprehend it, till it came ſo near him, that he was almoſt ruined before he dreamed of any danger. 1551.

This Year the Tranſactions of Trent were remarkable. The Pope had called the Council to meet there, and the firſt of May this year there was a Seſſion held. There was a War now broken out, between the Pope, and the King of France, on this occaſion. The Pope had a mind to have Parma in his own Hands, but that Prince, fearing that he would keep it, as the Emperor did Placentia, and ſo he ſhould be ruined between them, implored the Protection of France, and received a French Garriſon for his ſafety. Upon this, the Pope cited him to Rome declaring him a Traitor if he appeared not: and this engaged the Pope in a War with France. At firſt he ſent a threatning Meſſage to that King, that if he would not reſtore Parma to him, he would take France from him. Upon this the King of France proteſted againſt the Council of Trent, and threatned that he would call a National Council in France. The Council was adjourned to the 10*th* of September. In the mean while the Emperor preſſed the Germans to go to it. So Maurice, and the other Princes of the Ausburg Confeſſion, ordered their Divines to conſider of the matters which they would propoſe to the Council. The Electors of Mentz and Trier went to Trent. But the King of France Proceedings at Trent.

1551 ſent the Abbot of Belloſana thither, to make a Proteſtation, that by reaſon of the War that the Pope had raiſed, he could not ſend his Biſhops to the Council: and that therefore he would not obſerve their Decrees: (for they had declared in France, that abſent Churches were not bound to obey the Decrees of a Council: for which many Authorities were cited from the Primitive time.) But at Trent they proceeded for all this, and appointed the Articles about the Euchariſt to be firſt examined: and the Preſidents recommended to the Divines, to handle them according to Scripture, Tradition, and Ancient Authors, and to avoid unprofitable curioſities. The Italian Divines did not like this. For they ſaid, to argue ſo, was but an Act of the memory, and was an old and inſufficient way, and would give great advantage to the Lutherans, who were skilled in the Tongues; but the School-Learning was a myſtical and ſublime way, in which it was eaſier to ſet off or conceal matters as was expedient. But this was done to pleaſe the Germans: And, at the ſuite of the Emperor, the matter of Communicating in both kinds was poſtponed, till the German Divines could be heard. A ſafe Conduct was deſired, by the Germans, not only from the Emperor, but from the Council. For at Conſtance, John Huſs, and Jerome of Prague, were burnt, upon this pretence, that they had not the Councils ſafe conduct; and therefore when the Council of Baſil called for the Bohemians, they ſent them a ſafe Conduct, beſides that which the Emperor gave them. So the Princes deſired one in the ſame Form that was granted by thoſe of Baſil. One was granted by the Council, which in many things differed from that of Baſil; particularly in one Clauſe, that all things ſhould be determined according to the Scriptures, which was in that ſafe Conduct of Baſil, but was now left out. In October an Ambaſſador from the Elector of Brandenburg came to Trent, who was endeavouring to get his Son ſetled in the Arch-biſhoprick of Magdeburg, which made him more compliant. In his firſt Addreſs to the Council, he ſpake of the reſpect his Maſter had to the Fathers in it, without a word of ſubmitting to their Decrees. But in the Anſwer that was made in the Name of the Council, it was ſaid, they were glad he did ſubmit to them, and would obey their Decrees. This being afterwards complained of, it was ſaid, that they anſwered him according to what he ſhould have ſaid, and not according to what he had ſaid. But in the mean while, the Council publiſhed their Decrees about the Euchariſt; in the firſt part of which, they defined, that the way of the Preſence could hardly be expreſſed, and yet they called Tranſubſtantiation a fit term for it. But this might be well enough defended, ſince that was a thing as hard to be either expreſſed or underſtood, as any thing they could have thought on. They went on next to examine Confeſſion, and Penitence. And now, as the Divines handled the matter, they found the gathering Proofs out of Scripture grew endleſs and trifling; for there was not a place in Scripture where I confeſs was to be found, but they drew it in to prove Auricular Confeſſion. From that they went on to Extream Unction. But then came the Ambaſſadors of the Duke of Wittenberg, another Prince of the Auſburg Confeſſion, and ſhewed their Mandate to the Emperors Ambaſſadors; who deſired them to carry it to the Preſidents; but they refuſed to do that; ſince it was contrary to the Proteſtation, which the Princes of their Confeſſion had made againſt a Council in which the Pope ſhould preſide.

preſide. On the 25*th* of November they publiſhed the Decree of the neceſſity of Auricular Confeſſion, that ſo the Prieſt might thereby know how to proportion the Penance to the ſin. It was much cenſured, to ſee it defined that Chriſt had inſtituted Confeſſion to a Prieſt, and not ſhew'd where or how it was inſtituted. And the reaſon for it, about the proportioning the Penance, was laughed at, ſince it was known what ſlight Penances were univerſally injoyned to expiate the greateſt ſins. But the Ambaſſadors of Wittenberg moving that they might have a ſafe Conduct for their Divines to come and propoſe their Doctrine; The Legate anſwered, that they would not upon any terms enter into any Diſputation with them; but if their Divines had any ſcruple, in which they deſired ſatisfaction, with a humble and obedient mind, they ſhould be heard. And for a ſafe Conduct, he thought it was a diſtruſting the Council, to ask any other than what was already granted. Soon after this, there arrived Ambaſſadors from Strasburg, and from other five Cities, and thoſe ſent from the Duke of Saxe were on their Journey: ſo the Emperor ordered his Ambaſſadors to ſtudy to gain time till they came; and then an effectual courſe muſt be taken for compaſſing that about which he had laboured ſo long in vain to bring it to a happy concluſion. And thus this Year ended. 1551.

The Parliament was opened on the 23*d* of January, and ſate till the 15*th* of April. So I ſhall begin this Year with the account of the Proceedings in it. The firſt Act that was put into the Houſe of Lords, was for an Order to bring Men to Divine Service; which was agreed to on the 26*th*, and ſent down to the Commons, who kept it long before they ſent it back. On the 6*th* of April, when it was agreed to, the Earl of Darby, the Biſhops of Carliſle, and Norwich, and the Lords Sturton, and Windſor, diſſented. The Lords afterwards brought in another Bill, for authorizing a new Common-Prayer-Book, according to the Alterations which had been agreed on the former Year. This the Commons joyned to the former, and ſo put both in one Act. By it was firſt ſet forth, "That an Order of Divine Service being publiſhed, many did "wilfully abſtain from it, and refuſed to come to their Pariſh-Churches; "therefore all are required, after the Feaſt of All-hallows next, to come "every Sunday and Holy-day, to Common-Prayers, under pain of the "Cenſures of the Church. And the King, the Lords Temporal, and "the Commons, did in Gods Name require, all Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, "and other Ordinaries, to endeavour the due execution of that Act, as "they would anſwer before God for ſuch Evils and Plagues, with which "he might juſtly puniſh them, for neglecting that good and wholeſome "Law: and they were fully authorized to execute the Cenſures of the "Church on all that ſhould offend againſt this Law. To which is added, "That there had been divers doubts raiſed about the manner of the Miniſtration of the Service, rather by the curioſity of the Miniſters and Miſtakers, than of any other worthy Cauſe; and that for the better explanation "of that, and for the greater perfection of the Service, in ſome places, "where it was fit to make the Prayer and faſhion of Service more earneſt "and fit, to ſtir Chriſtian People to the true honouring of Almighty God; "therefore it had been by the Command of the King and Parliament per-"uſed, explained, and made more perfect. They alſo annexed to it the "Form 1552. A Seſſion of Parliament. An Act authorizing the new Common-Prayer-Book.

1552. "Form of making Bishops, Priests, and Deacons; and so appointed this "new Book of Service, to be every where received after the Feast of "All-Saints next, under the same Penalties that had been enacted three "years before, when the former Book was set out.

Which was much censured.

It was upon this Act said by the Papists, That the Reformation was like to change as oft as the Fashion did: since they seemed never to be at a Point in any thing, but new Models were thus continually framing. To which it was answered, That it was no wonder that the corruptions which they had been introducing for above a thousand years, were not all discovered or thrown out at once; but now the business was brought to a fuller perfection, and they were not like to see any more material Changes. Besides, any that would take the pains to compare the Offices that had been among the Papists, would clearly perceive, that in every Age there was such an encrease of additional Rites and Ceremonies, that though the old ones were still retained, yet it seemed there would be no end of new improvements and additions. Others wondered why the execution of this Law was put off so long as till the end of the Year. All the account I can give of this is, that it was expected that by that time the new Body of the Ecclesiastical Laws, which was now preparing, should be finished; and therefore, since this Act was to be executed by the Clergy; the day, in which it was to be in force, was so long delayed till that Reformation of their Laws were concluded.

An Act concerning Treasons.

On the 8th of February a Bill of Treasons was put in, and agreed to by all the Lords, except the Lord Wentworth. It was sent down to the Commons, where it was long disputed; and many sharp things were said of those who now bore the sway; that whereas they who governed in the beginning of this Reign had put in a Bill for lessening the number of such offences, now they saw the change of Councils, when several Laws were proposed. The Commons at last rejected the Bill, and then drew a new one, which was passed. By it they Enacted, "That if "any should call the King, or any of his Heirs named in the Statute of "the 35th of his Fathers Reign, Heretick, Schismatick, Tyrant, Infidel, "or Usurper of the Crown; for the first offence they should forfeit "their Goods and Chattels, and be imprisoned during pleasure; for the "second, should be in a Præmunire; for the third, should be attainted "of Treason: but any who should advisedly set that out in printing or "writing, was for the first offence to be held a Traitor. And that those who "should keep any of the Kings Castles, Artillery, or Ships, six days after they "were lawfully required to deliver them up, should be guilty of Treason. "that Men might be proceeded against for Treasons committed out of "the Kingdom, as well as in it. They added a Proviso, That none "should be Attainted of Treason on this Act, unless two Witnesses "should come, and to their face averr the Fact for which they were to be "tried; except such as without any violence should confess it: and that "none should be questioned for any thing said or written, but within "three Months after it was done.

This Proviso seems clearly to have been made with relation to the Proceeding against the Duke of Somerset, in which the Witnesses were not brought to averr the Evidence to his Face, and by that means he was deprived of all the benefit and advantage which he might have had by cross examining them. It is certain, that though some false Witnesses have have practiſed the Trade ſo much, that they ſeem to have laid off all ſhame, and have a brow that cannot be daunted; yet for the greateſt part a bright ſerenity and cheerfulneſs attends Innocence, and a lowring dejection betrays the Guilty, when the Innocent and they are confronted together. 1552.

On the 3*d* of March a Bill was brought in to the Lords for Holy-days and Faſting days; and ſent down to the Commons on the 15*th* of March, by whom it was paſſed, and had the Royal Aſſent. In the Preamble it is ſet forth, "That Men are not at all times ſo ſet on the performance of "Religious Duties as they ought to be; which made it neceſſary that there "ſhould be ſet times, in which labour was to eeaſe, that Men might on "theſe days wholly ſerve God: which days were not to be accounted "holy of their own nature, but were ſo called, becauſe of the Holy "Duties then to be ſet about; ſo that the Sanctification of them (was "not any Magical Vertue in that time, but) conſiſted in the dedicating "them to Gods Service: that no day was dedicated to any Saint; but "only to God, in remembrance of ſuch Saints: that the Scripture had "not determined the number of Holy-days, but that theſe were left to "the liberty of the Church. Therefore they Enact, That all Sundays, "with the days marked in the Calendar and Liturgy, ſhould be kept as "Holy-days: and the Biſhops were to proceed by the Cenſures of the "Church againſt the diſobedient. A Proviſo was added for the obſervation of St. George's Feaſt by the Knights of the Garter; and another, That Labourers or Fiſher-men might, if need ſo required, work on thoſe days either in or out of Harveſt. The Eves before Holy-days were to be kept as Faſts; and in Lent, and on Fridays and Saturdays, abſtinence from Fleſh was Enacted: but if a Holy-day fell to be on a Munday, the Eve for it was to be kept on Saturday, ſince Sunday was never to be a Faſting-day. But it was generally obſerved, that in this and all ſuch Acts, the People were ready enough to lay hold on any relaxation made by it, but did very ſlightly obſerve the ſtricter parts of it: ſo that the liberty left to Tradeſ-men to work in caſes of neceſſity, was carried further than it was intended, to a too publick profanation of the time ſo ſanctified; and the other parts of it, directing the People to a conſcientious obſerving of ſuch times, was little minded.

An Act about Faſts and Holy-days.

On the 5*th*. of March, a Bill concerning the relief of the Poor was put into the Houſe of Lords: the Form of paſſing it has given occaſion to ſome to take notice, that though it is a Bill for taxing the Subjects; yet it had its firſt birth in the Lords Houſe, and was agreed to by the Commons. By it the Church-wardens were empow'red to gather charitable Collections for the Poor; and if any did refuſe to contribute, or did diſſwade others from it, the Biſhop of the Dioceſs was to proceed againſt them. On the 9*th*. of March the Biſhops put in a Bill for the ſecurity of the Clergy from ſome ambiguous words that were in the ſubmiſſion which the Convocation had made to King Henry in the 21*ſt* year of his Reign: by which they were under a Præmunire, if they did any things in their Courts contrary to the Kings Prerogative; which was thought hard, ſince ſome through ignorance might tranſgreſs. Therefore it was deſired, that no Prelate ſhould be brought under a Præmunire, unleſs they had proceeded in any thing after they were prohibited by the Kings Writ. To this the Lords conſented, but it was let fall by the Commous.

There

1552. An Act for the Marriage of the Clergy.

There was another Act brought in for the Marriage of the Clergy which was agreed to by the Lords; the Earls of Shrewsbury, Darby, Rutland, and Bath, and the Lords Abergaveny, Stourton, Mounteagle, Sandys, Windsor, and Wharton, protesting against it. The Commons also passed it, and it was assented to by the King. By it was set forth, "That many took "occasion from words in the Act formerly made about this matter, to "say, that it was only permitted, as Usury and other unlawful things "were, for the avoiding greater evils; who thereupon spake slanderously of such Marriages, and accounted the Children begotten in "them to be Bastards; to the high dishonour of the King, and Parliament, and the Learned Clergy of the Realm, who had determined "that the Laws against Priests Marriages were most unlawful by the "Law of God; to which they had not only given their Assent in the "Convocation, but Signed it with all their Hands. These slanders did "also occasion, that the Word of God was not heard with due reverence: whereupon it was Enacted, That such Marriages, made according to the Rules prescribed in the Book of Service, should be esteemed good and valid, and that the Children begot in them should be inheritable according to Law.

The Marques of Northampton did also put in a Bill for confirming his Marriage, which was passed: only the Earl of Darby, the Bishops of Carlisle, and Norwich, and the Lord Stourton, dissented. By it, the Marriage is declared lawful, as by the Law of God indeed it was; any Decretal, Canon, Ecclesiastical Law, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. This occasioned another Act, That no Man might put away his Wife, and marry another, unless he were formerly divorced; to which the Bishop of Norwich dissented; because he was of opinion, that a Divorce did not break the Marriage-Bond. But this Bill fell in the House of Commons, being thought not necessary, for the Laws were already severe enough against such double Marriages.

An Act against Usury.

By another Act, the Bishoprick of Westminster was quite suppressed and re-united to the See of London: but the Collegiate Church, with its exempted Jurisdiction, was still continued. Another Bill was put in against Usury; which was sent from the Lords to the Commons, and passed by both, and assented to. By it, an Act passed in Parliament in the 37*th* year of the late Kings Reign, "That none might take above "per Cent. for Money lent, was repealed; which, they say, was not intended for the allowing of Usury, but for preventing further inconveniences: and since Usury was by the Word of God forbidden, and set out in "divers places of Scripture as a most odious and detestable vice; which "yet many continued to practice, for the filthy gain they made by it; "therefore from the first of May all Usury or gain for Money lent, was to "cease: and whosoever continued to practice to the contrary, were to suffer imprisonment, and to be fined at the Kings pleasure.

This Act has been since repealed, and the gain for Money lent has been several times brought to several regulations. It was much questioned, whether these Prohibitions of Usury by Moses were not judicial Laws, which did only bind the Nation of the Jews; whose Land being equally divided among the Families by Lot, the making gain by lending Money was forbid to them of that Nation: yet it did not seem to be a thing of its nature sinful, since they might take encrease of a Stranger. The not lending lending Money on uſe was more convenient for that Nation; which abounding in People, and being ſhut up in a narrow Country, they were neceſſarily to apply themſelves to all the ways of Induſtry for their ſubſiſtence; ſo that every one was, by that Law of not lending upon uſe, forced to employ his Money in the way of Trade or Manufacture, for which they were ſure to have vent, ſince they lay near Tyre and Sidon, that were then the chief Places of Traffick and Navigation of the World: and without ſuch Induſtry the Soil of Judea could not poſſibly have fed ſuch vaſt numbers as lived on it: So that it ſeemed clear that this Law in the Old Teſtament properly belonged to that policy. Yet it came to be looked on by many Chriſtians as a Law of perpetual obligation. It came alſo to be made a part of the Canon Law; and Abſolution could not be given to the breakers of it, without a ſpecial faculty from Rome. But for avoiding the ſeverity of the Law, the invention of Mortgages was fallen on; which at firſt, were only purchaſes made, and let back to the owner, for ſuch Rent as the uſe of the Money came to: ſo that the uſe was taken as the Rent of the Land thus bought. And thoſe who had no Land to ſell thus, fell upon another way: The Borrower bought their Goods, to be paid within a Year, (for inſtance an hundred and ten Pound) and ſold them back, for a Sum to be preſently laid down as they ſhould agree, (it may be an hundred Pound;) by this means the one had a hundred Pound in Hand, and the other was to have ten Pound or more at a years end. But this being in the way of Sale, was not called Uſury. This Law was look'd on as impoſſible to be obſerved in a Country, like England: and it could not eaſily appear where the immorality lay, of lending Money upon moderate gain, ſuch as held proportion to the value of Land; provided that the perpetual Rule of Chriſtian Equity and Charity were obſerved, which is, not to exact above the proportion duly limited by the Law, and to be merciful in not exacting ſeverally of Perſons who by inevitable accidents have been diſabled from making payment. This digreſſion I thought the more neceſſary, becauſe of the ſcruples that many good and ſtrict Perſons have ſtill in that matter. 1552.

Another Act paſſed both Houſes, againſt all Simoniacal Pactions, the reſervation of Penſions out of Benefices, and the granting Advowſons while the Incumbent was yet alive. It was agreed to by the Lords, the Earls of Derby, Rutland, and Suſſex, the Viſcount Hereford, and the Lords Mounteagle, Sands, Wharton, and Evers, diſſenting. But upon what reaſon I do not know, the Bill was not aſſented to by the King, who being then ſick, there was a Collection made of the Titles of the Bills which were to have the Royal Aſſent, and thoſe the King Signed, and gave Commiſſion to ſome Lords to paſs them in his Name. Theſe abuſes have been oft complained of, but there have been ſtill new contrivances found out, to elude all Laws againſt Simony: either bargains being made by the Friends of the Parties concerned without their expreſs knowledge; or Bonds of Reſignation given, by which Incumbents lie at the mercy of their Patrons, and in theſe, the faultineſs of ſome Clergy-men, is made the coulour of impoſing ſuch hard terms upon others, and of robbing the Church oftentimes by that means. A Bill againſt Simony.

There was a private Bill put in, about the Duke of Somersets Estate, which had been by Act of Parliament entailed on his Son in the 23d Year of the last Kings Reign. On the third of March it was sent to the House of Commons, Signed by the King, it was for the Repeal of that Act. Whether the King was so alienated from his Unkle, that this extraordinary thing was done by him for the utter ruine of his Family, or not, I cannot determine: but I rather incline to think it was done in hatred to the Dutchess of Somerset and her Issue. For the Estate was entailed on them by that Act of Parliament, in prejudice of the Issue of the former Marriage, of whom are descended the Seimours of Devonshire; who were disinherited and excluded from the Duke of Somersets Honours by his Patents, and from his Estate by Act of Parliament; partly upon some jealousies he had of his former Wife, but chiefly by the power his second Wife had over him. This Bill of Repeal was much opposed in the House, though sent to them in so unusual a way, by the King himself. And though there was on the 8*th.* of March a Message sent from the Lords, that they should make haste towards an end of the Parliament, yet still they stuck long upon it; looking on the breaking of Entails that were made by Act of Parliament, as a thing of such consequence that it dissolved the greatest security that the Law of England gives for property. It was long argued by the Commons, and was fifteen several days brought in. At last a new Bill was devised, and that was much altered too: it was not quite ended till the day before the Parliament was dissolved. But near the end of the Session, a Proviso was sent from the Lords, to be added to the Bill, confirming the Attainder of the Duke and his Complices. It seems his Enemies would not try this at first, till they had by other things measured their strength in that House; and finding their interest grew there, they adventured on it; but they mistook their measures, for the Commons would not agree to it. In conclusion, the Bill of Repeal was agreed to. But whereas there had been some Writings for a Marriage between the Earl of Oxfords Daughter and the Duke of Somersets Son, and a Bill was put in for voiding these; upon a division of the House the 28*th.* of March there were sixty eight that agreed, and sixty nine that rejected it, so this Bill was cast out. By this we see what a thin House of Commons there was at that time, the whole being but 137 Members. But this was a natural effect of a long Parliament: many of those who were at first chosen, being infirm; and others not willing to put themselves to the charge and trouble of such constant and long attendance. It is also from hence clear, how great an interest the Duke of Somerset had in the affections of the Parliament.

The Commons refuse to attaint the Bishop of Duresme by Bill.

Another Bill gave a more evident discovery how hateful the Duke of Northumberland was to them. The Bishop of Duresme was, upon some complaint brought against him of misprision of Treason, put into the Tower about the end of December last year. What the Particulars were I do not find; but it was visible that the secret reason was, that he being Attainted, the Duke of Northumberland intended to have had the Dignities and Jurisdiction of that Principality conferred on himself: so that he should have been made Count Palatine of Duresme. Tonstall had in all Points given obedience to every Law, and to all the Injunctions that had been made: but had always in Parliament protested against the changes in Religion; which he thought he might with a good Conſcience ſubmit to and obey; though he could not conſent to them. Only in the matter of the Corporal Preſence, he was ſtill of the old Perſwaſion, and writ about it. But the Latine Stile of his Book is much better than the Divinity and Reaſonings in it. So what he would have done, if he had been required to ſubſcribe the Articles that were now agreed on, did not appear, for he was all this while Priſoner. There was a conſtant good correſpondence between Cranmer and him: Though in many things they differed in opinion; yet Tonſtall was both a Man of candour, and of great moderation, which agreed ſo well with Cranmers temper, that no wonder they lived always in good terms. So when the Bill for Attainting him as guilty of Miſpriſion of Treaſon was paſſed in the Houſe of Lords, on the 31*ſt.* of March, being put in on the 28*th.* Cranmer ſpeak ſo freely againſt it, that the Duke of Northumberland and he were never after that in friendſhip together. What his Arguments were I could not recover; but when he could do no more, he proteſted againſt it, being ſeconded only by the Lord Stourton. How it came to paſs that the other Popiſh Lords and Biſhops that proteſted againſt the other Acts of this Parliament, did not joyn in this, I cannot imagine: unleſs it was, that they were the leſs concerned for Tonſtall, becauſe Cranmer had appeared to be ſo much his friend, or were awed by their fear of offending the Duke of Northumberland. But when the Bill was carried down to the Commons, with the Evidences againſt him, which were ſome Depoſitions that had been taken, and brought to the Lords; they who were reſolved to condemn that practice for the future, would not proceed upon it now. So on the fifth of April they ordered the Privy-Counſellors of their Houſe, to move the Lords, that his Accuſers and he might be heard face to face: and that not being done, the went no further in the Bill. 1552.

By theſe Indications the Duke of Northumberland ſaw how little kindneſs the Houſe of Commons had for him. The Parliament had now ſate almoſt five years, and being called by the Duke of Somerſet, his Friends had been generally choſe to be of it. So that it was no wonder, if upon his Fall they were not eaſie to thoſe who had deſtroyed him: nor was there any motion made for their giving the King a Supply. Therefore the Duke of Northumberland thought it neceſſary for his Intereſt to call a new Parliament. And accordingly on the 15*th.* of April the Parliament was diſſolved; and it was reſolved to ſpend this Summer in making Friends all over England, and to have a new Parliament in the opening of the next Year. The Parliament is Diſſolved.

The Convocation at this time agreed to the Articles of Religion that were prepared the laſt Year: which, though they have been often printed, yet ſince they are but ſhort, and of ſo great conſequence to this Hiſtory, I have put them into the Collection, as was formerly told.

Thus the Reformation of Doctrine and Worſhip were brought to their perfection; and were not after this in a tittle mended or altered in this Reign, nor much afterwards; only ſome of the Articles were put in more general words under Queen Elizabeth.

Another part of the Reformation was yet unfiniſhed, and it was the chief work of this year: that was, the giving Rules to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, and for all things relating to the Government of the Church, A Reformation of Eccleſiaſtical Courts conſidered.

1552. and the exercise of the several Functions in it. In the former Volume it was told, that an Act had passed for this effect; yet it had not taken effect, but a Commission was made upon it, and these appointed by King Henry had met and consulted about it, and had made some progress in it, as appears by an Original Letter of Cranmers to that King in the Year 1545. in which he speaks of it as a thing then almost forgotten, and quite laid aside; for from the time of the six Articles till then, the design of the Reformation had been going backward: At that time the King began to re-assume the thoughts of it, and was resolved to remove some Ceremonies, such as the creeping to the Cross, the ringing of Bells on St. Andrews Eve, with other superstitious Practices; for which Cranmer sent him the draught of a Letter to be written in the Kings Name, to the two Arch-bishops, and to be by them communicated to the rest of the Clergy. In the Postscript of his Letter he complains much of the sacrilegious waste of the Cathedral Church of Canterbury, where the Dean and Prebendaries had been made to alienate many of their Mannours upon Letters obtained by Courtiers from the King, as if the Lands had been desired for the Kings use: upon which they had surrendred those Lands, which were thereupon disposed of to the Courtiers that had an Eye upon them. This Letter should have come in in the former Volume, but I had not seen it then, so I took hold on this Occasion to direct the Reader to it in the Collection.

Collection Number 61.

It was also formerly told, that an Act had passed in this Reign, to empower thirty two Persons, who should be named by the King, to make a Reformation of the Ecclesiastical Laws, which was to be finished within three years. But the Revolutions of Affairs, and the other more pressing things that were still uncompleated, had kept them hitherto from setting to that work. On the first of November last year, a Commission was given to eight Persons to prepare the matter for the review of the two and thirty, that so it might be more easily compiled, being in a few hands, than could well be done, if so many had been to set about it. These eight were, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely, Dr. Cox, and Peter Martyr, two Divines, Dr. May, and Dr. Taylor, two Doctors of the Law, and John Lucas, and Richard Goodrick, two Common Lawyers. But on the 14*th*. of November the Commission was renewed, and the Bishop of London was named in the room of the Bishop of Ely; one Traheron in the room of May; and Gosnald in Goodrick's room. These, it seems, desiring more time than one year to finish it in, for two of the years were now lapsed, in the last Session of the Parliament they had three years more time offered them. But it seems the Work was believed to be in such a forwardness, that this continuation was not judged necessary, for the Royal Assent was not given to that Act. After the Parliament was ended, they made haste with it. But I find it said in the Preface to the Book, as it was printed in Queen Elizabeths Reign, that Cranmer did the whole Work almost himself: which will justifie the Character some give of him, that he was the greatest Canonist then in England. Dr. Haddon, that was University Orator in Cambridge, and Sir Jo. Cheek, were employed to put it in Latin. And they did so imitate the Stile of the Roman Laws, that any who reads the Book, will fancy himself to be reading a Work of the purer Ages of that State, when their Language was not yet corrupted with

theſe barbarous terms which the mixture of other Nations brought in, and made it no where more nauſeouſly rude than in the Canon Law. 1552.

The Work was digeſted and caſt into fifty one Titles: to bring it near the Number of the Books of the Pandects, into which Juſtinian had digeſted the Roman Law. It was prepared by February this year, and a Commiſſion was granted to thirty two Perſons, of whom the former eight were a part: conſiſting of eight Biſhops, eight Divines, among whom John a Laſco was one, eight Civilians, and eight Common Lawyers. They were to reviſe, correct, and perfect the Work, and ſo to preſent it to the King. They divided themſelves into four Claſſes, eight to a Claſſis; and every one of theſe were to prepare their Corrections, and ſo to communicate them to the reſt. And thus was the work carried on, and finiſhed; but before it received the Royal Confirmation, the King died, and this fell with him: nor do I find it was ever ſince that time taken up, or proſecuted with the care that a thing of ſuch conſequence deſerved: and therefore I ſhall not think it improper for me, having before ſhewed what was done, in the next place to give an account of what was then intended to be done; and is now very fit to be well conſidered.

The firſt Title was of the Trinity, and the Catholick Faith; in which thoſe who denied the Chriſtian Religion were to ſuffer death, and the loſs of their Goods. The Books of Scripture were numbred, theſe called Apocryphal being left out of the Canon; which, though they were read in the Church, it was only for the edification of the People, but not for the proof of the Doctrine. The power of the Church was ſubjected to the Scriptures: The four General Councils were received; but all Councils were to be examined by the Scripture; as were alſo the Writings of the Fathers, who were to be much reverenced, but according to what themſelves have written, they were only to be ſubmitted to when they agreed with the Scriptures. The Chief Heads of it.

The ſecond Title contains an enumeration of many Hereſies, viz. againſt the Trinity, Jeſus Chriſt, the Scriptures, about Original ſin, Juſtification, the Maſs, Purgatory; and cenſured thoſe who denied Magiſtracy to be lawful, or aſſerted the Community of Goods, or Wives; or who denied the Paſtoral Office, and thought any might aſſume it at pleaſure; or who thought the Sacraments naked Signs, who denied the Baptiſm of Infants, or thought none could poſſibly be ſaved that were not Baptized; or who aſſerted Tranſubſtantiation, or denied the lawfulneſs of Marriage, particularly in the Clergy; or who aſſerted the Popes Power; or ſuch as excuſed their ill Lives by the pretence of Predeſtination, as many wicked Men did: from which and other Hereſies all are diſſwaded, and earneſtly exhorted to endeavour the extirpation of them.

The third was about the Judgments of Hereſie before the Biſhop of the Dioceſs, even in exempted Places. They were to proceed by Witneſſes; but the Party, upon fame, might be required to purge himſelf: if he repented, he was to make publick profeſſion of it in thoſe places where he had ſpread it; and to renounce his Hereſie, ſwearing never to return to it any more: but obſtinate Hereticks were to be declared infamous, incapable of publick Truſt, or to be Witneſſes in any Court, or to have power to make a Teſtament, and were not to have the benefit

1552. of the Law: Clergy-men falling into Hereſie were not to return to their Benefices, unleſs the Circumſtances were ſuch that they required it; and thus all Capital Proceedings for Hereſie were laid down.

The fourth was about Blaſphemy, flowing from hatred or rage against God, which was to be puniſhed as obſtinate Hereſie was.

The fifth was about the Sacraments of Baptiſm, and the Lords Supper. To which is added, that Impoſition of Hands is to be retained in the Ordination of Paſtors; that Marriages are to be ſolemnly made: that thoſe who renew their Baptiſmal Vow, be confirmed by the Biſhop: and that the Sick ſhould be viſited by their Paſtors.

The ſixth was about Idolatry, Magick, Witchcraft, or conſulting with Conjurers; who were to be arbitrarily puniſhed, if they ſubmitted; otherwiſe, to be excommunicated.

The ſeventh was about Preachers; whom the Biſhops were to examine carefully, before they licenſed them; and were once a year to gather together all thoſe who were licenſed in their Dioceſſes, to know of them the true ſtate of their Flock; what Vices abounded, and what Remedies were moſt proper. Thoſe who refuſed to hear Sermons, or did make diſturbance in them, where to be ſeparated from the Communion. It ſeems it was deſigned, that there ſhould be in every Dioceſs, ſome who ſhould go round a Precinct, and Preach like Evangeliſts, as ſome then called them.

The eighth was about Marriage; which was to be after asking Banns three Sundays, or Holy-days. Thoſe who were married in any other Form, than that in the Book of Service, were not to be eſteemed lawfully married: thoſe who corrupted Virgins, were to be excommunicated if they did not marry them; or if that could not be done, they were to give them the third part of their Goods, beſides other arbitrary puniſhments. Marriages made without the conſent of Parents or Guardians, were declared null. Then follow the things that may void Marriages; they are left free to all: Poligamy is forbid, Marriages made by force are declared void, Mothers are required to ſuckle their Children.

The ninth is about the Degrees of Marriage. All theſe in the Levitical Law, or thoſe that are reciprocal to them, are forbidden: but Spiritual Kindred was not to hinder Marriage, ſince there was nothing in Scripture about it, nor was there any good reaſon for it.

The tenth was about Adultery. A Clergy-man guilty of it was to forfeit all his Goods and Eſtate to his Wife, and Children; or if he had none, to the Poor, or ſome pious uſe; and to loſe his Benefice, and be either baniſhed, or impriſoned during Life. A Lay-man was to refund his Wives Portion, and to give her the half of his Goods, and be impriſoned, or baniſhed, during Life. Wives that were guilty, were to be in like manner puniſhed. But the Innocent Party might marry again: yet ſuch were rather exhorted, if they ſaw hope of amendment, to be reconciled to the offending Party. No Marriage was to be diſſolved without a Sentence of Divorce. Deſertion, long Abſence, Capital Enmities where either Party was in hazard of their Life, or the conſtant perverſeneſs or fierceneſs of a Husband againſt his Wife, might induce Divorce: but little Quarrels might not do it; nor a perpetual Diſcord Relief in ſuch a Miſery being one of the Ends of Marriage. But all ſeparation from Bed and Board, except during a Trial, was to be taken away. 1552.

Reſ

The 11*th.* was about Admiſſion to Eccleſiaſtical Benefices. Patrons were to conſider, the choice of the Perſon was truſted to them, but was not to be abuſed to any ſacrilegious or baſe ends: if they did otherwiſe, they were to loſe their right for that time. Benefices were not to be given or promiſed, before they were void; nor let lie deſtitute above ſix Months, otherwiſe they were to devolve to the Biſhop. Clergy-men before their Ordination were to be examined by the Arch-deacons, with ſuch other Triers as the Biſhop ſhould appoint to be aſſiſtant to them: and the Biſhop himſelf was to try them, ſince this was one of the chief things, upon which the happineſs of the Church depended. The Candidate was to give an Oath to anſwer ſincerely, upon which he was to be examined about his Doctrine, chiefly of the whole Points of the Catechiſm, if he underſtood them aright: and what knowledge he had of the Scriptures: they were to ſearch him well whether he held Heretical Opinions: None was to be admitted to more Cures than one; and all Priviledges for Pluralities were for ever to ceaſe: nor was any to be abſent from his Cure, except for a time, and a juſt cauſe, of which he was to ſatisfie his Ordinary. The Biſhops were to take great care to allow no abſence longer than was neceſſary: every one was to enter upon his Cure within two Months after he was Inſtituted by the Biſhop. Prebendaries who had no particular Cure, were to preach in the Churches adjacent to them. Baſtards might not be admitted to Orders, unleſs they had eminent Qualities. But the Baſtards of Patrons were upon no account to be received, if preſented by them. Other bodily defects, unleſs ſuch as did much diſable them, or made them very contemptible, were not to be a barr to any. Beſide the Sponſions in the Office of Ordination, they were to ſwear that they had made no agreement to obtain the Benefice to which they were preſented, and that if they come to know of any made by others on their account, they ſhould ſignifie it to the Biſhop; and that they ſhould not do any thing to the prejudice of their Church.

The 12*th.* and 13*th.* were about the renouncing or changing of Benefices.

The 14*th.* was about purgation upon common fame, or when one was accuſed for any crime, which was proved incompleatly, and only by preſumptions. The Eccleſiaſtical Courts might not re-examine any thing that was proved in any Civil Court, but upon a high ſcandal a Biſhop might require a Man to purge himſelf, otherwiſe to ſeparate him from Holy things. The Form of a Purgation was, to ſwear himſelf innocent; and he was alſo to have four Compurgators of his own Rank, who were to ſwear, that they believed he ſwore true: upon which the Judge was to reſtore him to his Fame. Any that were under ſuſpicion of a Crime, might by the Judge be required to avoid all the occaſions from which the ſuſpition had riſen: But all ſuperſtitious Purgations were to be rejected.

The 15*th*, 16*th*, 17*th*, and 18*th*, were about Dilapidations, the Letting of the Goods of the Church, the confirming the former Rules of Election in Cathedrals or Colledges, and the Collation of Benefices.

1552. fices. And there was to be a Purgation of Simony, as there ſhould be occaſion for it.

The 19*th.* was about Divine Offices. In the Morning on Holy-days the Common-Prayer was to be uſed, with the Communion-Service joyned to it. In Cathedrals, there was to be Communion every Sunday and Holy-day; where the Biſhop, the Dean, and the Prebendaries, and all maintained by that Church, were to be preſent. There was no Sermon to be in Cathedrals in the Morning, leſt that might draw any from the Pariſh Churches; but only in the Afternoons. In the Anthems, all Figured Muſick, by which the Hearers could not underſtand what they ſung, was to be taken away. In Pariſh Churches, there were only to be Sermons in the Moaning; but none in the Afternoon, except in great Pariſhes. All who were to receive the Sacrament, were to come the day before, and inform the Miniſter of it; who was to examine their Conſciences, and their Belief. On Holy-days in the Afternoon, the Catechiſm was to be explained for an hour. After the Evening-Prayers, the Poor were to be looked to; and ſuch as had given open ſcandal were to be examined, and publick Penitence was to be enjoyned them: and the Miniſter, with ſome of the Ancients of the Pariſh, were to commune together about the ſtate of the People in it: that if any carried themſelves indecently, they might be firſt charitably admoniſhed; and, if that did not prevail, ſubjected to ſeverer Cenſures: but none were to be excommunicated, without the Biſhop were firſt informed, and had conſented to it. Divine Offices were not to be performed in Chappels, or private Houſes, leſt the Churches ſhould under that pretence be neglected, and Errors more eaſily diſſeminated; excepting only the Houſes of Peers and Perſons of great Quality, who had numerous Families; but in theſe, all things were to be done according to the Book of Common-Prayer.

The 20*th.* was about thoſe that bore Office in the Church; Sextons, Church-wardens, Deacons, Prieſts, and Rural Deans. This laſt was to be a Yearly Office: he that was named to it by the Biſhop, being to watch over the manners of the Clergy and People in his Precinct, was to ſignifie the Biſhops pleaſure to them, and to give the Biſhop an account of his Precinct every ſixth Month. The Arch-deacons were to be general Viſitors over the Rural Deans. In every Cathedral, one of the Prebendaries, or one procured by them, was thrice a week to expound ſome part of the Scriptures. The Biſhops were to be over all, and to remember that their Authority was given to them for that end, that men might be brought to Chriſt, and that ſuch as had gone aſtray might be reſtored by Repentance. To the Biſhop all were to give obedience according to the Word of God. The Biſhop was to preach often in his Church; was to Ordain none for Rewards, or raſhly; was to provide good Paſtors, and to deprive bad ones: he was to viſit his Dioceſs every third year, or oftener as he ſaw cauſe; but then he was to do it at his own charge: he was to have yearly Synods, and to confirm ſuch as were well inſtructed. His Family was to conſiſt of Clergy-men, whom he ſhould bring up to the Service of the Church; (ſo was St. Auſtins, and other Ancient Biſhops Families conſtituted.) This being a great means to ſupply the great want of good and faithful Miniſters. Their Wives and Children were alſo to avoid all levity or vain dreſſing. They were never never to be abſent from their Dioceſſes, but upon a publick and urgent cauſe: and when they grew ſick or infirm, they were to have Coadjutors. If they became ſcandalous or heretical, they were to be deprived by the Kings Authority. The Archbiſhops were to exerciſe the Epiſcopal Function in their Dioceſs; and were once to viſit their whole Province, and to overſee the Biſhops, to admoniſh them for what was amiſs, and to receive and judge Appeals, to call Provincial Synods upon any great occaſion, having obtained Warrant from the King for it. Every Biſhop was to have a Synod of his Clergy ſome time in Lent, ſo that they might all return home before Palm-Sunday. They were to begin with the Litany, a Sermon, and a Communion; then all were to withdraw into ſome private place, where they were to give the Biſhop an account of the ſtate of the Dioceſs, and to conſult of what required advice; every Prieſt was to deliver his opinion, and the Biſhop was to deliver his Sentence, and to bring mattters to as ſpeedy a Concluſion as might be; and all were to ſubmit to him, or to appeal to the Archbiſhop. 1552.

The 21*ſt*, 22*d*, 23*d*, 24*th*, 25*th*, 26*th*, 27*th*, 28*th*, and 29*th* Titles are about Church-wardens, Univerſities, Tithes, Viſitations, Teſtaments, Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, Suſpenſion, Sequeſtration, Deprivation.

The 30*th*. is about Excommunication, of which, as being the chief Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure, I ſhall ſet down their Scheme the more fully.

Excommunication they reckon an Authority given of God to the Church, for removing ſcandalous or corrupt Perſons, from the uſe of the Sacraments, or fellowſhip of Chriſtians, till they give clear ſigns of their repentance, and ſubmit to ſuch Spiritual puniſhments, by which the Fleſh may be ſubdued, and the Spirit ſaved. This was truſted to Churchmen, but chiefly, to Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Archdeacons, Deans, and any other appointed for it by the Church. None ought to be excommunicated but for their obſtinacy in great faults; but it was never to be gone about raſhly; and therefore the Judge who was to give it, was to have a Juſtice of Peace with him, and the Miniſter of the Pariſh where the Party lived, with two or three learned Presbyters, in whoſe Preſence the matter was to be examined, and Sentence pronounced, which was to be put in writing. It was to be intimated in the Pariſh where the Party lived, and in the neighbouring Pariſhes, that all Perſons might be warned to avoid the company of him that was under Excommunication: and the Miniſter was to declare what the nature and conſequences of Excommunication were, the Perſon ſo cenſured being cut off from the Body of Chriſt: after that, none was to eat, or drink, or keep company with him, but thoſe of his own Family: whoſoever did otherwiſe, if being admoniſhed they continued in it, were alſo to be Excommunicated. If the Perſon cenſured continued forty days without expreſſing any repentance, it was to be certified into the Chancery, and a Writ was to iſſue for taking and keeping him in Priſon, till he ſhould become ſenſible of his offences; and when he did confeſs theſe, and ſubmitted to ſuch puniſhments as ſhould be enjoyned, the Sentence was to be taken off, and the Perſon publickly reconciled to the Church. And this was to take place againſt thoſe, who, being condemned for capital Offences, obtained the Kings Pardon, but were notwithſtanding to be ſubject to Church-cenſures.

Their deſign concerning the uſe of Excommunication.

1552. Then follows the Office of receiving Penitents. They were firſt to ſtand without the Church, and deſire to be again received into it, and ſo to be brought in: the Miniſter was to declare to the People the hainouſneſs of ſin, and the mercies of God in the Goſpel, in a long Diſcourſe, of which the Form is there preſcribed: Then he was to ſhew the People, that as they were to abhor hard'ned ſinners, ſo they were to receive with the Bowels of true Charity, all ſincere Penitents: he was next to warn the Perſon, not to mock God, and deceive the People, by a feigned Confeſſion; he was thereupon to repeat, firſt a general Confeſſion, and then more particularly to name his ſin, and to pray to God for mercy to himſelf, and that none by his ill example might be defiled; and finally to beſeech them all to forgive him, and to receive him again into their Fellowſhip: Then the Miniſter was to ask the People, whether they would grant his deſires, who were to anſwer, they would: Then the Paſtor was to lay his Hand on his Head, and to abſolve him from the puniſhment of his offences, and the bond of Excommunication; and ſo to reſtore him to his place in the Church of God. Then he was to lead him to the Communion-Table, and there to offer up a Prayer of Thankſgiving to God for reclaiming that ſinner. For the other Titles, they relate to the other parts of the Law of thoſe Courts, for which I refer the Reader to the Book it ſelf.

How far any of thoſe things, chiefly the laſt about Excommunication, may be yet brought into the Church, I leave to the Conſultations of the Governors of it, and of the two Houſes of Parliament. It cannot be denied, that Vice and Immorality, together with much impiety, have over-run the Nation; and though the charge of this is commonly caſt on the Clergy, who certainly have been in too many places wanting to their duty; yet on the other hand, they have ſo little power, or none at all, by Law, to cenſure even the moſt publick ſins, that the blame of this great defect ought to lie more univerſally on the whole Body of the Nation, that have not made effectual proviſion for the reſtraining of vice, the making ill Men aſhamed of their ways, and the driving them from the Holy Myſteries, till they change their courſe of Life.

A Project for relieving the Clergy reduced to great Poverty.

There was another thing propoſed this Year for the correcting the great diſorders of Clergy-men, which were occaſioned by the extream miſery and poverty to which they were reduced. There were ſome motions made about it in Parliament, but they took not effect: ſo one writ a Book concerning it, which he dedicated to the Lord Chancellor, then the Biſhop of Ely. He ſhewed, that without Rewards or Encouragements few would apply themſelves to the Paſtoral Function, and that thoſe in it, if they could not ſubſiſt by it, muſt turn to other employments: ſo that at that time, many Clergy-men were Carpenters, and Taylors, and ſome kept Ale-houſes. It was a reproach on the Nation, that there had been ſo profuſe a zeal for ſuperſtition, and ſo much coldneſs in true Religion. He complains of many of the Clergy who did not maintain Students at the Univerſities according to the Kings Injunctions; and that in Schools, and Colledges, the poor Scholars Places were generally filled with the Sons of the Rich; and that Livings were moſt ſcandalouſly ſold; and the greateſt part of the Country-Clergy were ſo ignorant, that they could do little more than read. But there was no hope of doing any thing effectually for redreſſing ſo great a calamity, calamity, till the King ſhould be of Age himſelf to ſet forward ſuch Laws as might again recover a competent maintenance for the Clergy. 1552.

This Year, both Heath of Worceſter, and Day Biſhop of Chicheſter, were put out of their Biſhopricks. For Heath, it has been already ſaid, that he was put in priſon for refuſing to conſent to the Book of Ordinations. But for Day, whether he refuſed to ſubmit to the new Book, or fell into other tranſgreſſions, I do not know. Both theſe were afterwards deprived, not by any Court conſiſting of Church-men, but by Secular Delegates, of whom three were Civilians, and three Common Lawyers, as King Edwards Journal informs us. Dayes Sentence is ſomething ambiguouſly expreſſed, in the Patent that Scory Biſhop of Rocheſter had to ſucceed him; which bears date the 24*th.* of May, and mentions his being put there in the room of George late Biſhop of that See, who had been deprived or removed from it: In June following, upon Hollbeach Biſhop of Lincoln's death, Taylor that had been Dean of Lincoln, was made Biſhop. This Year the Biſhoprick of Gloceſter was quite ſuppreſſed, and converted into an exempted Arch-deaconry; and Hooper was made Biſhop of Worceſter. In the December before, Worceſter and Gloceſter had been united, by reaſon of their Voicinage, and their great poverty, and that they were not very populous: ſo they were to be for ever after one Biſhoprick with two Titles, as Coventry and Litchfield, and Bath and Wells were; and Hooper was made Biſhop of Worceſter and Gloceſter. But now they were put into another method, and the Biſhop was to be called only Biſhop of Worceſter. In all the vacancies of Sees, there were a great many of their beſt Lands taken from them: and the Sees that before had been profuſely enriched, were now brought to ſo low a condition, that it was ſcarce poſſible for the Biſhops to ſubſiſt: and yet, if what was ſo taken from them had been converted to good uſes, to the bettering the condition of the poor Clergy over England, it had been ſome mitigation of ſo hainous a Robbery; but theſe Lands were ſnatched up by every hungry Courtier, who found this to be the eaſieſt way to be ſatisfied in their pretenſions: and the World had been ſo poſſeſſed with the opinion of their exceſſive Wealth, that it was thought they never could be made poor enough.

Heath and Day turned out of their Biſhopricks.

This Year a Paſſage fell out, relating to Ireland, which will give me occaſion to look over to the Affairs of that Kingdom. The Kings of England had formerly contented themſeves with the Title of Lords of Ireland: which King Henry the 8*th.* in the 33*d.* Year of his Reign had in a Parliament there, changed into the Title of a Kingdom. But no ſpecial Crown or Coronation was appointed, ſince it was to follow the Crown of England. The Popes and the Emperors have pretended, that the conferring Titles of Sovereign Dignity belonged to them. The Pope derived his claim from what our Saviour ſaid, That all Power in Heaven and in Earth was given to him, and by conſequence to his Vicar. The Emperors, as being a dead ſhadow of the Roman Empire, which Title, with the deſignation of Ceſar, they ſtill continued to uſe, and pretended, that as the Roman Emperors did anciently make Kings, ſo they had ſtill the ſame right: though becauſe thoſe Emperors made Kings in the Countreys which were theirs by Conqueſt, it was an odd ſtretch to infer, that thoſe who retained nothing of their Empire, but the Name,

The Affairs of Ireland.

1552. should therefore make Kings in Countries that belonged not to them: and it is certain, that every entire or independent Crown or Statee may make for or within it self what Titles they please. But the Authority the Crown of England had in Ireland was not then so entire, as by the many Rebellions that have fallen out since, it is now become. The Heads of the Clans and Names had the Conduct of all their several Tribes, who were led on by them to what designs they pleased: And though within the English Pale, the King was obeyed, and his Laws executed almost as in England; yet the native Irish were an uncivilized and barbarous Nation, and not yet brought under the Yoke; and for the greatest part of Ulster, they were united to the Scots, and followed their Interests.

There had been a Rebellion in the second Year of this Reign. But Sir Anthony St. Leiger, then Deputy, being recalled, and Sir Edw. Bellinghame sent in his room, he subdued O-Canor, and O-More, that were the chief Authors of it: and not being willing to put things to extremities, when England was otherwise distracted with Wars, he perswaded them to accept of Pensions of 100 l. a-piece, and so they came in and lived in the English Pale. But the Winter after, there was another Rebellion designed in Ulster, by O-Neal, O-Donnel, O-Docart, and the Heads of some other Tribes; who sent to the Queen Dowager of Scotland, to procure them assistance from France, and they would keep up the disorders in Ireland. The Bishop of Valence, being then in Scotland, was sent by her to observe their strength, that he might accordingly perswade the King of France to assist them. He cross'd the Seas, and met with them, and with Wauchop, a Scotch-man, who was the Bishop of Armagh of the Popes making, and who, though he was blind, was yet esteemed one of the best at Riding Post in the World. They set out all their greatness to the French Bishop, to engage him to be their friend at the Court of France: but he seemed not so well satisfied of their ability to do any great matter, and so nothing followed on this. One passage fell out here, which will a little discover the temper of that Bishop. When he was in O-Docarts House, he saw a fair Daughter of his, whom he endeavoured to have corrupted, but she avoided him carefully. Two English Gray-Friars, that had fled out of England for their Religion, and were there at that time, observing the Bishops inclinations, brought him an English Whore, whom he kept for some time. She one night looking among his things, found a Glass full of somewhat that was very odoriferous, and poured it all down her Throat: which the Bishop perceiving too late, fell into a most violent passion; for it had been presented to him by Soliman the Magnificent, at his leaving the Court, as the richest Balm in Egypt; and was valued at 2000 Crowns. The Bishop was in such a rage, that all the House was disturbed with it; whereby he discovered both his lewdness and passion at once. This is related by one that was then with him, and was carried over by him to be a Page to the Scotch Queen; Sir James Melvil, who lived long in that Court, under the Constable of France, and was afterwards much employed by the Prince Elector Palatine in many Negotiations; and coming home to his own Country, was sent on many occasions to the Court of England, where he lived in great Esteem. He in his old Age writ a Narrative of all the Affairs that himself had been concerned in, which one of the beſt and perfecteſt Pieces of that nature that I have ſeen. The Original is yet extant under his own Hand in Scotland: a Copy of it was ſhewed me by one deſcended from him, from which I ſhall diſcover many conſiderable Paſſages, though the Affairs in which he was moſt employed, were ſomething later than the time of which I am to write. But to return to Ireland. Upon the Peace made with France and Scotland, things were quieted there; and Sir Ant. St. Leiger was in Auguſt 1550. again ſent over to be Deputy there. For the Reformation, it made but a ſmall progreſs in that Kingdom. It was received among the Engliſh, but I do not find any endeavours were uſed to bring it in among the Iriſh. This Year Bale was ſent into Ireland. He had been a buſie Writer upon all occaſions, and had a great deal of Learning, but wanted Temper, and did not write with the decency that became a Divine, or was ſutable to ſuch matters; which it ſeems made thoſe who recommended Men to preferment in this Church, not think him ſo fit a Perſon to be employed here in England. But the Biſhoprick of Oſſery being void, the King propoſed him to be ſent thither. So in Auguſt this Year Dr. Goodaker was ſent over to be Biſhop of Armagh, and Bale to be Biſhop of Oſſery. There were alſo two other, who were Iriſh Men, to be promoted. When they came thither, the Archbiſhop of Dublin intended to have conſecrated them according to the old Pontifical; for the new Book of Ordination had not been yet uſed among them. Goodaker and the two others were eaſily perſwaded to it, but Bale abſolutely refuſed to conſent to it: who being aſſiſted by the Lord Chancellor, it was carried, that they ſhould be ordained according to the new Book. When Bale went into his Dioceſs, he found all things there in dark Popery; but before he could make any Reformation there, King Edwards death put an end to his and all ſuch deſigns. 1552.

In England nothing elſe that had any relation to the Reformation paſſed this Year, unleſs what belongs to the change made in the Order of the Garter may be thought to relate to it. On the 23*d*. of April the former Year, being St. George's day, a Propoſition was made to conſider the Order and Statutes, ſince there was thought to be a great deal of ſuperſtition in them; and the Story upon which the Order was founded, concerning St. George's fighting with the Dragon, looked like a Legend formed in the darker Ages, to ſupport the humour of Chivalry, that was then very high in the World. And as the Story had no great credibility in it ſelf, ſo it was delivered by no Ancient Author. Nor was it found that there had been any ſuch Saint: there being among Ancient Writers none mentioned of that Name, but George of Alexandria, the Arrian Biſhop, that was put in when Athanaſius was baniſhed. Upon this motion in the former Year, the Duke of Somerſet, the Marqueſs of Northampton, and the Earls of Wiltſhire, and Warwick, were appointed to review the Statutes of the Order. So this Year the whole Order was changed; and the Earl of Weſtmorland and Sir Andrew Dudley, who were now to be inſtalled, were the firſt that were received according to the new Model, (which the Reader will find in the Collection, as it was tranſlated into Latin out of the Engliſh, by the King himſelf, written all with his own Hand, and it is the third Paper after his Journal.) The Preamble of it ſets forth the noble deſign of the Order, to animate great Men to gallant Actions, and to aſſociate them into a Fraternity, for 1552. for their better encouragement and aſſiſtance; but ſays, it had been much corrupted by ſuperſtition, therefore the Statutes of it were hereafter to be theſe,

It was no more to be called the Order of St. George, nor was he to be eſteemed the Patron of it; but it was to be called the Order of the Garter. The Knights of this Order were to wear the Blew Ribond or Garter as formerly; but at the Collar, in ſtead of a George, there was to be on one ſide of the Jewel, a Knight carrying a Book upon a Sword point, on the Sword to be written Protectio, on the Book Verbum Dei; on the Reverſe, a Shield, on which ſhould be written Fides; to expreſs their reſolution both with offenſive and defenſive Weapons to maintain the Word of God. For the reſt of the Statutes I ſhall refer the Reader to the Paper I mentioned. But this was repealed by Queen Mary, and ſo the old Rules took place again, and do ſo ſtill. This deſign ſeems to have been chiefly intended, that none but thoſe of the Reformed Religion might be capable of it; ſince the adhering to, and ſtanding for the Scriptures, was then taken to be the diſtinguiſhing Character between the Papiſts and the Reformers.

This is the ſum of what was either done or deſigned this Year with relation to Religion. As for the State, there was a ſtrict enquiry made of all who had cheated the King in the ſuppreſſion of Chantries, or in any other thing that related to Churches; from which the Viſitors were believed to have embezeled much to their own uſes, and there were many Sutes in the Star-Chamber about it. Moſt of all theſe Perſons had been the Friends or Creatures of the Duke of Somerſet: and the enquiry after theſe things ſeems to have been more out of hatred to him than out of any deſign to make the King the richer by what ſhould be recovered for his uſe. But on none did the Storm break more ſeverely than on the Lord Paget. He had been Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, and was charged with many miſdemeanours in that Office, for which he was fined in 6000 l. But that which was moſt ſevere, was that on St. George's Eve, he was degraded from the Order of the Garter for divers offences; but chiefly, becauſe he was no Gentleman, neither by Fathers ſide nor Mothers ſide. His chief offence was his greateſt Vertue. He had been on all occaſions a conſtant Friend to the Duke of Somerſet: for which the Duke of Northumberland hated him mortally, and ſo got him to be degraded to make way for his own Son. This was much cenſured, as a barbarous Action, that a Man who had ſo long ſerved the Crown in ſuch publick Negotiations, and was now of no meaner Blood than he was when King Henry firſt gave him the Order, ſhould be ſo diſhonoured, being guilty of no other fault, but what is common to moſt Courtiers, of enriching himſelf at his Maſters coſt; for which his Fine was ſevere enough for the expiation. But the Duke of Northumberland was a Perſon ſo given up to violence and revenge, that an ordinary diſgrace did not ſatisfie his hatred.

Paget degraded from being a Knight of the Garter.

Sir Ant. St. Leiger, another Knight of the Order, was at the ſame time accuſed, upon complaint ſent from the Archbiſhop of Dublin in Ireland, for ſome high words that he had uſed. But theſe being examined, he was cleared, and admitted to his Place among the Knights of the Garter. Many others that were obnoxious came in, upon this violent proſecution, to purchaſe the favour of Northumberland, who was much much ſet on framing a Parliament to his mind, and ſo took thoſe methods which he thought likelieſt to work his ends. It being ordinary for Men of inſolent and boiſterous tempers, who are generally as abject when they are low, as they are puft up with proſperity, to meaſure other People by themſelves; therefore knowing that the methods of reaſon and kindneſs would have no operation on themſelves, and that height and ſeverity are the only ways to ſubdue them, they uſe that ſame way of gaining others which they find moſt effectual with themſelves. 1552.

This Year the King went on, in paying his Debts, reforming the Coin, and other ways that might make the Nation great and wealthy. And one great Project was undertaken, which has been the chief beginning and foundation of the great Riches, and ſtrength of Shipping, to which this Nation has attained ſince that time. From the days of King Henry the third, the free Towns of Germany, who had aſſiſted him in his Wars, obtained great Priviledges in England: they were made a Corporation, and lived together in the Still-yard near the Bridge. They had in Edward the 4*th*'s time been brought into ſome trouble, for carrying their Priviledges further than their Charter allowed them: and ſo Judgment was given that they had forfeited it, but they redeemed themſelves out of that, by a great Preſent which they made to the King. That which chiefly ſupported them at Court, was, that they trading in a Body were not only able to take the Trade out of all other Perſons Hands, by underſelling them, but they had always a great ſtock of Money; and ſo when the Government was in a ſtrait, they were ready, upon a good Security, to lend great Sums: and on leſſer occaſions could obtain the favour of a Stateſ-man by the Preſents they made him. But now Trade was raiſed much above what it had been, and Courts becoming more magnificent than formerly, there was a greater conſumption, particularly of Cloth, than had ever been known. The diſcovery of the Indies had raiſed both Trade and Navigation, ſo that there was a quicker circulation of the Wealth of the World, than had been in former Ages. The encreaſe of Trade.

Antwerp, and Hamburgh, lying both conveniently, the one in the mouth of the Elb, and the other near the mouth of the Rhine, which were the two greateſt Rivers that fell into thoſe Seas, the Merchants of thoſe two Cities at that time had the chief Trade of the World. The Engliſh began to look on thoſe Eaſterlings with envy. All that was Imported or Exported came for moſt part in their bottoms: all Markets were in their Hands, ſo that Commodities of forreign growth were vented by them in England, and the Product of the Kingdom was bought up by them. And all the Nation being then ſet much on Paſture, they had much advanced their Manufacture; in ſo much that their own Wooll, which had been formerly wrought at Antwerp, was now made into Cloth in England, which the Still-yard Men obtained leave to carry away. At firſt they Shipped not above eight Cloaths in a year, after that an hundred, then a thouſand, then ſix thouſand; but this laſt year there was Shipped in their Name 44000 Cloaths; and not above 1100 by all others that traded within England.

The Merchant Adventurers found they could not hold out, unleſs this Company was broke. So they put in their complaint againſt them in the beginning of this year, to which the Still-yard Men made anſwer, and they 1552. they replied. Upon this, the Council made a Decree, that the Charter was broken, and ſo diſſolved the Company. Thoſe of Hamburg, and Lubeck, and the Regent of Flanders, ſolicited the Council to have this redreſſed, but in vain: for the advantage the Nation was to have by it, was too viſible to admit of any interpoſition. But the deſign of Trade being thus ſet on foot, another Project of a higher nature followed it. The War was now begun between the Emperor and the King of France. And that, with the perſecution raiſed in Flanders againſt all that leaned to the Doctrine of the Proteſtants, made many there think of changing their Seats. It was therefore propoſed here in England to open a free Trade, and to appoint ſome Mart Towns, that ſhould have greater Priviledges and Securities for encouraging Merchants to live in them, and ſhould be eaſier in their Cuſtoms than they were any where elſe. Southampton for the Cloth Trade, and Hull for the Northern Trade, were thought the two fitteſt Places. And for the advantages and diſadvantages of this deſign, I find the young King had ballanced the matter exactly; for there is a large Paper all written with his own Hand, containing what was to be ſaid on both ſides. But his death, and Queen Maries marrying the Prince of Spain, put an end to this Project: though all the Addreſſes her Husband made, ſeconding the deſires of the Eaſterlings, could never prevail to the ſetting up of that Company again. If the Reader would underſtand this matter more perfectly, he may find a great deal of it in the Kings Journal, and in the fourth Paper that follows it, where the whole Affair ſeems to be conſidered on all hands: but Men that know Merchandize more perfectly will judge better of theſe things.

King Edwards Remains, Number 4.

Cardan in England.

This Summer, Cardan, the great Philoſopher of that Age, paſſed thorough England. He was brought from Italy on the account of Hamilton Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, who was then deſperately ſick of a Dropſie. Cardan cured him of his Diſeaſe: but being a Man much converſant both in Aſtrology, and Magick, as himſelf profeſſed, he told the Archbiſhop, that though he had at preſent ſaved his Life, yet he could not change his fate; for he was to die on a Gallows. In his going through England he waited on King Edward, where he was ſo entertained by him, and obſerved his extraordinary Parts and Vertues ſo narrowly, that on many occaſions he writ afterwards of him, with great aſtoniſhment, as being the moſt wonderful Perſon he had ever ſeen.

The Affairs of Scotland.

But the mention of the Scotch Archbiſhops ſickneſs leads me now to the Affairs of Scotland. The Queen had paſſed thorough England from France to Scotland laſt year. In her Paſſage ſhe was treated by the King with all that reſpect that one Crowned Head could pay to another. The Particulars are in his Journal, and need not be recited here. When ſhe came home, ſhe ſet her ſelf much to perſwade the Governour to lay down the Government, that it might be put in her Hands; to which he, being a ſoft Man, was the more eaſily induced, becauſe his Brother, who had great power over him, and was a violent and ambitious Man, was then ſo ſick, that there was no hope of his Life. He had alſo received Letters from France, in ſuch a Style, that he ſaw he muſt either lay down the Government, or not only loſe the Honour and Penſion he had there, but be forced to ſtruggle for what he had in his own Country. Whether the French underſtood any thing by their Spies in the Court of England, that it had been propoſed there to perſwade him to pretend to the Crown, and were therefore the more earneſt to have the Government out of his Hands, I do not know: but though I have ſeen many hundreds of Letters that paſſed in thoſe times between England and Scotland, I could not find by any of them that he ever entred into any Treaty about it. 1552.

It ſeems his baſe Brother had ſome thoughts of it. For when he was ſo far recovered that he could enquire after news, and heard what his Brother had done, he flew out in a paſſion, and called him a Beaſt for parting with the Government, ſince there was none but a Laſs between him and the Crown. I ſet down his own words, leaving a ſpace void for an Epithete he uſed of the young Queen, ſcarce decent enough to be mentioned. There had been a great Conſultation in France what to do with the Queen of Scotland. Her Unkles preſſed the King to marry her to the Dolphin; For thereby another Kingdom would be added to France, which would be a perpetual Thorn in the ſide of England; She had alſo ſome Proſpect of ſucceeding to the Crown of England; ſo that on all accounts it ſeemed the beſt Match in Europe for the Dolphin. But the wiſe Conſtable had obſerved, that the Spaniards loſt by their Dominions that lay ſo remote from the chief Seat of their Government; though theſe were the richeſt Countries in Europe; namely, Sicily, Naples, Millain, and the Netherlands; and wiſely apprehended that France might ſuffer much more, by the acceſſion of ſuch a Crown, which not only was remote, but where alſo the Country was poor, and the People not eaſily governed. It would be a vaſt charge to them, to ſend Navies, and to pay Armies there: The Nobility might when they would, by confederating with England, either ſhake off the French Government, or put them to a great expence to keep it: ſo that whereas Scotland had been hitherto, by a Penſion, and ſometimes by a little aſſiſtance, kept in a perpetual alliance with France, he apprehended by ſuch a Union it might become their Enemy, and a great weight on their Government. This the Conſtable preſſed much, both out of his care of his Maſters Intereſt, and in oppoſition to the Houſe of Guiſe. He adviſed the King rather to marry her to ſome of his Subjects, of whom he was well aſſured, and to ſend her and her Husband home into Scotland; by which means the perpetual amity of that Kingdom might be preſerved on eaſie terms. But the King was ſo poſſeſſed with the notion of the Union of that Crown to France, that he gave no ear to this wiſe advice; thinking it flowed chiefly from the hatred and enmity which he knew the Conſtable bore the Family of Guiſe. This the Conſtable himſelf told Melvil, from whoſe Narrative I have it. The Queen Mother of Scotland being poſſeſſed of the Government, found two great Factions in it. The Head of the one was the Arch-biſhop, who now recovering, and finding himſelf neglected, and the Queen governed by other Councils, ſet himſelf much againſt her, and drew the Clergy for the moſt part into his Intereſts. The other Faction was of thoſe who hated him, and them both, and inclined to the Reformation. They ſet up the Prior of St. Andrews, who was their young Queens natural Brother, as their Head, and by his means offered their Service to the Queen now made Regent: they offered that 1552 they would agree with her to send the Matrimonial Crown to the Dolphin, and consent to the Union of both Kingdoms: only they desired her protection from the violence of the Clergy, and that they might have secretly Preachers in their Houses to instruct them in the Points of Religion. This Offer the Queen readily accepted of, and so by their assistance carried things till near the end of her Regency with great moderation and discretion. And now the Affairs of Scotland were put in a Channel, in which they held long steady and quiet, till about six years after this, that upon the Peace with the King of Spain there were cruel Councils laid down in France, and from thence sent over into Scotland, for extirpating Heresie. But of that we shall discourse in its proper place.

The Affairs of Germany. As for the Affairs of Germany, there was this year a great and sudden turn of things there; with which the Emperor was surprized by a strange supineness, that proved as fatal to him, as it was happy to the Empire; though all the World besides saw it coming on him. Upon the delivery of Magdeburg, Maurice of Saxe's Army, pretending there was an Arrear due to them, took up their Winter Quarters, near Saxe, in the Dominions of some Popish Princes: where they were very unwelcome Guests. The Sons of the Landgrave, being required by their Father, pressed the Duke of Saxe on his Honour, to free their Father, or to become their Prisoner in his room, since they had his faith for his liberty: so he went to them, and offered them his Person; but though he did not trust them with his whole design; yet he told them so much that they were willing to let him go back. The Emperors Counsellors were allarumed with what they heard from all hands. And the Duke of Alva (well known afterwards by his cruelties in the Netherlands) advised him to send for Maurice to come and give an account of all those suspitious passages, to take the Army out of his hands; and to take such securities from him, as might clear all the jealousies, for which his carriage had given great cause. But the Bishop of Arras was on the other hand so assured of him, that he said, the giving him any suspition of the Emperors distrust might really engage him into such designs; and that such deep Projects as they heard he was in, were too fine conceits for Dutch drunken Heads. He also assured them he had two of his Secretaries in Pension, so that he was advertised of all his motions. But the Duke of Saxe came to know that those his Secretaries were the Emperors Pensioners; and dissembled it so well, that he used them in all appearance with more confidence than formerly: he held all his Consultations in their presence, and seemed to open his heart so to them, that they possessed the Bishop with a firm confidence of his sincerity and steadiness to the Emperors Interests. Yet his lingering so at the Town of Magdeburg, with the other dark Passages concerning him, made the Emperor conceive at last a jealousie of him, and he writ for him to come and clear himself: Then he refined it higher; for having left Orders with the Officers whom he had made sure to him, to follow with the Army in all the haste they could; he himself took Post, with as small a Train as his Dignity could admit of, and carried one of those corrupted Secretaries with him: but on the way he complained of pains in his side, so that he could not hold on his Journey: but sent forward his Secretary cretary, who gave ſuch an account of him, that it, together with his coming ſo readily a great part of his way in ſo ſecure a manner, made the Emperor now lay down all his former diſtruſts. The Emperor writ to Trent, and to many other Places, that there was no cauſe of fear from Maurice. And Maurice, to colour the matter more compleatly, had ſent his Ambaſſadors to Trent, and had ordered Melanchon, and his other Divines, to follow them ſlowly, that as ſoon as the ſafe Conduct was obtained, they might go on and defend their Doctrine. 1552.

Upon their coming to Trent, and propoſing their deſires, that all might be again conſidered; the Legates rejected the Propoſition with much ſcorn. The Emperors Ambaſſadors and Prelates preſſed that they might be well received. The Arch-biſhop of Toledo ſhew'd how much Chriſt had born with the Scribes and Phariſees; and that in imitation of him, they ought to leave nothing undone that might gain upon them. So it was reſolved, that the Council ſhould make a Proteſtation, that the uſage they gave them was out of Charity, which is above all Law; ſince it was againſt the Decretals to have any Treaty with profeſſed Hereticks. At the ſame time the Imperialiſts dealt no leſs earneſtly with the Ambaſſadors from the Proteſtant Princes, not to ask too much at once, but to go on by degrees; and aſſured them they had a mind to leſſen the Popes greatneſs as much as they had. The Ambaſſadors firſt ſtep was to be for obtaining a ſafe Conduct. They excepted to that which the Council had given, as different from that the Council of Baſil had ſent to the Bohemians, in four material Points. The firſt was, That their Divines ſhould have a deciſive Voice. 2. That all Points ſhould be determined according to the Scriptures; and according to the Fathers, as they were conformable to thoſe. The third, That they ſhould have the exerciſe of their Religion within their own Houſes. 4. That nothing ſhould be done in contempt of their Doctrine. So they deſired that the ſafe Conduct might be word for word the ſame with that of Baſil. Proceedings at Trent.

But the Legates abhorred the Name of that Council, that had endeavoured ſo much to break the Power of the Popedom, and had conſented to that extraordinary ſafe Conduct, only to unite Germany, and to gain them by ſuch compliance to be of their ſide againſt the Pope. Yet the Legates promiſed to conſider of it. The Ambaſſadors were received in a Congregation, which differed from a Seſſion of the Council, juſt as a Committee of a whole Houſe of Parliament, differs from the Houſe, when ſet according to its Forms. They began their Speech with this Salutation, Moſt Reverend and moſt Mighty Fathers and Lords; they added a cold Complement, and deſired a ſafe Conduct. At this time the Pope hearing that the Emperor was reſolved to bring on the old deſigns of ſome Councils for leſſening his greatneſs, and that the Spaniſh Biſhops were much ſet on it, united himſelf to France, and reſolved to break the Council as ſoon as it was poſſible; and therefore he ordered the Legates to proceed in the deciſion of the Doctrine, hoping that the Proteſtants would deſpair of obtaining any thing, and ſo go away. So the ſafe Conduct they had deſired was not granted them, and another was offered in its room, containing 1552. taining only full security for their Persons. Upon this security, such as it was, Divines came both from Wirtenberg, and the Town of Strasburg. But as they were going on to treat of Matrimony, the War of Germany broke out, and the Bishops of the Empire, with the other Ambassadors, immediately went home. The Legates laid hold on this so readily, that though the Session was to have been held on the second of May, they called an extraordinary one on the 28*th* of April, and suspended the Council for two years.

An Account of the Council of Trent.

And being to have no other occasion to say any thing more of this Council, I shall only add, that there had been a great expectation over Christendome of some considerable event of a General Council for many years. The Bishops and Princes had much desired it, hoping it might have brought the differences among Divines to a happy composure; and have setled a Reformation of those abuses, which had been long complained of, and were still kept up by the Court of Rome, for the ends of that Principality that they had assumed in Sacred things. The Popes for the same reasons were very apprehensive of it, fearing that it might have lessened their Prerogatives; and by cutting off abuses, that brought in a great Revenue to them, have abridged their Profits. But it was, by the cunning of the Legates, the dissensions of Princes, the great number of poor Italian Bishops, and the ignorance of the greatest part of the other, so managed, that in stead of composing differences in Religion, things were so nicely defined, that they were, made irreconcilable. All those abuses, for which there had been nothing but practice, and that much questioned before, were now, by the Proviso's, and Reservations, excepted for the Priviledges of the Roman See, made warrantable. So that it had in all Particulars an Issue quite contrary to what the several Parties concerned had expected from it, and has put the World ever since out of the humour of desiring any more General Councils, as they are accustomed to call them. The History of that Council was writ with as much Life, and Beauty, and Authority, as had been ever seen in any humane Writing, by Frier Paul of Venice, within half an Age of the time in which it was ended; when the thing was yet fresh in Mens Memories, and many were alive who had been present: and there was not one in that Age that engaged to write against it. But about forty years after, when Father Paul, and all his friends who knew from what Vouchers he writ, were dead; Pallavicini, a Jesuit, who was made a Cardinal, for this Service, undertook to answer him, by another History of that Council, which, in many matters of Fact, contradicts Father Paul; upon the credit (as he tells us) of some Journals and Memorials of such as were present, which he perused, and cites upon all occasions. We see that Rome hath been in all Ages so good at forging those things which might be of use to its Interests, that we know not how to trust that Shop of false Wares in any one thing that comes out of it. And therefore it is not easie to be assured of the truth and genuineness of any of the Materials, out of which the Jesuit composed his Work. But as for the main Thread of the Story, both his and Father Pauls Accounts do so agree, that whosoever compares them, will clearly see, that all things were managed by Intrigues and ſecret Practiſes; ſo that it will not be eaſie for a Man of common ſenſe, after he has read over Pallavicini's Hiſtory to fancy that there was any extraordinary influence of the Holy Ghoſt hovering over and directing their Councils. And the care they took for palliating all the corruptions then complained of was ſo apparent, that their Hiſtorian had no other way by which to excuſe it, but to ſet up a new Hypotheſis, which a French Writer ſince has wittily called the Cardinals New Goſpel; "That "there muſt be a Temporal Principality in the Church, that all things "which ſupport that Principality are to be at leaſt tolerated, though "they be far contrary to the Primitive Patterns, and to the firſt deli-"very of the Goſpel by Chriſt and his Apoſtles. That which was "then ſet up, he accounts a ſtate of Infancy, to which Milk was pro-"per; but the Church being ſince grown to its full ſtate and ſtrength, "other things are now neceſſary for the maintaining and preſerving "of it. 1552.

And a Judgment of the Historles of it.

But to return to Maurice, he having poſſeſſed the Emperor with an entire confidence in him, gathered his Army together, took Ausburg, with many other Imperial Cities; and diſplaced the Magiſtrates which the Emperor had put in them, and reſtored their old ones, with the baniſhed Miniſters: ſo that every thing began to put on a new face. Ferdinand King of the Romans did Mediate; both on his own account, for the Turks were falling into Hungary; and on the Empires, for the King of France was come with a great Army to the Confines of the Empire: and the Conſtable, pretending that he only deſired paſſage through the Town of Metz, entred it, and poſſeſſed himſelf of it. Toul and Verdun fell alſo into his Hands: and the French were endeavouring to be admitted into Strasburg. The Emperor was now in great diſorder, he had no Army about him; thoſe he had confided in were declared againſt him; his own Brother was not ill pleaſed at his misfortune, the French were like to gain ground on his Hereditary Dominions. Being thus perplexed, and irreſolved, he did not ſend a ſpeedy Anſwer to Maurice's Demands, which he had ſent by his Brother; for the ſetting of the Landgrave at liberty, reſtoring the freedoms of the Empire, and particularly in matters of Religion. But to loſe no time the mean while, Maurice marched on to Inſpruch, where the Emperor lay: and ſurprized a Paſs to which he had truſted, ſo that he was within two Miles of him before he was aware of it. Upon this the Emperor roſe from Supper in great haſt, and by Torch-light fled away to make his eſcape into Italy. He gave the Duke of Saxe his liberty; but he generouſly reſolved to follow him in this his calamity; and perhaps he was not willing to owe his liberty to his Coufin Maurice. Thus all that deſign, which the Emperor had been laying ſo many years, was now broken off on a ſudden: he loſt all the advantages he had of his former Victories, and was forced to ſet the Priſoners at liberty, and to call in the Proſcriptions; and in conclufion, the Edict of Paſſaw was made, by which the ſeveral Princes and Towns were ſecured in the free exerciſe of their Religion.

1552. I have made this digreſſion, which I thought not diſagreeable to the matter of my Hiſtory, to give account of the extream danger in which Religion was in Germany, and how ſtrangely it was recovered; in which he who had been the chief Inſtrument of the miſeries it had groaned under, was now become its unlooked-for deliverer. I have enlarged on ſome Paſſages that are in none of the Printed Hiſtories, which I draw from Melvils Memoires, who ſays he had them from the Elector Palatines own Mouth.

The Emperor is much caſt down.

But the Emperors misfortunes redoubled on him. For having made Peace in the Empire, he would againſt all reaſon, or probability of ſucceſs, ſit down before Metz. But the Duke of Guiſe defended the Place ſo againſt him, and the time of the year was ſo unſeaſonable, being in December, that after a great loſs of Men, and vaſt expence of Treaſure, he was forced to raiſe his Siege. From thence he retired into Flanders, where his afflictions ſeiſed ſo violently on him, that for ſome time he admitted none to come near him: Some ſaid he was frantick, others that he was ſullen and Melancholly. The Engliſh Ambaſſadors at Bruſſels for many Weeks could learn nothing certain concerning him. Here, it is ſaid, he began to reflect on the vanity of the World, when, he who had but a year before given Law to Chriſtendom, was now driven to ſo low an ebbe, that as he had irrecoverably loſt all his footing in Germany; ſo in all other things his Councils were unlucky. It was one of the notableſt turns of Fortune that had been in many Ages; and gave a great demonſtration, both of an over-ruling Providence, that diſpoſes of all humane Affairs at pleaſure, and of a particular care that God had of the Reformation, in thus recovering it when it ſeemed gone without hope in Germany.

Theſe Reflections made deep impreſſions on his mind, and were believed to have firſt poſſeſſed him with the deſign which not long after he put in execution, of laying down his Crowns, and retiring to a private courſe of Life. In his retirement having time to conſider things more impartially, he was ſo much changed in his opinion of the Proteſtant Religion, that he who hitherto had been a moſt violent oppoſer of it, was ſuſpected of being turned to it before he died.

1553. Thus ended this Year; and now I come to the laſt and fatal Year of this young Kings Life and Reign: The firſt thing done in it, was, a regulation of the Privy-Council, which was divided into ſo many Committees, and every one of theſe had its proper Work and days appointed for the receiving and diſpatching of all Affairs. In all theſe things a Method was preſcribed to them, of which the Reader will ſee a full account in the fixth Paper of thoſe that follow King Edwards Journal; which Paper, though it is not all written with his Hand, as the others be, yet it is in ſo many places interlined by him, that he ſeems to have conſidered it much, and been well pleaſed with it. His ſecond Parliament was opened on the firſt of March. On the ſixth of March it was moved in the Houſe of Commons to give the King two Tenths and two Fifteenths with a Subſidy for two years: It was long argued at firſt, and at the paſſing the Bill it was again argued, but at laſt the Commons agreed to it. The Preamble of it is a long Accuſation of the Duke of Somerſet, for involving the King in Wars, waſting his Treaſure, engaging him in much Debt, embaſing the Coin, and having given occaſion to a moſt terrible Rebellion. In fine, conſidering the great Debt the King was left in by his Father, the loſs he put himſelf to in the reforming the Coin, and they finding his temper to be ſet wholly on the good of his Subjects, and not on enriching himſelf; therefore they give him two Tenths, and two Fifteenths, with one Subſidy for two years. Whether the debate in the Houſe of Commons was againſt the Subſidies in this Act, or againſt the Preamble, cannot be certainly known: but it is probable the Debate at the engroſſing the Bill was about the Preamble, which the Duke of Northumberland and his Party were the more earneſtly ſet on, to let the King ſee how acceptable they were, and how hateful the Duke of Somerſet had been. The Clergy did alſo, for an expreſſion of their affection and duty, give the King ſix Shillings in the Pound of their Benefices. There was alſo a Bill ſent down from the Lords, that none might hold any Spiritual Promotion, unleſs he were either Prieſt or Deacon: But after the third reading it was caſt out. The reaſon of it was, becauſe many Noblemen and Gentlemens Sons had Prebends given them, on this pretence, that they intended to fit themſelves by Study for entring into Orders; but they kept theſe, and never advanced in their Studies: upon which the Biſhops prevailed to have the Bill agreed to by the Lords, but could carry it no further. 1553.

A Regulation of the Privy-Council.

A new Parliament.

Another Act paſſed for the ſuppreſſing the Biſhoprick of Dureſme, which is ſo ſtrangely miſ-repreſented by thoſe who never read more than the Title of it, that I ſhall therefore give a more full account of it. It is ſet forth in the Preamble, "That that Biſhoprick being then void of a Prelate, ſo that the Gift thereof was "in the Kings pleaſure: and the compaſs of it being ſo large, extending to ſo many Shires ſo far diſtant, that it could not be ſufficiently ſerved by one Biſhop; and ſince the King, according to "his godly diſpoſition, was deſirous to have Gods Holy Word "preached in theſe Parts, which were wild and barbarous, for lack "of good Preaching, and good Learning; therefore he intended to "have two Biſhopricks for that Dioceſs: the one at Dureſme, which "ſhould have 2000 Marks Revenue; and another at Newcaſtle, "which ſhould have 1000 Marks Revenue: and alſo to Found a "Cathedral Church at Newcaſtle, with a Deanry and Chapter, out "of the Revenues of the Biſhoprick: therefore the Biſhoprick of "Dureſme is utterly extinguiſhed and diſſolved, and Authority is "given for Letters Patents to erect the two new Biſhopricks together with the Deanry and Chapter at Newcaſtle: with a Proviſo "that the Rights of the Deanry, Chapter, and Cathedral of Dureſme "ſhould ſuffer nothing by this Act. The Biſhoprick of Dureſme ſuppreſſed, and two new ones appointed.

When this Bill is conſidered, that diſſolution that was deſigned by it will not appear to be ſo ſacrilegious a thing as ſome Writers have 1553 have represented it. For whosoever understands the value of old Rents, especially such as these were near the Marches of an Enemy, where the Service of the Tenants in the War made their Lands be set at very low rates, will know, that 3000 Marks of Rent being reserved, besides the endowing of the Cathedral, which could hardly be done under another thousand Marks, there could not be so great a Prey of that Bishoprick as has been imagined. Ridley, as himself writes in one of his Letters, was named to be Bishop of Duresme, being one of the Natives of that Country; but the thing never took effect. For in May, and no sooner, was the Temporalty of the Bishoprick turned into a County Palatine, and given to the Duke of Northumberland. But the Kings sickness, and soon after his death, made that and all the rest of these designs prove abortive.

How Tonstall was deprived, I cannot understand. It was for misprision of Treason, and done by Secular Men. For Cranmer refused to meddle in it. I have seen the Commission given by Queen Mary to some Delegates to examine it: in which it is said, That the Sentence was given only by Lay men; and that Tonstall, being kept Prisoner long in the Tower, was brought to his Trial, in which he had neither Counsel assigned him, nor convenient time given him for clearing himself; and that after divers Protestations, they had, notwithstanding his Appeal, deprived him of his Bishoprick. He was not only turned out, but kept Prisoner, till Queen Mary set him at liberty.

At the end of this Parliament the King granted a free Pardon: concerning which, this is only remarkable, That whereas it goes for a Maxime, that the Acts of Pardon must be passed without changing any thing in them, the Commons, when they sent up this Act of Pardon to the Lords, desired that some words might be amended in it; but it is not clear what was done, for that same day the Acts were passed, and the Parliament was dissolved.

In it the Duke of Northumberland had carried this Point, That the Nation made a publick Declaration of their dislike of the Duke of Somersets Proceedings; which was the more necessary, because the King had let fall words concerning his death, by which he seemed to reflect on it with some concern, and look'd on it as Northumberlands deed. But the Act had passed with such difficulty, that either the Duke did not think the Parliament well enough disposed for him; or else he resolved totally to vary from the Measures of the Duke of Somerset, who continued the same Parliament long, whereas this that was opened on the first was dissolved on the last day of March.

A Visitation for the Plate in the Churches

Visitors were soon after appointed to examine, what Church-plate, Jewels, and other Furniture, was in all Cathedrals and Churches; and to compare their account with the Inventories made in former Visitations; and to see what was embezeled, and how it was done. And because the King was resolved to have Churches and Chappels furnished with that that was comely and convenient for the Administration of the Sacraments; they were to give one or two Chal-

ces of Silver, or more, to every Church, Chappel, or Cathedral, as their diſcretions ſhould direct them; and to diſtribute comely Furniture for the Communion-Table, and for Surplices; and to ſell the reſt of the Linnen, and give it to the Poor: and to ſell Copes, and Alter-Cloaths, and deliver all the reſt of the Plate and Jewels to the Kings Treaſurer Sir Edm. Pecham. This is ſpitefully urged by one of our Writers, who would have his Reader infer from it, that the King was ill principled as to the matters of the Church, becauſe when this Order was given by him he was now in the 16*th.* Year of his Age. But if all Princes ſhould be thus judged by all Inſtructions that paſs under their Hands, they would be more ſeverely cenſured than there is cauſe. And for the particular matter that is charged on the Memory of this young Prince, which, as it was repreſented to him, was only a calling for the ſuperfluous Plate and other Goods that lay in Churches more for pomp than for uſe; though the applying of it to common uſes, except upon extream neceſſities, is not a thing that can be juſtified; yet it deſerved not ſo ſevere a cenſure; eſpecially the Inſtructions being Signed by the King in his ſickneſs; in which it is not likely that he minded Affairs of that kind much, but ſet his Hand eaſily to ſuch Papers as the Council prepared from him. 1553.

Theſe Inſtructions were directed, in the Copy that I have peruſed, to the Earl of Shrewsbury, Lord Preſident of the North: upon which occaſion, I ſhall here make mention of that which I know not certainly in what year to place, namely, the Inſtructions that were given to that Earl when he was made Preſident of the North. And I mention them the rather, becauſe there have been ſince that time ſome Conteſts about that Office, and the Court belonging to it. There was by his Inſtructions a Council to be aſſiſtant to him; whereof ſome of the Members were at large, and not bound to attendance, others were not to leave him without licence from him: and he was in all things to have a negative Voice in it. For the other Particulars, I refer the Reader to the Copy, which he will find in the Collection. One Inſtruction among them belongs to Religion; that he and the other Councellors, when there was at any time Aſſemblies of People before them, ſhould perſwade them to be obedient chiefly to the Laws about Religion, and eſpecially concerning the Service ſet forth in their own Mother-Tongue. There was alſo a particular charge given them concerning the aboliſhed Power of the Biſhop of Rome: whoſe abuſes they were by continual inculcation ſo to beat into the minds of the People, that they might well apprehend them, and might ſee that thoſe things were ſaid to them from their Hearts, and not from their Tongues only for Forms ſake. They were alſo to ſatisfie them about the abrogation of many Holy-days appointed by the ſame Biſhop; who endeavoured to perſwade the World that he could make Saints at his pleaſure: which by leading the People to idleneſs, gave occaſion to many vices and inconveniences. Theſe Inſtructions were given after the Peace was made with Scotland; otherwiſe there muſt have been a great deal in them relating to that War; but the Critical time of them I do not know.

Collection Number 56.

1553. This Year Harly was made Bishop of Hereford, instead of Skip, who died the last Year. And he being the last of those who were made so by Letters Patents, I shall give the Reader some satisfaction concerning that way of making Bishops. The Patents began with the mention of the vacancy of the See, by death, or removal: upon which the King being informed of the good qualifications of such a one, appoints him to be Bishop, during his natural Life, or so long as he shall behave himself well: giving him power to ordain and deprive Ministers, to confer Benefices, judge about Wills, name Officials, and Commissaries, exercise Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, visit the Clergy, inflict Censures, and punish scandalous Persons, and to do all the other parts of the Episcopal Function that were found by the Word of God to be committed to Bishops; all which they were to execute and do in the Kings Name and Authority. After that in the same Patent follows the restitution of the Temporalties. The day after, a Certificate in a Writ called a Significavit was to be made of this, under the Great Seal, to the Archbishop, with a Charge to consecrate him.

The Form of the Bishops Letters Patents.

The first that had his Bishoprick by the Kings Patents was Barlow that was removed from St. Davids to Bath and Wells. They bear date the third of February, in the second Year of the Kings Reign: and Ferrar, Bishop of St. Davids, was not the first, as some have imagined, for he was made Bishop the first of August that Year. This Ferrar was a rash indiscreet Man, and drew upon himself the dislike of the Prebendaries of St. Davids. He was made Bishop upon the Duke of Somersets favour to him. But last Year many Articles were objected to him: some, as if he had incurred a Præmunire for acting in his Court not in the Kings, but his own Name, and some for neglecting his Charge; and some little indecencies were objected to him, as going strangely habited, travelling on foot, whistling impertinently, with many other things, which if true, shewed in him much weakness and folly. The heaviest Articles he denied: yet he was kept in Prison, and Commissioners were sent into Wales to examine Witnesses, who took many Depositions against him. He lay in Prison till Queen Maries time; and then he was kept in on the account of his Belief. But his suffering afterwards for his Conscience, when Morgan, who had been his chief Accuser before on those other Articles, being then made his Judge, condemned him for Heresie, and made room for himself to be Bishop by burning him, did much turn the Peoples Censures from him, upon his Successor.

By these Letters Patents it is clear, that the Episcopal Function was acknowledged to be of Divine appointment, and that the Person was no other way named by the King than as Lay-Patrons present to Livings; only the Bishop was legally authorized, in such a part of the Kings Dominions, to execute that Function which was to be derived to him by Imposition of Hands. Therefore here was no pretence for denying that such Persons were true Bishops, and for saying, as some have done, that they were not from Christ, but from the King.

Upon this occasion it will not be improper to represent to the Reader how this matter stands according to the Law at this day, which is

is the more neceſſary, becauſe ſome ſuperficial Writers have either miſ-underſtood, or miſ-repreſented it. The Act that authorized thoſe Letters Patents, and required the Biſhops to hold their Courts in the Kings Name, was repealed both by the 1 Mar. Chap. 2. and 1, and 2 Phil. and Mary Chap. 8. The latter of theſe that repealed only a part of it, was repealed by the 1 Eliz. Chap. 1. and the former by the 1 Jac. Chap. 25. So ſome have argued, that ſince thoſe Statutes which repealed this Act of Edward the 6th. 1 Par. Chap. 2. are ſince repealed, that it ſtands now in full force. This ſeems to have ſome colour in it, and ſo it was brought in queſtion in Parliament in the fourth year of King James: and great debate being made about it, the King appointed the two Chief Juſtices to ſearch into the matter: they upon a ſlight enquiry agreed, that the Statute of Edw. the 6th. was in force by that Repeal; but the Chief Baron, and the other Judges, ſearching the matter more carefully, found, that the Statute had been in effect repealed by the firſt of Eliz. Ch. 1. where the Act of the 25 Hen. 8. concerning the Election and Juriſdiction of Biſhops, as formerly they had exerciſed it, was revived: ſo that being in full force the Act of Edw. the 6th. that repealed it, was thereby repealed. To this all the Learned Men of the Law did then agree; ſo that it was not thought ſo much as neceſſary to make an explanatory Law about it, the thing being indeed ſo clear, that it did not admit of any ambiguity. 1553. Coke 2. Inſt. P. 684, 685.

In May this Year the King by his Letters Patents authorized all Schoolmaſters to teach a new and fuller Catechiſme, compiled, as is believed, by Poinet.

Theſe are all the Paſſages in which the Church is concerned this Year. The Forreign Negotiations were important. For now the ballance began to turn to the French ſide; therefore the Council reſolved to mediate a Peace between the French and the Emperor. The Emperor had ſent over an Ambaſſador in September laſt year, to deſire the King would conſider the danger in which Flanders was now, by the French Kings having Metz, with the other Towns in Lorrain, which did in a great meaſure divide it from the aſſiſtance of the Empire: and therefore moved, that according to the ancient League between England and the Houſe of Burgundy, they would enter into a new League with him. Upon this occaſion the Reader will find how the Secretaries of State bred the King to the underſtanding of buſineſs, with relation to the Studies he was then about: for Secretary Cecil ſet down all the Arguments for and againſt that League, with little Notes on the Margent, relating to ſuch Topicks from whence he brought them; by which it ſeems the King was then learning Logick. It is the fifth of thoſe Papers after his Journal. King Edwards Remains, Number 5.

A Treaty with the Emperor.

It was reſolved on, to ſend Sir Richard Moriſon, with inſtructions to complement the Emperor upon his coming into Flanders, and to make an offer of the Kings aſſiſtance againſt the Turks, who had made great Depredations that year both in Hungary, Italy, and Sicily. If the Emperor ſhould, upon that, complain of the French King, and ſay, that he had brought in the Turks, and ſhould have asked aſſiſtance againſt him; he was to move the Emperor to ſend over an 1553. Ambaſſador to treat about it; ſince he that was then Reſident in England was not very acceptable. Theſe Inſtructions (which are in the Collection) were Signed in September, but not made uſe of till January this year. And then new Orders were ſent to propoſe the King to be a Mediator between France and the Emperor. Upon which, the Biſhop of Norwich, and Sir Phil. Hobbey were ſent over to joyn with Sir Richard Moriſon: and Sir William Pickering, and Sir Tho. Chaloner, were ſent into France. In May the Emperor fell ſick, and the Engliſh Ambaſſadors could learn nothing certainly concerning him: but then the Queen of Hungary, and the Biſhop of Arras treated with them. The Biſhop of Arras complained, that the French had begun the War, had taken the Emperors Ships at Barcelona, had robbed his Subjects at Sea, had ſtirred up the Princes of Germany againſt him, had taken ſome of the Towns of the Empire from him; while the French Ambaſſadors were all the while ſwearing to the Emperor, that their Maſter intended nothing ſo much as to preſerve the Peace: ſo that now, although the French were making ſeveral Overtures for Peace, they could give no credit to any thing that came from them. In fine, the Queen and Biſhop of Arras, promiſed the Engliſh Ambaſſadors to let the Emperor know of the Kings offering himſelf to mediate; and afterwards told them, that the Emperor delayed giving anſwer till he were well enough to do it himſelf.

Collection Number 57.

On the 26th. of May, the Ambaſſadors writ over that there was a Project ſent them out of Germany, of an Alliance between the Emperor, Ferdinand King of the Romans, the King of England, and the Princes of the Empire. They did not deſire that the King ſhould offer to come into it of his own accord; but John Frederick of Saxe would move Ferdinand to invite the King into it. This way they thought would give leaſt jealouſie. They hoped the Emperor would eaſily agree to the conditions that related to the Peace of Germany, ſince he was now out of all hopes of making himſelf Maſter of it. The Princes neither loved, nor truſted him; but loved his Brother, and relied much on England. But the Emperor having propoſed, that the Netherlands ſhould be included in the perpetual League of the Empire, they would not agree to that, unleſs the Quota's of their Contribution were much changed: for theſe Provinces were like to be the Seats of Wars, therefore they would not engage for their defence, but upon reciprocal advantages and eaſie terms.

When the Engliſh Ambaſſadors in the Court of France, deſired to know on what terms a Peace might be mediated, they found they were much exalted with their ſucceſs: ſo that (as they writ over on the firſt of May) they demanded the reſtitution of Millan, and the Kingdoms of Sicily, Naples, and Navarre, the Sovereignty of Flanders, Artois, and the Town of Tournay; they would alſo have Siena to be reſtored to its liberty, and Metz, Toul, and Verdun, to continue under the Protection of France. Theſe terms the Council thought ſo unreaſonable, that, though they writ them over as News to their Ambaſſadors in Flanders, yet they charged them not to propoſe propoſe them. But the Queen of Hungary asked them what Propoſitions they had for a Peace, knowing already what they were; and from thence ſtudied to inflame the Ambaſſadors, ſince it appeared how little the French regarded their Mediation, or the Peace of Chriſtendom, when they asked ſuch high and extravagant things upon a little ſucceſs. 1553.

On the 9th. of June the Emperor ordered the Ambaſſadors to be brought into his Bed-Chamber, whither they were carried by the Queen of Hungary. He looked pale, and lean; but his Eyes were lively, and his Speech clear. They made him a Complement upon his Sickneſs, which he returned with another for their long attendance. Upon the matter of their Embaſſy, he ſaid, the King of France had begun the War, and muſt likewiſe begin the Propoſitions of Peace: But he accepted of the Kings Offer very kindly, and ſaid, They ſhould always find in him great inclinations to a juſt Peace. On the firſt of July the Council writ to their Ambaſſadors. Firſt, aſſuring them, that the King was ſtill alive, and they hoped he ſhould recover; they told them, they did not find that the French would offer any other terms than thoſe formerly made: and they continued ſtill in that mind, that they could not be offered by them as Mediators; yet they ordered them to impart them unto the Emperor as News, and carefully to obſerve his looks and behaviour upon their opening of every one of them.

The Kings ſickneſs.

But now the Kings death broke off this Negotiation, together with all his other Affairs. He had laſt year, firſt the Meaſels, and then the Small-Pox, of which he was perfectly recovered: In his Progreſs, he had been ſometimes violent in his Exerciſes, which had caſt him into great Colds: but theſe went off, and he ſeemed to be well after it. But in the beginning of January this year he was ſeized with a deep Cough; and all Medicines that were uſed did rather encreaſe than leſſen it; upon which a ſuſpition was taken up, and ſpread over all the World, (ſo that it is mentioned by moſt of the Hiſtorians of that Age) that ſome lingering Poiſon had been given him: but more than Rumours, and ſome ill-favoured Circumſtances, I could never diſcover concerning this. He was ſo ill, when the Parliament met, that he was not able to go to Weſtminſter; but ordered their firſt meeting, and the Sermon to be at White-hall. In the time of his ſickneſs, Biſhop Ridley preached before him, and took occaſion to run out much on Works of Charity; and the obligation that lay on Men of high Condition to be eminent in good Works. This touched the King to the quick: So that preſently after Sermon he ſent for the Biſhop. And after he had commanded him to ſit down by him, and be covered, he reſumed moſt of the Heads of the Sermon, and ſaid, he looked on himſelf as chiefly touched by it: he deſired him, as he had already given him the Exhortation in general, ſo to direct him how to do his duty in that Particular. The Biſhop, aſtoniſhed at this tenderneſs in ſo young a Prince, burſt forth in Tears, expreſſing how much he was overjoyed to ſee ſuch Inclinations in him: but told him he muſt take time to think on it, and craved leave to conſult with the Lord Major and Court of Aldermen. So the King writ

His care of the Relief of the Poor.

1553. by him to them to consult speedily how the Poor should be relieved. They considered there were three sorts of Poor; such as were so by natural infirmity or folly, as impotent Persons, and Mad-men, or Ideots; such as were so by accident, as sick, or maimed Persons; and such as by their idleness did cast themselves into poverty. So the King ordered the Gray-Friars Church near Newgate with the Revenues belonging to it, to be a House for Orphans: St. Bartholomews near Smith-field to be an Hospital: and gave his own House of Bridewell to be a Place of Correction and Work for such as were willfully idle. He also confirmed and enlarged the grant for the Hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark, which he had erected and endowed in August last. And when he set his Hand to these Foundations, which was not done before the 26*th.* of June this Year: He thanked God, that had prolonged his Life, till he had finished that design. So he was the first Founder of those Houses, which, by many great Additions since that time have risen to be among the Noblest in Europe.

He expressed in the whole course of his Sickness great submission to the Will of God, and seemed glad at the approaches of death; only the consideration of Religion and the Church touched him much; and upon that account he said, he was desirous of Life. About the end of May, or beginning of June, the Duke of Suffolks three Daughters were married: The eldest, Lady Jane, to the Lord Guilford Dudley, the fourth Son of the Duke of Northumberland, (who was the only Son whom he had yet unmarried:) The second, the Lady Katharine, to the Earl of Pembroke's eldest Son, the Lord Herbert: The third, the Lady Mary, who was crooked, to the Kings Groom-Porter Martin Keys. The Duke of Northumberland married his two Daughters, the eldest to Sir Henry Sidney, Son to Sir William Sidney, that had been Steward to the King when he was Prince; the other was married to the Lord Hastings, Son to the Earl of Huntingdon. The People were mightily inflamed against this insolent Duke, for it was generally given out, that he was sacrificing the King to his own extravagant ambition. He seemed little to regard their Censures, but attended on the King most constantly, and expressed all the care and concern about him that was possible. And finding that nothing went so near his Heart as the ruine of Religion, which he apprehended would follow upon his death, when his Sister Mary should come to the Crown: Upon that, he and his Party took advantage to propose to him to settle the Crown by his Letters Patents on the Lady Jane Gray. How they prevailed with him to pass by his Sister Elizabeth, who had been always much in his favour, I do not so well understand. But the King being wrought over to this, the Dutchess of Suffolk, who was next in King Henry's Will, was ready to devolve her Right on her Daughter, even though she should come afterwards to have Sons. So on the 11*th.* of June, Mountague that was Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and Baker, and Bromley, two Judges with the Kings Attorney, and Solicitor, were commanded to come to Council. There they found the King with some Privy-Councellors about him. The King told them, he did now apprehend the the danger the Kingdom might be in, if upon his death his Siſter Mary ſhould ſucceed; who might marry a Stranger, and ſo change the Laws and the Religion of the Realm. So he ordered ſome Articles to be read to them, of the way in which he would have the Crown to deſcend. They objected, that the Act of Succeſſion, being an Act of Parliament, could not be taken away by any ſuch device: yet the King required them to take the Articles, and draw a Book according to them: they asked a little time to conſider of it. So having examined the Statute of the firſt Year of this Reign, concerning Treaſons, they found that it was Treaſon, not only after the Kings death, but even in his Life, to change the Succeſſion. Secretary Petre in the mean while preſſed them to make haſte: When they came again to the Council, they declared they could not do any ſuch thing; for it was Treaſon; and all the Lords ſhould be guilty of Treaſon if they went on in it. Upon which the Duke of Northumberland, who was not then in the Council-Chamber, being advertiſed of this, came in great fury, calling Mountague a Traitor, and threatned all the Judges; ſo that they thought he would have beaten them. But the Judges ſtood to their Opinion. They were again ſent for, and came, with Goſnold added to them, on the 15*th.* of June. The King was preſent, and he ſomewhat ſharply asked them, Why they had not prepared the Book as he had ordered them? They anſwered, That what ever they did would be of no force without a Parliament. The King ſaid, he intended to have one ſhortly. Then Mountague propoſed, that it might be delayed till the Parliament met. But the King ſaid, He would have it firſt done, and then ratified in Parliament; and therefore he required them on their Allegiance to go about it; and ſome Counſellors told them, if they refuſed to obey that, they were Traitors. This put them in a great conſternation; and old Mountague, thinking it could not be Treaſon what ever they did in this matter while the King lived, and at worſt, that a Pardon under the Great Seal would ſecure him, conſented to ſet about it, if he might have a Commiſſion requiring him to do it, and a Pardon under the Great Seal when it was done. Both theſe being granted him, he was ſatisfied. The other Judges, being asked if they would concur, did all agree, being overcome with fear; except Goſnald, who ſtill refuſed to do it. But he alſo, being ſorely threatned, both by the Duke of Northumberland, and the Earl of Shrewsbury, conſented to it the next day. So they put the Entail of the Crown in Form of Law, and brought it to the Lord Chancellor to put the Seal to it. They were all required to ſet their Hands to it, but both Goſnald and Hales refuſed. Yet the former was wrought on to do it, but the latter, though a moſt ſteady and zealous Man for the Reformation, would upon no conſideration yield to it: After that the Lord Chancellor, for his Security, deſired that all the Counſellors might ſet their Hands to it; which was done on the 21*ſt.* of June by thirty three of them; it is like, including the Judges in the Number. But Cranmer, as he came ſeldom to Council after the Duke of Somerſets Fall, ſo he was that day abſent on deſign. Cecil, in a Relation which he made one write of this Tranſaction, for clearing himſelf afterwards, ſays, That when he had heard Goſnald and Hales declare how much it was againſt Law, he refuſed to ſet his Hand to it as a Counſellor, and that he only Signed as a Witneſs

But through fear all yielded except Judge Hales.

1553 Witnesses to the Kings Subscription. But Cranmer still refused to do it after they had all Signed it, and said he would never consent to the disinheriting of the Daughters of his late Master. Many Consultations were had to perswade him to it. But he could not be prevailed on, till the King himself set on him; who used many Arguments, from the danger Religion would otherwise be in, together with other Perswasions; so that, by his Reasons, or rather Importunities, at last he brought him to it. But whether he also used that distinction of Cecils, that he did it as a Witness, and not as a Counsellor, I do not know: but it seems probable that if that liberty was allowed the one, it would not be denied the other.

Cranmer was very hardly brought to consent to it.

The Kings sickness becomes desperate.

But though the setling this business gave the King great content in his mind, yet his Distemper rather encreased than abated; so that the Physicians had no hope of his recovery. Upon which, a confident Woman came, and undertook his Cure, if he might be put into her Hands. This was done, and the Physicians were put from him, upon this pretence, that they having no hopes of his recovery, in a desperate Cause desperate Remedies were to be used. This was said to be the Duke of Northumberlands advice in particular; and it encreased the Peoples jealousie of him, when they saw the King grow very sensibly worse every day after he came under the Womans care: which becoming so plain, she was put from him, and the Physicians were again sent for, and took him into their charge. But if they had small hopes before, they had none at all now. Death thus hastening on him, the Duke of Northumberland, who knew he had done but half his work, except he had the Kings Sisters in his hands, got the Council to write to them in the Kings Name, inviting them to come and keep him company in his sickness. But as they were on the way, on the sixth of July, his Spirits and Body were so sunk, that he found death approaching; and so he composed himself to die in a most devout manner. His whole exercise was in short Prayers and Ejaculations. The last that he was heard to use was in these words: Lord God deliver me out of this miserable and wretched Life, and take me among thy Chosen; Howbeit not my Will but thine be done; Lord, I commit my Spirit to thee. O Lord, thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy Chosens sake send me Life and Health, that I may truly serve thee. O my Lord God, bless my People, and save thine Inheritance; O Lord God, save thy chosen People of England; O Lord God, defend this Realm from Papistry, and maintain thy true Religion, that I and my People may praise thy Holy Name, for Jesus Christ his sake. Seeing some about him, he seemed troubled, that they were so near, and had heard him: but with a pleasant countenance he said, he had been praying to God. And soon after, the Pangs of death coming on him, he said to Sir Henry Sidney, who was holding him in his Arms, I am faint, Lord have mercy on me, and receive my Spirit; and so he breathed out his Innocent Soul. The Duke of Northumberland, according to Cecils Relation, intended to have concealed his death for a fortnight, but it could not be done.

His last Prayer

His Death and Character.

Thus died King Edward the sixth, that incomparable young Prince. He was then in the sixteenth Year of his Age, and was counted the wonder of that Time. He was not only learned in the Tongues, and other Liberal beral Sciences, but knew well the State of his Kingdom. He kept a Book, in which he writ the Characters that were given him, of all the chief Men of the Nation, all the Judges, Lord-Lieutenants, and Juſtices of the Peace over England: in it he had marked down their way of living, and their zeal for Religion. He had ſtudied the matter of the Mint, with the Exchange, and value of Money; ſo that he underſtood it well, as appears by his Journal. He alſo underſtood Fortification, and deſigned well. He knew all the Harbours and Ports, both of his own Dominions, and of France, and Scotland; and how much Water they had, and what was the way of coming in to them. He had acquired great knowledge in Forreign Affairs; ſo that he talked with the Ambaſſadors about them in ſuch a manner, that they filled all the World with the higheſt opinion of him that was poſſible; which appears in moſt of the Hiſtories of that Age. He had great quickneſs of apprehenſion; and being miſtruſtful of his memory, uſed to take Notes of almoſt every thing he heard: he writ theſe firſt in Greek Characters, that thoſe about him might not underſtand them; and afterwards writ them out in his Journal. He had a Copy brought him of every thing that paſſed in Council, which he put in a Cheſt, and kept the Key of that always himſelf. 1553.

In a word, the natural and acquired perfections of his mind were wonderful; but his Vertues and true Piety were yet more extraordinary. He was ſuch a Friend to Juſtice, that though he loved his Unkle the Duke of Somerſet much, yet when he was poſſeſſed of a belief of his deſigning to murder his Fellow-Councellors, he was alienated from him: and being then but fourteen, it was no wonder if that was too eaſily infuſed in him. His chief Favourite was Barnaby Fitz-Patrick, to whom he writ many Letters and Inſtructions when he ſent him to be bred in France. In one of his Letters to him, he writ, That he muſt not think to live like an Ambaſſador, but like a private Gentleman, who was to be advanced as he ſhould deſerve it. He allowed him to keep but four Servants: he charged him to follow the company of Gentlemen, rather than of Ladies: that he ſhould not be ſuperfluous in his Apparel: that he ſhould go to the Campagne, and obſerve well the Conduct of Armies, and the Fortification of ſtrong Places: and let the King know always when he needed Money, and he would ſupply him. All theſe with many other directions the King writ with his own Hand: and at his return, to let him ſee he intended to raiſe him by degrees, he gave him a Penſion only of 150 Pound. This Fitz-Patrick did afterwards fully anſwer the opinion this young King had of him. He was bred up with him in his Learning; and as it is ſaid, had been his whipping Boy, who according to the Rule of educating our Princes, was alway to be whipt for the Kings faults. He was afterwards made by Queen Elizabeth Baron of Upper Oſſory in Ireland, which was his Native Country.

King Edward was tender and compaſſionate in a high meaſure: ſo that he was much againſt the taking away the Lives of Hereticks; and therefore ſaid to Cranmer, when he perſwaded him to Sign the Warrant for the burning of Joan of Kent, that he was not willing to do it, becauſe he thought that was to ſend her quick to Hell. He expreſſed great tenderneſs to the miſeries of the Poor in his ſickneſs, as hath been already

1553 ſhewn. He took particular care of the Sutes of all poor Perſons; and gave Dr. Cox ſpecial charge to ſee that their Petitions were ſpeedily anſwered, and uſed oft to conſult with him how to get their matters ſet forward. He was an exact keeper of his word; and therefore, as appears by his Journal, was moſt careful to pay his Debts, and to keep his credit: knowing that to be the chief Nerve of Government; ſince a Prince that breaks his Faith, and loſes his Credit, has thrown up that which he can never recover, and made himſelf liable to perpetual diſtruſts, and extream contempt.

He had above all things a great regard to Religion. He took Notes of ſuch things as he heard in Sermons, which more ſpecially concerned himſelf: and made his meaſures of all Men by their zeal in that matter. This made him ſo ſet on bringing over his Siſter Mary to the ſame Perſwaſions with himſelf; that when he was preſſed to give way to her having Maſs, he ſaid, That he would not only hazard the loſs of the Emperors friendſhip, but of his Life, and all he had in the World, rather than conſent to what he knew was a ſin: and he cited ſome Paſſages of Scripture that obliged Kings to root out Idolatry; by which he ſaid he was bound in Conſcience not to conſent to her Maſs; ſince he believed it was Idolatry; and did argue the matter ſo learnedly with the Biſhops, that they left him, being amazed at his knowledge in Divinity. So that Cranmer took Cheek by the Hand upon it, and ſaid, He had reaſon all the days of his Life to rejoyce that God had honoured him to breed ſuch a Scholar. All Men who ſaw and obſerved theſe qualities in him, looked on him as one raiſed by God for moſt extraordinary ends; and when he died, concluded that the ſins of England muſt needs be very great, that had provoked God to take from them a Prince under whoſe Government they were like to have ſeen ſuch bleſſed times. He was ſo affable and ſweet natured, that all had free acceſs to him at all times; by which he came to be moſt univerſally beloved, and all the high things that could be deviſed were ſaid by the People to expreſs their eſteem of him. The Fable of the Phœnix pleaſed moſt; ſo they made his Mother one Phœnix, and him another, riſing out of her Aſhes. But graver Men compared him to Joſiah; and long after his death I find both in Letters and Printed Books they commonly named him Our Joſias, others called him Edward the Saint.

A Prince of ſuch qualities; ſo much eſteemed and loved, could not but be much lamented at his death; and this made thoſe of the Reformation abhor the Duke of Northumberland, who they ſuſpected had haſtened him to ſuch an untimely end: which contributed, as much as any thing, to the eſtabliſhing of Queen Mary on the Throne; for the People reckoned none could be ſo unworthy to govern, as thoſe who had poiſoned ſo worthy a Prince, and ſo kind a Maſter. I find nothing of opening his Body for giving ſatisfaction about that which brought him to his end; though his lying unburied till the eight of Auguſt makes it probable that he was opened.

But indeed the ſins of England, did at this time call down from Heven heavy Curſes on the Land. They are ſadly expreſſed in a Diſcourſe that Ridley writ ſoon after, under the Title of the Lamentation of England: he ſays Lechery, Oppreſſion, Pride, Covetouſneſs, and a hatred and and ſcorn of Religion, were generally ſpread among all People: chiefly thoſe of the higher Rank. Cranmer and he had been much diſliked: the former for delivering his Conſcience ſo freely on the Duke of Somerſets death; and both of them for oppoſing ſo much the rapine and ſpoil of the Goods of the Church, which was done without Law or Order. Nor could they engage any to take care of relieving the Poor, except only Dobbs, who was then Lord Major of London. Theſe ſins were openly preached againſt, by Latimer, Lever, Bradford, and Knox, who did it more ſeverely, and by others who did it plainly, though more ſoftly. One of the main cauſes Ridley gives of all theſe evils, was, that many of the Biſhops, and moſt of the Clergy, being all the while Papiſts in Heart, who had only complied to preſerve their Benefices, took no care of their Pariſhes, and were rather well pleaſed that things were ill managed. And of this that good Biſhop had been long very apprehenſive when he conſidered the ſins then prevailing, and the Judgments which they had reaſon to look for; as will appear by an excellent Letter, which he ſent about to his Clergy to ſet them on to ſuch Duties as ſo ſad a Proſpect required: It will be found in the Collection; and though it belongs to the former Year, yet I chooſe rather to bring it in on this occaſion. Theſe things having been fully laid open in the former parts of this Work, I ſhall not inſiſt on them here, having mentioned them only for this cauſe, that the Reader may from hence gather, what we may ſtill expect, if we continue guilty of the ſame or worſe ſins, after all that illumination and knowledge with which we have been ſo long bleſt in theſe Kingdoms. 1553.

BOOK II.

THE LIFE AND REIGN OF Queen MARY.

1553.

Q. Mary ſucceeds, but is in great danger.

UPon the Death of King Edward, the Crown devolved, according to King Henry's Will, and the Act of Parliament, made in the 35*th.* Year of his Reign, on his Eldeſt Siſter, the now Queen Mary. She was on her way to London, in obedience to the Letters that had been writ to her, to come and comfort her Brother in his Sickneſs; and was come within half a days Journey of the Court, when ſhe received an Advertiſement from the Earl of Arundel, that her Brother was dead; together with an account of what was done about the Succeſſion. The Earl alſo informed her, that the King's Death was concealed, on deſign to entrap her before ſhe knew of it; and therefore he adviſed her to retire. Upon this, ſhe knowing that the Duke of Northumberland was much hated in Norfolk, for the great ſlaughter he had made of the Rebels, when he ſubdued them in the third Year of the laſt Reign; therefore choſe to go that way to the Caſtle of Framlingham in Suffolk: Which Place being near the Sea, ſhe might, if her Deſigns ſhould miſcarry, have an opportunity from thence to fly over to the Emperor that was then in Flanders.

And retires to Suffolk.

At London, it ſeems, the whole Buſineſs of ſetting up the Lady Jane, had been carried very ſecretly; ſince if Queen Mary had heard any 1553. hint of it, she had certainly kept out of the way, and not adventured to have come so near the Town. It was an unaccountable Error in the Party for the Lady Jane, that they had not, immediately after the Seal was put to the Letters Patents, or at furthest, presently after the King's Death, sent some to make sure of the King's Sisters; instead of which they thus lingred, hoping they would have come into their Toils, in an easier and less violent way. On the 8*th*. of July, they writ to the English Ambassadors at Brussels the news of the King's Death, but said nothing of the Succession. On the 9*th*. of July, they perceived the King's Death was known; for Queen Mary writ to them, from Kenning-Hall, that she understood the King her Brother was dead; which how sorrowful it was to her, God only knew, to whose Will she did humbly submit her Will. The Provision of the Crown to her, after his Death, she said, was well known to them all; but she thought it strange, that he being three days dead, she had not been advertised of it by them. She knew what Consultations were against her, and what Engagements they had entred into; but was willing to take all their Doings in good part, and therefore did give Pardon for all that was past, to such as would accept of it, and required them to proclaim her Title to the Crown in London.

She writes to the Council.

Upon this Letter, they saw the death of the King could no longer be concealed; so the Duke of Suffolk, and the Duke of Northumberland, went to Durham-House, where the Lady Jane lay, to give her notice of her being to succeed to the Crown, in the room of the deceased King. She received the News with great sorrow for King Edward's Death; which was not at all lessened, but rather encreased, by that other part of their Message, concerning her being to succeed him.

Who declare for the Lady Jane.

Lady Jane's Character.

She was a Lady that seemed indeed born for a great Fortune; for she was a beautiful and graceful Person, so she had great Parts, and greater Vertues. Her Tutor was Dr. Elmer, believed to be the first that was afterwards made Bishop of London by Queen Elizabeth. She had learned from him the Latin and Greek Tongues to great perfection; so that being of the same Age with the late King, she seemed his perior to him in those Languages. And having acquired the helps Knowledge, she spent her time much in the study of it. Roger Asch Tutor to the Lady Elizabeth, coming once to wait on her at her ther's House in Leicestershire, found her reading Plato's Works in Gre when all the rest of the Family were hunting in the Park: He ask her, How she could be absent from such pleasant Diversions? She a swered, The Pastimes in the Park were but a shadow to the delight had in reading Plato's Phedon, which then lay open before her; added, That she esteemed it one of the greatest Blessings that G ever gave her, that she had sharp Parents, and a gentle Schoolmas which made her take delight in nothing so much, as in her Study. S read the Scriptures much, and had attained great knowledge in Div ty. But with all these Advantages of Birth and Parts, she was so ble, so gentle, and pious, that all People both admired and loved and none more than the late King. She had a Mind wonderfully ra above the World, and at the Age wherein others are but imbib the Notions of Philosophy, she had attained to the practice of high highest Precepts of it. She was neither lifted up with the hope of a Crown, nor cast down when she saw her Palace made afterwards her Prison; but carried her self, with an equal temper of Mind, in those great inequalities of Fortune, that so suddenly exalted and depressed her. All the Passion she expressed in it was, that which is of the noblest sort, and is the indication of tender and generous Natures, being much affected with the Troubles her Father and Husband fell in, on her account. 1553.

The mention of the Crown, when her Father, with her Father-in-Law, saluted her, Queen, did rather heighten her disorder upon the King's Death. She said, She knew, by the Laws of the Kingdom, and by natural Right, the Crown was to go to the King's Sisters; so that she was afraid of burdening her Conscience, by assuming that which belonged to them; and that she was unwilling to enrich her self by the spoils of others. But they told her, all that had been done was according to the Law, to which all the Judges and Counsellors had set their Hands. This joyned with their Persuasions, and the Importunities of her Husband, who had more of his Fathers temper, than of her Philosophy in him, at length prevailed with her to submit to it: Of which her Father-in-Law did afterwards say in Council, She was rather, by enticement of the Counsellors, and force, made to accept of the Crown, than came to it by her own seeking and request. Her unwillingness to accept of the Crown.

Upon this, Order was given for proclaiming her Queen the next day. And an Answer was writ to Queen Mary, signed by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland; the Marquesses of Winchester and Northampton; the Earls of Arundel, Shrewsbury, Huntington, Bedford, and Pembrook; the Lords, Cobham and Darcy; Sir Thomas Cheyney, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir William Petre, Sir William Cecil, Sir John Cheek, Sir John Mason, Sir Edward North, and Sir Robert Bowes, in all one and twenty; letting her know, 'That Queen Jane was now their Soveraign, according to the Ancient Laws of the Land, and the late King's Letters Patents, to whom they were now bound by their Allegiance. They told her, That the Marriage between her Father and Mother, was dissolved by the Ecclesiastical Courts, according to the Laws of God, and of the Land. That many noble Universities in Christendom had consented to it; That the Sentence had been confirmed in Parliaments, and she had been declared illegitimate, and uninheritable to the Crown. They therefore required her to give over her Pretences, and not to disturb the Government; and promised, that if she shewed her self Obedient, she should find them all ready to do her any Service which in Duty they could. Council writes to Q. Mary.

The day following they proclaimed Queen Jane. The Proclamation will be found in the Collection. It sets forth, 'That the late King had, by his Letters Patents, limited the Crown, that it should not descend to his two Sisters, since they were both illegitimated by Sentences in the Spiritual Courts, and Acts of Parliament, and were only his Sisters by the Half-Blood, who (though it were granted they had been legitimate) are not inheritable by the Law of England. It was added, That there was also great cause to fear, that the King's Sisters might marry Strangers, and so change the Laws of the Kingdom, and Lady Jane proclaimed Queen. Collection. Number 1.

1553. 'ſubject it to the Tyranny of the Biſhops of Rome, and other Foreign Laws. For theſe Reaſons they were excluded from the Succeſſion; and the Lady Frances, Dutcheſs of Suffolk, being next the Crown, it was provided, that if ſhe had no Sons at the death of the King, the Crown ſhould devolve immediately on her eldeſt Daughter Jane, and after her, and her Iſſue, to her Siſters; ſince ſhe was born within the Kingdom, and already married in it. Therefore ſhe was proclaimed Queen, promiſing to be moſt benign and gracious to all her People, to maintain God's Holy Word, and the Laws of the Land, requiring all the Subjects to obey and acknowledge her. When this was proclaimed, great multitudes were gathered to hear it; but there were very few that ſhouted with the Acclamations ordinary on ſuch Occaſions. And whereas a Vintner's Boy did ſome-way expreſs his ſcorn at that which was done, it was ordered, that he ſhould be made an Example the next day, by being ſet on a Pillory, and having his Ears nail'd to it, and cut off from his Head; which was accordingly done; a Herauld in his Coat, reading to the multitude that was called together, by ſound of Trumpet, the nature of his Offence.

Cenſures paſs'd upon it.

Upon this, all People were in great diſtraction; The Proclamation, opening the new Queens Title, came to be variouſly deſcanted on. Some who thought the Crown deſcended by right of Blood, and that it could not be limited by Parliament, argued, that the King having his Power from God, it was only to deſcend in the natural way of Inheritance; therefore they thought the next Heir was to ſucceed. And whereas the King's two Siſters were both by ſeveral Sentences and Acts of Parliament, declared Baſtards; and whether that was well judged, or not, they were to be reputed ſuch as the Law declared them to be, ſo long as it ſtood in force; therefore they held that the Queen of Scotland was to ſucceed; who, though ſhe pretended this upon Queen Mary's Death, yet did not claim now, becauſe by the Papal Law, the Sentence againſt Queen Mary was declared Null. Others argued, that though a Prince were named by an immediate appointment from Heaven, yet he might change the courſe of Succeſſion, as David did, preferring Solomon before Adonijah: But this, it was ſaid, did not belong to the Kings of England, whoſe right to the Crown, with the extent of their Prerogative, did not come from any Divine Deſignation, but from a long Poſſeſſion, and the Laws of the Land: and that therefore the King might by Law limit the Succeſſion, as well as he and other Kings had in ſome Points limited the Prerogative, (which was clearly Sir Thomas More's Opinion;) and that therefore the Act of Parliament, for the Succeſſion of the King's Siſters, was ſtill ſtrong in Law. It was alſo ſaid, That if the King's Siſters were to be excluded for Baſtardy, all Charles Brandon's Iſſue were in the ſame predicament; ſince he was not lawfully married to the French Queen, his former Wife Mortimer being then alive, and his Marriage with her was never diſſolved; (for though ſome Engliſh Writers ſay they were divorced, yet thoſe who wrote for the Queen of Scots Title, in the next Reign denied it;) But in this the difference was great between them; ſince the King's Siſters were declared Baſtards in Law, whereas this againſt Charles Brandon's Iſſue, was only a Surmiſe. Others objected, That if the Blood gave an Indefeaſible Title, how came it that the L. Jane's Mother did not Reign? It is true, Maud the Empreſs, Empreſs, and Margaret Counteſs of Richmond, were ſatisfied that their Sons, Henry the Second, and Henry the Seventh, ſhould reign in their Rights; but it had never been heard of, that a Mother had reſigned to her Daughter, eſpecially when ſhe was yet under Age. But this was imputed to the Duke of Suffolk's weakneſs, and the Ambition of the Duke of Northumberland. That Objection concerning the Half-Blood, being a Rule of Common Law in the Families of Subjects, to cut off from Step-Mothers the Inclinations and Advantages of deſtroying their Husbands Children, was not thought applicable to the Crown: Nor was that of Ones being born out of the Kingdom, which was hinted at to exclude the Queen of Scotland, thought pertinent to this Caſe: ſince there was an Exception made in the Law for the King's Children, which was thought to extend to all their Iſſue. But all People agreed in this, that though by Act of Parliament, King Henry was empowred to provide or limit the Crown, by his Letters Patents; yet that was a Grant particularly to him, and did not deſcend to his Heirs: So that the Letters Patents made by King Edward, could have no force to ſettle the Crown, and much leſs when they did expreſly contradict an Act of Parliament. The proceeding ſo ſeverely againſt the Vintner's Boy, was imputed to the violent temper of the Duke of Northumberland. And though when a Government is Firm, and Factions are weak, the making ſome publick Examples, may intimidate a Faction otherwiſe diſheartned; yet Severities, in ſuch a juncture as this, when the Council had no other Support but the aſſiſtance of the People, ſeemed very unadviſed; and I thought it was a great Error to puniſh him in that manner. 1553.

This made them reflect on the reſt of Northumberland's Cruelties; in bringing the Duke of Somerſet, with thoſe Gentlemen that ſuffered with him, to their End, by a foul Conſpiracy; but above all things, the Suſpitions that lay on him, of being the Author of the late King's untimely Death, enraged the People ſo much againſt him, that without conſidering what they might ſuffer under Queen Mary, they generally inclined to ſet her up. The Duke of Northumberland much hated.

The Lady Jane was proclaimed in many Towns near London, yet the People were generally running to Queen Mary: Many from Norfolk came to her, and a great Body of Suffolk Men gathered about her, who were all for the Reformation. They deſired to know of her, whether ſhe would alter the Religion ſet up in King Edward's Days; to whom ſhe gave full Aſſurances, that ſhe would never make any Innovation or Change, but be contented with the private Exerciſe of her own Religion. Upon this they were all poſſeſſed with ſuch a belief of her ſincerity, that it made them reſolve to hazard their Lives and Eſtates in her Quarrel. The Earls of Bath and Suſſex raiſed Forces, and joined with her; ſo did the Sons of the Lord Wharton and Mordant; with many more. Many declare for Q. Mary.

Upon this the Council reſolved to gather Forces for the diſperſing of theirs, and ſent the Earl of Huntington's Brother to raiſe Buckingham-ſhire, and others to other parts, ordering them to meet the Forces that ſhould come from London, at New-Market. It was at firſt propoſed to have the Duke of Suffolk to command them; but the Lady Jane was ſo much concerned in her Father's preſervation, that ſhe urged, he might not be ſent; and he being but a ſoft Man, was eaſily excuſed. So it The Council orders Forces to be ſent againſt her.

1553. it fell next on the Duke of Northumberland, who was now much distracted in his Mind. He was afraid, if he went away, the City might declare for Queen Mary; nor was he well assured of the Council, who seemed all to comply with him, rather out of fear, than good will. Cecil would not officiate as Secretary, as himself relates; the Judges would do nothing; and the Duke plainly saw, that if he had not (according to the custom of our Princes, on their first coming to the Crown) gone with the Lady Jane, and the Council, into the Tower, whereby he kept them as Prisoners, the Council were inclined to desert him. This divided him much in his Thoughts. The whole success of his Design depended on the dispersing of the Queens Forces: And it was no less necessary to have a Man of courage continue still in the Tower. There was none there whom he could entirely trust, but the Duke of Suffolk, and he was so mean spirited, that he did not depend much on him. But the progress the Queens Forces made, pressed him to go, and make head against her. So he laid all the heavy Charges he could on the Council, to look to Queen Jane, and to stand firmly to her Interests; and left London on the 14*th*. of July, marching out with 2000 Horse, and 6000 Foot. But as he rode through Bishops-gate street, and Shoreditch, though there were great Crouds looking on, none cried out to wish him success, which gave a sad indication how ill they were affected to him.

And write to the Emperor.

The Council writ to the Emperor by one Shelley, whom they sent to give notice of the Lady Jane's Succession, complaining that the Lady Mary was making Stirs, and that his Ambassador had officiously meddled in their Affairs; but that they had given Orders for reducing the Lady Mary to her Duty. They also desired the continuance of his Friendship, and that he would command his Resident to carry himself as became an Ambassador. Sir Philip Hobbey was continued Ambassador there; the others were ordered to stay and prosecute the Mediation of the Peace; but the Emperor would not receive the Letters; and in a few days there went over others from Queen Mary.

Ridley preaches for the L. Jane's Title.

Ridley was appointed to set out Queen Jane's Title, in a Sermon at Pauls; and to warn the People of the Dangers they would be in if Queen Mary should reign: which he did, and gave an account in a Sermon of what had passed between him and her, when he went and offered to preach to her. At the same time the Duke of Northumberland, at Cambridge, where himself was both Chancellor of the University, and Steward of the Town, made the Vice-Chancellor preach to the same purpose. But he held in more general terms, and managed it so that there was no great Offence taken on either hand.

Q. Mary's Party grows strong.

But now the Queen had made her Title be proclaimed at Norwich, and sent Letters all over England, requiring the Peers, and other persons of great Quality, to come to her assistance. Some Ships had been sent about, to lie on that Coast for intercepting her, if she should fly away; but those who commanded them were so dealt with, that instead of appearing against her, they declared for her. Sir Edward Hastings had raised 4000 Men in Buckinghamshire, instead of joyning with the Duke of Northumberland, went over with them into her Service. Many came also from all Places every day running to her, and in several Coof England ſhe was proclaimed Queen. But none came in to the Duke of Northumberland, ſo he writ earneſtly to the Lords at London, to ſend him more Supplies. 1553.

They underſtanding, from all the Corners of England, that the Tyde grew every-where ſtrong for the Queen, entred into Conſultations how to redeem their paſſed Faults, and to reconcile themſelves to her. The Earl of Arundel hated Northumberland on many accounts. The Marqueſs of Wincheſter was famous for his dexterity in ſhifting ſides, all ways to his own Advantage. To them joyned the Earl of Pembrook, the more cloſely linked to the Intereſts of the Lady Jane, ſince his Son had married her Siſter; which made him the more careful to diſentangle himſelf in time. To thoſe, Sir Thomas Cheney, Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Sir John Maſon, with the two Secretaries, came over. It was ſaid, that the French and Spaniſh Ambaſſadors had deſired an Audience in ſome Place in the City; and it was propoſed to give it in the Earl of Pembrooks Houſe; who being the leaſt ſuſpected, it was agreed to, by the Duke of Suffolk, that they ſhould be ſuffered to go from the Tower thither. They alſo pretended, that ſince the Duke of Northumberland had writ ſo earneſtly for new Forces, they muſt go and treat with my Lord Mayor and the City of London about it. But as ſoon as they were got out, the Earl of Arundel preſſed them to declare for Queen Mary: And to perſwade them to it, he laid open all the Cruelty of Northumberland, under whoſe Tyranny they muſt reſolve to be enſlaved, if they would not now ſhake it off. The other conſenting readily to it, they ſent for the Lord Mayor, with the Recorder, and the Aldermen; and having declared their Reſolutions to them, they rode together into Cheapſide, and there proclaimed Queen Mary, on the 19*th.* of July: From thence they went to Saint Pauls, where Te Deum was ſung. An Order was ſent to the Tower, to require the Duke of Suffolk to deliver up that Place, and to acknowledge Queen Mary: and that the Lady Jane ſhould lay down the Title of Queen. To this, as her Father ſubmitted tamely, ſo ſhe expreſſed no ſort of Concern in loſing that imaginary Glory, which now had for nine days been rather a Burden, than any Matter of Joy to her. They alſo ſent Orders to the Duke of Northumberland to disband his Forces, and to carry himſelf as became an Obedient Subject to the Queen. And the Earl of Arundel, with the Lord Paget, were ſent to give her an account of it, who continued ſtill at Framingham in Suffolk.

And the Council turn to her.

And proclaimed her Queen.

The Duke of Northumberland had retired back to Cambridge, to ſtay for new Men from London; but hearing how Matters went there, before ever the Councils Orders came to him, he diſmiſt his Forces, and went to the Market-place, and proclaimed the Queen, flinging up his own Hat for joy, and crying, God ſave Queen Mary. But the Earl of Arundel being ſent by the Queen to apprehend him; it is ſaid, That when he ſaw him, he fell abjectly at his Feet to beg his favour. This was like him, it being not more unuſual for ſuch Inſolent Perſons to be moſt baſely ſunk with their Misfortunes, than to be out of meaſure blown up with ſucceſs. He was, on the 25*th.* of July, ſent to the Tower, with the Earl of Warwick his eldeſt Son, Ambroſe and Henry two of his other Sons. Some other of his Friends were made Priſoners, among whom was Sir Thomas Palmer, the wicked Inſtrument of the

Now did all People go to the Queen to implore her Mercy. She received them all very favourably, except the Marques of Northampton, Dr. Ridley, and Lord Robert Dudley. The first of these had been a submissive fawner on the Duke of Northumberland; the second had incurred her displeasure by his Sermon, and she gladly laid hold on any colour to be more severe to him, that way might be made for bringing Bonner to London again; the third had followed his Father's Fortune. On the 27*th*, the Lords Chief Justices, Cholmley and Montague, were sent to the Tower; and the day after, the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir John Cheek, went after them; the Lady Jane and her Husband being still detained in the Tower. Three days after an Order came to set the Duke of Suffolk at liberty, upon engagement to return to Prison when the Queen required it, for it was generally known that he had been driven on by Dudley; and as it was believed, that he had not been faulty out of Malice, so his great weakness made them little apprehensive of any Dangers from him; and therefore the Queen being willing to express a signal Act of Clemency at her first coming to the Crown, it was thought best to let it fall on him.

The Queen enters London.

Now did the Queen come towards London, being met on the way by her Sister Elizabeth, with a thousand Horse, who had gathered about her, to shew their Zeal to maintain both their Titles, which in this late contest had been linked together. She made her entry into London on the third of August, with great solemnity and pomp. When she came to the Tower, the Duke of Norfolk, who had been almost seven Years in it; Gardiner, the Bishop of Winchester, that had been five Years there; the Dutchess of Somerset, that had been kept there near two Years; and the Lord Courtney, (whom she made afterwards Earl of Devonshire) that was Son to the Marques of Exeter, and had been kept there ever since his Father was Attainted, had their Liberty granted them. So now she was peaceably setled in the Throne, without any effusion of Blood; having broke through a Confederacy against her, which seemed to be so strong, that if he that was the Head of it, had not been universally odious to the Nation, it could not have been so easily dissipated. She was naturally pious and devout, even to superstition; had a generous disposition of Mind, but much corrupted by Melancholy, which was partly natural in her, but much increased by the cross Accidents of her Life, both before and after her Advancement; so that she was very peevish, and splenetick, towards the end of her Life. When the Differences became irreconcilable between her Father and Mother, she followed her Mothers Interests, they being indeed her own; and for a great while could not be perswaded to submit to the King; who being impatient of contradiction from any, but especially from his own Child, was resolved to strike a terror in all his People, by putting her openly to death. Which her Mother coming to know, writ her a Letter of a very devout strain, which will be found in the Collections. In which, 'She encouraged her to suffer 'chearfully, to trust to God, and keep her heart clean. She charged 'her, in all things, to obey the King's Commands, except in the Mat-'ters of Religion. She sent her two Latin Books, the one of the Life 'of

'and the other St. Jerom's Letter. She bid her divert her self at the Vir-
'ginals or Lute, but above all things to keep her self pure, and to enter 'into no treaty of Marriage, till these ill times should pass over; of 'which her Mother seemed to retain still good hopes. This Letter should have been in my former Volumn, if I had then seen it, but it is no improper Place to mention it here. At Court, many were afraid to move the King for her; both the Duke of Norfolk and Gardiner look'd on, and were unwilling to hazard their own Interests to preserve her. But (as it was now printed, and both these appealed to) Cran- And was pre-fore it was no wonder if she obstinately adhered to that which her Mother, and all about her, had been infusing into her for many Years:

but that it would appear strange if he should for this Cause so far forget he was a Father, as to proceed to Extremities with his own Child: that if she were separated from her Mother, and her People, in a little time there might be ground gained on her; but to take away her Life, would raise horror through all Europe against him. By these means he preserved her at that time.

former part of this Work; she writ Letters of such submission, as shew how expert she was at dissembling. Three of these to her Father, and one to Cromwell, I have put in the Collection; 'in which she, Collect. Numb.

stubbornness, and disobedience to his most just and vertuous Laws, implores his Pardon, as lying prostrate at his Feet: and considering his great Learning and Knowledg, she puts her Soul in his Hand, resolving that he should for ever thereafter direct her Conscience, from which she vows she would never vary. This she repeats in such tender words, that it shews she could command her self to say any thing that she thought fit for her ends. And when Cromwell writ to her, to know 'what her Opinion was about Pilgrimages, Purgatory, and Re-liques, she assures him she had no Opinion at all, but such as she should receive from the King, who had her whole Heart in his keeping; and he should imprint upon it, in these and all other Matters, whatever his inestimable Vertue, high Wisdom, and excellent Learning, should think convenient for her. So perfectly had she learned that stile, that she knew was most acceptable to him. Having copied these from the Originals, I thought it not unfit to insert them, that it may appear how far those of that Religion can comply, when their Interest leads them to it.

From that time this Princess had been in all Points most exactly comliant to every thing her Father did. And after his Death, she never retended to be of any other Religion, than that which was established by him: So that all that she pleaded for, in her Brother's Reign, was only the continuance of that way of Worship, that was in use at her Fa-her's Death. But now, being come to the Crown, that would not ontent her; yet when she thought where to fix, she was distracted between wo different Schemes that were presented to her.

1553. The Designs for changing Religion.

On the one hand, Gardiner and all that Party, were for bringing Religion back to what it had been at King Henry's Death; and afterward, by slow degrees, to raise it up to what it had been before the breach with the Papacy. On the other hand, the Queen, of her own Inclination, was much disposed to return immediately to the Union of the Catholick Church, as she called it: and it was necessary for her to do it, since it was only by the Papal Authority that her Illegitimation was removed. To this it was answered, that all these Acts and Sentences that had passed against her, might be annulled, without taking any notice of the Pope. Gardiner finding these things had not such weight with her as he desired, for she looked on him as a crafty temporizing Man, sent over to the Emperor, on whom she depended much, to assure him, that if he would perswade her to make him Chancellor, and to put Affairs into his Hands, he should order them so, that every thing she had a mind to, should be carried in time. But Gardiner understood she had sent for Cardinal Pool; so he writ to the Emperor, that he knew his Zeal for the Exaltation of the Popedom, would undo all: therefore he pressed him to write to the Queen for moderating her heat and to stop the Cardinal's coming over. He said, that Pool stood attainted by Law, so that his coming into England would alarm the Nation. He observed, that upon a double account they were averse to the Papacy: The one was, for the Church Lands, which they had generally bought from the Crown on very easie terms, and they would not easily part with them. The other was, The fear they had of Papal Dominion and Power, which had been now for about 25 Years set up to the People, as the most intollerable Tyranny that ever was. Therefore, he said, it was necessary to give them some time to wear out their Prejudices; and the precipitating of Councils might ruin all. He gave the Emperor also secret Assurances of serving him in all his Interests. All this Gardiner did the more warily, because he understood that Cardinal Pool hated him as a false and deceitful Man. Upon this the Emperor writ to the Queen several Letters with his own hand, which were so hardly legible, that it was not possible for me, or some others to whom I shewed them, to read them, so well as to copy them out: as one that was written by his Sister, the Queen of Hungary, and signed by him, is no better; but from many half Sentences, I find, that it was with a design to temper her, that she should not make too much haste, nor be too much led by Italian Counsels. Upon the return of this Message, the Seal, which had been taken from Goodrick, Bishop of Ely, and put for some days in the keeping of Hare, Master of the Rolls, was, on the 13*th* of August, given to Gardiner, who was declared Lord Chancellor of England, and the conduct of Affairs was entirely put in his hands. So that now the measure of the Queens Counsels was to do every thing slowly, and by such sure steps as might put them less in hazard.

Gardiner's Policy.

He is made Chancellor.

The Duke of Northumberland and others Tried.

The first thing that was done, was, the bringing the Duke of Northumberland to his Trial. The old Duke of Norfolk was made Lord High Steward; the Queen thinking it fit to put the first Character of honour on him, who had suffered so much for being the Head of the Popish Party. And here a subtle thing was started, which had been kept a great Secret hitherto. It was said, the Duke of Norfolk never been truly attainted; and that the Act againſt him was not a true Act of Parliament; ſo that without any Pardon, or reſtitution in Blood, he was ſtill Duke of Norfolk. This he had never mentioned all the laſt Reign, leſt that ſhould have procured an Act to confirm his Attainder. So he came now in upon his former Right, by which, all the Grants that had been given of his Eſtate, were to be declared void by Common Law. The Duke of Northumberland, with the Marqueſs of Northampton, and the Earl of Warwick, were brought to their Tryals. The Duke deſired two Points might be firſt anſwered by the Judges, in matter of Law. The one, Whether a Man acting by the Authority of the Great Seal, and the Order of the Privy Council, could become thereby guilty of Treaſon? The other was, Whether thoſe who had been equally guilty with him, and by whoſe Direction and Commands he had acted, could ſit his Judges? To theſe the Judges made anſwer, That the Great Seal of one that was not lawful Queen, could give no Authority, nor Indempnity, to thoſe that acted on ſuch a Warrant: and that any Peer that was not, by an Attainder upon Record, convicted of ſuch acceſſion to his Crime, might ſit his Judg, and was not to be challenged upon a Surmiſe or Report. So theſe Points, by which only he could hope to have defended himſelf, being thus determined againſt him, he confeſſed he was guilty, and ſubmitted to the Queens Mercy. So did the Marqueſs of Northampton, and the Duke's Son, the Earl of Warwick, who (it ſeems by this Trial) had a Writ for ſitting in the Houſe of Peers; they were all three found guilty. Judgment alſo paſſed next day, in a Jury of Commoners, againſt Sir John Gates, and his Brother Sir Humphrey; Sir Andrew Dudley, and Sir Thomas Palmer, confeſſing their Indictments. But of all theſe it was reſolved, that only the Duke of Northumberland, and Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer, ſhould be made Examples; Heath, Biſhop of Worceſter, was employed to inſtruct the Duke, and to prepare him for his Death. Whether he had been always in heart what he then profeſſed, or whether he only pretended it, hoping that it might procure him favour, is variouſly reported: but certain it is, that he ſaid, he had been always a Catholick in his Heart; yet this could not ſave him. He was known to be a Man of that temper, ſo given, both to revenge and diſſimulation, that his Enemies ſaw it was neceſſary to put him out of the way, leſt if he had lived, he might have inſinuated himſelf into the Queens favour, and then turn'd the danger upon them. So the Earl of Arundel, now made Lord Steward of the Houſhold, with others, eaſily obtained that his Head ſhould be cut off, together with Sir John Gates's, and Sir Thomas Palmer's.

At his Death he profeſſes he had been always a Papiſt.

On the 22*d* of Auguſt he was carried to the Place of Execution. On the way, there was ſome expoſtulation between Gates and him; They, as is ordinary for Complices in ill Actions, laying the blame of their Miſeries on one another: Yet they profeſſed they did mutually forgive, and ſo died in Charity together. It is ſaid, that he made a long Speech, accuſing his former ill Life, and confeſſing his Treaſons. But that part of it which concerned Religion, is only preſerved. In it, he exhorted the People to ſtand to the Religion of their Anceſtors, and to reject that of latter date, which had occaſioned all the miſery of the foregoing thirty Years; and deſired, as they would prevent the like for the future, 1553. that they would drive out of the Nation these Trumpets of Sedition, the new Preachers; that for himself, what-ever he had otherwise pretended, he believed no other Religion than that of his fore-fathers; in which he appealed to his Ghostly Father, the Bishop of Worcester then present with him; but being blinded with Ambition, he had made wreck of his Conscience, by temporising, for which he professed himself sincerely penitent. So did he, and the other two, end their days. Palmer was little pitied, as being believed a treacherous Conspirator against his former Master, and Friend, the Duke of Somerset.

His Character. Thus died the ambitious Duke of Northumberland. He had been, in the former parts of his Life, a great Captain, and had the reputation of a wise Man: He was generally successful, and they that are so, are always esteemed wise. He was an extraordinary Man in a lower sphere, but had forgot himself much when he was raised higher, in which his Mind seemed more exalted than his Fortunes. But as he was transported by his Rage and Revenge out of measure, so he was as servile and mean in his Submissions. Fox, it seems, was informed, that he had hopes given him of his Life, if he should declare himself to be of the Popish Religion, even though his Head were laid on the Block: but which way soever he made that Declaration, either to get his Life by it, or that he had really been always what he now professed; it argues that he regarded Religion very little, either in his Life, or at his Death. But whether he did any thing to hasten the late King's Death, I do not find it was at all enquired after: Only those who considered how much Guilt disorders all People, and that they have a black Cloud over their Minds, which appears, either in the violence of Rage, or the abjectness of Fear, did find so great a change in his deportment, in these last Passages of his Life, from what was in the former parts of it, that they could not but think there was some extraordinary thing within him from whence it flowed.

King Edwards Funeral. And for King Edward's Death, those who had Affairs now in their Hands, were so little careful of his Memory, and indeed so glad of his Death, that it is no wonder they made little search about it. It is rather strange that they allowed him such Funeral Rites. For the Queen kept a solemn Exequie, with all the other Remembrances of the Dead, and Masses for him, used in the Roman Church, at the Tower, on the 8th of August, the same day that he was buried at Westminster: the Lord Treasurer, (who was the Marques of Winchester, still continued in that Trust) the Earls of Shrewsbury, and Pembrook, being the principal Mourners. Day, that was now to be restored to his See of Chichester, was appointed to Preach the Funeral Sermon: In which he commended and excused the King, but loaded his Government severely; and extolled the Queen much, under whom he promised the People happy days. It was intended that all the Burial Rites should have been according to the old Forms that were before the Reformation. But Cranmer opposed this vigorously, and insisted upon it, That as the King himself had been a zealous promoter of that Reformation, so the English Service was then established by Law: upon this he stoutly hindred any other way of officiating, and himself performed all the Offices of the Burial; to which he joined the solemnity of a Communion. In these, it may be easily imagined, he did every thing with a very lively sorrow, since since as he had loved the King beyond expreſſion, ſo he could not but look on his Funeral, as the Burial of the Reformation, and in particular as a ſtep to his own. 1553.

On the 12*th* of Auguſt, the Queen made an open declaration in Council, that although her Conſcience was ſtaied in the Matters of Religion, yet ſhe was reſolved not to compel or ſtrain others, otherwiſe than as God ſhould put into their Hearts, a perſwaſion of that Truth ſhe was in; and this ſhe hoped ſhould be done by the opening His Word to them, by godly, vertuous, and learned Preachers. Now all the deprived Biſhops looked to be quickly placed in their Sees again. Bonner went to St. Pauls on the 13*th* of Auguſt, being Sunday, where Bourn, that was his Chaplain, preached before him. He ſpake honourably of Bonner, with ſharp Reflections on the Proceedings againſt him in the Time of King Edward. This did much provoke the whole Audience, who as they hated Bonner, ſo could not hear any thing ſaid that ſeemed to detract from that King. Hereupon there was a great Tumult in the Church; ſome called to pull him down, others flung Stones, and one threw a Dagger towards the Pulpit with that force, that it ſtuck faſt in the timber of it; Bourn, by ſtooping, ſaved himſelf from that danger: and Rogers, and Bradford, two eminent Preachers, and of great credit with the People, ſtood up, and gently quieted the heat; and they, to deliver Bourn out of their hands, conveyed him from the Pulpit, to a Houſe near the Church.

The Queen declares ſhe will force no Man's Conſcience.

A Tumult at Paul's Croſs.

This was ſuch an Accident as the Papiſts would have deſired; for it gave them a colour to proceed more ſeverely, and to prohibit Preaching, which was the firſt ſtep they intended to make. There was a Meſſage ſent to the Lord Mayor, to give a ſtrict charge, that every Citizen ſhould take care of all that belonged to him, and ſee that they went to their own Pariſh Church, and kept the Peace; as alſo to acquaint them with what the Queen had declared in Council on the 13*th* of Auguſt. And on the 18*th*, there was publiſhed an Inhibition in the Queens Name, to this effect; 'That ſhe, conſidering the great Dan-'ger that had come to the Realm, by the Differences in Religion, did 'declare for her ſelf, that ſhe was of that Religion that ſhe had profeſ-'ſed from her Infancy, and that ſhe would maintain it during her time, 'and be glad that all her Subjects would charitably receive it: Yet ſhe 'did not intend to compel any of her Subjects to it, till publick Order 'ſhould be taken in it by common Aſſent: requiring all, in the mean 'while, not to move Sedition or Unquietneſs, till ſuch Order ſhould 'be ſetled, and not to uſe the Names of Papiſt, or Heretick, but to 'live together in Love, and in the Fear of God: but if any made 'Aſſemblies of the People, ſhe would take care they ſhould be ſeverely puniſhed: and ſhe ſtraitly charged them, that none ſhould preach, 'or expound Scripture, or print any Books, or Plays, without her ſpe-'cial Licenſe. And required her Subjects, that none of them ſhould 'preſume to puniſh any on pretence of the late Rebellion, but as they 'ſhould be authoriſed by her: Yet ſhe did not thereby reſtrain any 'from informing againſt ſuch Offenders: She would be moſt ſorry to 'have cauſe to execute the ſeverity of the Law, but ſhe was reſolved 'not to ſuffer ſuch Rebellious Doings to go unpuniſhed, but hoped her 'Subjects would not drive her to the extream execution of the Laws.

An Inhibition of all preaching.

When

1553. When this was publiſhed, which was the firſt thing that was ſet out in her Name ſince ſhe had come to the Crown, it was much deſcanted on. The Profeſſion ſhe made of her Religion to be the ſame it had been from her Infancy, ſhewed it was not her Fathers Religion, but entire Popery that ſhe intended to reſtore. It was alſo obſerved, that whereas before ſhe had ſaid plainly ſhe would compel none to be of it; now that was qualified with this, till publick Order ſhould be taken in it; which was, till they could ſo frame a Parliament, that it ſhould concur with the Queens Deſign. The equal forbidding of Aſſemblies, or ill Names, on both ſides, was thought intended to be a Trap for the Reformed, that they ſhould be puniſhed if they offended, but the others were ſure to be rather encouraged. The reſtraint of preaching without Licenſe, was pretended to be copied from what had been done in King Edward's Time: Yet then there was a Liberty left for a long time to all to Preach in their own Churches, only they might preach no where elſe without a Licenſe: And the power of Licenſing was alſo lodged at firſt with the Biſhops in their ſeveral Dioceſſes, and at laſt with the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, as well as with the King; whereas now, at one ſtroke, all the Pulpits of England that were in the hands of the Reformed, were brought under an Interdict; for they were ſure to obtain no Licenſes. But the cunningeſt part of theſe Inhibitions, was, the declaring that the Queen would proceed with rigour againſt all that were guilty of the late Rebellion, if they ſhould provoke her; many about London had ſome way or other expreſſed themſelves for it, and theſe were the hotteſt among the Reformed: So that here was a ſtorm threatning hanging over them, if they ſhould expreſs any more Zeal about Religion.

Cenſures paſt upon it.

She requites the Service of the Men of Suffolk ill.

When this was put out, the Queen underſtanding, that in Suffolk thoſe of that Profeſſion took a little more liberty than their Neighbours, preſuming on their great Merit, and the Queens Promiſes to them; there was a ſpecial Letter ſent to the Biſhop of Norwich's Vicar, himſelf being at Bruſſels, to ſee to the execution of theſe Injunctions againſt any that ſhould preach without Licenſe. Upon this, ſome came from Suffolk to put the Queen in mind of her Promiſe. This was thought inſolent; and ſhe returned them no other anſwer, But that they being Members, thought to rule her that was their Head; but they ſhould learn, that the Members ought to obey the Head, and not to think to bear Rule over it. One of theſe had ſpoken of her Promiſe with more confidence than the reſt, his Name was Dobbe; ſo he was ordered to ſtand three days in the Pillory, as having ſaid that which tended to the defamation of the Queen. And from hence all ſaw what a ſevere Government they were to come under, in which the claiming of former Promiſes, that had been made by the Queen when ſhe needed their Aſſiſtance, was to be accounted a Crime. But there was yet a more unreaſonable Severity ſhewed to Bradford and Rogers, who had appeaſed the Tumult the Sunday before, and reſcued the Preacher from the Rage of the People. It was ſaid, that their appeaſing it, ſo eaſily, ſhewed what Intereſt they had with the People, and was a preſumption that they had ſet it on; ſo without any further Proof, the one was put in the Tower, and the other confined to his Houſe.

But now the deprived Biſhops, who were Bonner of London, Gardiner of Winchester, Tonſtall of Dureſm, Heath of Worceſter, and Day of Chichester, were to be reſtored to their Sees. I have only ſeen the Commiſſion for reſtoring Bonner and Tonſtall; but the reſt were no doubt in the ſame ſtrain, with a little variation. The Commiſſion for Bonner bearing date the 22*d* of Auguſt, was directed to ſome Civilians, ſetting forth, that he had petitioned the Queen to examine the Appeal he had made from the Delegates that had deprived him; and that therefore the Sentence againſt him being unjuſt and illegal, he deſired it might be declared to be of no effect. Upon which, theſe did, without any great heſitation, return the Sentences void, and the Appeals good. So thus they were reſtored to their Sees. But becauſe the Biſhoprick of Dureſm was by Act of Parliament diſſolved, and the Regalities of it, which had been given to the Duke of Northumberland, were now by his Attainder fallen into the Queens hand, She granted Tonſtall Letters Patents, erecting that Biſhoprick again of new; making mention that ſome wicked Men, to enrich themſelves by it, had procured it to be diſſolved. 1553. The Popiſh Biſhops reſtored.

On the 29th of Auguſt Commiſſion was granted to Gardiner to give Licences under the Great Seal to ſuch Grave, Learned and diſcreet Perſons, as he ſhould think meet and able to preach God's Word. All who were ſo licenſed, were qualified to preach in any Cathedral or Parochial Church, to which he ſhould think it convenient to ſend them. By this the Reformers were not only out of hope to obtain any Licences, but likewiſe ſaw a way laid down for ſending ſuch Men as Gardiner pleaſed into all their Pulpits, to infect their People. Upon this they conſidered what to do. If there had been only a particular Interdiction of ſome private perſons, the conſiderations of Peace and Order being of a more publick nature than the conſequence of any one Man's open Preaching could be, they judged it was to be ſubmitted to: but in ſuch a caſe, when they ſaw this Interdiction was general, and on deſign to ſtop their mouths till their Enemies ſhould ſeduce the People, they did not think they were bound in Conſcience to give Obedience. Many of them therefore continued to preach openly; others, inſtead of Preaching in Churches, were contented to have only the Prayers and other Service there; but for inſtructing their People, had private Conferences with them. The Council hearing that their Orders had been diſobeyed by ſome in London, two in Coventry, and one in Amerſham, they were ſent for, and put in Priſon. And Coverdale Biſhop of Exeter, and Hooper of Gloceſter, being cited to appear before the Council, they came and preſented themſelves on the 29*th.* and 30*th.* of Auguſt; and on the firſt of September, Hooper was ſent to the Fleet, and Coverdale appointed to wait their pleaſure. The Conſultations among the Reformed Doctors.

At this time the Popiſh Party, growing now inſolent over England, began to be as forward in making Changes, before the Laws warranted them, as theſe of the Reformation had been in King Edward's time: ſo that in many places they ſet up Images, and the Latin Service, with the old Rites again. This was plainly againſt Law; but the Council had no mind to hinder it; but on the other hand encouraged it all they could. Upon which Judge Hales, who thought he might with the more aſſurance ſpeak his mind, having appeared ſo ſteadily for the Queen, did at the Circuits in Kent, give a Charge to the Juſtices to ſee to the execu- The barbarous uſage of Judge Hales.

1553 execution of King Edward's Laws, which were still in force and unrepealed. Upon this he was, without any regard to his former Zeal, put first into the Marshalsea; from thence he was removed to the Counter, and after that to the Fleet: where the good old Man was so disordered with the Cruelties that the Warden told him were contriving against all that would not change their Religion, that it turned his Brain, so that he endeavoured to have kill'd himself with a Penknife. He was after that, upon his Submission, set at liberty; but never came to himself again: so he, not being well looked to, drowned himself. This, with the usage of the Suffolk-Men, was much censured; and from thence it was said, that no Merits or Services could secure any from the Cruelties of that Religion. And it appeared in another signal Instance, how the Actions of Men were not so much considered as their Religion. The Lord Chief Justice Mountague, who had very unwillingly drawn the Letters Patents for the Lady Jane's Succession, was turned out of his Place, kept six weeks in Prison, fined in a Thousand pounds, and some Lands that had been given him by King Edward, were taken from him; though he had sent his Son with Twenty Men to declare for the Queen, and had a great Family of Seventeen Children, six Sons and eleven Daughters: whereas Judg Bromley that had concurred in framing the Letters Patents without any reluctancy, was made Lord Chief Justice: The true Reason was, Bromley was a Papist in his heart, and Mountague was for the Reformation.

In many other places, where the People were Popishly affected, they drove away their Pastors. At Oxford, Peter Martyr was so ill used, that he was forced to fly for his safety to Lambeth, where he could not look for any long protection, since Cranmer himself was every day in expectation of being sent to Prison. He kept himself quiet, and was contriving how to give some Publick and Noble Testimonies to the Doctrine that he had so long professed, and indeed had been the chief promoter of in this Church. But his quiet behaviour was laid hold on by his Enemies, and it was given out, that he was resolved to comply with every thing the Queen had a mind to. So I find Bonner wrote to his Friend Mr. Lechmore on the 6th of September, in that Letter which is in the Collection. 'He gives him notice that the day before he had been restored to 'his Bishoprick, and Ridley repulsed; for which he is very witty. 'Ridley had a Steward for two Manours of his, whose name was Ship- 'side, his Brother-in-law; upon which he plays as if he had been Sheep-'head. He orders Lechmore to look to his Estate, and he should take 'care at the next Parliament that both the Sheepsheads and the Calves-'heads should be used as they deserved. He adds that Cranmer, whom 'in scorn he calls Mr. Canterbury, was become very humble, and ready 'to submit himself in all things; but that would not serve his turn: 'and it was expected that he should be sent to the Tower that very 'day. These reports being brought to Cranmer, some advised him to fly beyond Seas: he said he would not diswade others from that course, now that they saw a Persecution rising; but considering the station he was in, and the hand he had in all the Changes that were made, he thought it so indecent a thing for him to fly, that no entreaties should ever perswade him to it. So he by Peter Martyr's advice, drew up a Writing, that I have put in the Collection (in Latin, as it was at that time 'translated) tranſlated.) The ſubſtance of it was to this effect; 'That as the Devil 1553.

'had at all times ſet on his Inſtruments by Lies to defame the Servants of 'God, ſo he was now more than ordinarily buſie. For whereas King
'Henry had begun the correcting of the abuſes of the Maſs, which his 'Son had brought to a further perfection: and ſo the Lords Supper
'was reſtored to its firſt Inſtitution, and was celebrated according to
'the pattern of the Primitive Church; now, the Devil intending to 'bring the Maſs again into its room, as being his own invention, had 'ſtirred up ſome to give out that it had been ſet up in Canterbury by 'his the ſaid Cranmer's Order; and it was ſaid that he had undertaken 'to ſing Maſs to the Queens Majeſty, both at King Edward's Funeral,
'at Paul's, and other places: and though for theſe twenty years he 'had deſpiſed all ſuch vain and falſe Reports, as were ſpread of him; yet
'now he thought it not fit to lye under ſuch miſrepreſentations. There'fore he proteſted to all the World, that the Maſs was not ſet up at 'Canterbury by his Order; but that a fawning hypocritical Monk (this 'was Thornton Suffragan of Dover,) had done it without his know'ledge; and for what he was ſaid to have undertaken to the Queen, her
'Majeſty knew well how falſe that was: offering if he might obtain
'her Leave for it, to maintain, that every thing in the Communion Ser'vice that was ſet out by their moſt innocent and good King Edward,
'was according to Chriſts Inſtitution, and the practice of the Apoſtles,
'and the ancient Church for many Ages: to which the Maſs was con'trary, being full of errors and abuſes; and although Peter Martyr was
'by ſome called an ignorant Man, he with him or other four or five, ſuch
'as he ſhould chooſe, would be ready to defend not only their Book
'of Common Prayer, and the other Rites of their Service, but the 'whole Doctrine and Order of Religion, ſet forth by the late King, as 'more pure, and more agreeable to the Word of God, than any ſort of 'Religion that had been in England for a thouſand years before it: pro'vided that all things ſhould be judged by the Scriptures, and that the
'Reaſonings on both ſides ſhould be faithfully written down.

This he had drawn, with a Reſolution to have made a publick uſe of it: but Scory, who had been Biſhop of Chicheſter, coming to him, he ſhewed him the Paper, and bade him conſider of it. Scory indiſcreetly gave Copies of it; and one of theſe was publickly read in Cheapſide, on the fifth of September. So on the eighth of that month he was called before the Star-Chamber, and asked whether he was the Author of that ſeditious Bill, that was given out in his Name; and if ſo, whether he was ſorry for it. He anſwered, that the Bill was truly his; but he was very ſorry it had gone from him in ſuch a manner; for he had reſolved to have enlarged it in many things, and to have ordered it to be affixed to the doors of Pauls, and of the other Churches in London, with his Hand and Seal to it. He was at that time, contrary to all mens expectation, diſmiſſed. Gardiner plainly ſaw he could not expect to ſucceed him, and that the Queen had deſigned that See for Cardinal Pool, ſo he reſolved to protect and preſerve Cranmer all he could. Some moved that he ſhould be only put from his Biſhoprick, and have a ſmall Penſion aſſigned him, with a charge to keep within a Confinement, and not to meddle with matters of Religion. He was generally beloved for the gentleneſs of his temper; ſo it was thought that proceeding ſe-1553. verely with him, might alienate some from them, and embroil their affairs in the next Parliament. Others objected, that if he, who had been the chief promoter of Heresie, was used with such tenderness, it would encourage the rest to be more obstinate. And the Queen who had forgot the Services he did her in her Father's time, remembring rather that he had pronounced the Sentence of Divorce against her Mother, was easily induced to proceed severely. So on the thirteenth of September both he and Latimer were called before the Council; Latimer was that day committed; but Cranmer was respited till next day, and then he was sent to the Tower, both for matters of Treason against the Queen, and for dispersing of seditious Bills. Tylor of Hadlee, and several other Preachers, were also put in Prison; and upon an Information brought against Horn Dean of Durefm, he was sent for.

He and Latimer sent to the Tower.

The Forreigners sent out of England.

The Forreigners, that were come over upon publick Faith and encouragement, were better used: for Peter Martyr was preserved from the rage of his enemies, and suffered to go beyond Sea. There was also an Order sent to John a Lasco and his Congregation to be gone; their Church being taken from them, and their Corporation dissolved. And an hundred seventy five of them went away in two Ships to Denmark on the seventeenth of September, with all their Preachers; except two who were left to look to those few, which stayed behind, and being engaged in Trade, resolved to live in England, and follow their Consciences in the matters of Religion in private, with the Assistance of those Teachers. But a Lasco, after a long and hard passage, arriving at Denmark, was as ill received there, as if it had been a Popish Country, when they understood that he and his Company were of the Helvetian Confession: so that, though it was December, and a very severe Winter, they were required to be gone within two days, and could not obtain so much as liberty to leave their Wives or Children behind them, till they could provide a place for them. From thence they went first to Lubeck, then to Wismar, and Hamburgh, where they found the disputes about the manner of Christ's Presence in the Sacrament, had raised such violent animosities, that after much barbarous usage, they were banished out of all those Towns, and could find no place to settle in, till about the end of March, that they came to Friseland, where they were suffered to plant themselves.

Many English fly beyond Sea

Many in England, seeing the Government was set on severe courses so early, did infer that this would soon grow up to an extream Persecution; so that above a thousand Persons fled beyond Seas: most of them went in the company, and as the Servants, of French Protestants who having come over in King Edward's time, were now required, as the Germans had been, to return into their own Country. The Council understanding this, took care that no Englishman should escape out of their hands; and therefore sent an Order to the Ports, that none should be suffered to go over as Frenchmen, but those who brought Certificates from the French Ambassador. Among those that had got over, some eminent Divines went; who, either having no Cures, or being turned out of their Benefices, were not under such ties to any Flock, so that they judged themselves disingaged, and therefore did not, as Hirelings leave their Flock to the Persecution then imminent, but rather went to look after those who had not left England. The chief of these that went at first were Cox, Sands, Grindal, and Horn. Cox was without any good colour turned out, both of his Deanery of Christ-Church, and his Prebendary at Westminster. He was put into the Marshalsea, but on the 19*th*. of August was discharged. Sands was turned out for his Sermon before the Duke of Northumberland at Cambridge: On what account Grindal was turned out, I know not; Horn, soon after he got beyond Sea, printed an Apology for his leaving his Country: he tells that he heard there was some Crimes against the State objected to him, which made him come up from Duresm to clear himself: It was said that three Letters had been written to him in the Queens Name, requiring him to come up, and intimating that they were resolved to charge him with contempt, and other points of State. He protests that he had never received but one, which was given him on the Road; but seeing how he was like to be used, he withdrew out of England: upon which he takes occasion in that discourse to vindicate the Preachers in King Edward's time, against whom it was now objected, that they had neglected Fasting and Prayer, and had allowed the People all sorts of Liberty: This he said was so false, that the ruling Men in that time were much offended at the great freedom which the Preachers then took, so that many of them would hear no more Sermons; and he says for himself, that though Tonstal was now his great enemy, he had refused to accept of his Bishoprick, and was ill used, and threatned, for denying to take it. 1553.

All these things tended much to inflame the People. Therefore great care was taken, first, to oblige all those Noblemen who had assisted the Queen at her coming to the Crown; since a grateful acknowledgment of past Services is the greatest encouragement, both to the same Persons to renew them, and to others to undertake the like upon new occasions. The Earl of Arundel was made Lord Steward; Sir Edward Hastings was made Master of the Horse, and afterwards Lord Hastings; Sir John Gage, Lord Chamberlain; Sir John Williams, who had Proclaimed the Queen in Oxfordshire, was made Lord Williams; and Sir Henry Jerningham, that first gathered the Men of Norfolk about her, was made Captain of her Guard: but Ratcliff Earl of Sussex had done the most considerable Service of them all; for to him she had given the chief Command of her Army, and he had managed it with that Prudence, that others were thereby encouraged to come in to her Assistance; so an unusual Honour was contrived for him, that he might cover his head in her Presence: which passed under the Great Seal the second of October; he being the only Peer of England in whom this Honour was ever conferred, as far as I know. The like was granted to the Lord Courcy Baron of Kingsale in Ireland, whose Posterity enjoy it to this day: but I am not so well informed of that Family, as to know by which of our Kings it was first granted. The Queen having summoned a Parliament to the tenth of October, was Crowned on the first of that month, by Gardiner, who with ten other Bishops, all in their Mitres, Copes, and Crosiers, performed that Ceremony with great Solemnity. Day preaching the Coronation Sermon; who, it seems, was accounted the best Preacher among them; since he was ordered to Preach both at the late King's Funeral, and now again at the Coronation.

The Queen rewards those who had served her.

The Queen is Crowned, and discharges all Taxes.

But Gardiner had prepared a Largess of an extraordinary nature for 1553. the Queen to distribute that day among her People, besides her general Pardon; he caused a Proclamation to be published, which did set forth, 'That whereas the good Subjects of England had always exhibited Aid 'to their Princes, when the good of the Publick, and Honour of the 'Realm required it; and though the Queen, since her coming to the 'Crown, found the Treasury was marvellously exhausted, by the evil 'Government of late years, especially since the Duke of Northumber- 'land bare Rule; though she found her self charged with divers great 'Sums of her Father and Brothers Debts, which for her own Honour, 'and the Honour of the Realm, she determined to pay in times con- 'venient and reasonable; yet having a special regard to the welfare of 'her Subjects, and accounting their loving hearts and prosperity the 'chiefest Treasure which she desired, next to the Favour and Grace of 'God; therefore, since in her Brother's last Parliament, two Tenths, 'two Fifteenths, and a Subsidy both out of Lands and Goods, were 'given to him for paying his Debts; which were now due to her; 'she of her great Clemency did fully pardon and discharge these Sub- 'sidies; trusting her said good Subjects will have loving consideration 'thereof for their parts, whom she heartily requires, to bend themselves 'wholly to God, to serve him sincerely, and with continual Prayer, for 'the honour and advancement of the Queen, and the Common- 'Wealth.

A Parliament summoned.

And thus Matters were prepared for the Parliament; which was opened the tenth of October. In the Writ of Summons, and all other Writs, the Queen retained still the Title of Supream Head. Taylor Bishop of Lincoln, and Harley Bishop of Hereford came thither, resolving to justifie their Doctrine. Most of the other reformed Bishops were now in Prison: for besides these formerly mentioned, on the fourth of October the Archbishop of York was put in the Tower, no cause being given but heinous Offences only named in general. When the Mass begun, it is said that those two Bishops withdrew, and were upon that never suffered to come to their Places again. But one Beal the Clerk of the Council in Queen Elizabeths time, reports this otherwise, and more probably; that Bishop Taylor took his Place in his Robes, but refusing to give any reverence to the Mass, was violently thrust out of the House. He says nothing of Harley, so it is probable that he followed the other. The same Writer also informs us, that in many Places of the Country, Men were chosen by Force and Threats; in other Places those imployed by the Court, did by violence hinder the Commons from coming to chuse; in many Places false Returns were made; and that some were violently turned out of the House of Commons: upon which Reasons he concludes that it was no Parliament, since it was under a Force; and so might be annulled, as the Parliament held at Coventry in the 38*th.* year of King Henry the 6*th.* was, upon Evidence of the like Force, declared afterwards to be no Parliament. The Journals of the House of Lords in this Parliament are lost; so there is no light to be had of their Proceedings, but from the imperfect Journals of the House of Commons.

Bishops violently thrust out for not worshipping the Mass.

Great disorder in Elections.

On the second day of the Session, one moved in the House of Commons for a review of King Edward's Laws. But that being a while argued, was at this time laid aside, and the Bill for Tonnage and Poundage was put in. Then followed a Debate upon Dr. Nowell's being returned from Loo in Cornwal, whether he being a Prebendary of Weſtminſter could ſit in that Houſe? and the Committee being appointed to ſearch for Preſidents, it was reported, that he being repreſented in the Convocation Houſe, could not be a Member of that Houſe; ſo he was caſt out. The Bill of Tonnage and Poundage was ſent up to the Lords, who ſent it down to the Commons to be reformed in two Proviſo's that were not according to former Preſidents. How far this was contrary to the Rights of the Commons, who now ſay that the Lords cannot alter a Bill of Money, I am not able to determine. The only publick Bill that paſſed in this ſhort Seſſion was for a Declaration of Treaſons and Felonies: by which it was ordained that nothing ſhould be judged Treaſon, but what was within the Statute of Treaſons in the twenty fifth of Edward the third; and nothing ſhould be ſo judged Felony, that was not ſo before the 1ſt. year of King Henry the eight, excepting from any benefit of this Act, all ſuch as had been in Priſon before the laſt of September; who were alſo excepted out of the Queens Pardon at her Coronation. Two private Bills alſo paſſed: the one for the reſtoring of the Wife of the late Marqueſs of Exeter, who had been Attainted in the 32d. year of King Henry's Reign; and the other for her Son Edward Courtney Earl of Devonſhire. And ſo the Parliament was Prorogued from the 21ſt. to the 24th. of October, that there might be a Seſſion of Parliament conſiſting only of Acts of Mercy; though this Repeal of additional Treaſons and Felonies, was not more than what had paſſed in the beginning of King Edward's Reign, without the clog of ſo ſevere a Proviſo, by which many were cut off from the Favour deſigned by it. 1553.

An Act for moderating ſome ſevere Laws.

Some have thought, that ſince Treaſons had been reduced by the ſecond Act of Edward the 6th. to the ſtandard of the 25th. of Edward the third, that therefore there was ſomewhat elſe deſigned by this Act, than barely the repealing ſome late ſevere Acts, which being done the 1ſt. of Edward the 6th. needed not be now repealed, if it imported no more. And ſince this Act as it is worded, mentions, or rather excepts, thoſe Treaſons that are declared and expreſſed in the 25th. of Edward the 3d. they have inferred that the power of Parliaments declaring of Treaſons Ex poſt facto, which was reſerved by that Statute, is hereby taken away; and that nothing is now to be held Treaſon, but what is enumerated in that Statute. Yet this is ſtill liable to Debate; ſince the one may be thought to be declared and expreſſed in general words, as well as the other ſpecialties are in more particular words; and is alſo ſtill in force. So nothing ſeems comprehended within this Repeal, but the Acts paſſed in King Edward's Reign, declaring other Crimes to be Treaſon: ſome are added in the ſame Act, and others in that of the 3d and 4th. of his Reign, chap. 5. Nor is it likely, that if the Parliament had intended to have delivered the Subjects from the apprehenſions of all Acts of Attainder, upon a Declaration of new Treaſons, they would not have expreſſed it more plainly; ſince it muſt have been very grateful to the Nation, which had groaned heavily under Arbitrary Attainders of late years.

When the Parliament met again, the firſt Bill the Commons entred on, was that of Tonnage and Poundage, which they paſſed in two days. Then was the Bill about King Henry's Marriage with the Queens Mother ſent down on the 26th. by the Lords, and the Commons paſſed it on the 28th. ſo ſtrangely was the ſtream turned, that a Divorce that had been

The Marriage of Queen Katherine to King Henry Confirmed.

1553. been for seven years much desired by the Nation, was now repealed upon fewer days consultation. In the Preamble it was said, 'That truth how 'much soever obscured and born down, will in the end break out: and 'that therefore they declared that King Henry the 8*th.* being lawfully 'married to Queen Katherine by the consent of both their Parents, and 'the advice of the wisest Men in the Realm, and of the best and notablest 'Men for Learning in Christendom, did continue that state twenty years, 'in which God blessed them with her Majesty and other Issue, and a 'course of great happiness; but then a very few malicious Persons did 'endeavour to break that happy agreement between them, and studied 'to possess the King, with a scruple in his Conscience about it: and to 'support that, caused the Seals of some Universities to be got against 'it, a few Persons being corrupted with money for that end. They had 'also by sinistrous ways, and secret threatnings, procured the Seals of the 'Universities of this Kingdom, and finally Thomas Cranmer did most ungodlily, and against Law, judge the Divorce, upon his own unadvised understanding of the Scriptures, upon the Testimonies of the Universities, and some bare and most untrue conjectures; and that was afterwards confirmed by two Acts of Parliament, in which was contained the Illegitimacy of her Majesty: But that Marriage not being prohibited by the Law of God, and lawfully made, could not be dissolved broken; since what God hath joyned together, no Man could put asunder: all which they considering, together with the many miseries that had fallen on the Kingdom since that time, which they did esteem Plagues sent from God for it; therefore they declare that Sentence given by Cranmer to be unlawful, and of no force from the beginning: and do also repeal the Acts of Parliament that had confirmed it.

Which was much Censured.

By this Act, Gardiner had performed his Promise to the Queen of getting her Illegitimation taken off, without any relation to the Popes Authority. But in the drawing of it, he shewed that he was past all shame: when he could frame such an Act, of a business which himself had so violently and servilely promoted. The falsehood of that pretence of corrupting Universities has been shewn in the former Volume: but it was all they had now to say. The laying it all upon Cranmer was as high a pitch of malice and impudence as could be devised: for as Gardiner had been setting it on, long before Cranmer was known to King Henry; so he had been joyned with him in the Commission, and had given his assent to the Sentence which Cranmer gave. Nor was the Divorce grounded meerly upon Cranmer's understanding of the Scriptures, but upon the fullest and most studied Arguments, that had perhaps been in any Age brought together in one particular Case: and both Houses of Convocation had condemned the Marriage before his Sentence. But because in the right of his See he was Legate to the Pope, therefore to make the Sentence stronger, it was only in his name, though he had but a small share in it, compared to what Gardiner had.

The Queen carries it severely to the Lady Elizabeth.

By this Act, there was also a second Illegitimation brought on the Lady Elizabeth, to whom hitherto the Queen had been very kind, using her on all occasions with the tenderness of a Sister: but from this time forwards she handled her more severely. It was perhaps occasioned by by this Act, ſince before they ſtood both equally illegitimated; but now the Act that legitimated the Queen, making her moſt certainly a Baſtard in Law, the Queen might think it now too much to uſe her as ſhe had done formerly. Others ſuggeſt a more ſecret reaſon of this diſtaſt. The new Earl of Devonſhire was much in the Queens favour, ſo that it was thought ſhe had ſome inclinations to marry him; but he, either not preſuming ſo high, or really having an averſion to her, and an inclination to her Siſter, who of that moderate ſhare of beauty that was between them, had much the better of her, and was nineteen years younger, made his Addreſſes with more than ordinary concern to the Lady Elizabeth, and this did bring them both in trouble, as ſhall be afterwards ſhewn. 1553.

The next Bill that was ſent from the Lords to the Commons, was for the repealing King Edward's Laws about Religion. It was ſent down on the 31*ſt.* of October, and argued ſix days in the Houſe of Commons: but in the end it was carried, and ſent back to the Lords. The Preamble of it ſets forth the great diſorders that had fallen out in the Nation by the changes that had been made in Religion, from that which their Fore-fathers had left them by the Authority of the Catholick Church: thereupon all the Laws that had been made in King Edward's time about Religion were now repealed; and it was Enacted that, from the 20*th.* of December next, there ſhould be no other Form of Divine Service but what had been uſed in the laſt year of King Henry the 8*th*, leaving it free to all till that day, to uſe either the Books appointed by King Edward, or the old ones at their pleaſure. The Laws made by King Edward repealed.

Another Act was paſſed, which the Commons ſent up to the Lords, againſt all thoſe who by any overt Act ſhould moleſt or diſquiet any Preacher, becauſe of his Office, or for any Sermon that he might have Preached; or ſhould any way diſturb them when they were in any part of the Divine Offices, that either had been in the laſt year of King Henry, or ſhould be afterwards ſet forth by the Queen; or ſhould break or abuſe the holy Sacrament, or break Altars, Crucifixes, or Croſſes; thoſe that did any of theſe things ſhould be preſented to the Juſtices of Peace, and be by them put in Priſon, where they ſhould lye three Months, or till they were penitent for their Offences: and if any reſcued them, they ſhould be liable to the ſame puniſhment. But to this a Proviſo was added by the Lords, that this Act ſhould no way derogate from the Authority of the Eccleſiaſtical Laws and Courts, who might likewiſe proceed upon ſuch Offences: and a Certificate from the Ordinaries, that ſuch Offenders were puniſhed by them, being brought to the Juſtices of Peace, they were to proceed no further: or if the Juſtices made a Certificate that they had puniſhed them according to Law, the Ordinary might not puniſh them a ſecond time. But the Commons were now ſo heated, that they ſent up another Bill to the Lords againſt thoſe who came not to Church, nor to Sacraments, after the old Service ſhould be again ſet up: the inflicting of the Puniſhments in theſe caſes being left to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. This fell in the Houſe of Lords, not ſo much from any oppoſition that was made, as that they were afraid of allarming the Nation too much, by many ſevere Laws at once. An Act againſt the affronting Prieſts.

Another Law was made for ſecuring the publick Peace againſt unlawful An Act againſt unlawful Aſſemblies.

To this (besides the Answer which he might have writ to her self, that I have not seen,) he writ a copious Answer, in a tedious Paper of Instructions, which he gave to Goldwell; the Conclusion of which, summing up his whole Mind fully enough, I thought sufficient to put into the Collection, for the Instructions are extream long, and very full of words to little purpose. They seem to be of his own hand-writing, but of that I am not well assured, having seen nothing else of his hand, except his Subscription.

Collections, Numb. 9.

The Advice he sent to the Queen.

The substance of it was this: 'He rejoyced much at the two Acts 'that were passed, but yet he censures them both, because he observed 'some Defects in them: In the Act for confirming her Mothers Mar- 'age, he found fault that there was no mention made of the Popes Bulls 'by the authority of which only it could be a lawful Marriage. In the 'other, he did not like it, that the Worship of God, and the Sacraments 'were to be as they were in the end of her Fathers Reign; for 'then the People were yet in a State of Schism, and Schismaticks have 'no right to the Sacraments; the Pope's Interdict still lay on the Na- 'tion, and till that were taken off, none could without Sin either admi- 'nister, or receive them. He told her, that Commendone had said no- 'thing in her Name to the Consistory; but had spoken to them only on 'the Reports which, he said, he had heard of her from good hands; 'and it was necessary to say somewhat, in order to the sending a Legate. 'That many in the Consistory had opposed the sending of him, because 'there was no express Desire sent about it; but it was carried, that he 'should come over with very full Graces, and Power to reconcile the 'Kingdom on very easy Terms. He also told her, he was afraid, that 'when the Pope and Cardinals should hear that he was stopp'd, they 'would repent their Benignity, and take this as an Affront, and recall 'him and his Powers, and send another that would not be so tender 'of the Nation, or bring with him such full Powers: That to prevent 'this, he had sent one to the Pope and Cardinals, to mitigate their 'displeasure, by letting them know, he was only stopp'd for a little 'while, till the Act of Attainder that stood against him was repealed; 'and to make a shew of going forward, he had sent his Household- 'Stuff to Flanders, but would stay where he was, till he had further 'Orders. He said, he knew this flowed chiefly from the Emperor, who 'was for using such Political Courses, as himself had followed in the be- 'ginning of the Interim, and was earnest to have the State setled, before 'she meddled with Religion; he had spoke with his Confessor about it, 'and had convinced him of the Impiety of such Courses, and sent him 'to work on him. He also told the Queen, he was afraid carnal Policy 'might govern her too much, and that she might thereby fall from her 'simplicity in Christ, in which she had hitherto lived. He encouraged 'her therefore to put on a Spirit of Wisdom and Courage, and to trust 'in God who had preserved her so long, and had setled her on the 'Throne in so unlook'd for a manner. He desired she would shew as 'much Courage in rejecting the Supremacy, as her Father had done in 'acquiring it. He confessed, he knew none in either House of Par- 'liament fit to propose that matter: the Spiritualty had all complied 'so

'ſo far, had written and declared for it ſo much, that it could not 1553.
'flow from them decently; and the Temporalty being poſſeſſed of the 'Church Lands, would not willingly move it: therefore he thought
'it beſt for her ſelf to go to the Parliament, having before-hand ac'quainted ſome few both of the Spiritualty and Temporalty with her
'Deſign; and that ſhe ſhould tell both Houſes, ſhe was touched in 'her Conſcience, that ſhe and her People were in a Schiſm from the Ca-
'lick Church and the Apoſtolick See; and that therefore ſhe had de-
'ſired a Legate to come over to Treat about it; and ſhould thereupon
'propoſe that the Attainder might be taken off from him, that he might 'be capable to come on that Meſſage. And he proteſted, that he had 'never acted againſt the King, or Kingdom, but only with deſign to 'reduce them to the Unity of the Church; neither before nor after
'the Attainder: And whereas ſome might apprehend a thraldom from
'the Papacy, ſhe might give them aſſurance that they ſhould ſee all 'things ſo well ſecured, that there ſhould no danger come to the Na'tion from it; and he aſſured them that he, for his part, ſhould take
'as much care of that, as any of all the Temporalty could deſire.
'What Recommendations he ſent, for the Sees that were to be decla'red vacant, I do not know.

When this Diſpatch of his was brought into England, Gardiner, by the aſſiſtance of the Emperor, convinced the Queen that his method was unpracticable, and that the Marriage muſt be firſt diſpatched: and now Gardiner and he did declare open Enmity to one another. Gardiner thought him a weak man, that might have ſome ſpeculative knowledge of abſtracted Idea's, but underſtood not the World, nor the genious of the Engliſh Nation. Pool, on the other hand, thought him a falſe Man, that made conſcience of nothing, and was better at Intrigues and Diſſimulation, than the Government of the Church. But the Emperor ſaw Gardiner had ſo prudently managed this Parliament, that he concluded his meaſures were rather to be followed than the Cardinals. But Gardiners Methods are preferred to him.

In the Houſe of Commons it was given out, that it was neceſſary to gain the Queen to the Intereſt of the Nation, and to turn her from foreign Councils and Aid, by being eaſy to her in the matter of Religion, and therefore they were ready both to repeal the Divorce, and King Edward's Laws. But when they ſaw the deſign of the Marriage, and uniting with Rome, was ſtill carried on, they were all much allarm'd: ſo they ſent their Speaker, and twenty of their Houſe with him, with an earneſt and humble Addreſs to her, not to a marry a Stranger. This had ſo enflamed the Houſe, that the Court ſaw more could not be expected from them, unleſs they were ſatisfied in that point. So on the ſixth of December the Parliament was diſſolved. Upon that Gardiner ſent to the Emperor, to let him know that the Marriage was like to meet with ſuch oppoſition, that unleſs extraordinary Conditions were offered, which all ſhould ſee were much to the advantage of the Engliſh Crown, it could not be carried without a general Rebellion. He alſo aſſured him, that if great ſums of money were not ſent over to gratifie the chief Nobility and leading men in the Country, both for obliging them to his Intereſt, and enabling them to carry Elections for the next Parliament, the oppoſition would be ſuch, that the Queen muſt lay down all thoughts of marrying his Son. Upon this, the Emperor and his Son reſolved to offer

1553. offer what Conditions the English would demand; for Philip reckoned, if he once had the Crown on his Head, it would be easie for him with the assistance which his other Dominions might give him, to make all these signifie little. And for Money the Emperor borrowed twelve hundred thousand Crowns, (which in English Money was four hundred thousand pounds, for the Crown was then a Noble) and promised to send it over to be distributed as Gardiner and his Embassadors should think fit: but made his Son bind himself to repay him that sum, when he had once attained the Crown of England. And this the Emperor made so little a secret, that when, a year after, some Towns in Germany that had lent a part of this Money, desired to be repaid; he answered them, that he had lent his Son 1200000 Crowns to marry him to the Queen of England, and had yet received of him only 300000 Crowns, but he had good security for the rest, and the Merchants were bound to pay him 100000 lib. Sterling, and therefore he demanded a little more time of them. All this was printed soon after at Strasburgh by the English there, in a Book which they sent over to England; in which, both the Address made by the Commons in Parliament, and this Answer of the Emperor's to the Towns, is mentioned. And that whole Discourse, (which is in the form of an Address to the Queen, the Nobility and the Commons,) is written with such gravity and simplicity of Stile, that as it is by much the best I have seen of this time: so in these publick Transactions, there is no reason to think it untrue. For the things which it relates are credible of themselves; and though the sum there mentioned was very great, yet he that considers that England was to be bought with it, will not think it an extraordinary price. In that Discourse, it is further said, that as Gardiner corrupted many by Bribes, so in the Court of Chancery, Common Justice was denyed to all but those who came into these Designs.

1200000 Crowns sent into England to procure the consent of the Nation to the Marriage.

Having thus given an account of what was done in the Parliament, I shall next shew how the Convocation proceeded. Bonner being to preside in it, as being the first Bishop of the Province of Canterbury, appointed John Harpsfield his Chaplain to preach: who took his Text out of the twentieth of the Acts (verse 20.) Feed the Flock. He run out in his bidding Prayers, most profusely on the Queens Praises, comparing her to Deborah and Esther, with all the servilest flatteries he could invent: next he bid them pray for the Lady Elizabeth: but when he came to mention the Clergy, he enlarged in the praises of Bonner, Gardiner, Tonstall, Heath, and Day, so grosly, that it seems the strain of flattering Church-men at that time were very course: and he run out so copiously in them, as if he had been to deliver a Panegyrick and not to bid the Beads. In his Sermon he inveighed against the late Preachers, for not observing Fasts, nor keeping Lent, and for their Marriages which he severely condemned.

The Proceedings of the Convocation.

Weston, Dean of Westminster, was presented Prolocutor by the lower House, and approved of by Bonner. Whether any of the Bishops that had been made in King Edwards time sat among them, I do not know. But in the lower House there was great opposition made. There had been care taken that there should be none returned to the Convocation, but such as would comply in all points. But yet there came some Non-compliers, who being Deans or Arch-Deacons, had a right to sit in

in the Convocation. Theſe were Philpot Archdeacon of Wincheſter, Philips Dean of Rocheſter, Haddon Dean of Exeter, Cheyney Arch-deacon of Hereford, Ailmer Arch-deacon of Stow, and Young Chanter of St. Davids. Weſton the Prolocutor propoſed to them, on the 18*th.* of October, that there had been a Catechiſm printed in the laſt year of King Edwards Reign in the name of that Synod, and as he underſtood it was done without their conſents, which was a peſtiferous Book, and full of Hereſies; There was likewiſe a very abominable Book of Common Prayer ſet out; it was therefore the Queens pleaſure that they ſhould prepare ſuch Laws about Religion, as ſhe would ratifie with her Parliament. So he propoſed that they ſhould begin with condemning thoſe Books, particularly the Articles in them contrary to the Sacrament of the Altar: and he gave out two queſtions about it: Whether in the Sacrament, upon the Sanctification of the Bread and Wine, all their ſubſtance did not vaniſh, being changed into the Body and Blood of Chriſt? and, Whether the natural Body of Chriſt was not corporally preſent in the Euchariſt, either by the Tranſubſtantiation of the Elements into his Body and Blood, or by the Conjunction of Concomitance, as ſome expreſſed it? The Houſe was adjourned till the 20*th*, on which day every Man was appointed to give in his Anſwer to theſe Queſtions. All anſwered and ſubſcribed in the affirmative, except the ſix before mentioned. Philpot ſaid, whereas it was given out that the Catechiſm was not approved by the Convocation, though it was printed in their name; it was a miſtake: for the Convocation had authoriſed a number of Perſons to ſet forth Eccleſiaſtical Laws, to whom they had committed their Synodal Authority; So that they might well ſet out ſuch Books in the name of the Convocation. He alſo ſaid, that it was againſt all order, to move Men to ſubſcribe in ſuch points, before they were examined: and ſince the number of theſe on the one ſide, was ſo unequal to thoſe on the other ſide; he deſired that Dr. Ridley, Mr. Rogers, and two or three more, might be allowed to come to the Convocation. This ſeemed very reaſonable. So the lower Houſe propoſed it to the Biſhops. They anſwered, that theſe perſons being Priſoners, they could not bring them: but they ſhould move the Council about it. A Meſſage alſo was ſent from ſome great Lords, that they intended to hear the Diſputation; ſo the Houſe adjourned till the 23*d*. 1553.

There was then a great appearance of Noblemen and others. The Prolocutor began with a Proteſtation, that by this Diſpute they did not intend to call the Truth in doubt, to which they had all ſubſcribed; but they did it only to ſatisfie the objections of thoſe few who refuſed to concur with them. But it was denyed to let any Priſoners or others aſſiſt them, for it was ſaid, that that being a Diſpute among thoſe of the Convocation, none but Members were to be heard in it. Haddon, and Ailmer, foreſeeing they ſhould be run down with clamour and noiſe, refuſed to diſpute: Young went away: Cheyney being next ſpoke to, did propoſe his Objections: that St. Paul calls the Sacrament Bread after the Conſecration: that Origen ſaid, it went into the Excrement: and Theodoret ſaid, the Bread and Wine did not in the Sacrament depart from their former Subſtance, Form, and Shape. Moreman was called on to anſwer him: He ſaid, that St. Paul calling it Bread, was to be underſtood thus, the Sacrament or Form of Bread. To Origens Authority 1553. ty he answered nothing; but to Theodoret he said, the word they render Substance stood in a more general signification, and so might signifie accidental Substance. Upon this, Ailmer, who had resolved not to Dispute, could not contain himself, but said the Greek Word, &c. could not be so understood, for the following words of Form and Shape belonged to the Accidents, but that only belonged to the Substance of the Elements. Upon this there followed a Contest about the signification of that word. Then Philpot struck in, and said, the occasion of Theodoret's writing, plainly shewed, that was a vain Cavil; for the Dispute was with the Eutychians, whether the Body and humane Nature of Christ had yet an Existence distinct from the Divine Nature? The Eutychians said, it was swallowed up by his Godhead; and argued from some expressions used concerning the Sacrament, as if the presence of Christ in it had swallowed up the Elements: against which, Theodoret, according to the Orthodox Doctrine, argued to prove that there was in Christ a humane Nature, not swallowed up; and said, that as in the Sacrament, notwithstanding the union of Christ with the Elements, they did not depart from their Substance, Form, and Shape; So the humane Nature of Christ, was not absorbed by its Union to the Godhead. So it plainly appeared, this word Substance stood for the Nature of the Elements. Moreman being straitned in answering this, Philpot said, if he had not an Answer ready, he would desire him to think on one against their next Meeting; upon this the Prolocutor checked him, as if he were bragging too soon. He insisted on his Argument, but was commanded to be silent. Haddon upon that proposed another Argument, from these Words of our Saviour, The Poor you have always with you, but Me you have not always: That therefore his Body was not in the Sacrament. To this the Prolocutor answered, that Christ was not to be always with us so as to receive our Alms; which is all that was intended by that place: But Haddon brought a copious Citation out of St. Austin, applying that very Place to prove that Christ's natural Presence was no more on Earth, after his Ascension into Heaven. To this Dr. Watson opposed another place of St. Austin, and some dispute was about those Places: After that, Haddon read more Authorities of Fathers, asserting that Christ was in Heaven and not on Earth; the Words of the Institution did plainly express it: both because the Sacrament was to be in remembrance of Christ, and because it was to continue until his coming again. But to this they said, he was not on Earth in a bodily manner; and they endeavoured to take away the Force of the Argument from the Words, until his coming again, by some other Acceptions of the Word [until.] But Haddon asked them, whether they thought Christ did eat his own natural Body, when he instituted and took the Sacrament? they said he did. Upon that he answered, that that was so absurd, that he thought it needless to argue more with those who could yield it, and so he sate down. Philpot argued, that Christ could not receive his own Body in the Sacrament, since it was given for the Remission of Sins, of which he was not capable, having no Sin; Weston answered, he might receive it, as well as he Baptized: But Philpot answered, he was baptized, as he said himself, to be an example to others. So ended this days Dispute.

On the 25 Philpot, who was ordered to begin that Day, had prepared a long Diſcourſe in Latin: But Weſton interrupted him, and ſaid, He muſt make no Speech, he was only to propoſe his Arguments, and that in Engliſh; though it had been before ordered that the Diſpute ſhould be in Latin. Then Philpot went to explain what ſort of Preſence he would diſpute againſt, and what he allowed. Here Weſton again interrupted him, and bid him form his Argument. Upon that he fell down on his Knees, and begged of the Lords, and Privy-Counſellors that were preſent, That he might have leave to ſpeak his Mind: Which they granted him; ſo, he ſaid, For their Sacrifice of the Maſs, he would prove that it was no Sacrament at all, and that Chriſt was no way preſent in it; which if he ſhould not do, before the Queen and her Council, againſt any ſix that would maintain the contrary, he ſhould be willing to be burnt before the Court Gates. Upon this there was great out-crying, that he was mad, and talkt idely; and Weſton threatned to ſend him to Priſon. But this noiſe being laid, and he claiming the priviledg of the Houſe for the freedom of Speech, was required to go on to an Argument. Then he proved that Chriſt was in Heaven; for himſelf ſaid, I leave the World, and go to my Father: and to prove there was no ambiguity in theſe words, he obſerved, that his Diſciples ſaid upon this, Now thou ſpeakeſt plainly, without any Parable. It was anſwered by Dr. Chedſey, That thoſe words were only meant of his viſible Aſcenſion, but did not exclude his inviſible preſence; and he cited ſome words of Chryſoſtom's, That Chriſt took his Fleſh with him, and alſo left his Fleſh behind him. Weſton and the reſt ſaid, That Authority was unanſwerable; and for a while would not hear his Anſwer. But Philpot ſhewed him, that Chryſoſtom's words muſt be underſtood in a large ſenſe, as Believers are ſaid to be Fleſh of his Fleſh; for that Father applies that alſo to Baptiſm, from theſe words, As many as are baptized into Chriſt, have put on Chriſt; ſo the Fleſh that Chriſt left on Earth, according to him, is not the Corporal Preſence in the Sacrament. Upon this, Pye, Dean of Chicheſter, whiſpered ſomewhat to the Prolocutor; who thereupon ſaid to Philpot, That he had diſputed enough. He anſwered, That he had a dozen of Arguments, and they were enjoyning him ſilence, before he had got through one of them. They threatned to ſend him to Priſon if he ſpoke more. He ſaid, That was far from the Promiſe they had made of hearing them fully; and from what was preached laſt Sunday at Pauls, That all things ſhould be anſwered in this Diſputation. But Pye ſaid, He ſhould be anſwered another way. Philpot replyed, There was a Company of them now got together, who had heretofore diſſembled with God and the World; and were now met to ſuppreſs God's Truth, and to ſet forth falſe Devices, which they were not able to maintain. After this Ailmer ſtood up, and brought many Authorities out of Greek Authors, to prove that ἔσται in Theodoret, could only be underſtood of the ſubſtance of Bread and Wine: and Moreman deſired a days time to conſider of them. Then Pern, though he had ſubſcribed with the reſt, brought ſome Arguments againſt Tranſubſtantiation; for which the Prolocutor chid him, ſince he had before ſubſcribed. Ailmer anſwered, That it was againſt the freedom of the Houſe, for any to be ſo chid for delivering his Conſcience. It was now become late, ſo they adjourned to the 27*th.* 1553.

1553. Then they again disputed about Theodorets words, where Haddon shewed that he said the Symboles retained the same Substance that they had before. After that Cheyney fell to argue about those words; he acknowledged a real Presence, but denied Transubstantiation, and pressed Theodoret's Authority so close, that Watson said he was a Nestorian; and if Theodoret, who was but one, was of their side, there was above a hundred Fathers against them. Upon this Cheyney quoted Irneus, who had said, that our flesh was nourished by the Bread and Wine in the Sacrament. He also cited Hesychius, who said that in the Church of Jerusalem, the Symboles that were not consumed in the Communion, were burnt afterwards; he desired to know whether the Ashes were the Body of Christ, or what it was that was burnt. To all this Horsfield made a long Answer concerning Gods Omnipotence, and the weakness of mens understandings, that could not comprehend Divine Mysteries. But Cheyney still asked what it was that was burnt? Horsfield replied, it was either the Substanee of Bread, or the Body of Christ; and afterwards said it was a Miracle: At that Cheyney smiled, and said, then he could say no more. Weston asked, whether there was not enough said in answer to these mens Objections? Many of the Clergy cried out, Yes, Yes: but the Multitude with repeated cries said, No, No: Weston said, he spake to those of the House, and not to the rude Multitude. Then he asked those Divines, whether they would now for three days answer the Arguments that should be put to them? Haddon, Cheyney, and Ailmer, said they would not: But Philpot offered to do it: Weston said he was a mad man, and fitter to be sent to Bedlam. Philpot said, he that had carried himself with so much Passion, and so little Indifferency, deserved a Room there much better. Weston neglecting him, turned to the Assembly, and said, they might see what sort of men these were, whom they had now answered three days; but though they had promised it, and the Order of Disputation did require it, that they should answer in their turn three days, they now declined it. Upon that, Ailmer stood up and answered, that they had made no such Promise, nor undertaken any such Disputation; but being required to give their Reasons, why they would not subscribe with the rest, they had done it, but had received no Answer to them, and therefore would enter into no further Disputation before such Judges, who had already determined and subscribed those Questions. So the House was adjourned to the 30*th.* and then Philpot appeared to answer, but desired first leave to prosecute his former Argument, and urged that since Christ as man is like us in all things without sin, therefore as we are restrained to one place at a time, so is Christ but in one place, and that is Heaven; for St. Peter says, the Heavens must contain him till the Restitution of all things. To this it was answered, That Christ being God, his Omnipotence was above our understanding: and that to shut him in one place, was to put him in Prison. Philpot said, he was not speaking of his Divine Nature, but that as he was man he was like us: And for their saying that Christ was not to be imprisoned in Heaven, he left to all men to judge whether that was a good answer or not. Much discourse following upon this, the Prolocutor commanded him to come no more into the House. He answered, he thought himself happy to be out of their company. Others suggesting to the Prolocutor, that it would be said ſaid the meeting was not free, if men were put out of the Houſe for ſpeaking their minds: He ſaid to him he might come, ſo he were decently Habited, and did not ſpeak but when he commanded him. To this he anſwered, that he had rather be abſent altogether. Weſton concluded all, by ſaying, you have the Word, but we have the Sword: Truly pointing out wherein the ſtrength of both Cauſes lay.

This was the Iſſue of that Diſputation, which was ſoon after Printed in Engliſh: and in Latin by Volerandus Polanus, and is inſerted at large in Fox's Acts and Monuments. What account the other ſide gave of it, I do not find. But upon all ſuch occaſions, the prevailing party, when the inequality was ſo diſproportioned, uſed to carry things with ſo much noiſe and diſorder, that it was no wonder the Reformers had no mind to engage in this Diſpute. And thoſe who reflected on the way of proceeding in King Edwards time, could not but confeſs things had been managed with much more Candor and Equality. For in this very Point, there had been, as was formerly ſhewn, Diſputes for a Year together, before there was any Determination made: ſo that all men were free at that time to deliver their Opinions without any fear, and then the Diſputes were in the Univerſities, where as there were a great Silence, and Collection of Books, ſo the Auditors were more capable of being inſtructed by them: But here the Point was firſt determined, and then diſputed: And this was in the midſt of the diſorder of the Town, where the Privy Council gave all poſſible encouragement to the prevailing Party.

Cenſures paſt upon it.

The laſt thing I find done this year, was, the reſtoring Veiſey to be Biſhop of Exeter, which was done on the 28*th.* of December. In his Warrant for it under the great Seal, it is ſaid, that he, for ſome juſt troubles both in Body and Mind, had reſign'd his Biſhoprick to King Edward, to which the Queen now reſtored him. And thus ended this year. Foreign Affairs did not ſo much concern Religion, as they had done in the former Reign, which as it made me give ſome account of them then, ſo it cauſes me now not to proſecute them ſo fully.

In the beginning of the next year, the Emperour ſent over the Count of Egmont and ſome other Ambaſſadours to make the Propoſition and Treaty of Marriage, betwixt his Son and the Queen. In the managing of this Treaty, Gardiner had the chief hand: for he was now the Oracle at the Council-board: He had thirty years Experience in Affairs, a great Knowledge of the Courts of Chriſtendome, and of the State of England, and had great Sagacity, with a marvelous Cunning, which was not always regulated by the Rules of Candor and Honeſty. He in drawing the Articles of the Marriage had a double deſign: the one was, to have them ſo framed that they might eaſily paſs in Parliament; And the other was, to exclude the Spaniards from having any ſhare in the Government of England, which he intended to hold in his own hands. So the Terms on which it was agreed were theſe.

Ambaſſadors ſent from the Emperour for the marriage.

The Queen ſhould have the whole Government of England, with the giving of Offices and Benefices, in her own hands: ſo that though Philip was to be called King, and his Name was to be on the Coin, and the Seals, and in Writs, yet her hand was to give force to every thing without his. Spaniards ſhould not be admitted into the Government,

The Articles agreed.

1553. nor to any Offices at Court. The Laws ſhould not be altered, nor the Pleadings put into any other Tongue. The Queen ſhould not be made to go out of England, but upon her own deſire. The Children born in the Marriage ſhould not go out of England, but by the conſent of the Nobility. If the Queen out-lived the Prince, She ſhould have 60000*l.* a year out of his Eſtate, 40000 out of Spain, and 20000 of it out of the Netherlands. If the Queen had Sons by him, they ſhould ſucceed, both to her own Crowns, and the Netherlands, and Burgundy: and if the Arch-Duke Charles, Philip's only Son died, they ſhould ſucceed to all Her and His Dominions: If ſhe had only Daughters, they ſhould ſucceed to her Crowns, and the Netherlands, if they married by their Brothers conſent: or otherwiſe, they ſhould have ſuch Portions, as was ordinarily given to thoſe of their Rank: But if the Queen had no Iſſue, the King was not to pretend to any part of the Government after her death; but the Crown was to deſcend, according to the Laws of England, to her Heirs. There was to be a perpetual League betwixt England and Spain; but this was not to be in prejudice of their League with France, which was ſtill to continue in force.

Theſe were the Conditions agreed on, and afterwards confirmed in Parliament; by which it appears the Spaniards were reſolved to have the Marriage on any Terms; reckoning that if Prince Philip were once in England, he could eaſily enlarge his Authority, which was hereby ſo much reſtrained.

The Match generally diſliked.

It was now apparent, the Queen was to marry the Prince of Spain; which gave an univerſal diſcontent to the whole Nation. All that loved the Reformation ſaw, that not only their Religion would be changed, but a Spaniſh Government and Inquiſition would be ſet up in its ſtead. Thoſe who conſidered the Civil Liberties of the Kingdom, without great regard to Religion, concluded that England would become a Province to Spain; and they ſaw how they governed the Netherlands, and heard how they ruled Milan, Naples, and Sicily: but above all, they heard the moſt inhumane things that ever any Age produced, had been acted by them in their new Conqueſt in the Weſt-Indies.

It was ſaid, what might they expect, but to lie at the mercy of ſuch tyrannical Maſters, who would not be long kept within the Limits that were now preſcribed? All the great Conditions now talked of, were but the gilding the Pill, but its operation would be fatal, if they once ſwallowed it down. Theſe things had Influence on many; but the chief Plots to oppoſe it.

Conſpirators were the Duke of Suffolk, Sir Thomas Wiat, and Sir Peter Carew: The one was to raiſe the Mid-land Counties, the other to raiſe Cornwall, and Wiat was to raiſe Kent; hoping by riſing in ſuch remote places, ſo to diſtract the Government, that they ſhould be able to engage the Commons who were now as much diſtaſted with the Queen, as they had been formerly fond of her.

Are diſcovered.

But as Carew was carrying on his Deſign in the Weſt, it came to be diſcovered; and one that he had truſted much in it, was taken: upon that Carew fled over into France. Wiat was in Kent when he heard this; but had not yet laid his Buſineſs as he intended. Therefore fearing to be undone by the Diſcovery that was made, he gathered ſome Wiat breaks out.

Men about him, and on the 25*th* of January, went to Maidſtone: There he made Proclamation, that he intended nothing, but to preſerve ſerve the Liberty of the Nation, and keep it from coming under the Yoke of Strangers; which, he ſaid, all the Council, one or two excepted, were againſt: and aſſured the People, that all the Nobility, and chief Men of England, would concur with them. He ſaid nothing of Religion, but in private aſſured thoſe that were for the Reformation, that he would declare for them. One Roper came and declared him and his Company Traitors; but he took him, with ſome Gentlemen that were gathering to oppoſe him. From thence he went to Rocheſter, and writ to the Sheriff of Kent, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt the Strangers, for there were already, as he ſaid, an hundred Armed Spaniards landed at Dover. The Sheriff ſent him word, That if he and thoſe with him, had any Suits, they were to make them to the Queen on their knees, but not with Swords in their hands; and required them to diſperſe, under pain of Treaſon. Wiat kept his Men in good order, ſo that they did no hurt, but only took all the Arms they could find. 1554

At the ſame time, one Iſley and Knevet gathered People together about Tunbridg, and went to joyn with Wiat. The Queen ſent down a Herald to him with a Pardon, if he would diſperſe his Company in 24 hours; but Wiat made him deliver his Meſſage at the end of Rocheſter Bridg, and ſo ſent him away. The High Sheriff gathered together as many as he could, and ſhewed them how they were abuſed by Lyes; there was no Spaniards landed at all: and thoſe that were to come, were to be their Friends and Confederates againſt their Enemies. Thoſe that he brought together, went to Graveſend to meet the Duke of Norfolk, and Sir Hen. Jerningham, who were come thither with 600 Men from London; and they hearing that Knevet was in his way to Rocheſter, went, and intercepted, and routed him; ſixty of his Men were killed, the reſt ſaved themſelves in the Woods.

The News of this diſheartned Wiat much; who was ſeen to weep, and called for a Coat, which he ſtuffed with Angels, deſigning to have eſcaped. But the Duke of Norfolk marching to Rocheſter with 200 Horſe, and 600 Foot, commanded by one Bret; they were wrought on, by a pretended Deſertor, Harper, who ſeemed to come over from Wiat: he perſwaded the Londoners, that it was only the preſervation of the Nation from the Spaniards that they deſigned; and it was certain none would ſuffer under that Yoke more then they. This had ſuch an effect on them, that they all cried out, We are all Engliſh Men; and went over to Wiat. So the Duke of Norfolk was forced to march back. And now Kent was all open to Wiat, who thereupon ſent one to the Duke of Suffolk, preſſing him to make haſte and raiſe his Country: but the Bearer was intercepted. Upon that, the Earl of Huntington was ſent down with ſome Horſe to ſeize on him. The Duke was at all times a mean-ſpirited Man, but it never appeared more than now: For after a faint endeavour to raiſe the Country, he gave it over, and concealed himſelf in a private Houſe; but was betrayed by him to whom he had truſted himſelf, into the hands of the Earl of Huntington, and ſo was brought to the Tower. The Londoners revolt.

Wiat's Party encreaſing, they turned towards London. As they came to Debtford, Sir Edward Haſtings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, came to them, in the Queen's Name, to ask what would content them? Wiat deſired 1554. Wiat's Demands. deſired that he might have the Command of the Tower, that the Queen might ſtay under his Guard; and that the Council might be changed. Upon theſe extravagant Propoſitions, there paſſed high words, and the Privy Counſellors returned to the Queen. After this ſhe went into Guild-hall, and there gave an account of her Meſſage to Wiat, and his Anſwer. And for her Marriage, ſhe ſaid, ſhe did nothing in it but by advice of her Council, and ſpoke very tenderly of the love ſhe bore to her People, and to that City. On the 31, Wiat was become 4000 ſtrong, and came near Southwark. On the 2*d* of February he fell into Southwark. Some of his Company had a mind to have broken into Winchester-Houſe, and robb'd it; but he threatned to hang any that ſhould do it. He was put in hope, that upon his coming to Southwark, London would have declared for him; but in that he was deceived. The Bridg was fortified, ſo that he found it was not poſſible to force it. Here he held a Council of War with his Officers; ſome were for turning back into Kent, to diſperſe a Body of Men that the Lord Abergavenny had gathered together: but he ſaid, That was a ſmall Game. The ſtrength of their Party was in London, and therefore it was neceſſary for him to be there as ſoon as he could: for though they could not open the Bridg to him, yet he was aſſured, if he were on the other ſide, many would come out to him. Some were for croſſing over to Eſſex, where they heard the People were well-affected to them; but they had not Boats enough, ſo he marched to get over at Kingſton-Bridg.

He came to Southwark.

He croſſed the Thames at Kingſton. On the 4*th* they came to Kingſton, where the Queen had ordered the Bridg to be cut; but his Men repairing it, he croſſed the River that Night; and though he loſt much time by the mending of one of his Carriages that broke by the way, he was at Hide-Park by nine of the Clock next Morning, it being Aſh-wedneſday.

But is defeated The Earl of Pembroke had gathered a good Body of Men to have fallen on him, for his Men were now in great diſorder; but they look'd on, to let him caſt himſelf into their hands. He did not march by Holborn, as ſome adviſed, but came down to Charing-Croſs. There the Lord Clinton fell in between the ſeveral Bodies of his Men, and diſperſed them ſo, that he had not 500 left about him: But with thoſe that remained, he paſſed through the Strand, and Fleetſtreet, to Ludgate, where he ſtopped, in hope to have found the Gates opened to him. That hope failing, he returned back; and being now out of all heart, was taken at Temple-Bar by a Herald. All this while the Queen ſhewed great Courage, ſhe would not ſtir out of Whitehall, nor go by Water to the Tower, as ſome adviſed her, but went with her Women and Prieſts to her Devotions.

And taken.

This was a Rebellion, both raiſed and diſperſed, in as ſtrange a manner as could have been imagined. Wiat was a popular and ſtout Man, but had not a Head for ſuch an Undertaking, otherwiſe the Government was ſo feeble, that it had not been a difficult thing to have driven the Queen to great ſtraits. It was not at all raiſed upon pretence of Religion; which, according to the printed Account ſet out by the Queen's Order, was not ſo much as once named. And yet ſome of our own Writers ſay, That Poinet, the late Biſhop of Winchester, was in it. But this is certainly falſe, for ſo many Priſoners being taken, it is not to be imagined but this would have been found out, and publiſhed, Poinet was not in that Rebellion.

liſhed, to make that Religion more odious: and we cannot think but Gardiner would have taken care that he ſhould have been attainted in the following Parliament. 1554.

Chriſtophorſon ſoon after writ a Book againſt Rebellion, in which he ſtudies to faſten this Riſing on the Preachers of the New Religion, as he calls it; and gives ſome preſumptions, that amount to no more, but little flouriſhes of his Wit, but never names this, which had been a deciſive proof. So that it is but a groundleſs fiction, made by thoſe who have either been the Authors, or at leaſt have laid down the Principles of all the Rebellions in the Chriſtian World, and yet would caſt that blame on others, and exempt themſelves from it; as if they were the ſureſt Friends of Princes, while they deſign to enſlave them to a Foreign Power, and will neither allow them to Reign, nor to Live, but at the mercy of the Head of that Principality, to which all other Powers muſt bend; or break, if they meet with an Age that is ſo credulous and ſuperſtitious, as to receive their Dictates.

This raw, and ſoon-broken Rebellion, was as lucky to Gardiner, and thoſe who ſet on the Marriage, as if they had projected it; for now the People were much diſheartned, and their own deſigns as much fortified: ſince, as ſome Fevers are Critical, and caſt out thoſe latent Diſtempers, which no Medicines could effectually purge away; and yet if they were not removed, muſt in the end corrupt the whole Maſs of Blood; ſo in a weak Government, to which the People are ill-affected, ill-digeſted, Rebellions raiſe the Prince higher, and add as much ſpirit to his Friends, as they take from the Faction againſt him, and give a Handle to do ſome things, for which otherwiſe it were not eaſy, either to find Colours or Inſtruments.

The L. Jane and her Huſband executed.

One effect of this was, the proceeding ſeverely againſt the Lady Jane and her Husband, the Lord Guilford, who both ſuffered on the 12. of February. The Lady Jane was not much diſordered at it; for ſhe knew, upon the firſt Jealouſie, ſhe muſt be the Sacrifice; and therefore had now lived ſix months in the continual meditations of Death. Feckham, afterwards Abbot of Weſtminſter, was ſent to her by the Queen, three days before, to prepare her to die. He had a long converſation with her: but ſhe anſwered him with that calmneſs of Mind, and clearneſs of Reaſon, that it was an aſtoniſhing thing to hear ſo young a Perſon, of her Sex and Quality, look on Death, ſo near her, with ſo little diſorder, and talk ſo ſenſibly, both of Faith and Holineſs, of the Sacrament, the Scriptures, and the Authority of the Church. Feckham left her, ſeeing he could work nothing on her: but procured, as is ſaid, the continuance of her Life three days longer, and waited on her on the Scaffold. She writ to her Father to moderate his Grief for her Death, (which muſt needs have been great, ſince his Folly had occaſioned it.) She expreſſed her ſenſe of her Sin, in aſſuming the Royal Dignity, though he knew how unwillingly ſhe was drawn to it; and that in her Royal Eſtate, her enforced Honour had never defiled her innocent Heart. She rejoyced at her approaching End, ſince nothing could be to her more welcome, than to be delivered from that Valley of Miſery, into that Heavenly Throne, to which ſhe was to be advanced, where ſhe prayed that they might meet at laſt.

Her preparation for Death.

There

1554. There was one Harding that had been her Father's Chaplain, and that was a zealous Preacher in King Edward's Days; before whose Death he had animated the People much to prepare for Perſecution and never to depart from the Truth of the Goſpel; but he had now fallen away himſelf. To him ſhe writ a Letter full of ſevere expoſtulations and threatnings for his Apoſtacy; but it had no effect on him. It is of an extraordinary ſtrain, full of Life in the Thoughts, and of Zeal, if there is not too much, in the Expreſſions. The Night before her Execution, ſhe ſent her Greek Teſtament, which ſhe had always uſed, to her Siſter; with a Letter in the ſame Language, in which, in moſt pathetick Expreſſions, ſhe ſets out the value that ſhe had of it, and recommended the ſtudy and practice of it earneſtly to her. She had alſo compoſed a very devout Prayer for her Retirements; and this had ſhe ſpent the laſt moments of her life. She expreſſed great tenderneſs, when ſhe ſaw her Husband led out firſt; but ſoon overcame it, when ſhe conſidered how cloſely ſhe was to follow him. He had deſired to take leave of her before he died, but ſhe declined it, ſince it would be rather an encreaſe of Grief, than any addition of Comfort to them. She ſaid, ſhe hoped they would ſhortly meet, and be united in a happier State; and with a ſetled Countenance ſhe ſaw them bring back the beheaded Body to the Chappel, where it was to be buried. When ſhe was brought to the Scaffold, which was raiſed for her within the Tower, to prevent the compaſſion, which her dying more publickly might have raiſed; ſhe confeſſed, ſhe had ſinned in taking the Queen's Honour, when it was given her; ſhe acknowledged the Act was unlawful, as was alſo her conſenting to it; but, ſhe ſaid, it was neither procured nor deſired by her. She declared, that ſhe died a true Chriſtian, and hoped to be ſaved only by the Mercy of God in the Blood of Chriſt. She acknowledged that ſhe had too much neglected the Word of God, and had loved her ſelf and the World too much, for which that punishment had come juſtly to her from God: but ſhe bleſſed him that had made it a means to lead her to repentance. Then, having deſired the Peoples Prayers, ſhe kneeled down, and repeated the 51 Pſalm: Then ſhe undreſſed her ſelf, and ſtretched out her Head on the Block, and cried out, Lord into thy hands I recommend my Spirit; and ſo her Head was cut off.

All People lamented her ſad and untimely end, which was not even conſented to, even by the Queen her ſelf. Her Death had a moſt violent operation on Judg Morgan, that had pronounced the Sentence; ſoon after he fell mad, and in all his ravings, ſtill called to take away the Lady Jane from him. Indeed the blame of her death was generally caſt on her Father, rather than on the Queen, ſince the Rivalry of a Crown is a point of ſuch niceneſs, that even thoſe who bemoaned her Death moſt, could not but excuſe the Queen, who ſeemed to be driven to it, rather from Conſiderations of State, then any Reſentment of her own. On the 17 of February was the Duke of Suffolk tried by his Peers and condemned: He ſuffered on the 21. He would have died more pitied for his Weakneſs, if his Practices had not brought his Daughter to her end. Next, Wiat was brought to his Trial, where in moſt abject words he beg'd his Life, and offered to promote the Queen's Marriage, if they would ſpare him; but for all that he was

Beheaded

Beheaded. Bret was hanged in Chains at Rocheſter. In all fifty eight were Executed in ſeveral places, whoſe Attainders were confirmed by an Act of the following Parliament, 600 of the Rabble were appointed to come before the Queen with Halters about their Necks, and to beg their Lives which ſhe granted them; and ſo was this Storm diſſipated? only the Effuſion of Blood after it, was thought too liberal, and this Exceſs of Puniſhment was generally caſt on Gardiner, and made him become very hateful to the Nation; which has been alwayes much moved at a Repetition of ſuch ſad ſpectacles. 1554.

The Earl of Devonſhire, and the Lady Elizabeth, came to be ſuſpected of the Plot, as if the riſing in the Weſt had been ſet on by the Earl, with deſign, if it had ſucceeded, to have married the Lady Elizabeth, and put her in the Queen's Room. Wiat did at his death clear them of any occaſion to his Confederacies. Yet the Queen who was much alienated from her Siſter upon old Scores, was not unwilling to find a pretence for uſing her ill; ſo ſhe was made a Priſoner. And the Earl of Devonſhire had, upon the account formerly mentioned, offended the Queen, who thought her kindneſs ill requited, when ſhe ſaw he neglected her, and preferred her Siſter; ſo he was again put into priſon. Sir Nicolas Throgmorton was alſo charged with that ſame Guilt, and brought to his Tryal, which laſted Ten hours; but was acquitted by the Jury: Upon which they were caſt into Priſon, and ſeverely Fined, ſome in 2000 l. and ſome in a 1000 Marks. This was fatal to his Brother Sir John, who was caſt by the Jury, upon the ſame Evidence that his Brother had been acquitted, but he proteſted his innocence to the laſt. Sir John Cheek had got beyond Sea, finding he was alſo ſuſpected and ſought after; and both Sir Peter Carew, and he hoping that Philip would be glad, at his firſt admiſſion to the Crown of England, to ſhew acts of favour, went into Flanders; where, upon aſſurances given of Pardon and Mercy, they rendered themſelves. But upon their coming into England, they were both put into the Tower. Carew made his eſcape, and was afterwards employed by Queen Elizabeth in her affairs in Ireland. Cheek was at this time diſcharged, but upon ſome new Offence, he was taken again in Flanders, in May, 1556. and was prevailed upon to renounce his Religion, and then he was ſet at liberty; but was ſo ſadly affected at the unworthineſs of that Action, that it was believed to have caſt him into a Languiſhing, of which he ſoon after dyed. There was a baſe Impoſture ſet up at this time, of one that ſeemed to ſpeak from a Wall with a ſtrange ſort of voice. Many ſeditious things were uttered by that voice, which was judged of variouſly. Some called it the Spirit of the Wall. Some ſaid it was an Angel that ſpake: And many marvellous things were reported of it; But the matter being narrowly enquired into, it was found to be one Elizabeth Croſts, a Girle, who from a private hole in the Wall, with the help of a Wiſtle, had uttered thoſe words. She was made to do Pennance openly at Pauls for it: But by the account then printed of it, I do not find any Complices were found; except one Drake, to whom no particular Character is added. So it ſeems it was a Trick laid Betwixt theſe two; for what purpoſe I cannot find. Sure enough in thoſe Times, it was not laid to the charge of the Preachers of the Reformation. Which I the rather take notice of, becauſe of the Malignity of one of our Hiſtorians, who has laid this to the charge

The instructions to the Bishops. Col. Number 10.

The Nation being now settled, the Queen did next give Instructions to the Bishops to proceed to visit the Clergy, according to some Articles which she sent them, which will be found in the Collections. In those, after a long and invidious Preamble of the disorders that had been in the time of King Edward, she commanded them, to execute all such Ecclesiastical Laws as had been in force in her Fathers Reign: That the Bishops should in their Courts proceed no more in the Queens Name: That the Oath of Supremacy should be no more Exacted of any of the Clergy: That none suspect of Heresie should be admitted to Orders: That they should endeavour to repress Heresie, and punish Hereticks: That they should suppress all naughty Books, and Ballads: That they should remove all married Clergy men, and separate them from their Wives; but for those that renounced their Wives, they might put them into some other Cure, or reserve a Pension out of their Benefice for them: That no religious Man who had professed Chastity, should be suffered to live with his Wife: That care should be taken of vacant Churches: That till they were provided, the People should go to the Neighbouring Churches: That all the Ceremonies, Holy-days and Fasts, used in King Henry's time, should be again observed: That those who were ordained by the new Book in King Edward's time, not being ordained in very deed, The Bishop, if they were otherwise sufficient, should supply what was wanting before, and so admit them to Ministry: That the Bishops should set forth an uniform Doctrine of Homilies; and compel the people to come to Church, and hear Divine Service: That they should carefully look to all School-masters and Teachers of Children: And that the Bishops should take care to set forth the Premisses, with all kind of Vertue, godly Living, and good Example; and endeavour to keep down all sort of Vice.

Proceedings against the Bishops that adhered to the Reformation.

These were Sign'd on the 4*th.* of March, and Printed, and sent over the Kingdom. But to make the Married Bishops Examples of the severity of their proceedings; the Queen gave a special Commission to Gardiner Tonstall, Bonner, Parsew, Bishop of St. Asaph, Day, and Kitchin of Landaffe, making mention, that with great grief of heart 'she had heard, that the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of St. David's, 'Chester and Bristol, had broken their Vows, and defiled their Function, by contracting Marriage; therefore those, or any three of them, 'are empowered to call them before them; and if the Premisses be found Col. Number 11, 12. 'to be true, to deprive, and turn them out of their Bishopricks. This I have put into the Collection, with another Commission to the same 'Persons, to call the Bishops of Lincoln, Gloucester and Hereford, before 'them; in whose Patents it was provided that they should hold their 'Bishopricks so long as they behaved themselves well: and since they 'by preaching Erroneous Doctrine, and by inordinate Life and Conversation, as she credibly understood, had carried themselves contrary to 'the Laws of God, and the Practice of the universal Church, these or 'any two of them, should proceed against them, either according to 'Ecclesiastical Canons, or the Laws of the Land, and declare their Bishoppricks void, as they were indeed already void: Thus were Seven Biſhops all at a daſh turned out. It was much cenſured, that there having been Laws made, allowing Marriage to the Clergy, the Queen ſhould by her own Authority, upon the repealing theſe Laws, turn out Biſhops for things that had been ſo well warranted by Law: for the Repeal was only an Annulling of the Law for the Future, but did not void it from the beginning: ſo that, however it might have juſtified proceedings againſt them for the Future, if they had lived with their Wives; yet it could not warrant the puniſhing them for what was paſt: And even the ſevereſt Popes, or their Legates, who had preſſed the Cœlibate moſt, had alwayes before they proceeded to deprive any Prieſts for Marriage, left it to their choice, whether they would quit their Wives, or their Benefices: but had never ſummarily turned them out for being married: And for the other Biſhops, it was an unheard of way of procedure, for the Queen before any proceſs was made, to empower Delegates to declare their Sees void, as they were indeed already void. This was to give Sentence before hearing. And all this was done by vertue of the Queens Supremacy; for though ſhe thought that, a ſinful and Schiſmatical Power, yet ſhe was eaſily perſwaded to uſe it againſt the Reformed Clergy, and to turn them out of their Benefices upon ſuch unjuſt and Illegal pretences. So that now the proceedings againſt Gardiner and Bonner, in which were the greateſt Stretches made that had been in the laſt Reign, were far outdone by thoſe new Delegates. For the Archbiſhop of York, though he was now turned out, yet he was ſtill kept Priſoner; till King Philip, among the Acts of Grace he did at his coming over, procured his Liberty. But his See was not filled till February next; for then Heath had his Conge d'elire. On or before the 18*th* of March this Year, were thoſe other Sees declared Vacant. For that day did the Conge d'elire go out to the Deans and Chapters of St. Davids, Lincoln, Hereford, Cheſter, Gloceſter, and Briſtol: for Morgan, White, Parſew, Coates, Brookes, and Holyman. Goodrick of Ely died in April this Year. He ſeems to have complied with the time, as he had done often before: for he was not at all caſt into any trouble, which it cannot be imagined he could have eſcaped, ſince he had put the great Seal to the Patents for the Lady Jane, if he had not Redeemed it by a ready conſenting to the changes that were to be made. He was a buſie ſecular ſpirited Man, and had given himſelf up wholly to Factions and Intrigues of State: ſo that, though his opinion had always leaned to the Reformation, it is no wonder if a man ſo tempered would prefer the keeping of his Biſhoprick before the Diſcharge of his Conſcience. Thirleby of Norwich was Tranſlated to Ely, and Hopton was made Biſhop of Norwich. But Scory, that had been Biſhop of Chicheſter, though upon Day's being reſtored, he was turned out of his Biſhoprick, did comply meerly: He came before Bonner, and Renounced his Wife, and did Penance for it, and had his Abſolution under his Seal, the 14*th* of July this Year: which is in the Collection. But it ſeems this was out of fear; for he ſoon after fled out of England, and lived beyond Sea until Queen Elizabeth's days: and then he came over; But it was judged indecent to reſtore him to his former See, where it is likely this Scandal he had given, was known; and ſo he was made Biſhop of Hereford. The Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Barlow, was alſo

1554. made to Reſign, as appears by the Conge d'elire for Bourn to ſucceed him, dated the 19*th.* of March. Therein it is ſaid that the See was Vacant by the Reſignation of the former Biſhop; though in the Election, that was made on the 28*th.* of March, it is ſaid the See was vacant by the Removal or Deprivation of their former Biſhop. But I incline to believe it truer, that he did reſign; ſince he is not mentioned in the Commiſſions formerly ſpoken of. But that was not all; for at this time a Book was ſet out in his Name, whether written by him, or Forged and laid on his Name, I cannot judge: in which he retracts his former errours, and ſpeaks of Luther and Oecolampadius, and many others, with whom he ſays he had familiarly converſed: with great bitterneſs. He alſo accuſes the Goſpellers in England, of Gluttony, Hypocriſie, Pride, and ill Nature: And indeed it is one of the moſt Virulent Invectives againſt the Reformation, that was written at that time: But it is not likely, if he had turned ſo heartily as the Strain of that Book runs, that he would have been quite thrown out; eſpecially, ſince he had never Married; ſo I rather look on it as a Forgery caſt on his Name, to diſgrace the Reformation. He fled beyond Sea, where he lived till the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign; and then it ſeems there was ſome offence taken at his former behaviour; for he was not reſtored to Bath and Wells, but put into Chicheſter, that was a much meaner Biſhoprick. Thus I have given a clear account, and free of all Partiality or Reſervation, of the changes made in the moſt of the Sees in England. The two Archbiſhops, Cranmer and Holgate; the Biſhops, Ridley, Poinet, Scory, Coverdale, Taylor, Harvey, Bird, Buſh, Hooper, Ferrar, and Barlow were all removed; Rocheſter was void, and Griffins was put into it this April. Goodrick dying now, Thirleby ſucceeded him; and Scory ſon of Coventry and Litchfield dying ſoon after, Bayn ſucceeded him. So here were ſixteen new Biſhops brought in, which made no ſmall change in the Church.

The Maſs every where ſet up. When this done, the Biſhops went about the executing of the Queen's Injunctions. The New Service was every-where caſt out, and the old Ceremonies and Service were again ſet up. In this Buſineſs none was ſo hot as Bonner; for the Act that repealed King Edward's Laws, being agreed to by the Commons, to whom the Lords had ſent it; he, without ſtaying for the Royal Aſſent, did that very Night ſet up the Old Worſhip at Pauls, on St. Katherines day; and it being the cuſtom, that on ſome Holy Days, the Quire went up to the Steeple to ſing the Anthems, that fell to be on that Night; which was an ancient way of beginning a form of Worſhip, to which the People had been long diſuſed: And the next Day, being St. Andrew's, he did officiate himſelf, and had a ſolemn Proceſſion.

The moſt eminent Preachers in London, were either put in Priſon or under Confinement; and as all their Mouths had been ſtopt, by the prohibiting of Sermons, unleſs a Licenſe were obtained; ſo they were now to be fallen on for their Marriages. Parker eſtimates it, that there were now about 16000 Clergy-Men in England: and of theſe 1200 were turned out upon this account; ſome, he ſays, were deprived without Conviction, upon common Fame; ſome were never cited to appear, and yet turned out: Many that were in Priſon, were cited and turned out for not appearing; though it was not in their Power

Some were induced to ſubmit, and quit their Wives for their Livings: They were all ſummarily deprived. Nor was this all; but after they were deprived, they were alſo forced to leave their Wives; which piece of ſeverity was grounded on the Vow, that (as was pretended) they had made: though the falſhood of this Charge was formerly demonſtrated. 1554

To juſtify this ſeverity of Procedure, many were ſet to write againſt the Marriage of the Clergy. Smith, of whom I made mention in the former Book, that had then ſo humbly recanted and ſubmitted, did now appear very boldly, and reprinted his Book, with many Additions. But the moſt ſtudied Work was ſet out by Martin, a Doctor of the Laws. It was certainly, for moſt part Gardiner's Work, and I have ſeen the Proof Sheets of a great part of it, daſht and altered in many places, by Gardiner's hand. This Martin had made his Court to Cranmer in former times. He had ſtudied the Law at Bourges, where Francis Balduin, one of the celebrated Lawyers of that time, had publickly noted him for his lewdneſs, as being not only over-run himſelf with the French Pox; but as being a Corrupter of all the Univerſity, which Balduin certified in a Letter to one in England, that took care to print it. Books againſt the marriage of the Clergy.

It was alſo printed, that Bonner had many Baſtards: and himſelf was believed to be the Baſtard of one Savage, a Prieſt in Leiceſterſhire, that had been Baſtard to Sir John Savage of Cheſhire. Which Prieſt, by Elizabeth Frodſham, the Wife of one Edmond Bonner, had this Edmond now Biſhop of London; and it ſeems his Mother did not ſoon give over thoſe her lewd Courſes, for Wymſly, Arch-Deacon of London, was another of her Baſtards. That Kennel of the uncleanneſs of the Prieſts and Religious Houſes, was again, on this occaſion, raked, and expoſed, with too much indecency: for the married Prieſts, being openly accuſed, for the impurity and ſenſuality of their Lives, thought it was a juſt piece of ſelf defence, to turn theſe Imputations back on thoſe who pretended to Chaſtity, and yet led moſt irregular Lives, under that appearance of greater ſtrictneſs.

This was the ſtate in which things were, when the New Parliament met on the 2*d*. of April. Gardiner had before-hand prepared the Commons, by giving the moſt conſiderable of them Penſions; ſome had 200, and ſome 100 l. a Year, for giving their Voices to the Marriage. The firſt Act that paſſed, ſeemed of an odd nature, and has a great Secret under it. The Speaker of the Houſe of Commons brought in a Bill, declaring, That whereas the Queen had of right ſucceeded to the Crown; but, becauſe all the Laws of England had been made by Kings, and declared the Prerogatives to be in the King's Perſon; from thence ſome might pretend that the Queen had no right to them; it was therefore declared to have been the Law, that theſe Prerogatives did belong to the Crown, whether it were in the hands of Male or Female: and whatſoever the Law did limit and appoint for the King, was of right alſo due to the Queen, who is declared to have as much Authority as any other her Progenitors. A New Parliament. The Regal Power aſſerted to be in a Queen, as well as a King.

Many in the Houſe of Commons wondered what was the intention of ſuch a Law; and as People were at this time full of jealouſie, one Skinner, a Member of the Houſe, (who in Queen Elizabeth's time took Orders, The Secret Reaſons for that Act.

1554. Ex M. SS. D. Gul. Petyt.

Orders, and was made Dean of Durefm) ſaid, he could not imagine why ſuch a frivolous Law was deſired, ſince the thing was without diſpute: and that, that which was pretended, of ſatisfying the People, was too ſlight: he was afraid there was a trick in theſe words, That the Queen had as great Authority as any of her Progenitors; on which perhaps it might be afterwards ſaid, She had the ſame Power that William the Conqueror exerciſed, in ſeizing the Lands of the Engliſh, and giving them to Strangers; which alſo Edward the Firſt did upon the conqueſt of Wales. He did not know what relation this might have to the intended Marriage, therefore he warned the Houſe to look well to it; ſo a Committee being appointed to correct it, ſuch words were added, as brought the Queen's Prerogative under the ſame Limitation, as well as it exalted it to the height of her Progenitors. But one Fleetwood, afterwards Recorder of London, told the Earl of Leiceſter the ſecret of this, in Queen Elizabeth's Time, who writ down his Diſcourſe, and from thence I have copied it. There was one that had been Cromwell's Servant, and much employed by him in the ſuppreſſion of Monaſteries: he was a Man of great Notions, but very buſy and factious; ſo having been a great ſtickler for the Lady Jane, he was put in the Fleet, upon the Queen's firſt coming to the Crown: yet within a month he was diſcharged; but upon the laſt Riſing, was again put up, and indicted of High Treaſon: He had great Friends, and made application to one of the Emperor's Ambaſſadors, that was then the Chancellor of the Dutchy of Milan, and by his means he obtained his Liberty. Being brought to him, he ſhewed him a new Plat-form of Government, which he had contrived for the Queen. She was to declare her ſelf a Conqueror; or that ſhe having ſucceeded to the Crown by Common Law, was not at all to be limited by the Statute Laws, ſince thoſe were only reſtrictions upon the Kings, but not on the Queens of England; and that therefore all thoſe Limitations of the Prerogative, were only binding in the Perſons of Kings, but ſhe was free from them: Upon this, he ſhewed how ſhe might eſtabliſh Religion, ſet up the Monaſteries, raiſe her Friends, and ruine her Enemies, and Rule according to her Pleaſure. The Ambaſſador carried this to the Queen, and ſeemed much pleaſed with it, but deſired her to read it carefully, and keep it as a great Secret.

As ſhe read it, ſhe diſliked it, and judged it contrary to the Oath ſhe had made at her Coronation: and thereupon ſent for Gardiner, and charged him, as he would anſwer before the Judgment-Seat of God, at the general Day of the Holy Doom, that he would conſider the Book carefully, and bring her his opinion of it next day, which fell to be Maundy Thurſday. So, as the Queen came from her Maundy, he waited on her into her Cloſet, and ſaid theſe words; My good and moſt gracious Lady, I intend not to pray your Highneſs, with any humble Petitions, to name the Deviſers of this new invented Plat-form: but boldly I ſay, That it is pity that ſo noble and vertuous a Lady, ſhould be endangered with the pernicious Devices of ſuch lewd and ſubtil Sycophants; for the Book is naught, and moſt horrible to be thought on. Upon this the Queen thanked him, and threw the Book into the Fire; and charged the Ambaſſador, that neither he, nor any of his Company, ſhould receive more ſuch Projects from any of her People. This made Gar- ner apprehended, that if the Spaniards began ſo ſoon to put ſuch Notions into the Queen's Head, they might afterwards, when ſhe was in their Hands, make ſomewhat of them; and therefore, to prevent ſuch Deſigns for the future, he drew the Act; in which, though he ſeemed to do it as an Advantage to the Queen, for the putting of her Title beyond diſpute; yet he really intended nothing by it, but that ſhe ſhould be reſtrained by all thoſe Laws, that the former Kings of England had conſented to: And becauſe King Henry the Seventh, though his beſt right to the Crown flowed from his Marriage to the Heir of the Houſe of York, had yet taken the Government wholly into his own hands; he, fearing leſt the Spaniards ſhould pretend to ſuch a Power by the Authority, which Marriage gives the Husband over the Wife, got the Articles of the Marriage to be ratified in Parliament; by which they not only confirmed thoſe agreed on, but made a more full explanation of that part of them, which declared the entire Government of the Kingdom to belong only to the Queen. 1554.

To this the Spaniards gave too great an occaſion, by publiſhing King Philip's Pedigree, whom they derived from John of Gaunt. They ſaid, this was only done to conciliate the favour of the Nation, by repreſenting him not a ſtranger, but a Native: But this gave great offence; concerning which I have ſeen a little Book that was then printed; It was there ſaid, That King Henry the Seventh came in, pretending only to marry the Heir of the Houſe of York: but he was no ſooner on the Throne, then he declared his own Title, and kept it his whole Life. So it was ſaid, the Spaniard would call himſelf Heir of the Houſe of Lancaſter, and upon that Pretenſion, would eaſily wreſt the Power out of the Queen's hands, who ſeemed to mind nothing but her Devotions. This made Gardiner look the better to the ſecuring of the Liberties of the Crown and Nation; ſo that it muſt be acknowledged, that the preſerving of England out of the hands of the Spaniards at that time, ſeems to be almoſt wholly owing to him. Great Jealouſies of the Spaniſh Power.

In this Parliament, the Marqueſs of Northampton was reſtored in Blood. And the Act for reſtoring the Biſhoprick of Dureſm not having gone through the laſt Parliament when it was diſſolved, was now brought in again. The Town of Newcaſtle oppoſed it much, when it came down to the Commons. But the Biſhop of Dureſm came to them on the 18*th*. of April, and gave them a long account of all his Troubles, from the Duke of Northumberland, and deſired that they would diſpatch his Bill. There were many Proviſo's put into it, for ſome that were concerned in Gateſide; but it was carried in the Houſe, That, inſtead of theſe Proviſo's, they ſhould ſend a Deſire to him, recommending thoſe Perſons to his Favour: So upon a Diviſion, there were 120 againſt it, and 201 for it. After this, came the Bill confirming the Attainders of the Duke of Suffolk, and fifty eight more, who were attainted for the late Rebellion. The Lords put in a Proviſo, excepting Entailed Lands out of their Forfeitures; but the Commons rejected the Proviſo, and paſſed the Bill. Then did the Commons ſend up a Bill for reviving the Statutes made againſt Lollardy: which being read twice by the Lords, was laid aſide. The Commons intended next to have revived the Statute of the ſix Articles: but it did not agree with the Deſign at Court, to take any notice of King Henry's The Biſhoprick of Duriſm reſtored.

1554. Henry's Acts; ſo this was let fall. Then they brought in another Bill to extirpate Erroneous Opinions and Books; but that was at the third reading laid aſide. After that they paſſed a particular Bill againſt Lollardy in ſome Points, as the eating of fleſh in Lent; but that alſo being ſent up to the Lords, was at the third reading laid aſide, by the major part of the Houſe; ſo forward were the Commons to pleaſe the Queen: or ſuch Operation had the Spaniſh Gold on them, that they contrived four Bills in one Seſſion, for the proſecution of thoſe they called Heretical Hicks. But to give ſome content on the other hand, they paſſed a Bill that neither the Biſhop of Rome, nor any other, ſhould have any Power to Convene, or trouble any, for poſſeſſing Abbey Lands: This was ſent up to the Lords, but laid aſide at that time, aſſurance being given, that the Owners of thoſe Lands ſhould be fully ſecured. The Reaſon of laying this aſide, was that ſince by Law the Biſhop of Rome had no Authority at all in England, it was needleſs to paſs an Act againſt his Power in that particular, for that ſeemed to aſſert his Power in other things: and ſince they were reſolved to reconcile the Nation to him, it was ſaid, that it would be indecent to paſs an Act that ſhould call him only Biſhop of Rome, which was the Compellation given him during the Schiſm; and it was prepoſterous to begin with a Limitation of his Power, before they had acknowledged his Authority: So this was laid aſide, and the Parliament ended on the 25*th.* of May.

But the Matters of the Convocation are next to be related. The Men of the Reformation complained every-where, that the Diſputes of the laſt Convocation had not been fairly carried; that the moſt eminent Men of their perſwaſion were detained in Priſon, and not admitted to it: that only a few of them, that had a right to be in the Houſe were admitted to ſpeak, and that theſe were much interrupted. So they was now reſolved to adjourn the Convocation for ſome time, and to ſend the Prolocutor with ſome of their number to Oxford, that the Diſputations might be, in the preſence of that whole Univerſity. And ſince Cranmer and Ridley were eſteemed the moſt Learned Men of that Perſwaſion, they were, by a Warrant from the Queen, removed from the Tower of London, to the Priſons at Oxford. And though Latimer was never accounted very Learned, and was then about eighty Years of Age, yet he having been a celebrated Preacher, who had done the Reformation no leſs Service by his Labours in the Pulpit, than others had done by their abler Pens; he was alſo ſent thither to bear his part in the Debates.

Some ſent to Oxford to diſpute with Reformed Biſhops.

Thoſe who were ſent from the Convocation, came to Oxford on the 13*th.* of April, being Friday. They ſent for thoſe Biſhops on Saturday, and aſſigned them Munday, Tueſday, and Wedneſday, every one of them his day, for the defending of their Doctrine: but ordered them to be kept apart. And that all Books and Notes ſhould be taken from them. Three Queſtions were to be diſputed.

1. Whether the natural Body of Chriſt was really in the Sacrament?
2. Whether any other Subſtance did remain, but the Body and Blood of Chriſt?
3. Whether in the Maſs there was a Propitiatory Sacrifice for the Sins of the Dead and Living?

Where

When Cranmer was first brought before them, the Prolocutor made an Exhortation to him, to return to the Unity of the Church. To which he answered, with such gravity and modesty, that many were observed to weep: He said, He was as much for Unity as any, but it must be an Unity in Christ, and according to the Truth. The Articles being shewed him, he asked, Whether by the Body of Christ they meant an Organical Body: They answering, It was the Body that was born of the Virgin: Then he said, he would maintain the Negative of these Questions. 1554.

On the 16*th*. when the Dispute with Cranmer was to begin, Weston, that was Prolocutor, made a stumble in the beginning of his Speech; for, he said, Ye are this day assembled to confound the detestable Heresie of the Verity of the Body of Christ in the Sacrament. This Mistake set the whole Assembly a laughing; but he recovered himself, and went on: he said, it was not lawful to call these things in doubt, since Christ had so expressly affirmed them, that to doubt of them, was to deny the Truth and Power of God. Then Chedsey urged Cranmer with the words, This is my Body: To which he answered, That the Sacrament was effectually Christ's Body, as broken on the Cross; that is, His Passion effectually applyed. For the explanation of this, he offered a large Paper containing his Opinion: of which I need say nothing, since it is a short abstract of what he writ on that Head formerly; and of that a full account was given in the former Book. There followed a long debate about these words. Oglethorp, Weston, and others, urged him much, that Christ making his Testament, must be supposed to speak Truth, and plain Truth; and they run out largely on that. Cranmer answered, That figurative Speeches are true; and when the Figures are clearly understood, they are then plain likewise. Many of Chrysostom's high expressions about the Sacrament were also cited; which Cranmer said, were to be understood of the Spiritual Presence received by Faith. Upon this much time was spent, the Prolocutor carrying himself very indecently towards him, calling him, an unlearned, unskilful, and impudent man: There were also many in the Assembly that often hissed him down, so that he could not be heard at all; which he seemed to take no notice of, but went on as often as the noise ceased. Then they cited Tertullian's words, the Flesh is fed by the Body and Blood of Christ, that so the Soul may be nourished by God. But he turned this against them, and said, hereby it was plain, the Body as well as the Soul received Food in the Sacrament; therefore the Substance of Bread and Wine must remain, since the Body could not be fed by that Spiritual Presence of the Body of Christ. Tresham put this Argument to him, Christ said, as he lived by the Father, so they that eat his Flesh should live by him; but he is by his Substance united to his Father, therefore Christians must be united to his Substance: To this Cranmer answered, That the similitude did not import an equality, but a likeness of some sort; Christ is essentially united to his Father; but Believers are united to him by Grace; and that in Baptism, as well as in the Eucharist. Then they talked long of some words of Hilary's Ambrose's, and Justin's. Then they charged him, as having mistranslated some of the Passages of the Fathers in his Book; from which he vindicated himself, saying, that he had all his Life, in all manner of things, hated falshood. Cranmer Disputes.

1554. After the Diſpute had laſted from the Morning till two of the Clock it was broke up: and there was no ſmall Triumph, as if Cranmer had been confounded in the Opinion of all the Hearers, which they had expreſſed by their Laughter and Hiſſing. There were Notaries that took every thing that was ſaid; from whoſe Books Fox did afterwards print the account of it, that is in his great Volume.

And Ridley. The next day Ridley was brought out; and Smith, who was ſpoken of in the former Book, was now very zealous to redeem the prejudice which that compliance was like to be to him in his Preferment: So he undertook to diſpute this day. Ridley began with a Proteſtation, declaring, That whereas he had been formerly of another mind from what he was then to maintain, he had changed upon no worldly conſideration, but meerly for love of the Truth, which he had gathered out of the Word of God, and the Holy Fathers: but becauſe it was God's Cauſe he was then to maintain, he proteſted that he might have leave afterwards to add, or to change, as upon better conſideration he ſhould ſee cauſe for it. He alſo deſired he might have leave to ſpeak his mind without interruption; which though it was promiſed him, yet he was often ſtopt, as he went on explaining his Doctrine. He argued againſt the Corporal Preſence, as being contrary to the Scriptures that ſpoke of Chriſt's leaving the World; as being against the Article of his ſitting at the right hand of God; and againſt the nature of the Sacrament, which is a Remembrance; he ſhewed, that in it the Wicked receive Chriſt no leſs than the Godly; That it is against nature to ſwallow down a living Man; that this Doctrine introduced many extraordinary Miracles, without any neceſſity; and muſt have given advantage to the Hereticks, who denyed Chriſt had a real Body or a true humane Nature; and that it was contrary to the Doctrine of the Fathers: He acknowledged that it was truly the Communion of his Body, that is, of Chriſt's Death, and of the Heavenly Life given by him: and did, in a ſtrong nervous Diſcourſe, as any I ever ſaw on that Subject, gather together the chief Arguments for his Opinion.

Smith argued, That notwithſtanding Chriſt's being at the right Hand of God, he was ſeen on Earth: Ridley ſaid, he did not deny but he might come and appear on Earth, but that was for a moment, to convince ſome, and comfort others, as St. Paul, and St. Stephen; though he ſaid, it might be they ſaw him in Heaven; but he could not be, at the ſame time, both in Heaven and on Earth. They returned on Chryſoſtom's words, and preſſed him with ſome of Bernard's: but he anſwered the Sayings of the former, that they were Rhetorical and Figurative; ſo he excepted againſt the judgment of the latter, as living in an Age when their Opinion was generally received. The Diſpute held till Weſton grew weary, and ſtopt all; ſaying, You ſee the obſtinate vain-glorious, crafty, and inconſtant mind of this Man; but you ſee alſo the force of Truth cannot be ſhaken; therefore cry out with me, Truth has the Victory. This being ecchoed again by the Audience, they went away with great Triumph; and now they reckoned the hardeſt part of the Work was over, ſince Latimer only remained.

Lati

Latimer being next day brought forth, told them, he had not uſed Latin much theſe twenty Years, and was not able to Diſpute, but he would declare his Faith, and then they might do as they pleaſed. He declared, That he thought the Preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament to be only Spiritual, ſince it is that by which we obtain Eternal Life, which flows only from Chriſt's abiding in us by Faith; therefore it is not a bare naked ſign: but for the Corporal Preſence, he looked on it as the Root of all the other Errors in their Church: He enlarged much againſt the Sacrifice of the Maſs: and lamented that they had changed the Communion into a private Maſs: that they had taken the Cup away from the People; and inſtead of Service in a known Tongue, were bringing the Nation to a Worſhip that they did not underſtand. He perceived they laughed at him; but he told them, they were to conſider his great Age, and to think what they might be when they came to it. They preſſed him much to Anſwer their Arguments: He ſaid, his Memory was gone, but his Faith was grounded on the Word of God; he was fully convinced by the Book which Dr. Cranmer had written on that Subject. 1554. And Latimer.

In this whole Diſputation, as Ridley wrote of it, there was great diſorder, perpetual Shoutings, Tauntings, and Reproaches; ſo that it looked liker a Stage, than a School of Divines; and the noiſe and Confuſions, with which he had been much offended when he was in the Sorbone, were modeſt, compared to this. Cenſures paſt upon it.

On April 28, they were again brought to St. Maries; where Weſton told them, They were over-come in the Diſputation, therefore he required them to ſubſcribe with the reſt. Cranmer objected againſt their way of Diſputing; he ſaid, they would not hear any one argue againſt their Errors, or defend the Truth; that often-times four or five of them were ſpeaking at once, ſo that it was impoſſible for any to hear, or to anſwer all theſe: In concluſion, he refuſed to ſubſcribe. Ridley and Latimer made the ſame Anſwers. So they were all judged Hereticks, and the Fautors of Hereſy. Then they were asked, Whether they intended to turn? They anſwered, That they would not turn: ſo they were judged obſtinate Hereticks, and declared to be no more Members of the Church.

Upon which Cranmer anſwered; 'From this your Judgment and Sentence, I appeal to the juſt judgment of Almighty God, truſting to be preſent with him in Heaven, for whoſe Preſence on the Altar I am thus condemned.

Ridley anſwered; 'Although I be not of your Company, yet I doubt not but my Name is written in another Place, whither this Sentence will ſend us ſooner than we ſhould by the courſe of Nature have come.

Latimer anſwered; I 'I thank God moſt heartily that he hath prolonged my Life to this end, that I may in this caſe glorify God with this kind of Death.

To them Weſton anſwered; 'if you go to Heaven with this Faith, then I will never come thither, as I am thus perſwaded.

After this, there was a ſolemn Proceſſion in Oxford, the Hoſt being carried by Weſton the Prolocutor; who had been (as himſelf ſaid in his Diſputation) ſix years in Priſon in King Edward's Time. This 1554. gave him now great repute, though he was known to be a constant Drunkard. Ridley wrote to him, desiring to see what the Notaries had written, and that he might have leave to add in any part, as had been promised him; but he had no Answer. On the 23*d.* of April the Commissioners sent from the Convocation, returned to London. Cranmer sent a Petition sealed, by Weston, to be delivered to the Council; in which he earnestly begged their favour with the Queen, that he might be pardoned for his Treason, since they knew how unwillingly he consented to the Patents for excluding her. He also complained of the disorder in the Disputes lately had; saying, that he was not heard nor suffered to propose his Arguments; but all was shuffled up in a day, though he had Matter on that Subject for twenty days work; that it look'd like a Design to shut up all things in haste, and make a Triumph, and so to condemn them of Heresy: He left it to their Wisdom to consider, if this was an indifferent way of handling such a Matter. Weston carried this Petition half way, and then opening it, and finding what it contained, he sent it back, and said, he would deliver no such Petition. Cranmer was so kept, that though Ridley and Latimer could send to one another, yet it was not easy for them to send to him, without giving Mony to their Keepers. In one of Ridley's Letters to Cranmer, he said, he heard they intended to carry down Rogers, Crome, and Bradford, to Cambridg, and to make such a Triumph there, as he had lately made of them at Oxford: He trusted, the day of their deliverance out of all their Miseries, and of their entrance into perpetual Rest, and perpetual Joy and Felicity drew nigh: He prayed God to strengthen them with the mighty Spirit of his Grace. He desired Cranmer to pray for him, as he also did for Cranmer. As for the Letters which these and the other Prisoners writ in their Imprisonment, Fox gathered the Originals from all People that had them: and Sir Walter Mildmay, the Founder of Emannel Colledge, procured them from him, and put them into the Library of that Colledge, where I saw them: but they are all printed by Fox, so that the Reader, who desires to see them, may find them in his Acts and Monuments. Of them all, Ridley writ with the greatest connexion and force, both in the Matter, and in the way of Expression.

The Prisoners in London set out in writing their Reasons against disputing by word of mouth.

This being now over, there was great boasting among all the Popish Party, as if the Champions of the Reformation had been foiled. The Prisoners in London hearing they intended to insult over them, as they had done over those at Oxford, set out a Paper, to which the late Bishops of Exeter, St. Davids, and Glocester, with Taylor, Philpot, Bradford, Crome, Sanders, Rogers, and Lawrence, set their Hands, on the 8th of May.

The substance of it was; 'That they, being Prisoners, neither as 'Rebels, Traitors, nor Transgressors of any Law, but meerly for their 'Conscience to God and his Truth, hearing it was intended to carry 'them to Cambridg to dispute, declared they would not dispute, but 'in Writing, except it were before the Queen and her Council, or be- 'fore either of the Houses of Parliament: and that for these Rea- 'sons.

1. 'It was clear, that the Determinations of the Universities were 'already made; they were their open Enemies, and had already con- 'demned

'demned their Cauſe before they had heard it, which was contrary 1554
'both to the Word of God, and the determinations they had made in
'King Edward's Time.

2. 'They ſaw the Prelates and Clergy were ſeeking neither to find out
'the Truth, nor to do them good, otherwiſe they would have heard 'them, when they might have declared their Conſciences without ha'zard; but that they ſought only their deſtruction, and their own
'glory.

3. 'They ſaw that thoſe who were to be the Judges of theſe Diſputes,
'were their inveterate Enemies; and by what paſſed in the Convocation
'Houſe laſt Year, and lately at Oxford, they ſaw how they muſt expect 'to be uſed.

4. 'They had been kept long Priſoners, ſome nine or ten months,
'without Books, or Papers, or convenient places of ſtudy.

5. 'They knew they ſhould not be heard to ſpeak their minds fully,
'but ſhould be ſtopt, as their Judges pleaſed.

6. 'They could not have the nomination of their Notaries, who would 'be ſo choſen, that they would write and publiſh what their Enemies had 'a mind to. Therefore they would not engage in publick Diſputes, ex'cept by Writing: but they would give a Summary of their Faith, for 'which they would be ready to offer up their Lives to the Halter, or the 'Fire, as God ſhould appoint.

'They declared, That they believed the Scriptures to be the true
'Word of God, and the Judg of all Controverſies in the Matters of 'Religion; and that the Church is to be obeyed, as long as ſhe follows
'this Word. That they believed the Apoſtles Creed; and thoſe Creeds
'ſet out by the Councils of Nice, Conſtantinople, Epheſus, and Chalce-
'don, and by the firſt and fourth Councils of Toledo; and the Sym-
'boles of Athanaſius, Ireneus, Tertullian, and Damaſus. That they be'lieved Juſtification by Faith; which Faith was not only an Opinion,
'but a certain perſwaſion wrought by the Holy Ghoſt, which did illu-
'minate the Mind, and ſuppled the Heart to ſubmit it ſelf unfeignedly
'to God. That they acknowledged an Inherent Righteouſneſs, yet
'Juſtification, and the Pardon of Sins, they believed came only by
'Chriſt's Righteouſneſs imputed to them. They thought the Worſhip
'of God ought to be in a Tongue underſtood by the People; That
'Chriſt only, and not the Saints, were to be prayed to; that immedi'ately after Death, the Souls paſs either to the State of the Bleſſed, or
'of the Damned, without any Purgatory between; that Baptiſm and
'the Lords Supper are the Sacraments of Chriſt, which ought to be
'adminiſtred according to his Inſtitution: and therefore they condem'ned the denying the Chalice, Tranſubſtantiation, the Adoration, or
'the Sacrifice of the Maſs; and aſſerted the lawfulneſs of Marriage to 'every Rank of Men. Theſe things they declared they were ready 'to defend, as they often had before offered: and concluded, charging
'all people to enter into no Rebellion againſt the Queen, but to obey
'her in all Points, except where her Commands were contrary to the Law 'of God.

In the end of this Month, the Lady Elizabeth was taken out of the Tower, and put into the Cuſtody of the Lord Williams; who waited on her to Woodſtock, and treated her with great civility, and all the reſpect 1554. respect due to her Quality: but this not being so acceptable to those who governed, she was put under the Charge of Sir Hen. Benefield, by whom she was more roughly handled.

Prince Philip Lands. On the 20*th.* of July, Prince Philip landed at Southampton. When he set foot to Land first, he presently drew his Sword, and carried it a good way naked in his Hand. Whether this was one of the Forms of his Country, I know not: but it was interpreted as an Omen, that he intended to Rule England with the Sword: though others said, it shewed, he intended to draw his Sword in defence of the Nation. The Mayor of Southampton brought him the Keys of the Town, an expression of Duty always payd to our Princes; he took them from him, and gave them back without speaking a word, or expressing by any sign that he was pleased with it. His stiffness amazed the English, who use to be treated by their Kings with great sweetness on such occasions: and so much gravity in so young a Man was not understood, but was look'd on as

And is married to the Queen. sign of vast pride and morosenes. The Queen met him at Winchester; where, on the 25*th.* of July, Gardiner married them in the Cathedral, the King being then in the 27*th.* and the Queen in the 38*th.* Year of her Age. They were presented from the Emperor by his Ambassador, with a resignation of his Titular Kingdom of Jerusalem, and his more valuable one of Naples, which were Pledges of that total resignation that followed not long after.

So on the 27*th.* of July they were proclaimed by their new Titles; 'Philip and Mary, King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem, 'and Ireland; Princes of Spain and Sicily, Defenders of the Faith; Arch-'Dukes of Austria; Dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant; Counts of Habspurg, Flanders, and Tirol: Spain having always delighted in a long enumeration of pompous Titles.

It was observed, how happy Marriages had been to the Austrian Family; who, from no extraordinary Beginnings, had now, in eighty Years time, been raised by two Marriages; first, with the Heir of Burgundy, and the Netherlands, and then with the Heir of Spain, to be the greatest Family in Christendome: and the Collateral Family by the Marriage of the Heir of Bohem and Hungary, was now the greatest in the Empire. And surely if Issue had followed this Marriage, the most extraordinary success possible would have seemed to be entailed on them. But there was no great appearance of that; for as the Queen was now far advanced in Years, so she was in no good state of Health: a long course of Discontent, had corrupted both the health of her Body and the temper of her Mind: Nor did the Matter alter much by the Marriage, except for the worse. The King's wonderful Gravity and Silence, gained nothing upon the English; but his magnificence and Bounty was very acceptable. He brought after him a vast Mass of

He brings a great Treasure with him to England. Wealth; seven and twenty Chests of Bullion, every Chest being a Yard and some Inches long; which were drawn in twenty Carts to the Tower; after which came ninety nine Horse, and two Carts, loaded with coined Gold and Silver. This great Wealth was perhaps the Sum that was formerly mentioned, which was to be distributed among the English; for it is not improbable, that though he empowred his Ambassadors, and Gardiner, to promise great Sums to such as should promote his Marriage, yet that he would not part with so much Money it was made ſure; and therefore he ordered this Treaſure to be brought after him; (I mention it here, yet it came not into England till October and January following) He made his entry into London with great ſtate. 1554

At his firſt ſetling in England, he obtained of the Queen, that many Priſoners ſhould be ſet at Liberty; among whom the chief were, the Arch-Biſhop of York, and ten Knights, with many other Perſons of Quality. Theſe, I ſuppoſe, had been committed, either for Wiat's Rebellion, or the Buſineſs of the Lady Jane; for I do not believe, any were diſcharged that were impriſoned on the account of Religion. As for this Arch-Biſhop, though he went along in the Reformation, yet I find nothing that gives any great Character of him. I never ſaw any Letter of his, nor do I remember to have ſeen any honourable mention made of him any where; ſo that he ſeems to have been a ſoft and weak man; and except thoſe little Fragments of his Opinions in ſome Points about the Maſs, (which are in the Collection) I know no remains of his Pen. It ſeems he did at this time comply in Matters of Religion, for without that, it is not probable that either Philip would have moved for him, or that the Queen would have been eaſily entreated. Act of Favour done by him.

The Interceſſions that Philip made for the Lady Elizabeth, and the Earl of Devonſhire, did gain him the Hearts of the Nation, more than any thing elſe that he ever did. Gardiner was much ſet againſt them, and ſtudied to bear down the declaration that Wiat had made of their Innocency all that he could; but it was made ſo openly on the Scaffold, that it was not poſſible to ſuppreſs it. Before, in his Examinations, Wiat had accuſed them, hoping to have ſaved himſelf by ſo baſe an Action; but he redeemed it all he could at his Death. This had broken Gardiner's Deſign, who thought all they did about Religion, was but half work, unleſs the Lady Elizabeth were deſtroyed. For he knew, that though ſhe complyed in many things, yet her Education had been wholly under the Reformed: and which was more to him, who judged all People by their Intereſt, he reckoned that Intereſt muſt make her declare againſt the Papacy, (ſince otherwiſe ſhe was a Baſtard) if ever ſhe ſhould out-live her Siſter. He preſerves the Lady Elizabeth.

Philip oppoſed this, at firſt, upon a generous Account, to recommend himſelf, by obtaining ſuch Acts of Favour to be done by the Queen. But afterwards, when the hopes of Iſſue failed him by his Marriage, he preſerved her, out of Intereſt of State: for if ſhe had been put out of the way, the Queen of Scotland (that was to be married to the Dolphin) was to ſucceed; which would have made too great an Acceſſion to the French Crown: and beſides, as it afterwards appeared, he was not without hopes of perſwading her to marry himſelf, if her Siſter ſhould dye without Iſſue. For the Earl of Devonſhire, he more eaſily obtained his freedom, though not till ſome Months had paſſed. That Earl being ſet at liberty, finding he was to lye under perpetual Diſtruſts, and that he might be, perhaps upon the firſt Diſorder, again put into the Tower, to which his Stars ſeemed to condemn him, reſolved to go beyond Sea; but dyed within a Year after, as ſome ſay, of Poyſon.

All

1554. All this I have laid together, (though it fell not out all at once) that I might give a full account of all the Acts of Grace that Philip did in England; But for the rest of his Behaviour, it was no way acceptable to the People, for as he engaged the Nation in all his Interests, so that henceforth, during this Reign, England had no share in the Consultations of Europe, but was blindly led by him, which proved fatal to them in the conclusion, by the ignominious loss of Calais; So his temper and way of deportment seemed most ridiculous, and extravagantly formal to the English Genius, which naturally loves the mean, between the excessive jollity and talkativeness of the French, and the sullen staidness of the Spaniard; rather enclining more to the briskness of the one, than the supercilliousness of the other: And indeed his Carriage was such here, that the acting him and his Spaniards, was one of the great Diversions of Queen Elizabeth's Court. The Hall of the Court was almost continually shut all his Time, and none could have access, unless it were first demanded, with as much formality as Ambassadors use in asking Audience: So that most of the Nobility left the Court, few staying but the Officers of the Household.

He was little beloved by the English.

Gardiner magnifies him much in a Sermon.

Gardiner had now the Government put entirely in his Hands; And he, to make his Court the better with the new King, preached at St. Paul's the 30*th.* of September, where, after he had inveighed long against the Preachers in King Edward's Time, which was the common Subject of all their Sermons, he run out much in commendation of the King; affirming him to be as wise, sober, gentle, and temperate, as any Prince that ever was in England; and if he did not prove so, he was content that all his Hearers should esteem him an impudent Lyar. The state of the Court continued in this posture till the next Parliament.

But great Discontents did now appear every-where. The severe Executions after the last rising, the Marriage with Spain, and the overturning of Religion, concurred to alienate the Nation from the Government. This appeared no where more confidently than in Norfolk, where the People reflecting on their Services, thought they might have the more leave to speak.

There were some malicious Rumours spread, that the Queen was with Child before the King came over. This was so much resented at Court, that the Queen writ a Letter to the Justices there, (which is in the Collection) to enquire into those false Reports, and to look to all that spread false News in the County. The Earl of Sussex, upon this, examined a great many, but could make nothing out of it. It flowed from the officiousness of Hopton, the new Bishop of Norwich; who thought to express his Zeal to the Queen, whose Chaplain he had long been, by sending up the Tales of the Country to the Council Table; not considering how much it was below the Dignity of the Government, to look after all vain Reports.

Col. Numb. 14.

Bonner's Carriage in his Visitation.

This Summer the Bishops went their Visitations, to see every thing executed according to the Queen's Injunctions. Bonner went his with the rest. He had ordered his Chaplains to draw a Book of Homilies, with an exposition of the Christian Religion. He says, in his Preface to it, that he and his Chaplains had compiled it; but it is likely he had only the Name of it, and that his Chaplains composed it. Yet the greatest, and indeed, the best part of it was made to their hands, for it was taken out of the Inſtitution of a Chriſtian Man, ſet out by King Henry; only varied in thoſe Points, in which it differed from what they were now about to ſet up: So that concerning the Pope's Power, ſince it was not yet eſtabliſhed, he ſays nothing, for, or againſt it. 1554.

The Articles upon which he made his Viſitation, will be found in the Collection, and by theſe we may judge of all the other Viſitations over England. 'In the Preface, he proteſts he had not made his Arti- Col. Numb. 15. 'cles out of any ſecret grudg or diſpleaſure to any; but meerly for the 'diſcharge of his Conſcience towards God and the World. The Ar- 'ticles were; Whether the Clergy did ſo behave themſelves in Living, 'Teaching, and Doing, that in the judgment of indifferent Men, they 'ſeemed to ſeek the Honour of God, of the Church, and of the King 'and Queen? Whether they had been Married, or were taken for 'Married? and whether they were Divorced, and did no more come 'at their Wives? or whether they did defend their Marriages? Whe- 'ther they did reſide, keep Hoſpitality, provide a Curate in their ab- 'ſence? And whether they did devoutly celebrate the Service, and uſe 'Proceſſions? Whether they were ſuſpect of Hereſy? Whether they 'did haunt Ale-houſes and Taverns, Bowling-Allies, or ſuſpect Houſes? 'Whether they favoured, or kept company with any ſuſpect of Hereſy? 'Whether any Prieſt lived in the Pariſh, that abſented himſelf from 'Church? Whether theſe kept any private Conventicles? Whether 'any of the Clergy was Vicious, blaſphemed God or his Saints, or was 'guilty of Simony? Whether they exhorted the People to Peace and 'Obedience? Whether they admitted any to the Sacrament, that was 'ſuſpect of Hereſy, or was of an ill Converſation, an Oppreſſor, or 'Evil Doer? Whether they admitted any to preach that were not 'licenſed, or refuſed ſuch as were? Whether they did officiate in 'Engliſh? Whether they did uſe the Sacraments aright? Whether 'they viſited the Sick, and adminiſtred the Sacraments to them? 'Whether they did marry any, without asking the Banes three Sundays? 'Whether they obſerved the Faſts and Holy-Days? Whether they went 'in their Habits and Tonſures? Whether thoſe that were ordained 'ſchiſmatically, did officiate without being admitted by the Ordinary? 'Whether they ſet Leaſes, for many Years, of their Benefices? Whether 'they followed Merchandiſe or Uſury? Whether they carried Swords 'or Daggers, in Times or Places not convenient? Whether they did 'once every quarter expound to the People in the Vulgar Tongue, 'the Apoſtles Creed, Ten Commandments; the two Commandments 'of Chriſt for loving God and our Neighbour, the Seven Works of 'Mercy, Seven deadly Sins, Seven principal Vertues, and the Seven 'Sacraments? Theſe were the moſt conſiderable Heads on which he viſited.

One thing is remarkable, that it appears, both by theſe, and the Queen's Injunctions, that they did not pretend to re-ordain thoſe that had been ordained by the New Book in King Edward's Time; but to reconcile them, and add thoſe things that were wanting; which were, the Anointing, and giving the Prieſtly Veſtments, with other Rites of the Roman Pontifical. In this Point of re-ordaining ſuch as were ordained in Hereſy or Schiſm, the Church of Rome has not gone by any

No Reordination of thoſe ordained in King Edward's Time.

1554. steady Rule: For though they account the Greek Church to be guilty both of Heresy and Schism, they receive their Priests without a New Ordination. Yet after the time of the Contests between Pope Nicolas and Photius, and much more after the outragious heats at Rome, between Sergius and Formosus, in which the dead Bodies of the former Popes were raised and dragged about the Streets by their Successors, they annulled the Ordinations, which they pretended were made irregularly.

Afterwards again, upon the great Schism between the Popes of Rome and Avignon, they did neither annul nor renew the Orders that had been given: But now, in England, though they only supplyed at this time the defects, which they said were in their former Ordinations, yet afterwards, when they proceeded to burn them that were in Orders, they went upon the old Maxim; That Orders given in Schism were not valid; so they did not esteem Hooper nor Ridley Bishops, and therefore only degraded them from Priesthood; though they had been ordained by their own Forms, saving only the Oath to the Pope; but for those who were ordained by the new Book, they did not at all degrade them, supposing now they had no true Orders by it.

Bonner, in his Visitation, took great care to see all things were every where done according to the old Rules, which was the main thing intended; other Points being put in for form. When he came to Hadham, he prevented the Doctor, who did not expect him so soon by two hours, so that there was no ringing of Bells, which put him in a small disorder: And that was much encreased, when he went into the Church, and found neither the Sacrament hanging up, nor a Rood set up: thereupon he fell a railing, swearing most intemperately, calling the Priest an Heretick, a Knave, with many other such goodly words. The Priest said, all these things should be amended speedily; and knowing that a good Dinner was the best way to temper Bishop Bonner, he desired him to go and dine at his House: but Bonner took it so ill, that Hadham, which was one of his own Churches, was an ill Example to them about it, that he lost all patience; and reaching at Dr. Bricket (that was the Parson's Name) to beat him, he misguided the stroke, which fell on Sir Thomas Josselin's Ear with great force. Fecknam, then Dean of Pauls in Dr. May's room studied to appease Josselin, and said to him, That the Bishop's being so long in the Marshalsea, had so disordered him, that in his Passion he knew not what he did; but when he came to himself, he would be sorry for what he had done. Josselin answered, he thought now that he was taken out of the Marshalsea, he should be carried to Bedlam. But Bonner continued in his Fury; and though he had purposed to stay at his House there some days, and had ordered Provisions to be made, yet he would needs be gone, though it disordered the rest of his Visitation, for he came to every place sooner than he intended, or had given notice.

Bonner's rage.

The Carvers, and makers of Statues, had now a quick Trade, for Roods and other Images, which were to be provided, for all Places. Bonner had observed, that in most Churches the Walls were painted with places of Scripture; and in many places there were passages written, that either favoured the Marriage of the Clergy, or were against the Corporal Presence, and the Sacrifice of the Mass, and the multiplicity multiplicity of the Ceremonies of the Church: So he did, at his return, send out Episcopal Letters, on the 24*th.* of October, to raze all those Paintings. Upon this it was generally said, That the Scriptures must be dasht out to make way for the Images, since they were so contrary one to another, that they could not decently stand together. There were many ludicrous things every where done in derision of the old Forms, and of the Images; Many Poems were printed, with other ridiculous Representations of the Latin Service, and the Pageantry of their Worship. But none occasioned more laughter, than what fell out at Pauls the Easter before; the custom being to lay the Sacrament into the Sepulchre, at the Even Song on Good-Friday, and to take it out by break of day on Easter Morning: At the time of the taking of it out, the Quire sung these words, Surrexit, non est hic, He is risen, he is not here: But then the Priest looking for the Host, found it was not there indeed, for one had stollen it out; which put them all in no small disorder, but another was presently brought in its stead. Upon this a Ballad followed, that their God was stollen and lost, but a new one was made in his room. This Railery was so salt, that it provoked the Clergy much. They offered large Rewards to discover him that had stollen the Host, or had made the Ballad, but could not come to the knowledge of it. But they resolved e're long, to turn that mirth and pleasantness of the Hereticks, into severe mourning. 1554. The Sacrament stollen.

And thus Matters went on to the 11*th.* of November, when the third Parliament was summoned. In the Writ of Summons, the Title of Supream Head of the Church was left out, though it was still by Law united to the other Royal Titles: And therefore this was urged, in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, as a good Reason for annulling that Parliament, since it was not called by a lawful Writ. Now was Cardinal Pool allowed to come into England. The Emperor had this Summer brought him to Flanders, where, to make amends for the rudeness of stopping him on his way, he desired him to mediate a Peace between France and him; but that had no effect. It soon appeared, that all things were so well prepared by Gardiner's Policy, and the Spanish Gold, that it would be an easy Matter to carry every thing in this Session. The Lord Paget, and the Lord Hastings, were sent from the King and Queen to bring the Cardinal over. At the opening of the Parliament, it was an unusual sight, to see both King and Queen ride in State, and come into it with two Swords of State, and two Caps of Maintenance carried before them: The Swords were carried, one by the Earl of Pembroke, the other by the Earl of Westmoreland; and the Caps, by the Earls of Arundel and Shrewsbury. The first Bill put into the Lords House, was the Repeal of the Attainder of Cardinal Pool: it began on the 17*th.* and was sent down to the Commons on the 19*th.* who read it three times in one day, and sent it up. This Bill being to be passed before he could come into England, it was questioned, in the House of Commons, Whether the Bill could be passed without making a Session, which would necessitate a Prorogation? It was resolved it might be done; so on the 22*d.* the King and Queen came, and passed it. It set forth, that the only Reason of his Attainder, was, because he would not consent to the unlawful Separation and Divorce between King Henry, and his most godly, vertuous, and lawful Wife, A New Parliament. The Attainder of Cardinal Pool repealed.

1554. Queen Katherine: Therefore they considering the true and sincere Conscience of the Cardinal in that Point, and his other many godly Vertues and Qualities, did repeal that Act.

He comes to London.

On the 24*th*. he came to London, but without the Solemnities of a Legates Entry, because the Pope's Authority was not yet set up by Law. What Cardinal Pools Instructions were, I do not know; nor is it fully understood, by Learned Men, what was the Power of a Legate a Latere in those Days. But I found, in the King's Paper Office, the Original Bull of Cardinal Beaton's Legatine Power in Scotland, which it seems was intercepted by some of the King's Ships, in the passage by Sea thither; or was sent up to London by those who killed him, and possessed themselves of his Castle and Goods. And I having mentioned this Bull to those Learned Men, by whose direction I have governed myself in this Work, I did, by their advice, give it a room in the Collection, though it be large; since, no doubt, Cardinal Pool's Bull was in the same form. In it the Reader will clearly perceive what Authority was lodged in the Legates, to overthrow and dispense with almost all the Rules and Canons of the Church; only some peculiar things, (which were more conspicuously scandalous) were still reserved to the Apostolick See it self; whose singular Priviledge it has been always esteemed to dispense with the best things, and allow of the worst; so the Pretenders to those Graces, payed proportionably for them; this Authority was too Sacred to be trusted, even to a Legate, it being the Prerogative of the Popes themselves, to be the most eminent Transgressors of all Canons and Constitutions.

Col. Number 17.

The Cardinal first declared what his Designs and Powers were to the King and Queen; and then on the 27*th*. a Message was sent to the Parliament to come and hear him deliver his Legation; which they did. He made them a long Speech, inviting them to a Reconciliation with the Apostolick See, from whence he was sent by the common Pastor of Christendom, to reduce them, who had long strayed from the Inclosure of the Church. This made some emotion in the Queen, which she soon thought was a Child quickned in her Belly: this redoubled the Joy; some not sparing to say, that as John Baptist leaped in his Mothers Womb at the Salutation of the Virgin, so here a happy Omen followed on the Salutation from Christs Vicar. In this, her Women, seeing that she firmly believed her self with Child, flattered her so far, that they half perswaded her of it. Notice was given of it to the Council, who that night writ a Letter to Bonner about it, ordering a Te Deum to be sung at St. Pauls, and the other Churches of London, and that Collects should be constantly used for bringing this to a happy perfection. All that night, and next day, there was great joy about the Court and City.

And makes a Speech to the Parliament.

The Queen is believed to be with Child.

On the 29*th*. the Speaker reported to the Commons the Substance of the Cardinal's Speech; and a Message coming from the Lords for a Conference of some of their House, with the Lord Chancellor, four Earls, four Bishops, and four Lords, to prepare a Supplication for their being reconciled to the See of Rome; it was consented to: and the Petition being agreed on at the Committee, was reported, and approved of by both Houses. It contained an Address to the King and Queen.

'That whereas they had been guilty of a moſt horrible Defection 1554.
'and Schiſm from the Apoſtolick See, they did now ſincerely repent of 'it; and in ſign of their Repentance, were ready to repeal all the 'Laws made in prejudice of that See: therefore ſince the King and Queen
'had been no way defiled by their Schiſm, they pray them to be Interceſ-
'ſors with the Legate to grant them Abſolution, and to receive them a'gain into the Boſom of the Church,

The Parliaments Petition to be reconciled to the See of Rome.

So this being preſented by both Houſes on their Knees to the King and Queen, they made their Interceſſion with the Cardinal, who thereupon delivered himſelf in a long Speech.

'He thanked the Parliament for repealing the Act againſt him, and 'making him a Member of the Nation, from which he was by that Act
'cut off: In recompence of which, he was now to reconcile them to 'the Body of the Church. He told them, The Apoſtolick See cheriſhed
'Britain moſt tenderly, as the firſt Nation that had publickly received
'the Chriſtain Faith. The Saxons were alſo afterwards converted by 'the means of that See; and ſome of their Kings had been ſo devoted 'to it, that Offa, and others, had gone to viſit the Threſholds of the 'Apoſtles. That Adrian the fourth, an Engliſh Pope, had given Ire- 'land to the Crown of England: and that many mutual Marks of reci'procal kindneſs had paſſed between that common Father of Chriſten-
'dom, and our Kings, their moſt beloved Sons: but none more emi'nent than the beſtowing on the late King, the Title of Defender of 'the Faith. He told them, That in the Unity with that See, conſiſted
'the happineſs and ſtrength of all Churches: that ſince the Greeks had
'ſeparated from them, they had been abondoned by God, and were
'now under the Yoke of Mahometans. That the Diſtractions of Ger- 'many did further demonſtrate this; but moſt of all, the Confuſions
'themſelves had felt, ever ſince they had broken that Bond of Perfe'ction. That it was the Ambition and Craft of ſome, who for their 'private Ends began it, to which the reſt did too ſubmiſſively comply;
'and that the Apoſtolick See might have proceeded againſt them for it,
'by the aſſiſtance of other Princes; but had ſtayed looking for that Day,
'and for the Hand of Heaven. He run out much on the commendation
'of the Queen, and ſaid, God had ſignally preſerved her, to procure this 'great Bleſſing to the Church. At laſt he enjoyned them for Penance to 'repeal the Laws they had made; and ſo, in the Pope's Name, he granted
'them a full Abſolution, which they received on their Knees; and he alſo
'abſolved the whole Realm from all Cenſures.

The Cardinal makes a long Speech.

And grants them Abſolution.

The reſt of the day was ſpent with great Solemnity and Triumph; all that had been done, was publiſhed next Sunday at Pauls. There was a Committee appointed, by both Houſes, to prepare the Statute of Repeal, which was not finiſhed before the 25*th*. of December; and then, the Biſhop of London only proteſting againſt it, becauſe of a Proviſo put in for the Lands which the Lord Wentworth had out of his Biſhoprick, it was agreed to, and ſent to the Commons. They made more haſte with it, for they ſent it back the 4*th*. of January, with a deſire that twenty Lines in it, which concerned the See of London, and the Lord Wentworth, might be put out, and two new Proviſo's added. One of their Proviſo's was not liked by the Lords, who drew a new one; to which the Viſcount Montacute, and the Biſhops of London 1554. London and Coventry, dissented. The twenty Lines of the Lord Wentworth's Proviso were not put out; but the Lord Chancellor took a Knife, and cut them out of the Parchment, and said, Now I do truly the Office of a Chancellor; the word being ignorantly derived by some from Cancelling. It is not mentioned in the Journal, that this was done by the Order of the House; but that must be supposed, otherwise it cannot be thought the Parliament would have consented to so unlimited a Power in the Lord Chancellor, as to raze or cut out Proviso's at his pleasure.

The Act of Repealing all Laws against that See.

'By the Act is set forth, their former Schism from the See of Rome, 'and their Reconciliation to it now; upon which, all Acts passed 'since the 20*th.* of Henry the Eighth, against that See, were specially 'enumerated and repealed: There it is said, that for the removing 'of all Grudges that might arise, they desired that the following Articles 'might through the Cardinal's Intercession, be established by the Pope's 'Authority.

1. 'That all Bishopricks, Cathedrals, or Colledges, now established, 'might be confirmed for ever.

2. 'That Marriages, made within such degrees as are not contrary to 'the Law of God, but only to the Laws of the Church, might be con- 'firmed, and the Issue by them declared legitimate.

3. 'That all Institutions into Benefices might be confirmed.

4 'That all Judicial Processes might be also confirmed.

A Proviso for Church-Lands.

And finally, 'That all the Settlements of the Lands, of any Bisho- 'pricks, Monasteries, or other Religious Houses, might continue as 'they were, without any trouble by the Ecclesiastical Censures or 'Laws.

A Petition from the Convocation about it.

'And to make this pass the better, a Petition was procured from the 'Convocation of Canterbury, setting forth, That whereas they, being 'the Defenders and Guardians of the Church, ought to endeavour 'with all their strength, to recover those Goods to the Church, which 'in the time of the late Schism had been alienated; yet having consi- 'dered well of it, they saw how difficult, and indeed impossible, that 'would prove, and how much it would endanger the publick Peace 'of the Realm, and the Unity of the Church; therefore they prefer- 'ring the publick Welfare, and the Salvation of Souls, to their own 'private Interests, did humbly pray the King and Queen to intercede 'with the Legate, that according to the Powers given him by the Pope, 'he would settle and confirm all that had been done in the alienation of 'the Church and Abbey Lands, to which they, for their Interests, did 'consent: and they added an humble Desire, That those things which 'concerned the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction and Liberty, might be re- 'establish'd, that so they might be able to discharge the Pastoral Care 'committed to them. Upon this, the Cardinal granted a full confir- 'mation of those things: ending it, with a heavy charge on those who 'had the Goods of the Church in their hands, that they would consi- 'der the Judgments of God that fell on Belshazar, for his profane 'using the Holy Vessels, though they had not been taken away by 'himself, but by his Father. And he most earnestly exhorted them 'that at least they would take care, that out of the Tythes of Parso- 'nages, or Vicarages, those who served the Cures, might be sufficiently 'maintainmaintain'd and encouraged. This was confirmed in Parliament, where also it was declared, That all Suits about these Lands, were only to be in the Queen's Courts, and not in the Ecclesiastical Courts: and if any should, upon the pretence of any Ecclesiastical Authority, disturb the Subjects in their possession, they were to fall into a Premunire. It was also declared, that the Title of Supream Head, never of right belonged to the Crown; yet all Writings, wherein it was used, were still to continue in force; but that hereafter, all Writings should be of force, in which, either since the Queen's coming to the Crown, or afterwards, that Title should be, or had been omitted. It was also declared, that Bulls from Rome might be executed; that all Exemptions that had belonged to Religious Houses, and had been continued by the Grants given of them, were repealed, and these Places were made subject to the Episcopal Jurisdiction, excepting only the Priviledges of the two Universities, the Churches of Westminster and Windsor, and the Tower of London. But for encouraging any to bestow what they pleased on the Church, the Statutes of Mortmain were repealed for twenty Years to come; provided always, that nothing in this Act should be contrary to any of the Rights of the Crown, or the Ancient Laws of England: but that all things should be brought to the State they were in at the 20*th*. Year of her Father's Reign and to continue in that condition, 1554.

An Address made by the Inferior Clergy.

For understanding this Act more perfectly, I shall next set down the Heads of the Address which the Lower House of Convocation made to the Upper; for most of the Branches of this Act had their first rise from it; I have put in the Collection, having found it among Arch-Bishop Parker's Papers. 'In it they petitioned the Lords of the Upper House of Convocation, to take care, that by their consent to the settlement of the Church Lands, nothing might be done in prejudice of any just Title they had in Law to them: as also, it being said, in the Grant of Chantries to King Edward, that Schools and Hospitals were to be erected in several parts of the Kingdom; they desired that some regard might be had to that: Likewise, that the Statutes of Mortmain might be repealed: and whereas Tithes had been at all times appointed for the Ecclesiastical Ministry, therefore they prayed that all Impropriations might be dissolved, and the Tithes be restored to the Church. They also proposed 27 Articles of things meet to be considered for the Reformation of the Church. Namely, That all who had preached any Heretical Doctrine, should be made openly to recant it: that Cranmer's Book of the Sacrament, the late Service Books, with all Heretical Books, should be burnt; and all that had them, should be required to bring them in; otherwise they should be esteemed the favourers of Heresy: That great care should be had of the Books that were either printed or sold. That the Statutes made against Lollards, might be revived, and the Church restored to its former Jurisdiction. That all Statutes for Pluralities, and Non-residence, might be repealed, that so Beneficed Men might attend on their Cures: That Simoniacal Pactions might be punished; not only in the Clergy that made them, but in the Patrons, and in those that mediated in them; that the Liberties of the Church might be restored according to the Magna Charta; and the Clergy be delivered from the heavy Burdens of First-Fruits, Tenths, Col. Numb. 16.

1554. 'and Subsidies: That there might be a clear explanation made of a 'the Articles of the Premunire; and that none should be brought u- 'der it, till there were first a Prohibition issued out by the Queen i 'that Particular; and that disobedience to it, should only bring them 'within that Guilt: That all Exemptions should be taken away; a 'Usury be forbid; all Clergy Men obliged to go in their Habits. The 'last was, That all who had spoiled Churches without any Warrant 'might be obliged to make restitution.

The Laws against Hereticks revived.

The next Act that was brought in, was for the reviving the Statutes made by Richard the Second, Henry the Fourth, and Henry the fifth, against Hereticks; of which an account was given in the first Book of the former Part. The Act began in the House of Commons; who, as was observed in the former Parliament, were much set on Severities. It was brought in on the 12th. of December, and sent up to the Lords on the 15th. who passed it on the 18th. of that month. The Commons put in also another Bill, for voiding all Leases made by married Priests. It was much argued among them; and the first Draught being rejected, a new one was drawn, and sent up to the Lords, on the 19th. of December: but they finding it would shake a great part of the Rights of the Church Lands, that were made by Married Priests, as Bishops, laid it aside. Thus did the servile and corrupted House of Commons run so fast, that the Bishops themselves were forced to moderate their Heats. They all understood how much the Queen was set upon having the Church raised as high as could be, and saw there was nothing so effectual to recommend any to her Favour, as to move high in these Matters: And though their Motions were thought too violent, and rejected, yet their Affections were thereby discovered: so that they knew they should be looked on as Men deeply engaged in these Interests.

An Act declaring Treasons.

After this, the Bill of Treasons was brought in. This was also argued for some days in the House of Commons, but at last agreed to. By it, any who denyed the King's Right to the Title of the Crown with the Queen's, or endeavoured to put him from it, together with them that did several other Offences, were to forfeit all their Goods and to be imprisoned during Life; and Clergy Men were to be deprived by their Ordinaries: In these cases, the second Offence was to be Treason. But if any should compass the King's Death, and utter it by any overt Deed, during his Marriage to the Queen, the first offence of this kind should be Treason. It was also enacted, that the Parliament having petitioned the King, that if the Queen dyed without Issue, he would take on him the Government of them, till they came of Age; to which he had assented; therefore, if the Queen dyed before her Children came to be of Age, the Government of the Kingdom should be in the King's Hands; if it were a Son, till he were eighteen; or if a Daughter, till she was fifteen Years of Age: And in all that time, the conspiring his Death was to be Treason. The Witnesses were to be brought before the Parties; and none was to be tryed for any words, but within six months after they were spoken.

Another against seditious words.

Another Act passed, upon a Report made of some Heretical Preachers, who had, as was informed, prayed in their Conventicles, that God would turn the Queen's Heart from Idolatry to the true Faith, &c.

elſe ſhorten her days, and take her quickly out of the way: All therefore that ſo prayed for taking away the Queen's Life, were to be judged Traytors; but if they ſhewed themſelves penitent for ſuch Prayers, they were not to be condemned of Treaſon, but put to any corporal Puniſhment, other than Death, at the Judges Diſcretion. This was paſſed in great haſte, for it was thrice read in the Houſe of Lords, and paſſed on the 16th. of January, in which the Parliament was Diſſolved. 1554.

There was another Act paſt, againſt thoſe that ſpread Lying Reports of any Noblemen, Judges, or great Officers; that ſuch as ſpread them, ſhould be impriſoned till they brought their Authors, according to former Acts. If any ſpread ſuch Reports of the King and Queen, they were to be ſet on a Pillory, and pay 100 l. or have their Ears cut off, and be three months Priſoners: and they were to pay 100 Marks, and ſuffer one months Impriſonment, though they had Authors for them, if they reported them maliciouſly: But if their Reports tended to the ſtirring of any Inſurrection, they were to loſe their right Hands; and upon a ſecond Offence to ſuffer Impriſonment during their Lives; but they were to be proceeded againſt within three months after the words ſo ſpoken.

All the Bills being ended, the Parliament was diſſolved on the 16th. of January, to Gardiner's no ſmall joy. He had now performed all that he had undertaken to the Queen, or the Emperor: Upon which he had the Reputation that he was formerly in, of a great Stateſman, and a dextrous manager of Affairs, much confirmed and raiſed; ſince he had brought about, in ſo ſmall a time, ſo great a change, where the Intereſts of thoſe who conſented to it, ſeemed to lead them another way. To thoſe who had apprehended the Tyranny of Rome, he had ſaid, That as our former Kings had always kept it under in a great meaſure; ſo there was leſs danger of that now, ſince they ſaw that all Princes had agreed to preſerve their own Rights entire, againſt the Pope's Pretenſions. He ſhewed them, that therefore all the old Laws againſt Proviſions from Rome, were ſtill kept in force. And ſo upon Cardinal Pool's being called over, there was a Commiſſion ſent him, under the Great Seal, bearing date the 10th. of November, authoriſing him to exerciſe his Legatine Power in England. By this he ſhewed them that no Legate ſhould ever come into England to execute any Power, till his Faculties were ſeen and approved by the Queen. Others thought this was but a vain imagination; for if the Papacy were once fully eſtabliſhed and People again brought under the old Superſtition, of eſteeming the Popes Chriſt's Vicars, and the infallible Heads of the Church, it would not be poſſible to retain the People in their Obedience, ſince all the aſſiſtance that the Princes of Chriſtendome of this time had from their Subjects in their Wars with the Popes, flowed chiefly from this, that they generally did no more ſubmit implicitly to their Prieſts. But if once that blind Obedience were reſtored, it would be eaſy for the Prieſts, by their private dealings in Confeſſion, to overturn Governments as they pleaſed.

Gardiner is in great eſteem.

But that which ſtuck moſt, was, That the Church Lands were, by the Cannon Law, ſo indiſſolubly annexed to the Church, that they could not be ſeparated from it. To this it was anſwered, that they

Great fear about the Church Lands.

1554. should secure it by a Law at Rome, and should confirm all the Alienations that had been made, both by consent of the Clergy, and by the Pope's Authority committed to the Legate. Yet even that did not satisfy many who found some Laws in the Canon, so strict, that the Pope himself could not dispence with them: If the Legate did it, the Pope might refuse to confirm it, and then it was nothing: and what one Pope did, another often recalled. So it was said, that this Confirmation was but an Artifice, to make it pass the more easily. Besides, all observed, that in the Cardinal's Confirmation of those Lands there was a charge given to all, to be afraid of the Judgments of God that fell on Belshazar for using the Holy Vessels; which was, to pardon the thing, and yet to call it a Sacriledge, for which they might look for the Vengeance of God. So that the Cardinal did at the same time both bind and loose; and it was plain, both by that Clause, and the Repeal of the Statute of Mortmain, that it was designed to possess People with the Opinion of the Sin of retaining Church-Lands. It was thought this Confirmation, was rather an Indemnity and Permission to keep them, than a declaring the Possessors had any lawful Title to them. So that when Men were near Death, and could no longer enjoy those Lands themselves, it was not to be doubted, but the Terrors of Sacriledge, and the Punishments due to it, with the hope of that relief and comfort that Soul-Masses might bring them in Purgatory, would prevail with many of them, to make at least great, if not entire, Restitutions.

This Point being carried by those who did not understand what future danger their Estates were in, but considered the present Confirmation, and the other Advantages which they were to have for consenting to this Act; all the rest passed with no opposition. The Act about the proceeding against Hereticks, passed more easily than anything that had been proposed: So it seems the opposition that was made to other Acts, came not from any that favoured the Reformation, otherwise this would have found some resistance. But now it was the only way to the Queen's Favour, and to Preferment, to run down that which was called Heresy.

Consultations about the way of dealing with Hereticks

After the Dissolution of the Parliament, the first thing taken into consideration was, what way to proceed against the Hereticks. Cardinal Pool had been suspected to favour the Protestants, but seemed now to be much alienated from them: and therefore when Tremellius who had declared himself a Protestant, came to him at Brussels, he would not see him, though he was his God-father. He came over into England, much changed from that freedom of Conversation he had formerly practised: he was in reserves to all People, spoke little, and had put on an Italian Temper, as well as behaviour: he brought over two Italians, Priuli and Ormaneto, who were his only Confidents. He was a Man of a generous and good disposition; but knew how jealous the Court of Rome would be of him, if he seemed to favour Hereticks; therefore he expressed great detestation of them. Nor did he converse much with any that had been of that Party, but the late Secretary Cecil, who, though he lived for the most part privately at his House near Stamford, where he afterwards built a most sumptuous House; and was known to favour the Reformation still in his Heart Heart; yet in many things he complyed with the Time, and came to have more of his confidence than any Engliſh Man. 1554.

The Cardinal profeſſed himſelf an Enemy to extream Proceedings. He ſaid, Paſtors ought to have Bowels, even to their ſtraying ſheep: Biſhops were Fathers, and ought to look on thoſe that erred as their ſick Children, and not for that, to kill them: He had ſeen, that ſevere Proceedings did rather inflame than cure that Diſeaſe: There was a great difference to be made between a Nation uninfected, where ſome few Teachers came to ſpread Errors; and a Nation that had been overrun with them, both Clergy and Laity. The People were not ſo violently to be drawn back, but were to have time given them to recover out of thoſe Errors, into which they had been led by the Complyance and Writings of their Prelates. Therefore he propoſed, that there ſhould be a ſtrict Reformation of the manners of the Clergy, carryed on. He had obſerved, in every Country of Chriſtendom, that all the beſt and wiſeſt Men acknowledged, that the Scandals and Ignorance of the Clergy, had given the entrance to Hereſy: So he moved, that there might be a reviving of the Rules of the Primitive Church; and then, within a little time, Men might by degrees be brought over. I have not found that he propoſed the receiving the Council of Trent; which is the more ſtrange, ſince he had been himſelf one of the Legates at the firſt Seſſion of it: but it ſeems, it was not thought ſeaſonable to propoſe it, till the Council were firſt ended and diſſolved. The Cardinal is for moderate Courſes.

On the other hand, Gardiner, who had no great ſenſe of Eccleſiaſtical Matters, but as they ſerved Intrigues of State; and being himſelf of ſuch a temper, that ſevere Proceedings wrought much on him? judged that the executing the Laws againſt the Lollards, was that in which they were chiefly to truſt. He was confident, the Preachers then in Priſon, were Men of ſuch tempers, that, if they ſaw they were to be burnt, they would comply; or if they ſtood out, and were burnt, that would ſo terrify the reſt, that the whole Nation would ſoon change. He remembred well how the Lollards grew in England, only upon Cardinal Wolſey's ſlackning the execution of the Laws againſt them: And upon the paſſing of the Statute of the ſix Articles, many ſubmitted; ſo that if King Henry had not diſcouraged the vigorous execution of that Act, all had turned. He did not deny, but a Reformation of the Clergy was a good and fit mean; but ſaid, that all Times could not bear ſuch things; and if they went to reform their Manners, the Hereticks would from thence take advantage of raiſing clamours againſt a ſcandalous Clergy; which would encreaſe, rather then leſſen the averſion the People had to their Paſtors. So Gardiner complained, that Pool, by his intention of coming over too haſtily, had almoſt precipitated all things; and now, by his gentle proceedings, would as much prejudice them another way. All theſe Reaſonings, were ſuch as became a Man of Gardiner's temper, which being ſervile, and abject, made him meaſure others by himſelf. But Gardiner is for violent ones.

He was alſo at this time highly provoked, by the reprinting of his Books of True Obedience, which he had writ in the Time of King Henry, and to which Bonner had made the Preface. In theſe Books, Gardiner had not only argued againſt the Pope's Supremacy, and for the Kings, but had condemned the King's Marriage with Queen Katherine, calling 'it often incestuous, and unlawful; and had justified the King's Divorcing 'her, and marrying his most godly and vertuous Wife, Queen Ann. This being reprinted in Strasburg, was now conveighed into England, and it was acknowledged to be a handsome piece of Spite in the Reformed, thus to expose him to the World. But though this netled him much, yet he was confident enough, and excused himself, that he had erred through fear and weakness, as St. Peter had done; though it was an unreasonable thing, to compare an Error of near thirty Years continuance, to the sudden denyal of St. Peter, that was presently expiated with so true and sincere a Repentance.

To which the Queen inclined.

Between these two Councils, the Queen would have a mean way taken, to follow both in part. She encouraged Pool to go on in the correcting the Manners of the Clergy; and likewise pressed Gardiner to proceed against the Hereticks.

She also sent Ambassadors to Rome; who were the Viscount Montecute; the Bishop of Ely, and Sir Edward Carn, one to represent every State of the Kingdom; to make her Obedience to the Pope, and to obtain a Confirmation of all those Graces Cardinal Pool had granted in his Name.

1555. On the 23*d.* of January, all the Bishops went to Lambeth, to receive the Cardinal's Blessing and Directions. He wished them to return to their Cures, and treat their Flocks with all gentleness, and to endeavour rather to gain them that way, than to use Extremity and Rigour. And on the 25*th.* there was a solemn Procession through London; there went first 160 Priests, all in their Copes, eight Bishops next, and last of all came Bonner himself, carrying the Host; to thank God for reconciling them again to his Church, and Bonfires were burning all the Night. And to keep up a constant remembrance of it, it was ordered, that St. Andrew's day should be still observed as the Anniversary of it, and be called The Feast of the Reconciliation; and Procession, with all the highest Solemnities they at any time use, were to be on that day.

They begin with Rogers, and others.

But now they turned wholly to the Prosecution of the Hereticks. There had been thirty of them taken at a Meeting near Bow Church, where one Rose, a Minister, gave them the Communion according to the English Book of Service; so they were all put in Prison. On the 22*d.* of January, Rogers, with others, were brought before the Council; He had been a Prebendary of Pauls, and in a Sermon, after the Queen was come to London, had zealously asserted the Doctrine, he had formerly preached; and as it has been shewn, was confined to his House, upon the Tumult that had been at Pauls. He was was much pressed to fly over into Germany, but he would not hearken to it, though the Necessities of ten Children were great Temptations. He was esteemed one of the most Learned of the Reformers, so that when those of the Convocation were required to Dispute; they desired that Ridley and he might be suffered to come and joyn with them. It was resolved to begin with him, and some others, at the Council-Board, to see if they could be easily brought over.

He was accordingly brought before the Council; where being asked by Gardiner, Whether he would knit himself to the Catholick Church, and and receive the Pope as the Supream Head? He ſaid, He knew no other Head of the Church but Chriſt; and for the Pope he had no more Authority in England, than any other Biſhop, either by the Word of God, or the Authority of the Church, for 400 Years after Chriſt. But they objecting, that he had acknowledged King Henry to be Supream Head: He anſwered, He never acknowledged him ſo to be Supream, as to forgive Sins, beſtow the Holy Ghoſt, or be a Judge above the Word of God. But as he was going to explain himſelf, Gardiner preſſed him to anſwer plainly. He objected to Gardiner, That all the Biſhops had for many Years preached againſt the Pope. Gardiner ſaid, They were forced to it, by the Cruelty of the Times; but they would Argue no more with him: Now Mercy was offered, if he rejected it, Juſtice muſt come next. Rogers ſaid, if they had been preſſed to deny the Pope's Power by Cruelty, would they now by the ſame Motives force others to acknowledge it? for his part he would never do it. Other ten were called in, one after another; and only one of them, by the Lord Effingham's Favour, was let go upon a general Queſtion, if he would be an Honeſt Man; but all the reſt anſwering reſolutely, were ſent back to Priſon, and were kept much ſtricter than formerly; none being ſuffered to come near them. 1555. Who refuſing to comply.

On the 28*th.* of January, the Biſhops of Wincheſter, London, Dureſm, Salisbury, Norwich, and Carliſle, ſate in St. Mary Overies in Southwark; where Hooper was firſt brought before them. It needs not to be doubted, but Bonner remembred that he had informed againſt him, when he was deprived in King Edward's Time. He had been ſummoned to appear before the Queen, ſoon after ſhe came to the Crown: and it was pretended, he owed her great Sums of Mony: Many adviſed him not to appear, for that it was but a pretence to put him, and a great many more in Priſon, where they would be kept till Laws were made to bring them out to a Stake. But he would not withdraw; ſo now he and Mr. Rogers were ſingled out and begun with. They were asked, Whether they would ſubmit, or not? they both refuſed to ſubmit, Rogers being much preſſed, and continuing firm in his Reſolutions; Gardiner ſaid, It was vain-glory in him to ſtand out againſt the whole Church. He proteſted it was his Conſcience, and not Vain-glory, that wayed him; for his part, he would have nothing to do with the Antichriſtian Church of Rome. Gardiner ſaid, by that he condemned the Queen, and the whole Realm, to be of the Church of Antichriſt: Rogers ſaid, The Queen would have done well enough, if it had not been for his counſel. Gardiner ſaid, the Queen went before them in thoſe Counſels, which proceeded of her own motion. Rogers ſaid, He would never believe that. The Biſhop of Carliſle ſaid, they could all bear him witneſs to it. Rogers ſaid, they would all witneſs for one another. Upon that, the Comptroller, and Secretary Bourn, being there, ſtood up in Court and atteſted it. Then they asked Rogers, What he thought of the Sacrament? He ſaid, It was known he had never meddled in that Matter, and was ſuſpected by ſome to be of a contrary Opinion to many of his Brethren, but yet he did not allow of their Corporal Preſence. He complained, that after he had been confined half a Year in his Houſe, they had kept him a Year in Newgate, without any Fault; for they could not ſay he had broken Were judged: 1555. any of their Laws, since he had been a Prisoner all the while; so that meerly for his Opinion they were now proceeding against him. They gave Hooper and him time till next morning, to consider what they would do: but they continuing in their former Resolution; were declared obstinate Hereticks, and appointed to be degraded and so to be delivered into the Sheriffs hands. Hooper was only degraded from the Order of Priesthood. Then Rogers desired he might be suffered to speak with his Wife, concerning his ten Children: They answered, she was not his Wife, and so denyed it. Upon this they were led away to Newgate.

And condemned.

On the 4*th*. of February, early in the morning, Rogers was called upon to make ready for Smithfield: He was so fast asleep, that he was not easily awakened; he put on his Cloaths carelesly, being, as he said, so soon to lay them off. When he was brought to Bonner to be degraded, he again renewed his desire to see his Wife, but could not obtain it. He was led to Smithfield, where he was not suffered to make any Speech to the People: so, in a few words, he desired them to continue in that Doctrine which he had taught them, and for which he had not only patiently suffered all the bitterness and cruelty that had been exercised on him, but did now most gladly resign up his Life, and give his Flesh to the consuming Fire, for a Testimony to it. He repeated the 51 Psalm, and so fitted himself for the Stake. A Pardon was brought, if he would recant: but he chose to submit to that severe, but short punishment, rather than put himself in danger of Everlasting Burning, by such an Apostacy: So the Fire was set to him, which consumed him to Ashes.

Rogers Martyrdom.

For Hooper, after they had degraded him, they resolved to send him to Gloceſter: At which he much rejoyced, hoping by his Death to confirm their Faith, over whom he had been formerly placed. He was carryed thither in three dayes. After he came, he had one days interval given him, which he spent in Fasting and Prayer. Some came to perswade him to accept of the Queen's Mercy, since Life was sweet, and Death was bitter. He Answered, The Death that was to come after was more bitter, and the Life that was to follow was more sweet. As some of his Friends parted with him, he shed some Tears, and told them, All his Imprisonment had not made him do so much.

Hooper burnt at Gloceſter.

On the 9*th*. he was led out to his Execution; where, being denyed leave to speak, but only to pray, in the strain of a Prayer, he declared his belief. Then the Queen's Pardon being shewed him, he desired them to take it away. He prayed earnestly for strength from God, to endure his Torment patiently; and undressed himself, and embraced the Reeds. When he was tyed to the Stake with Iron Chains, he desired them to spare their pains, for he was confident he should not tremble them. The Fire was put to him, but the Wood being green, burnt ill, and the Wind blew away the flame of the Reeds: He prayed oft, O Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me, and receive my Soul; and called to the People, for the Love of God, to bring him more Fire, for the Fire was burning his neather Parts, but did not reach his Vitals. The Fire was renewed, but the Wind still blew it away from rising up to stifle him, so that he was long in the Torment. The last words he was heard to say, were, Lord Jesus receive my Spirit. Once his Hands dropped off before he died; with the other he Continued to knock on his Breaſt ſome time after; and was in all near three quarters of an hour a burning. 1555.

Next theſe, was Sanders condemned, and ſent to Coventry to be burnt, where he ſuffered on the 8th of February. He had been made a Priſoner for Preaching, notwithſtanding the Queen's Prohibition, and was condemned for refuſing to conform to the New Laws. When he was led out to the Stake, a Pardon was likewiſe offered him: But he ſaid, He held no Hereſies, but the bleſſed Goſpel of Chriſt; and that he would never recant. When he came to the Stake, he embraced it, and ſaid, Wellcome the Croſs of Chriſt, wellcome Everlaſting Life? and ſo he was burnt. Sanders burnt at Coventry.

Dr. Taylor followed next, who was Parſon of Hadley. Some of his neighbouring Prieſts came to Hadley, and reſolved to ſay Maſs in his Church. He went thither, and openly declared againſt it, but was by violence thruſt out of the Church. Gardiner, being informed of this, writ for him to come up. Many of his Friends wiſhed him to go out of the way: He ſaid, He muſt follow Chriſt, the good Shepherd, who not only fed his Flock, but died for it. He was old, and thought he ſhould never be able, at any other time, to do his good God ſuch Service as he was then called to; ſo he went with much chearfulneſs. Gardiner received him with his ordinary Civilities, of Traitor, Villain, Heretick, and Knave. He anſwered, He was none of theſe; and put Gardiner in mind of the Oaths he had ſworn, both to King Henry and King Edward. Gardiner ſaid, An unlawful Oath was not to be kept; and charged him for hindring Maſs to be ſaid at his Church. He ſaid, He was by Law Parſon of Hadley, and no man had a right to come thither, and defile his Church and People with Idolatry. After ſome Diſcourſe on that Head, he was ſent to the Kings Bench Priſon; and being carried before the Council on the 22*d*. of January, he refuſed to turn. After that he was condemned, and degraded: And it was reſolved to ſend him to Hadley to be burnt there. All the way he expreſſed great chearfulneſs. When he was brought to the Stake, he ſaid to the People, he had taught them nothing but God's Holy Word, and was now to Seal it with his Blood: But one of the Guard ſtruck him over the Head, and made him give over ſpeaking. Then he went to his Prayers, and ſo to the Stake, where he was put in a Pitch Barrel. As the Faggots were laying about him, one flung a Faggot at his Head, which broke it, and fetch'd a great deal of Blood; but all he ſaid, was, Oh Friend, I have harm enough, what needed that? He repeated the 51 Pſalm in Engliſh; at which one of the Guard ſtruck him over the Mouth, and bid him ſpeak Latin. He continued in his Ejaculations to God, till the Fire was kindled; and one of the Guard cut him in the Head with his Halbert, ſo that his Brains fell out. This was done on the 9*th*. of February. And Taylor at Hadley.

Bradford was alſo at the ſame time condemned, but his Execution was reſpited.

Soon after the Condemnation of theſe Men, ſix others were apprehended on the account of Hereſy.

By

1555. Gardiner is disappointed.

By this Gardiner saw, that what he had expected did not follow; for he thought a few severe instances would have turned the whole Nation: but finding he was disappointed, he would meddle no more in the condemning of them; but left the whole matter wholly to Bonner, who undertook it chearfully, being naturally savage and brutal, and retaining deep resentments for what had befallen himself in King Edwards time.

These Cruelties are much censured.

The whole Nation stood amazed at these Proceedings, and the burning of such Men, only for their Consciences, without the mixture of any other thing, so much as pretended against them. And it was look't upon as a horrible cruelty, because those Men had acted nothing contrary to the Laws; for they were put in Prison, at first for smaller matters, and there kept, till those Laws were past, by which they were now burnt. So that, remembring Gardiners Plea for himself in his imprisonment, when he desired to be first Tried, and discharged in the particular for which he was committed, before new matter was brought against him; all Men saw now, how much more justly those men might have demanded the like at his hands. But now the Spirit of the two Religions shewed it self. In King Edwards time, Papists were only turned out of their Benefices, and at most imprisoned; and of those there were but very few: but now, that could not serve turn, but barbarous Cruelties must be executed on innocent Men, only for their Opinions. One piece of Severity was taken notice of among the rest: The Council sent for those who were to be burnt in the Country, and required of them a promise to make no Speeches; otherwise they threatned to cut out their Tongues immediately: so they to avoid that butchery, promised to obey those cruel Orders.

Reflections made on Hooper's Death.

The manner of Hooper's death, made those who judged too critically of Divine Providences, reflect on the dissension that had been raised by him about the Vestments; as if he, who had kindled that fire, had suffered now more than ordinary for that reason. But all that difference was at an end before this; for Ridley and he, between whom there had been the greatest animosity, becoming Partners in the same suffering, were perfectly reconciled to each other. He writ twice to Ridley, who writ him an Answer, as soon as he could convey it; in which he declared, how intirely he was knit to him, though in some circumstances of Religion they had formerly jarred a little: it was Hoopers wisdom, and his own simplicity, that had divided them; every one following the abundance of his own sence; but now he assured him, that in the Bowels of Christ he loved him in the Truth and for the Truth. He encouraged him to prepare for the day of his dissolution; after which they should triumph together in eternal Glory: he expressed great Joy for what he "heard of Cranmers godly and fatherly constancy, whose integrity, and "uprightness, gravity, and innocence, was known to the whole Nation: "and he blessed God that had given, in his reverend old Age, such a Man "to be the witness of his Truth: for miserable and hard-hearted was he, "whom the Godliness and constant confession of so worthy, so grave, "and so innocent a man, would not move to acknowledge and confess the "Truth.

It had been happy if the fires that consumed those good Men, had put an end to these Contests: and if those that have been since engaged in the like, will reflect more on the sense they had of them when they

they were now preparing for Eternity, than on the heats they were put in concerning them, when perhaps eaſe and plenty made their paſſions keener, they may from thence be reduced to have more moderate thoughts of ſuch matters. 1555.

If the Engliſh Nation was diſſatisfied with what was done ſince the beginning of this Reign, it cannot be imagined but their diſcontent received a great encreaſe by what was now acted. Thoſe that favoured the Reformation, were awakened to have more ſerious thoughts about it; ſince they ſaw thoſe that had preached it, died ſo patiently and reſolutely, rather than they would deny it. It begot in them greater tenderneſs to their memories, and a more violent averſion to their Perſecutors. The reſt of the Nation that neither knew nor valued Religion much, yet were ſtartled at the ſeverity and ſtrangeneſs of theſe Proceedings; and being naturally of relenting and compaſſionate Tempers, were highly diſaffected to the King, from whom they believed that this flowed. They Queen had before declared, ſhe would force no body in theſe points; ſo they thought it not reaſonable nor decent to charge her with it. Gardiner, with the other Biſhops and Privy Councellors had openly in Court purged themſelves of it; and laid it on the Queen, being therein more careful of their own credit, than of her honour; ſo now, it could fall no where but on the King; the ſowerneſs of whoſe temper, together with his bigotry for that Religion, made it reaſonable enough to impute it to him: beſides, he had been bred in Spain, where the Inquiſition was let looſe on all that were ſuſpected of Hereſie without any reſtraint: and his Father had, during his whole Reign, been always, as far as he ſafely could be, a Proſecutor of Proteſtants. Philip could not but ſee that all was caſt on him; and underſtanding that thereby he ſhould become unacceptable to the Nation, and ſo not be able to carry on his Deſign of making himſelf Maſter of England, he was ſomething concerned to clear himſelf of theſe Imputations. Therefore Alphonſus a Franciſcan Friar that was his Confeſſor, in a Sermon before him on the 10*th.* of February preached largely againſt the taking away of Peoples lives for Religion; and in plain terms, inveighed againſt the Biſhops for doing it: he ſaid, they had not learned it in Scripture, which taught Biſhops in the ſpirit of meekneſs to inſtruct thoſe that oppoſed them; and not to burn them for their Conſciences. This ſtartled the Biſhops; ſince it was now plain, that the Spaniards diſowned theſe extream courſes; and hereupon there was a ſtop for ſeveral weeks put to any further ſeverities. But the Popiſh Clergy, being once engaged in blood, have been always obſerved to become the moſt brutally cruel of any ſort of men; ſo that it was not eaſie to reſtrain them; and therefore they reſolved, rather than the Hereticks ſhould not be proſecuted any further, to take the blame of it avowedly on themſelves.

Theſe Burnings were diſliked by the Nation.

The King purges himſelf of them.

But they are proſecuted by the Clergy.

There was at this time a Petition Printed, and ſent over from ſome beyond Sea, to the Queen, in which they ſet before her the danger of her being carried away by a blind zeal, to perſecute the members of Chriſt, as St. Paul was before his converſion: They put her in mind how Cranmer had preſerved her in her Fathers time; ſo that ſhe had more reaſon to believe he loved her, and would ſpeak truth to her, than all the reſt of her Clergy; whom they compared to Jezabel's

A Petition againſt Perſecution.

1555. Prophets. They gathered many Passages out of Gardiner's Bonner's and Tonstal's Writings, against the Pope's Supremacy, and her Mothers Marriage; and shewed that they were Men that, by their own confession, had no conscience in them, but measured their Actions and Professions by their Fears, and Interests; and averred that it was known that many of that Faction did openly profess, that if they lived in Turkey, they would comply with the Religion of the Country. They said, that the Turks did tolerate Christians, and the Christians did in most places suffer Jews; but the Persecution now set on foot, was like that which the Scribes and Pharisees raised against the Apostles; for they then pretended that they had been once of their Religion, and so were Apostates, and Hereticks. They also said, (but by a common mistake) That the first Law for Burning in England, was made by Henry the Fourth; who to gratifie the Bishops that had helped him to depose King Richard the second, and to advance himself to the Throne, as it were, in recompence of that Service, had granted them that Law; which was both against all huanmity, and more particularly against the mercifulness of the Christian Religion.

They remembred her, that in King Edward's time, none of the Papists had been so used: and in conclusion they told her, she was trusted by God with the Sword, for the protection of her People, as long as they did well; and was to answer to him for their Blood, if she should delivered them to the mercy of such Wolves.

From the Queen, the Address is turned to the Nobility, warning them of the Danger, of not only losing their Abbey Lands, but also their Liberties; and being brought under a Spanish Yoke, which had ruined many of the best Countries in the World: They are told, they must resolve to come under heavy Taxes, and a general Excise, such as was in the Netherlands; and that all this would come justly on them who had joyned in the Reformation, for base ends, to get the Church Lands; and now, thinking those were secured to them, forsook it: but for all these things they were to answer heartily to God.

From them, it turns to the People, and exhorts them to repent of their great sins, which had brought such Judgments on them: and in the end, begs the Queen will at least be as favourable to her own People, as she had been to the Strangers, to whom she allowed a free passage to Forreign Parts.

This Discourse is writ in a strong and good Style, much beyond the rate of the other Books of that time. Upon this, some were set on work to write in defence of such Proceedings; so a Book was set out about it, with divers Arguments, of which the substance follows.

Arguments for persecuting Hereticks.

They said, The Jews were commanded to put Blasphemers to death; and those Hereticks were such, for they blasphemed the Sacrament of the Altar, which was the Body of Christ, and called it a piece of Bread. They noted also, that the Heathens had persecuted Christians; and if they had that Zeal for their false Religion, it became Christians to be much more zealous for theirs: they made use of that Expression in the Parable, Compel them to enter in; and of St. Paul's, I would they were cut off that trouble you. They alledged, that St. Peter had, by Divine Power, struck Ananias and Saphira dead; which seemed a good Warrant for the Magistrate to put such persons to Death. They said that the Heretics themſelves were for Burning, when they had Power; and that thoſe that died then by their hands, had expreſſed as much Courage in their Deaths, and Innocence in their Lives, as they had ever done: they cited St. Auſtin, who was for proſecuting the Donatiſts; and though he had been once of another mind, yet finding Severities had a good effect on them, he changed, and was for fining or baniſhing of them. Theſe were the Arguments for and againſt thoſe Proceedings. 1555.

But leaving them to the Reader's Judgment, I proceed in the Hiſtory. I intend not to write a pompous Martyrology, and therefore hereafter I ſhall only name the Perſons that ſuffered, with the reaſons for which they were condemned: but except in a very few Inſtances, I ſhall not enlarge on the manner of their Trial and Sufferings; which being ſo copiouſly done by Fox, there is nothing left for any that comes after him. In ſome private Paſſages, which were brought to him upon flying Reports, he made a few Miſtakes, being too credulous; but in the Account he gives from Records, or Papers, he is a moſt exact and faithful Writer; ſo that I could never find him in any prevarication, or ſo much as a deſigned concealment. He tells the Good and the Bad, the Weakneſs and Paſſion, as well as the Conſtancy and Patience of thoſe good Men, who ſealed their Faith with their Blood; who were not all equal in Parts, nor in Diſcretion; but the weaker any of them were, it argued the more cruelty in their Proſecutors, to proceed ſo ſeverely againſt ſuch inconſiderable Perſons.

The firſt Intermiſſion being over, on the 16*th.* of March, Thomas Thomkins, a Weaver in Shoreditch, was burnt in Smithfield, only for denying the corporal Preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament. Bonner kept him many months in his Houſe, hoping to have wrought on him by fair means; but thoſe having no effect, one day he tore out a great deal of the Hair of his Beard, but to conceal that, made his Beard be clean ſhaved: And another time he held his hand in the Flame of the Candle, ſo long, till the Sinews and Veins ſhrunk and burſt, and ſpurted in Harpſfield's Face that was ſtanding by, who, interpoſing with Bonner, got him to give over any further cruelty at that time. They proceed to burn more.

The next that ſuffered, was one William Hunter of Brentwood, an Apprentice of nineteen Years old; who had been drawn on in diſcourſe by a Prieſt, till he brought him to deny the Preſence in the Sacrament; and then was accuſed by him. His own Father was made to ſearch for him to bring him to Juſtice; but he, to ſave his Father from trouble, endred himſelf. Bonner offered him 40 pound if he would change, ſo mercenary a thing did he think Conſcience to be: But he anſwered, if they would let him alone, he would keep his Conſcience to himſelf, but he would not change; ſo he was condemned and ſent to be burnt near to where he ſuffered on the 20*th.* of March.

On the ſame day, Cauſton and Higbed, two Gentlemen of good Estates and great Eſteem, were burnt near their own Houſes in Eſſex.

On the 28*th.* of March, William Pigot was burnt at Braintree, and Stephen Knight at Malden; and on the 29*th*, John Lawrence, a Prieſt, at his own Houſe, was burnt at Colcheſter.

In all their Proceſſes, the Biſhops brought no Witneſſes againſt them; but did only exhibit Articles to them, according to the way of thoſe 1555. Courts, called Ex Officio; and required them to make Answers; and upon their Answers, which were judged Heretical, they condemned them; so that all this was singly for their Consciences, without the pretence of any other Matter.

Ferrar, Bishop of St. Davids, condemned and burnt.

Ferrar, that had been Bishop of St. Davids, being dealt with by Gardiner to turn, and refusing to do it, was sent down to Carmarthen; where his Successor Morgan sat upon him; and gave him Articles about the Marriage of Priests, the Mass, and some other things: To which his Answers being found Heretical, he was condemned. He put in an Appeal to Cardinal Pool, but it was not received: Yet it seems, that delayed the Execution till they heard from him; for though he was condemned on the 13*th*. he was not burnt before the 30*th* of March.

About that time was Rawlins White, an honest poor Fisher-man, burnt at Cardiff; it was in March, but the day is not mentioned: He was very ancient, and was put in prison, only because he had put his Son to School, that he might hear the Bible read by him. After a Year's Imprisonment, the Bishop of Landaff condemned him, upon Articles to which he answered as an Heretick.

On the 24*th* of April, George March, a Priest, was burnt at Chester, being judged, as the others had been; only at his death there was a new Invention of Cruelty, a Firkin of Pitch was hung over his Head, that the Fire melting it, it might scald his Head as it dropt on it.

One wounds a Priest at the Altar, and is burnt for Heresie himself, condemning his former Act.

After this, one Flower, that had been in Orders, but was a rash indiscreet Man, went on Easter-day into St. Margarets Church in Westminster, and there with a Knife, struck at, and wounded the Priest, as he was officiating. He for some time justified what he had done, as flowing from Zeal; but afterwards he sincerely condemned it. Bonner upon this proceeding against him as an Heretick, condemned him to the Fire; and he was burnt on the 24*th*. of April in Westminster Church-Yard. This Fact was condemned by all the Reformed, who knew that the Wrath of Man was not the way to accomplish the Righteousness of God. In the Jewish Government, some extraordinary Persons did execute Vengeance on notorious Offenders; but that Constitution was in all its Policy regulated by the Laws given by Moses; in which such Instances were proposed as Examples, whereby they became a part of the Law of that Land; so that in such Cases, it was certainly lawful to execute Punishment in that way; so in some Kingdoms, any Man that finds an out-lawed Person, may kill him: but where there is no Law warranting such things, it is certainly against both Religion, and the Laws of all Society and Government, for private persons to pretend to the Magistrates right, and to execute Justice upon any account whatsoever.

There was at this time a second stop put to the Execution of Hereticks, for till the end of May more fires were not kindled; People grew generally so enraged upon it, that they could not bear it. I shall therefore now turn my self to other things, that will give the Reader a more pleasing entertainment.

The Queen resolves to surrender up all the Church Lands that were in her hands.

On the 28*th* of March, the Queen called for the Lord Treasurer Sir Robert Rochester Comptroller, Sir William Petre Secretary of State, and Sir Francis Inglefield Master of the Wards. She said, she had sent for them, to declare her Conscience to them concerning the Church-Lands

Lands that continued ſtill in the Crown: ſhe thought they were taken away in the time of the Schiſm, and by unlawful means, therefore ſhe could not keep them with a good Conſcience; ſo ſhe did ſurrender and relinquiſh them. If they ſhould tell her, That her Crown was ſo poor, that ſhe could not well maintain her Dignity, if ſhe parted with them; ſhe muſt tell them, She valued the Salvation of her Soul more than ten Kingdoms; and thanked God, her Husband was of the ſame mind: and therefore ſhe was reſolved to have them diſpoſed, as the Pope, or his Legat ſhould think fit; ſo ſhe ordered them to go with the Lord Chancellor, to whom ſhe had ſpoken of it before, and wait on the Legat, and ſignifie it to him, together with the value of thoſe Lands. This flowed from the ſtrictneſs of the Queens Conſcience, who then thought her ſelf near the time of her delivery, and therefore would not have ſuch a load lie on her; of which ſhe was the more ſenſible, by reaſon of a Bull which Pope Julius had made, excommunicating all that kept any Abby or Church-Lands; and all Princes, Prelates and Magiſtrates, that did not aſſiſt in the execution of ſuch Bulls. Some ſaid, this related to the Buſineſs of England; but Gardiner ſaid, it was only made for Germany; and that Bulls had no Authority, unleſs they were received in England. This did not ſatisfie the People much; for if it was ſuch a ſin in Germany, they could not ſee, but it was as bad in England: And if the Pope had his Authority from Chriſt and St. Peter, his Bulls ought to take place every-where. 1555.

Pope Julius died ſoon after this, on the 20*th.* of March; and on the 6*th.* of April after, Cardinal Marcellus Cervinus was choſen Pope; a Man of great gravity and innocence of Life. He continued to keep his former Name, which had not been done a great while, except by Adrian the 6*th.* between whoſe temper, and this Man, there was a great reſemblance. He preſently turned all his Thoughts (as Adrian had done) to a Reformation of the Corruptions of that See; and blamed his Predeceſſors much who had always put it off: he thought nothing could make the Papacy more reverenced, than to cut off their exceſſive and ſuperfluous Pomp; whereby they would be the more eſteemed all the World over, and might, on ſure grounds, expect the protection of God. He had been one of the Legats at Trent, and there obſerved what was repreſented as the root of all Hereſie and Diſorder, that the Clergy were generally corrupted, and had, by many Exemptions procured from Rome, broken all the Primitive Rules. Upon his firſt Election, he called for the Cardinal of Mantua, and having obſerved him to be a man of great probity, told him, he knew it was ordinary for all Popes, at their firſt coming to the Throne, to talk of Reformation; but he would talk little, being reſolved to do more; only he opened his mind to him, that if ever he went back from it, he might have this check upon him, that ſo honeſt a man as he was, would know him to be a Knave, and a Hypocrite. He would ſuffer none of his Friends that were in remote parts, to come to Rome; nor his Nephews, that were in Rome, to come within the Court: he was reſolved to have ſent all Prieſts and Biſhops home to their Benefices; and talked much of their Non-reſidence with great deteſtation: He would not change his Table, nor his Cuſtom of making one read to him when he was ſitting at it. One day, after a long muſing at Dinner, he ſaid, he remembred

Pope Julius dies, and Marcellus ſucceeds.

1555. remembred the words of Hadrian the Fourth, 'That the Pope was the 'most miserable of all Men; his whole Life was bitterness, his Chair 'was full of Thorns, and his way of Briars; and then leaning with his Hand on the Table, he said, I do not see how they can be saved that hold this high Dignity. These Thoughts did so affect him, that on the 12th. day after that he was chosen Pope, he sickned, and died ten days after. These things are reported of him by the learned Onuphrius, who knew him well: and they will not be thought impertinent to have a room in this Story.

The Queen recommends Card. Pool to the Popedom upon Marcellus's death.

As soon as the News of his Death came to England, the Queen writ, on the 29th. day of May, to Gardiner, the Earl of Arundel, and the Lord Paget, who were then at Calais, mediating a Peace between the French and Spaniard; which they could not effect, but only procure a Truce: She desired them to deal with the Cardinal of Lorrain, the Constable, and the other French Commissioners, to perswade their Master to set up Cardinal Pool, that he might succeed in that Chair, since he seemed every way the fittest person for it; adding, (as will appear by the Letter which is in the Collection) that she had done this without his knowledge or consent. This could not come in time to Rome, where on the 23d. of that month, Caraffa was chosen Pope, who was called Paul the Fourth; and who was as different from his Predecessor as any man could be. He had put on an appearance of great strictness before; and had set up a Religious Order of Monks, called Theatines: But upon his coming to the Popedom, he put on the greatest Magnificence possible, and was the highest Spirited, and bloodiest Pope, that had been since Julius the Second's Time.

Paul the 4th. chosen Pope.

The English Ambassadors come to Rome.

He took it for a great Honour, that on the day of his Election, the English Ambassadors entred Rome, with a great Train of 140 Horse of their own Attendants. On the 23d. of June, in the first Consistory after he was Crowned, they were heard. They fell prostrate at his Feet, and acknowledged the Steps and Faults of their Schism, enumerating them all; for so the Pope had ordered it; confessing they had been ungrateful for the many benefits they had received from that Church, and humbly asking pardon for them. The Pope held some Consultation, whether he should receive them, since in their Credentials, the Queen stiled her self Queen of Ireland: that Title being assumed by King Henry, in the Time of Schism. It seemed hard to use such Ambassadors ill: but on the other hand, he stood upon his Dignity, and though it belonged only to his See to erect Kingdoms: therefore he resolved so to temper the Matter, that he should not take notice of that Title, but should bestow it as a Mark of his Favour. So on the 7th. of Jun. he did in private erect Ireland into a Kingdom; and conferred that Title on the King and Queen, and told them, that otherwise he would not suffer them to use it in their Publick Audience. And it is probable, it was the Contest about this, that made the Audience be delayed almost a month after their Arrival. This being adjusted, he received the Ambassadors graciously, and pardoned the whole Nation: and said, 'That in Token of his esteem of the King and Queen, he gave 'them the Title of the Kingdom of Ireland, by that Supream Power 'which he had from God, who had placed him over all Kingdoms, to 'supplant the Contumatious, and to build new ones. But in his private

Discours

Diſcourſes with the Ambaſſadors, he complained that the Church-Lands were not reſtored: which, he ſaid, was by no means to be endured; for they muſt render all back to the laſt farthing; ſince they belonged to God, and could not be kept without their incurring Damnation: He ſaid, he would do any thing in his power, to gratifie the King and Queen; but in this his Authority was not ſo large, as to prophane the things dedicated to God. This would be an Anathema, and a Contagion on the Nation, which would bring after it many Miſeries; therefore he required them to write effectually about it: he repeated this to them every time he ſpake to them; and told them alſo, that the Peter-pence muſt be paid in England, and that he would ſend a Collector to raiſe it: he himſelf had been imployed in that office when he was young, and he ſaid, he was much edified to ſee the forwardneſs of the People, eſpecially thoſe of the meaner ſort, in paying it: and told them they muſt not expect St. Peter would open Heaven to them, ſo long as they uſurped his Goods on Earth. 1555.

The P. preſſes the reſtoring of the Church Lands.

History of the Council of Trent.

The Ambaſſadors ſeeing the Popes haughty temper, that he could endure no contradiction, anſwered him with great ſubmiſſion; and ſo gained his Favour much; but knew well that theſe things could not be eaſily effected; and the Viſcount Montacute was to deeply concerned in the matter himſelf, to ſollicit it hard: for almoſt his whole Eſtate conſiſted of Abby Lands. Thus was this buſineſs rather laid over, than fully ſetled.

But now to return to the Affairs in England. There came Complaints from all places, that the Juſtices of Peace were remiſs in the matters of Religion; and particularly in Norfolk, that theſe things were ill looked to: So Inſtructions were ſent thither (which will be found in the Collections) requiring the Juſtices to divide themſelves into ten or twelve Diſtricts; that they might more narrowly look into all particulars: that they ſhould encourage the Preachers ſent to inſtruct that County, and turn out ſuch as did not come to Church, or conform in all things, but chiefly the Preachers of Hereſie: that the Juſtices and their Families ſhould be good examples to the reſt: that they ſhould have one or two in every Pariſh to be ſecretly inſtructed, for giving information of every thing in it; and ſhould look ſtrictly to all Vagabonds that wandred about, and to ſuch as ſpread falſe reports. This was thought to have ſo much of the Inquiſition in it, that it was imputed to the Counſels of the Spaniards. And they ſeem'd to have taken their pattern from the baſe Practiſes of thoſe called Delatores, that are ſet out by Tacitus as the greateſt abuſe of Power that ever was practiſed by the ill Emperors that ſucceeded Auguſtus; who going into all companies, and complying with what might be acceptable to them, engaged Men into diſcourſes againſt the State; and then gave ſuch Informations againſt them, which without their diſcovering themſelves by being brought to prove them, were made uſe of to the ruin of the accuſed Perſons. This was certainly very contrary to the freedom of the Engliſh temper, and helpt to alienate them the more from the Spaniards. But it may be eaſily imagined that others were weary of ſeverities, when Bonner himſelf grew averſe to them: He complained, that the matter was turned over upon him, the reſt looking on, and leaving the execution of theſe Laws wholly to him. So when the Juſtices and Sheriffs ſent up Hereticks to him, Inſtructions ſent to the Juſtices for ſearching after all ſuſpected of Hereſie.

1554. But is required to proceed by the King and Queen.

him, he sent them back and refused to meddle further. Upon which the King and Queen writ to him on the 24*th.* of May, complaining of this, and admonished him to have from henceforth more regard to the Office of a good Pastor and Bishop; and when such Offenders were brought to him, to endeavour to remove them from their Error; or if they were obstinate, to proceed against them according to Law. This Letter he caused to be put in his Register, from whence I copied it, and have placed it in the Collections. Whether he procured this himself for a colour to excuse his Proceedings; or whether it was sent to him by reason of his slackness; is not certain: but the latter is more probable, for he had burnt none during five weeks; but he soon redeemed that loss of time.

Coll. Number 20.

The Queens delivery is expected, but in vain.

At this time the Nation was in expectation of the Queens Delivery. And on the third of May, the Bishop of Norwich writ a Letter to the Earl of Sussex, of which I have seen the Original, that news was brought him from London, that the Queen had brought forth a Noble Prince: for which he had Te Deum solemnly sung in his Cathedral, and in the other Churches thereabout. He adds in the Postscript, that the News was confirmed by two other Hands. But, though this was without any ground, the Queen continued still in her opinion that she was with Child: and on the 29*th.* of May, Letters were written by the Council to the Lord Treasurer, to have Money in readiness, that those who were appointed to carry the joyful news of the Queens happy Delivery, might be speedily dispatched. In the beginning of June she was believed to be in Labour, and it flew over London again that she had brought forth a Son. The Priests had setled all their hopes on that; so they did every where sing Te Deum, and were transported into no small Extasie of Joy. One more officious than the rest, made a Sermon about it, and described all the lineaments of their young Prince: but they soon found they were abused. It was said, that they had been deceived, and that the Queen had no great Belly; but Melvin in his Memoirs says, he was assured from some of her Women, that she did cast forth at several times some Moles and unformed pieces of flesh. So now there was final hopes of any Issue from her. This encreased the sowrness of her temper; and King Philip, being so much younger than she, growing out of conceit with her, did not much care for her; but left her some months after. He saw no hope of Children, and finding that it was not possible for him to get England in his hands without that; gave over all his Designs about it: so having lived with her about fifteen months after their first Marriage, he found it necessary to look more after his Hereditary Crown, and less after his Matrimonial one; and henceforth he considered England rather as a sure Ally, that was to adhere firmly to his Interests, than as a Nation which he could ever hope to add to his other Crowns. All these things concurred to increase the Queens Melancholy humours, and did cast her into an ill state of health: so that it was not probable she could live long. Gardiner upon that, set himself much to have the Lady Elizabeth put out of the way; but, as it was formerly said, King Philip preserved her.

Proceedings against Hereticks.

And thus Affairs went on, as to Civil matters, till the meeting of the next Parliament in October following. But I now return to the Proceedings against the poor men called Hereticks; who were again, after a ſhort intermiſſion, brought to new Sufferings, John Cardmaker, that had been Divinity-Reader at S. Pauls, and a Prebendary at Bath; and John Warne, an Upholſter in London, were both burnt in Smithfield, on the 30*th.* of May, for denying the Corporal Preſence; being proceeded againſt ex Officio. On the 4*th.* of June, there was a piece of Pageantry acted on the Body of one Tooly; who being executed for a Robbery, did at his death ſay ſomething that ſavoured of Hereſy: upon which the Council writ to Bonner to enquire into it, and to proceed according to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws. He thereupon form'd a Proceſs, and cited the dead Body to anſwer the Points objected to him; but he, to be ſure, neither appearing nor anſwering, was condemned and burnt. After this, on the 10*th.* of June, Thomas Hawkes, a Gentleman in Eſſex, who had lived much in the Court, was alſo burnt at Coxhall: and on the ſame day John Simpſon, and John Ardeley, two Husbandmen, were alſo burnt in Eſſex. Thomas Watts, a Linnen-Draper, was burnt at Chelmsford. On the 9*th.* Nicholas Chamberlain, a VVeaver, was burnt at Colcheſter; and on the 15*th.* Thomas Oſmond, a Fuller, was burnt at Manning-tree; and the ſame day William Bamford, a Weaver, was burnt at Harwich. 1555.

Theſe, with ſeveral others, had been ſent up by the Earl of Oxford, to Bonner, becauſe they had not received the Sacrament the laſt Eaſter, and were ſuſpected of Hereſy: and Articles being given to them, they were upon their Anſwers condemned, and ſent to be burnt in the places where they had lived. But upon this occaſion, the Council fearing ſome Tumult, or violent Reſcue, writ to the Earl of Oxford, and the Lord Rich, to gather the Country, and to ſee the Hereticks burnt. The Earl of Oxford, being ſome way indiſpoſed, could only ſend his People to the Lord Rich. vvho went and obeyed the Orders that had been ſent him; for vvhich, Letters of Thanks vvere vvritten to him; and the Council underſtanding that ſome Gentlemen had come to the burning at Colcheſter, that had not been vvrit to, but as the vvords of the Letter have it, had honeſtly and of themſelves gone thither, writ to the Lord Rich to give them the Council's thanks for their Zeal. I find in the Council Books, many Entries made of Letters vvrit to ſeveral Counties, to the Nobility and Gentry to aſſiſt at theſe Executions: and ſuch as made excuſes, were always after that looked on with an ill eye, and were ſtill under great jealouſie.

The Council writ to the Lords in Eſſex to gather the Gentry, and aſſiſt at theſe Burnings.

After theſe followed the Execution of Bradford in July; He had been condemned among the firſt, but was not burnt till now. He had been a Prebendary of St. Pauls, and a celebrated Preacher, in the end of King Edwards days. He had preſerved Bourn in the tumult at Pauls-Croſs; and that afternoon, preaching at Bow-Church, he ſeverely reproved the People for the diſorder at Pauls; but three dayes after, was put in Priſon, where he lay, removed from one Priſon to another, near three years; where-ever he came, he gained ſo much on the Keepers, that they ſuffered him to Preach and give the Sacrament to his Fellow Priſoners. He was one of thoſe that were carried before the Council on the 22*d.* of January, where Bonner accuſed him of the Tumult at Pauls; though all he pretended to prove it by, was, that his way of ſpeaking to the People ſhewed, he thought he had ſome Authority over them, and was a Preſumption that he had ſet on the Sedition. Bradford appealed to God that ſaw his Innocency, and how unworthily he was requited for ſaving his Enemies, who rendered him evil for good. At Bradford's Martyrdome.

1555. last refusing to conform himself to the Laws, he was condemned with the rest on the 31. of Jan. where that Rescue was again laid to his Charge, together with many Letters he had written over England, which (as the Earl of Darby informed the Parliament) had done more hurt than he could have done, if he had been at liberty to Preach. He said, since he understood that they acted by a Commission which was derived from the Pope, he could not answer them, having sworn never to acknowledge that Authority: What he had done at Pauls, was at Bourns earnest desire, who prayed him for the Passion of Christ, to speak to the People; upon which he stepped up to the Pulpit, and had almost been killed with the Dagger that was thrown at Bourn, for it touched his Sleeve. But in the points of Religion, he professed his Faith so constantly, that for that cause he was condemned. Yet the saving of Bourn was so publickly known, that it was thought undecent to proceed against him so quick as they did with the rest. So both Heath Arch-Bishop of York, and Day Bishop of Chichester, Weston, Harpsfield, and the King's Confessor, and Alphonsus a Castro, went to see him, and endevoured to gain him: but all to no purpose. It looks very ill in Bourn that he never interposed for Bradford, nor came once to visit him: and as when Bradford was before the Council, Brurn's Brother the Secretary was very sharp upon him; so when he was brought to his Tryal, Bourn himself then Bishop of Bath and Wells being present, did not open his mouth for him, though he appealed to him, as to the business of the Tumult. With Bradford one John Leafe, an Apprentice of nineteen years old, was led out to be burnt, who was also condemned upon his Answers to the Articles exhibited to him. When they came to the Stake, they both fell down and Prayed. Then Bradford took a Fagot in his hands and kissed it; and so likewise kissed the Stake, expressing thereby the joy he had in his Sufferings: and cried, O England, repent, repent, beware of Idolatry and false Antichrists! But the Sheriff hindring him to speak any more, he embraced his Fellow Sufferer, and prayed him to be of good comfort, for they should Sup with Christ that night. His last words were, Strait is the way and narrow is the gate that leadeth into eternal Life, and few there be that find it.

Now the Persecution was carried on to other places, Bonner stopping in it again. But Thornton Suffragan of Dover, Harpsfield Arch-Deacon of Canterbury, and some others, resolved likewise to shew their zeal. This Thornton had from the first change made by King Henry been the most officious and forward in every turn; and had been the first in this Reign, that had set up the Mass at Canterbury. He was much despised for it by Cardinal Pool, but Pool could not hinder the fury of those men, without drawing on himself the Pope's indignation. The Pope was his professed and inveterate Enemy: but knew not how to vent his hatred to him, since he had done such an eminent service to the Church, as the reconciling of England. Gardiner understanding this, sent secretly to Rome, to give ill Characters of Pool, which the ill-natured Pope was ready enough to receive. Gardiner designed to be made a Cardinal; and to get Pool recalled, and himself made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury. The Pope was resolved, on the first occasion, to take the Legatine Power from Pool, and give it to Gardiner, but Pool was so much in the Queens favour, that this required some time time to bring it about. This made Gardiner ſtudy to preſerve Cranmer, as long as he lived. It ſeemed more reaſonable to have begun with him, who had indeed been the chief Author of the Reformation, and promoter of that they called Hereſie: nor had Gardiner ſuch kindneſs for him, as to interpoſe on his account; but he knew, that as ſoon as he was burnt, Pool would be preſently inveſted in the See of Canterbury. Therefore he ſuggeſted, that if he could be any way brought off, it would be the moſt effectual means poſſible to extirpate Hereſie: for if he who had ſo much ſet on theſe Doctrines, did forſake them, it would confound the whole Party, and bring over at leaſt all that were weak or ſtaggering; whereas on the other hand, if he dyed reſolutely for it, his death would confirm them all very much. This was a colour good enough to preſerve him. But why the See of Canterbury was not declared vacant, ſince he was now pronounced an obſtinate Heretick, I do not ſo well apprehend: whether there was any thing in the Pall, or the latter inventions of the Canoniſts, that made it neceſſary not to fill his See ſo long as he lived, I know not. Pool being in theſe Circumſtances, durſt neither offend thoſe at Rome, nor openly hinder the proſecution of Hereticks: which it ſeems he would have done more ſteadily, if it had not been for fear of the Popes taking thereby advantages againſt him, who had before given out in the Conclave, that he was a favourer of Hereſie; and therefore would the more eaſily be induced to believe any thing that might be written over to Rome, to his prejudice. 1555.

Some burnt at Canterbury.

Thoſe that ſate in Canterbury to judge the Hereticks, had four Men brought before them, two Prieſts, Bland, and Frankeſh; and Shiterden, and Midleton, two Laymen. They were condemned upon their Anſwers to the Articles exhibited to them, and burnt at Canterbury the 25*th.* of June: and in July, Margery Polley was burnt at Tunbridge on the like account; who was the firſt Woman that ſuffered in this Reign. Chriſtopher Ward was condemned with her, and burnt in Darford. On the 22*d.* of July, Dirick Carver was burnt at Lewis; and on the 23*d.* John Launder was burnt at Stoning. They had been taken in London; and brought before Bonner; but he would not meddle with them, and deſired they might be ſent to their own Ordinaries: One of them being of Surrey was within Gardiners Juriſdiction, who reſolved to proceed no more againſt the Hereticks, ſo he procured a Letter from the Council to Bonner, requiring him to proceed againſt them, who thereupon preſently condemned them.

Pretended Plots, and ſome put to the Torture to make Diſcovery.

There were at this time ſeveral diſcoveries of Plottings in ſeveral Counties, eſpecially in Dorſetſhire, and Eſſex; but the nature of theſe Plots is not ſet down in the Council Books. Some were taken and put in the Tower: Two or three Privy Counſellors were ſent thither on the 9*th.* of June, with a Letter from the Council to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to put them to the Torture, according to their diſcretion: yet nothing following upon this, it is probable theſe were only ſurmiſes deviſed by the Clergy, to ſet on the Council more ſeverely againſt them, whoſe Ruine they were contriving by all the ways they could think on.

There was alſo an outrage committed on two Friars, Peyto and Elſton, who were Franciſcans of the Obſervance. They had ſpoken ſharply against King Henry in the business of the Divorce, and had fled beyond Sea on that account: therefore the Queen had sent for them; and not only procured the Attainder that had passed against them, to be repealed in the last Parliament, but made Peyto her Confessor: and being resolved to raise Religious Houses in England again, she had begun with their Order, the Franciscans of the Observance, and with their House at Greenwich, which was the first that was suppressed; as was shewn in the former Book; and therefore she ordered that to be rebuilt this Summer. So Elston and Peyto going down by water, there were Stones flung at them by some that were a shore in London This the Queen resented highly; so she sent the Lord Treasurer to the Lord Mayor, requiring him to make Proclamation of a Reward to any that should discover those who had done it: but it could not be found out. She ordered all Sir Thomas Mores's Works to be printed together in one Volumn, which were in the Press this Year: and it was given out as an extraordinary thing, that King Edward had died, and she succeeded to the Crown, that very day in which he was beheaded. But in publishing his Works, one piece of Fraud has occurred to me since the former Part was printed. I have seen the Manuscript out of which his Letters were printed, where the Originals of the Letters that he writ to his Daughter, Mris Roper, are; with the Copies of those that he writ to Cromwel. But among these, there is a long Letter concerning the Nun of Kent, in which he speaks fully of her Hypocrisie, and other Villanies. It contains many remarkable passages concerning her, of the high opinion he at first had of her; how he was led into it, and how he was afterwards convinced, "That she was the most false dissembling Hypocrite that had "been known, and guilty of the most detestable Hypocrisie, and de-"vilish dissembled Falshood; and he believed, that she had commu-"cation with an evil Spirit. This Letter was at that time concealed but not destroyed: So I find the Conjecture I made about it, in my former Part, has proved true; though I did not then hope to come by the Letter it self, as I have done since. It seems it was resolved to raise the Credit of that Story; and since the Nun was believed to be both a Martyr and a Prophetess, it is like she might have been easily gotten to be Canoniz'd; and therefore so great a Testimony from such a Man, was not thought fit to be left in her way. The Letter I have put into the Collections.

Rastal published his works, but did not write his Life.

Concerning this Edition of Sir Thomas Mores's Works, I shall recall to the Reader's mind, what was said in the former Part about his Life pretended to be writ by Rastal; was now the publisher of his Works, and so much encouraged in it, that the Queen promoted him soon after to be a Judge; and so it is not likely, that Rastal ever writ any such book, otherwise he had now prefixed it to this Edition. Nor is it probable that the stories which Sanders vented in his Name afterwards concerning Anne Boleyn, or Queen Elizabeth's Birth, were then so much as contrived; otherwise it is not credible, that they should not have been printed at this time; since the Lady Elizabeth being the only object of the fear and jealousy of the Popish Party, was now out of the Queens favour, and a Prisoner: so that we cannot doubt, but all such Stories would have been very acceptable to the Queen, and the Clergy would have taken care to have published them, for the defaming her, and blasting her Title.

An

And therefore these things seem to be afterwards contrived in revenge, when Queen Elizabeth began to proceed severely against that Party, after the many and repeated Conspiracies they had engaged in against her Life. 1555.

But now the Queen resolved to endow so many Religious Houses, as the Revenues of the Church that were in her hands, could maintain: and about that, and some other particulars, she writ some directions to the Council with her own hand, which will be found in the Collections. I have seen two Copies of these that differ a little, but I follow that which seemed to me to be best derived from the Original. She desired, "That those who had Commission to treat with the Cardinal, about the "goods of the Church, might wait on him once a week, to finish that "and some other matters that were to be prepared for the Parliament: "She particularly recommended the care of having good Preaching "encouraged, which she wished might be well looked to; and she ad- "vised a general Visitation both of the Universities and Churches, to "be made, by such as the Cardinal and they should think fit. As for "the punishment of Hereticks, she wished it might not be done rashly; "yet she would have Justice done, on those who by Learning studi- "ed to deceive the simple: but would have it so managed, that the "People might see, they were not condemned but upon just occasions: "and therefore ordered that some of the Council should be present at "all the burnings about London; and that there should be every "where good Sermons at those times: She also verily believed, that "many Benefices should not be in one mans hand; but that every "Priest ought to look to his Cure, and reside upon it. And she looked "on the Pluralities over England, to be a main cause of the want of "good Preachers; whose Sermons if joyned with a good Example would "do much good; and without that, she thought their Sermons would "profit little.

And now I return to the Burnings, from which I am not unwilling frequently to break off, since a continued relation of such things cannot be but an ungrateful entertainment to the Reader. In July one Iuxon was burnt at Chichester: On the 2*d.* of August James Abeys was burnt at Bury in Suffolk. On the 8*th.* of August Denly a Gentleman was burnt at Uxbridge, and Robert Smith at Waybridge. On the 26*th.* George Tankervil was burnt at St. Albans. And on the 28*th.* of August Patrick Packingham also was burnt there: On the 31*st* of August one Newman was burnt at Saffron Walden in Essex, and Robert Samuel a Preacher was burnt at Ipswich. There were also in August, six burnt in one Fire at Canterbury. Elizabeth Warne burnt at Stratford Le Bow, Stephen Whorwood at Stratford, Thomas Fust at Ware, and William Hall at Barnet; but of their Sufferings the days are not marked. In September on the 6*th.* day of the month George Catmer, and four others were burnt at Canterbury. On the 20*th.* Robert Glover a Gentleman, and one Cornelius Bangey were burnt at Coventry: The same month, but we know not on what days, William Allen was burnt at Walsingham, Roger Coo at Stanford, Thomas Cob in Thetford. Thomas Haywood, and John Garaway, at Lichfield were also burnt on the same account. On the 16*th.* of October following, William Woley, and Robert Pigot, were burnt at Ely; where Shaxton, that had been Bishop of Salsbury in King Henry's time, had quitted his Bishoprick on the account of the six Articles, but in the end

More Hereticks burnt.

1555. end of that Reign recanted, and was now Bishop Suffragan of Ely, condemned them. It is enough to have named all these, who were burnt meerly by the Proceedings Ex Officio: for being forced, either to accuse themselves, or to die however, they chose rather plainly to answer those Articles that were ministred to them, and so were condemned for their Answers.

Ridley and Latimer burnt at Oxford.

But on the 16*th*. of October Ridley and Latimer offered up their lives at Oxford, on which it may be expected I should enlarge a little. The Bishops of Lincoln, Gloceſter, and Briſtol, were sent to Oxford by a special Commission from the Cardinal to proceed against them. As soon as Ridley heard they proceeded in the name of the Pope, by Authority from the Cardinal, he put on his Cap, having stood bare headed before that, because he would express no sign of Reverence to those who acted by such a Commission. He said, he payed great respect to the Cardinal as descended from the Royal Family, and a man endued with such Learning and Vertue; that therefore he honoured and reverenced him: but for his Legatine Authority from the Bishop of Rome, he utterly renounced it; and therefore would shew no Reverence to that Character: and so putting off his Cap as he spoke of him on other respects, he put it on again when he named his being Legate; and being required to put it off, refused to do it on that account: but one of the Beadles did it for him. After that the Bishop of Lincoln made him a long exhortation to recant, and acknowledge the See of Rome; since Christ had built his Church on St. Peter, and the Fathers had all acknowledged the preheminence of that See, and himself had been once of that opinion. To which he answered, it was upon the Faith which St. Peter confessed, that Christ had founded his Church; he acknowledged, the Bishop of Rome had been held in great esteem, both for the dignity of the City, and the worthiness of the Bishops that had sate in it; but they were only esteemed Patriarchs of the West; and the Church had not then thought of that Power, to which they had since advanced themselves: he confessed he was once of their mind, but it was as St. Paul had been a Persecutor: he had seen since such spots in the Church of Rome, that he could never return to it. Upon this followed much discourse: In conclusion they objected to him some Articles, about those Opinions which he had maintained a year and an half before that, in the Schools; and required him to make his Answers to them. He began with a Protestation that by answering them he did not acknowledge the Popes Authority, and then answered them as he had done before. Latimer used the same Protestation, and Answers. So they were allowed one nights respite to consider better, whether they would recant or not; but next day they appearing, and adhering to the Answers they had made, were declared obstinate Hereticks, and ordered to be degraded, and so delivered over to the Secular Power.

After that, new attempts were made on Ridley to perswade him to accept of the Queens Mercy; but all being to no purpose, the Writ was sent down to burn them. The night before the Execution, Ridley was very joyful, and invited the Major and his Wife, in whose House he was kept, to be at his Wedding next day: at which when the Major's Wife wept, he said, he perceived she did not love him: but he told her, though their breakfast would be sharp, he was sure his Supper would be sweet: he was glad to hear that his Sister would come, and see him dye: and was in such composure of mind, that they were all amazed at it. Next morning being the 16th. they were led out to the place of Execution, which was before Baliol Colledge: they looked up to the Prison to have seen Cranmer; but he was then engaged in Dispute with some Friars, so that he was not in his Window; but he looked after them with great tenderness, and kneeling down prayed earnestly, that God would strengthen their Faith and Patience in that their last but painful passage. When they came to the Stake, they embraced one another with great affection, Ridley saying to Latimer, Be of good heart, Brother, for God will either asswage the fury of the Flame, or enable us to abide it. Doctor Smith was appointed to Preach, and took his Text from these words, If I give my Body to be burnt, and have no Charity, it profiteth nothing. He compared their dying for Heresie, to Judas's hanging himself; and warned the People to beware of them, with as much bitterness as he could express. The best of it was, the Sermon lasted not above a quarter of an hour. When he had done, Ridley was going to answer him; and the Lord Williams, that was appointed by the Queen to see the Execution, was inclined to hear him: but the Vice-Chancellor said, except he intended to recant, he was not to be suffered to speak. Ridley answered, "He "would never deny his Lord, nor those Truths of his of which he was "perswaded; God's Will be done in him: He committed himself to "God, who would indifferently judge all. Then he addressed himself to the Lord Williams, and said, "Nothing troubled him so much, as that "he had received Fines of some, who took Leases of him when he was "Bishop of London; and these Leases were now voided: He therefore "humbly prayed, that the Queen would give order, that those might be made good to the Tenants, or that the Fines might be restored out of his Goods which he had left in his House, and were of far greater value than those Fines would amount to; and that some pity might be had of Shipside his Brother in Law, who was turned out of a place he had put him in, and had now attended on him with great care. Then they both prayed and fitted themselves for the Stake: Latimer saying to Ridley, "Be of good comfort, we shall this day light such a Candle in England, as I trust by God's Grace shall never be put out. Then Gunpowder being hanged about their Bodies in great quantities to hasten their death, the Fire was put to, and Latimer was with the first Flame; he Powder taking fire, put out of pain, and dyed immediately. But Ridley had a more lingring Torment, for they threw on the fire so much wood, that the Flame could not break through it; so that his Legs were almost consumed before this was observed, and then, one opening the passage to the Flame, it put an end to his Life.

Thus dyed these two excellent Bishops: the one for his Piety, Learning, and solid Judgement, the ablest Man of all that advanced the Reformation; and the other for the plain simplicity of his Life, esteemed truly primitive Bishop and Christian. Of his care of his Bishoprick, the Instructions he gave at his Visitation, chiefly of the Monasteries, will give a good evidence: and therefore I have put them in the Collection, Col. Numb. 23. they were copied from the Register of Worcester, by that ingenious and worthy Counsellor Mr. Summers; who out of his Zeal to the Reformation, searched all the Books there, that he might gather from them such 1555. ſuch things as he thought could be of uſe to this Work. Bonner had made an ill Retribution to Ridley, for the kindneſs he had ſhewed his Friends when he was in poſſeſſion at London: for he had made Boner's Mother always dine with him, when he lived in his Country-Houſe at Fulham, and treated her as if ſhe had been his own Mother; beſides his kindneſs to his other Friends. Heath, then Biſhop of Worceſter, had been kept Priſoner a Year and a half in Ridley's Houſe, where he lived as if he had been at his own; and Heath uſed always to call him the beſt learned of all the Party: yet he ſo far forgot gratitude and humanity, that though he went through Oxford when he was a Priſoner there, he came not to ſee him. When they lay in the Tower, both Cranmer and they were, by reaſon of the number of Priſoners, put into one Chamber for ſome months; but after they came to Oxford, they could ſcarce find Meſſages to one another: and men had laid off humanity ſo much, that all the while they lay there none of the Univerſity waited on them: few that favoured their Doctrine were then left, and of the reſt it was no wonder that none came to viſit them; nor did they ſupply them with any thing they needed: for all the Charity that was ſent to them came from London.

This Summer there was a ſtrict ſearch made after all the Goods of the Church, that had been embezelled: and all that had been Viſiters, either in King Henry or King Edward's time, were brought into Suits about it, and many compounded, and ſo purchaſed their quiet, by an offer to the Church of ſome large Gratuity: and according to the greatneſs thereof their affection to the Church was meaſured. Many of thoſe did favour the Reformation, which made them give the more bountifully, that ſo they might come under good Characters, and be the leſs ſuſpected.

Suits about the Spoils of Churches.

The Parliament was opened on the 21*ſt.* of October. The Chancellor came thither, both then, and on the 23*d.* but could come no more. It was reported, that he had ſtayed long for dinner, that day that Ridley and Latimer were to be burnt, till one ſhould bring him word, that the fire was ſet to them: but the Meſſenger coming Poſt, did not reach London till four a Clock in the afternoon, and that he then went out faſting to dine; but was at Dinner ſtruck with the illneſs, of which he died. It was a ſuppreſſion of Urine, which held him till the 12th of November, on which he died. He had great remorſe for his former and Day Biſhop of Chicheſter coming to him, and comforting him in the aſſurance of Juſtification through the Blood of Chriſt; he anſwered him, "He might ſpeak of that to him or others in his condition; "if he opened that gap again, and preached that to the People, then "well all together. He often repeated thoſe words, Erravi cum Petro, "non flevi cum Petro, I have erred with Peter, but I have not mourned "with him. He was of a nobler deſcent than is commonly known. For though he took the name Gardiner from his ſuppoſed Father, yet he was then believed to be the baſe ſon of Richard Woodvil, that was Brother to Queen Elizabeth, Wife to King Edward the 4*th*: ſo that he was Uncle to King Henry the 8*th.* in the ſecond and third degree of Conſanguinity, which might be the cauſe that he was ſo ſuddenly advanced to the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter. This is mentioned by Sir Edward Hoby, in a Letter he writ to one of thoſe that had fled beyond Sea, giving him an account of his Death: where he ſays of him, he was a Man of high deſcent than he was commonly reputed; and on the Margent it is ſaid, he was Nephew to a Queen of England. This explains that which I find objected both to him and Bonner in one of the Books that were written in the defence of the married Clergy; that no wonder they were ſuch enemies to Marriage, ſince both of them were born in Adultery. He was a Man well skill'd in the Canon and Civil Laws, and moderately in Divinity. He had a good Stile in Latin, and underſtood the Greek well; but his ſtrength lay in deep diſſimulation, a quickneſs of apprehenſion, a great proſpect of affairs, a cloſe and artificial way of concealing his mind, and inſinuating himſelf into the affections and confidences of other perſons. He did comply all Henry the 8*th*'s time; and would willingly have done the like in King Edwards time, but that Cranmer knew him too well to be directed by him, and handled him as he deſerved. But the uſage he then met with, ſo recovered him with Queen Mary, that ſhe put him in the greateſt Truſts; and now, when a Cardinals Hat was like to fall on his Head, he was carried off, and all his ambitious Projects fell with him. Of his ſervile compliance in promoting King Henries Divorce, I have found freſh Inſtances, beſides thoſe that are mentioned in the former Volume. When he went to Rome, in the Year 1529. Anne Boleyn writ a very kind Letter to him, which I have put in the Collection. By it the Reader will clearly perceive that he was then in the ſecret of the Kings deſigning to marry her, as ſoon as the Divorce was obtained. There is another particular in that Letter, which corrects a Conjecture which I ſet down in the beginning of the former Book, concerning the Cramp-Rings that were bleſſed by King Henry; which I thought might have been done by him after he was declared Head of the Church. That part was printed before I ſaw this Letter; But this Letter ſhews they were uſed to be bleſſed before the Separation from Rome; for Anne Boleyn ſent them as great Preſents thither. The uſe of them had been (it ſeems) diſcontinued in King Edwards time; but now under Queen Mary it was deſigned to be revived; and the Office for it was written out in a fair Manuſcript, yet extant; of which I have put a Copy of it in the Collection. But the ſilence in the Writers of that time makes me think it was ſeldom, if ever practiſed. But to return to Gardiners officious compliance in the matter of the Divorce, I have put in the Collection a Letter of his to King Henry, written in ſuch confidence to him, that even Cardinal Woolſey was not to ſee it. In it he ſets out the Popes timorouſneſs ſo plainly, that he writes he ſaw nothing but the fear he was in of the Emperors Forces, kept him from granting what was deſired; therefore he adviſed the King to do the buſineſs once in England, and then leave it to the Emperor to complain; not doubting but he would be put off by as many Delays as were now uſed in the Kings buſineſs.

Heath Archbiſhop of York had the Seals in February after; they having been during that interval, in the hands of Sir Nicholas Hare, then Maſter of the Rolls; and he was made Chancellor during the Queens pleaſure. The Queen alſo, conſidering that Whitehall had been taken from the See of York, had a ſcruple in her Conſcience againſt living in it; but Heath and ſhe agreed it thus: Suffolk-Place by the Duke's Attainder, was now in the Queens hands; ſo ſhe gave that to the See of York, which Heath ſold, and converted it to Tenements, and purchaſed another Houſe near

The temper of the Parliament is much changed.

But for the Parliament, it was now much changed; Mens minds were much alienated from the Clergy, and also from the Queen, who minded nothing else but to raise them to great wealth and power again. On the 28*th.* of October it was moved in the House of Commons to give a Subsidy, and two Fifteenths, for paying the Debts of the Crown, but it was opposed with great vehemence. It was said, that the Queen had profusely given away the Riches of the Crown, and then turned to the Laity to pay her Debts: why did she not rather turn it to the Spiritualty? But it was answered, that the Convocation had given her a Subsidy of six shillings in the pound; and the Queen asked now, after almost three years Reign, nothing but what she had discharged her Subjects of, at her first coming to the Crown. Yet the heats grew such that on the 1*st.* of November Secretary Petre brought a Message from her, that she thanked them that had moved for two Fifteenths for her, but she refused it: so the Subsidy was agreed on. On the 29th of November the Queen sent for the House of Commons. When they were come, she said to them, she could not with a good Conscience take the Tenths and First-fruits of Spiritual Benefices: It was a Tax her Father laid on the Clergy, to support his Dignity of Supream Head; of which since she was devested, she would also discharge that. Then the Legate made a Speech to shew that Tithes and Impropriations of Spiritual Benefices were the Patrimony of the Church; and ought to return to it. The Queen upon that, declared, that she would surrender them up likewise to the Church. Then one Story of the House of Commons kneeled down, and said to the Queen, That the Speaker did not open to her their Desire that Licences might be restrained. This was a great Affront to the Speaker; so he returning to the House, complained of Story. This Member thought he might assume more liberty; for in Edward the 6th's time, when the Bill for the first Book of the English Service passed, he spoke so freely against it, with such reflections on the King and the Protector, that he was put in the Serjeants hands, and sent to the Tower.

The Queen discharges the Clergy of Tenths and First-fruits.

Eccles. 10. 16. The words he had said, were, Wo unto thee O England, when thy King is a Child; and an Impeachment was drawn against him. But upon his Submission, the House ordered the Privy Councellors to declare to the Protector, that it was their Resolution that he should be enlarged, and the desired that they King would forgive his Offence against him and his Council: now he had indiscreetly appeared against all Licences from Rome, thinking he had a priviledge to talk more freely; but he confessed his fault, and the House, knowing that he spake from a good zeal, forgave him. He was afterwards condemned for Treason in Queen Elizabeths Reign.

Journ. Dom. Com.

On the 23*d.* of November, the Bill for suppressing the First-Fruits and Tenths, and the resigning up all Impropriations, that were yet in the Queens Gift to the Church, to be disposed of as the Legate pleased for the relief of the Clergy, was brought into the House. It was once thought fit to have the surrender of Impropriations left out: for it was said, the Queen might do that as well by Letters Patents; and if it were put into the Bill, it would raise great Jealousies; since it would be understood, that the Queen did expect that the Subjects should follow her example; but it was resolved, by all means possible, to recover the

Tithes

Tithes to the Church; ſo it was put into the Bill. It was long argued; ſome ſaid, the Clergy would rob the Crown, and the Nation both: and that the Laity muſt then ſupport the Dignity of the Realm. It was particularly committed to Sir William Cecil and others, to be examined by them. On the 13*th.* of December the Houſe divided about it, 126 were againſt it, and 193 were for it. 1555.

There was a Bill ſent down againſt the Counteſs of Suſſex, who had left her Husband, and gone into France, where ſhe lived openly in Adultery, and bare Children to others. A Bill was put in, to the ſame purpoſe, in the firſt Parliament of this Reign, to take her Jointure from her, and declare her Children Baſtards; and was then caſt out by the Commons; and had now again the ſame fate. Another Bill was put in againſt the Dutcheſs of Suffolk and others, who had gone beyond Sea, to require them to return, under ſevere puniſhments: but though it was agreed to by the Lords, yet, upon a diviſion of the Houſe of Commons, it was carried in the Negative. The greateſt and wealthieſt of thoſe who favoured the Reformation, ſeeing in how ill a condition they muſt be in, if they ſtayed in England, were gone beyond Sea: ſo it was now endeavoured to force them to return, or to make them loſe their Eſtates: but the Commons thought they had already conſented to too ſevere Laws againſt them, and therefore would add no more. The Dutcheſs of Suffolk had been perſecuted while ſhe was in the Netherlands, but narrowly eſcaped. Another Bill was put in, for the incapacitating of ſeveral perſons from being Juſtices of Peace; but was caſt out by the Commons at the firſt reading. This was chiefly againſt ſuch as were ſuſpected of remiſſneſs in the proſecuting of Hereticks: but the Commons would do nothing to encourage that; nor was it neceſſary, ſince it was in the Queens power to leave out of the Commiſſion ſuch as ſhe excepted to: but it ſhewed the Zeal of ſome, who had a mind to recommend themſelves by ſuch motions.

Againſt thoſe that had fled beyond Sea, rejected.

There was a Complaint put into the Houſe of Commons, by the Wife of one Rufford againſt Bennet Smith, who had hired two Perſons to kill her Husband: and which, as the Act paſſed about it ſays, was one of the moſt deteſtable Murders that had ever been known in England. But Smith that had hired, and afterwards paid the Murderers, might by the Law claim, and have the benefit of Clergy. It is, and hath been an ancient cuſtom in this Nation, that for ſome Crimes, thoſe who can read, are not to ſuffer Death. This was at firſt done with a Declaration, that either they had vowed, or were then reſolved to enter into Orders; which was the cauſe that no Bigami, that is, none that had been twice married, or ſuch as married Widows, were capable of it; becauſe ſuch could not receive Orders: and the Reading was only to ſhew that they were in ſome ſort qualified for Orders: though afterwards, the Reading, without any ſuch Vow or Promiſe, was all that was required, to give one the benefit of Clergy. This was granted as an Appendix of the Eccleſiaſtical Immunity; for the Churchmen were not ſatisfied that their own Perſons ſhould be exempted from puniſhment, but would needs have all that reſolved to come among them, be likewiſe preſerved from the puniſhment due to thoſe Crimes, which they had formerly committed. So Rufford's Wife petitioning, that Smith might by Act of Parliament be debarred that benefit; they ſent her to the Queen, to beg,

An Act debarring one from the benefit of Clergy.

1555. That she would order Smith to be brought from the Tower, where he was then kept, to the Bar of their House: which being done, the other Partners and Actors confessed all: and though he at first denied, yet he afterwards confessed. So the Bill was sent up by the Commons to the Lords, where it was much opposed by the Clergy; who would not consent that any diminution should be made of their ancient Priviledges: but the heinousness of the Fact wrought so much on the greater part, that it was passed; The Earls of Arundel and Rutland, the Bishops of London, Worcester, Norwich, and Bristol, the Lords Abergavenny, Fitzwater, and Lumley, protesting. Pates was now Bishop of Worcester, upon Heath's translation to York. He was (as some say) designed to be Bishop of that See by King Henry upon Latimer's Resignation; but being ingaged in a correspondence with the Pope and Cardinal Pool, he fled beyond Sea. But the truth is, that upon the Death of Jerome de Ghinuci, he was at Rome made Bishop of Worcester by the Pope, and was thereupon Attainted: But his Attainder had been repealed by the former Parliament, and so he was restored to that See.

Sir Anthony Kingston put in the Tower for his behaviour in the House of Commons Ex Lib. Concil.

On the 9th. of December the Parliament was dissolved. And the day following Sir Anthony Kingston, who had been a main Stickler in it, and had one day taken the Keys of the House from the Serjeant; which (it seems) was not displeasing to the major part of the House, since they did nothing upon it; was sent to the Tower: and that same day, (as it is in the Council Books) the Bishop of Ely delivered to the Lord Treasurer the Popes Bull, confirming the King and Queens Title to Ireland; bearing date the 7th. of June. Kingston lay in the Tower till the 23d. of the month, and then he submitted, and asked pardon, and was discharged. But he was next year accused to have engaged in a Design with some others, to have robbed the Exchequer of 50000 l. Whereupon six of them, Udal, Throgmorton, Petham, Daniel, Stanton, and White, were executed for Felony. What Evidence was brought against them I do not know. But Kingston died on his way to London.

Card. Pool in Convocation makes Canons for Reforming the Clergy. Rot. Pat. 1*st.* Par. 3. Reg.

From the Parliament I turn next to the Convocation, where the Cardinal was now at more liberty, being delivered from Gardiner's Jealousies and Opposition. He obtained of the Queen on the 2d. of November a Warrant under the great Seal, giving him Licence to hold a Synod. The Licence he had formerly taken out, is made mention of: and to avoid all ambiguities, which might arise from the Laws or Prerogatives of the Crown, she authorised him to call that, or any other Synod after, and to decree what Canons he should think fit: she also authorised the Clergy, to meet, consent to, and obey those Canons without any danger of the Law. This was thought safe on both sides; both for preserving the Rights of the Crown, and securing the Clergy from being afterwards brought within the statute of Premunire, as they had been upon their acknowledging Cardinal Woolseys Legantine power. To this Convocation Pool proposed a Book he had prepared, which was afterwards printed with the Title of The Reformation of England by the Decree of Cardinal Pool; and is now put into the Volumes of the Councils.

The Heads of Pools Reformation.

The first Decree is, that there should be constantly a remembrance of the Reconciliation now made with Rome, in every Mass: besides, a Procession, with other Solemnities, on the Anniversary of it. He also confirmed confirmed the Conſtitutions of Otho, and Otho bonus, forbidding the reading of all Heretical Books; and ſet forth the Catholick Faith, in the words of that Expoſition of it, which P. Eugenius ſent from the Council of Florence to thoſe of Armenia. 1555.

The 2*d.* was, for the careful adminiſtring and preſerving of the Sacraments; and for the putting away of all Feaſting in the Feſtivities of the Dedications of Churches.

The 3*d.* exhorts the Biſhops to lay aſide all ſecular Cares, and give themſelves wholly to the Paſtoral Office; and to reſide in their Dioceſs, under the higheſt pains. Their Canons are alſo required to reſide, and alſo other Clergy Men. All Pluralities of Benefices with Cure, are ſimply condemned: and thoſe who had more Benefices with Cure, were required within two months to reſign all, but one: otherwiſe it was to be declared that they had forfeited them all.

The 4*th.* is, that whereas the reſidence of Biſhops could not be of great uſe, unleſs they became truly Paſtors to their Flock; which was chiefly done by their preaching the Word of God; that had been, contrary to the Apoſtles Practice, much neglected by many: therefore he requires them to preach every Sunday or Holy day; or if they were diſabled, to find other fit Perſons to do it. And they were alſo in private to inſtruct and exhort their People; and all the other inferior Clergy; and to endeavour to perſwade them to the Catholick Faith; or if need were, to uſe threatnings. And becauſe of the great want of good Preachers, the Cardinal declared he would take care there ſhould be Homilies ſet out, for the inſtruction of the Nation. In the mean while, every Biſhop was to be ſending ſuch as were more eminent in preaching, over their Dioceſs, thereby to ſupply the defects of the reſt.

The 5*th.* is, about the lives of the Biſhops; that they ſhould be moſt ſtrict and exemplary: that they ſhould lay aſide all Pride and Pomp; ſhould not be cloathed in Silk, nor have rich Furniture; and have frugal Tables, not above three or four diſhes of Meat; and even ſo many he rather allows, conſidering the preſent time, than approves: that at their Table, the Scriptures, or other good Books, ſhould be read, mixed with pious diſcourſes: that they ſhould not have too great numbers of Servants or Horſes: but that this Parſimony might appear not to flow from Avarice, they were to lay out the reſt of their Revenues on the Poor, and for breeding young Scholars, and other works of Piety. All the ſame Rules he ſets to the inferior Clergy, with a due proportion to their Stations and Profits.

The 6*th.* is, about giving Orders; They were not to be raſhly given, but upon a ſtrict previous Examen. Every one that was to be Ordained, was to give in his Name a long time before, that there might be time to inquire carefully about him. The Biſhops were charged not to turn over the Examination upon others, and think their work was only to lay on their hands: but were to examine diligently themſelves, and not ſuperficially. And to call to their aſſiſtance ſuch as they knew to be pious and learned, and in whom they might confide.

The 7*th.* was, about conferring Benefices, which in ſome ſort came alſo within that charge, Lay hands ſuddenly on no Man. They were to lay aſide all partiality in their choice, and ſeek out the moſt deſerving: and to make ſuch as they put in Benefices bind themſelves by Oath to reſide.

The

1555. The 8th. was, againſt giving the Advouſons of Benefices before they were vacant.

The 9th. was about Simony.

The 10th. againſt the Alienations of any of the Goods of the Church.

The 11th. was, that in every Cathedral there ſhould be a Seminary for ſupplying the Dioceſs: of whom two Ranks were to be made; the one of thoſe who learned Grammar; the other, of thoſe who were grown up, and were to be ordained Acholyths; and theſe were to be trained up in Study and Vertue, till they were fit to ſerve in the Church. And a Tax of the fourth penny was laid on the Clergy for their maintenance.

The 12th. was about Viſitations.

Theſe were all finiſhed, agreed to, and publiſhed by him in February next Year.

In theſe Decrees mention is made of Homilies, which were intended to be publiſhed: and among Archbiſhop Parker's Papers, I find, the Scheme he had of them was thus laid: He deſigned four Books of Homilies. The firſt, of the controverted points, for preſerving the People from Error: 2d. The for the Expoſition of the Creed, and ten Commandments, the Lords Prayer, the Salutation of the Virgin, and the Sacraments: The 3d. was to be for the Saints days, and the Sundays and Holy days of the year; for explaining the Epiſtles and Goſpels: and the fourth was concerning Vertues and Vices, and the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church.

Ex Manuſcr. Col. C. C. Cant.

Pool's Deſigns for Reforming the Church.

By all theſe it may appear, how well tempered this Cardinal was. He never ſet on the Clergy to perſecute Hereticks, but to reform themſelves: as well knowing, that a ſtrict exemplary Clergy can ſoon overcome all Oppoſition whatſoever, and bear down even truth it ſelf. For the common People are generally either ſo ignorant, or ſo diſtracted with other affairs, that they ſeldom enter into any exact diſcuſſion of ſpeculative points, that are Diſputed among divines: but take up things upon general notions and prejudices; and none have more influence on them, than the ſcandals or ſtrict lives of Church-men. So that Pool intending to correct all thoſe, laid down good Rules, to amend their lives, to throw out thoſe crying ſcandals of Pluralities and Non-reſidence; to oblige Biſhops to be exact in their Examinations before Orders, and in conferring Benefices on the moſt deſerving, and not to be biaſſed by partial affections. In this laſt thing himſelf was a great Example. For though he had an only Brother, (ſo I find him called in one of the Cardinals Commiſſions to him with ſome others, though I believe he was a Baſtard Brother) David, that had continued all King Henry's time in his Arch-Deaconry of Darby; he, either to puniſh him for his former compliance, or to ſhew he had no mind to raiſe his kindred, did not advance him, till after he had been two years in England: and then he gave him only the Biſhoprick of Peterborough, one of the pooreſt of the Biſhopricks; which conſidering his nearneſs to the Crown, and high Birth, was a very ſmall preferment. But above all, that Deſign of his, to have Seminaries in every Cathedral for the planting of the Dioceſs, ſhews what a wiſe proſpect he had of the right methods of recovering a Church, which was overrun, as he judged, with Hereſie. It was the ſame that Cranmer had formerly deſigned; but never took effect.

Certainly

Certainly, Perſons formed from their Childhood, with others Notions, and another method of living, muſt be much better fitted for a holy Character, than thoſe that have lived in the pleaſures and follies of the world; who, unleſs a very extraordinary change is wrought in them, ſtill keep ſome of their old Cuſtoms about them, and ſo fall ſhort of that gravity and decency, that becomes ſo Spiritual a Function. 1555.

He ſhewed the weakneſs of his Spirit in one thing, that being againſt Cruel Proceedings with Hereticks, he did not more openly profeſs it: but both ſuffered the other Biſhops to go on, and even in Canterbury, now ſequeſtred in his hands, and ſoon after put under his care, he left thoſe poor men to the Cruelties of the brutal and fierce Popiſh Clergy. In this he was to be pitied, that he had not courage enough to contend with ſo haughty a Pope as Paul the 4*th*. was: who thought of no other way of bearing down Hereſie, but by ſetting up the Inquiſition every where: ſo Pool, it ſeems, judged it ſufficient for him, not to act himſelf, nor to ſet on any; and thought he did enough, when he diſcouraged it in private; but yet he granted Commiſſions to the other Biſhops and Arch-Deacons to proceed againſt thoſe called Hereticks. He was not only afraid of being diſcharged of his Legation, and of loſing the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, which was now ready to fall upon him; but he feared to be ſent for to Rome, and cruelly uſed by the Pope, who remembred all the Quarrels he formerly had with any of the Cardinals, and put Cardinal Merone (that was Pool's great Friend) in Priſon, upon ſuſpition of Hereſie. All theſe things prevailed with Pool to give way to the Perſecution; and it was thought, that he himſelf haſtned the Execution of Cranmer, longing to be inveſted with that See; which is the only perſonal blemiſh I find laid on him.

One remarkable thing of him was, his not liſtening to the Propoſition the Jeſuits made him, of bringing them into England. That Order had been ſet up about twelve years before this, and was in its firſt Inſtitution chiefly deſigned for propagating the Doctrines of that Church in Heretical or Infidel Countries; to which was afterwards added, the Education of Children. It was not eaſily allowed of at Rome, becauſe the Biſhops did univerſally complain of the great numbers of exempted Regulars; and therefore at firſt it was limited to a ſmall number; which Reſtriction was ſoon taken off. They, beſides the Vows of other Orders took one, for a blind and univerſal Obedience to the See of Rome: And becauſe they were much to be imployed, they were diſpenced with, as to the hours of the Quire, which made them be called a Mungrel Order between the Regulars and Seculars. They have ſince that time, by their care in educating Youth, by their indefatigable Induſtry, and chiefly by their Accommodating Pennances, and all the other Rules of Religion, to the Humors and Inclinations of thoſe who confeſs their Sins to them, drawn almoſt all the World after them: and are raiſed now to that heighth both of Wealth and Power, that they are become the Objects of the Envy and Hatred of all the reſt of their own Church. They ſuggeſted to Pool, That whereas the Queen was reſtoring the Goods of the Church that were in her hands, it was but to little purpoſe to raiſe up the old Foundations; for the Benedictine Order was become rather a Clog than a Help to the Church: they therefore deſired that thoſe Houſes might be aſſigned to them, for maintaining Schools and Semi-1555. Seminaries, which they should set on quickly: and they did not doubt but by their dealing with the Consciences of those who were a dying, they should soon recover the greatest part of the Goods of the Church. The Jesuits were out of measure offended with him, for not entertaining their Proposition; which I gather from an Italian Manuscript which my most worthy Friend Mr. Crawford found in Venice, when he was Chaplain there to Sir Thomas Higgins, His Majesties Envoy to that Republick: but how it came that this motion was laid aside, I am not able to judge.

There passed nothing else remarkable this Year, but that in the end of November, John Web a Gentleman, George Roper, and Gregory Parker were burnt all at one Stake in Canterbury. And on the 18*th*. of December, Philpot, that had disputed in the Convocation, was burnt in Smithfield. He was, at the end of that meeting, put in Prison for what he had said in it; though liberty of Speech had been promised; and the nature of the meeting did require it. He was kept long in the Stocks in the Bishop of London's Coal-house, and many conferences were had with him, to perswade him to change. By what Bonner said in one of them it appears that he hoped they should be better used upon Gardiner's death: for Bonner told him, he thought, because the Lord Chancellor was dead, they would burn no more; but he should soon find his Error, if he did not recant. He continued stedfast in his perswasion, and pleaded that he had never spoken nor written against their Law, since they were made, being all the while a Prisoner, except what he had said in Conference with them: yet this prevailed not with Bonner, who had as little Justice as Mercy in his temper. On the 16*th*. of December he was condemned, and delivered to the Sheriffs. He was at first laid in Irons, because he was so poor that he could not fee the Jaylour; but next day, these were by the Sheriffs order taken off. As he was led into Smithfield on the 18*th*. he kneeled down, and said, I will pay my Vows in thee O Smithfield. When he was brought to the Stake, he said, Shall I disdain to suffer at this Stake, since my Redeemer did not refuse to suffer on the Cross for me? He repeated the 106*th*, 107*th*, and 108*th*. Psalms, and then fitted himself for the Fire, which consumed him to Ashes. So this year ended, in which there were sixty seven burnt for Religion; and of those, four were Bishops, and thirteen were Priests.

Philpots Martyrdom.

Forreign Affairs. In Germany a Diet was held at Ausburg, where the Peace of Germany was fully setled: and it was decreed, that the Princes of the Austrian Confession should have the free liberty of their Religion; and that every Prince might in his own State establish what Religion he pleased; excepting only the Ecclesiastical Princes, who were to forfeit their benefices if they turned. Those of Austria, and Ferdinand's other Hereditary Dominions, desired freedom for their Consciences: but Ferdinand refused it; yet he appointed the Chalice to be given in the Sacrament. The Duke of Bavaria did the like in his Dominions. At all this the Pope was highly offended, and talked of deposing Ferdinand. He had nothing so much in his mouth, as the Authority former Popes had exercised, in deposing Princes at their pleasure. He had sworn to the Cardinals, before he was chosen, that he would make but four Cardinals in two years; but he created seven within one half year, and would would not hear the Conſiſtory argue againſt it, or remember him of his Promiſe; but ſaid, his Power was abſolute, and could not be limited. One of theſe Cardinals was Gropper the Dean of Colen, a man of great Learning and Vertues, but inconſtant and fearful, as was ſhewn in the former Book: he refuſed to accept of that Dignity ſo generally ſought after in their Church; and was more eſteemed for rejecting it, than others were that had by their Ambition aſpired to it. 1556.

Charles the 5*th*'s Reſignation.

In the end of this year, and the beginning of the next, a memorable thing fell out; of which if I give a large account, I do not fear to be much cenſured by the Reader for it; eſpecially ſince it is not impertinent to this work, the King and Queen being ſo much concerned in it. It was Charles, the 5*ths*. laying down, firſt, ſome of his hereditary Dominions in October this year; and the reſt, with the Empire, not long after. He had now enjoyed, the one, forty years, and the other thirty ſix. He was much diſabled by the Gout, which had held him, almoſt conſtantly, for ſeveral years: he had been in the greateſt Fatigues that ever any Prince had undergone, ever ſince the 17*th*. year of his age: he had gone, nine times into Germany, ſix times into Spain, ſeven times into Italy, four times into France; had been ten times in the Netherlands, had made two Expeditions into Africk, and been twice in England, and had croſſed the Seas eleven times. He had not only been a Conqueror in all his Wars, but had taken a Pope, a King of France, and ſome Princes of Germany Priſoners, beſides a vaſt acceſſion of Wealth and Empire from the Weſt-Indies. But he now growing out of love with the Pomp and Greatneſs of the World, began to have more ſerious thoughts of another Life; which were much encreaſed in him, by the anſwer one of his Captains gave him, when he deſired leave to retire, and being asked the reaſon, ſaid, that between the affairs of the World, and the hour of death, there ought to be ſome interval. He found his fortune turned: his Deſigns in Germany were blaſted: In the Siege of Mets, he ſaw he could no more command Triumphs to wait on him; for though his Army conſiſted of 100000 Men, yet he was forced to raiſe his Siege with the loſs of 40000 Men: and though his Wars had been this year more ſucceſsful, both in Italy and Flanders, yet he thought he was too old to deal with the King of France. It was thought, his Son ſet this forward; who had left England in diſcontent; being weary both of his Queen, and of holding a titular Crown, only in her Right, being excluded from the Government. All theſe things concurring, made the Emperor in a ſolemn Aſſembly at Bruſſels on the 25*th*. of October in the preſence of his Son, and Maximilian King of Boheme, and of the Duke of Savoy, and his two Siſters the Queens Dowagers of France and Hungary, with a vaſt number of others of lower quality, firſt give his Son the Golden Fleece, and ſo reſign the headſhip of that Order to him; and then, the Dukedoms of Burgundy, and Brabant, and the other Provinces of the Netherlands. Two months after that, he reſigned all his other Hereditary Dominions: and the next year, he ſent a Reſignation of the Empire to the Diet, who thereupon did chooſe his Brother Ferdinand Emperor; to which the Pope made great exceptions; for he ſaid, the Reſignation ought to have been only to him, and that being made as 1556. it was, it was null; and upon that he would not acknowledge the new Emperor.

Charles ſtaid ſometime in Flanders in a private Houſe. For he left all his Palaces; and had but little company about him. It is ſaid, that when Seld his Brother's Secretary, being ſent to him, was leaving him once late at night, all the Candles on the Stairs being burnt out, and none waiting to light him down, the late Emperor would needs carry the Candle down after him: the other, as may be well imagined, being much confounded at it, the Emperor told him, He was now a private Man; and his Servants knowing there was nothing now to be had by attending, did not wait carefully. He bad him tell his Brother what a change he had ſeen in him, and how vain a thing the attendance of Courtiers was; ſince he was ſo ſoon forſaken by his own Servants. He reſerved but 100000 Crowns a year for his own uſe and ſixty Servants. But at his coming into Spain, he found even that ſmall Penſion was not readily payed; at which he was obſerved to be much diſpleaſed. He retired to a place in the Confines of Caſtile and Portugal, which he had obſerved in his Hunting to be fit for a retreat, by reaſon of the pleaſantneſs of the Situation, and the temperateneſs of the Air: and there he had ordered a little Apartment of ſeven Rooms fourteen foot ſquare, to be built for him. He kept only twelve ſervants about himſelf and ſent the reſt to ſtay in the neighbouring Towns.

He gave himſelf at firſt much to mechanical Curioſities, and had great varieties of Clocks, and ſome other motions, which ſurpriſed the ignorant Monks, who were afraid they were the performances of Magick; eſpecially his Machines of Birds of wood that did fly out and come back, and the repreſentations of Armies, that by Springs engaged and fought. He alſo deſigned that great work of carrying the Tago up a Hill near Toledo; which was afterwards done at a vaſt charge. He gave himſelf to Gardening, and uſed to Graft and Imp with his own hand: and keeping but one Horſe, rid abroad ſome times, attended only by a Footman.

The making of Clocks was not then ſo perfect, as it is ſince: ſo that he could never bring his Clocks to ſtrike in the ſame minute; and he uſed upon that to ſay, he ſaw the Folly of endeavouring to bring all Men to be of the ſame mind in Religion, ſince he could not bring Machines to agree exactly.

He ſet himſelf alſo much to ſtudy; and in the ſecond year of his retirement, went oftner to the Chappel, and to the Sacrament, than he had done at firſt: He uſed alſo to Diſcipline himſelf, with a Cord which, after his death, having ſome marks of the ſeverity he had put himſelf to, was laid up among his Sons chiefeſt Rarities. But with all this, it was believed he became in moſt points to be of the belief of the Proteſtants, before he died: and as his Confeſſor was burnt afterwards for Hereſie, ſo Miranda the Archbiſhop of Toledo, who uſed to come often to him, was upon the ſame ſuſpitions kept long in Priſon. Near the end of two years, at the Anniverſary of his Mother's Funeral, who had died but a few years before, having lived long after, he took a conceit, that he would ſee an Obit made for himſelf, and would have his own Funeral Rites performed; to which he came himſelf himself with the rest of the Monks, and prayed most devoutly for the Rest of his own Soul; which set all the Company on weeping. Two days after, he sickned of a Feaver, of which he died on the 21*st.* of September 1558. A rare and great instance of a mind surfeited with the Pomps and Glories of the World, seeking for that Quiet in retirement, which he had long in vain searched after in Palaces and Camps. 1556.

Cranmer's Tryal.

And now I return to the Affairs of England. The 21*st.* of March was Cranmer brought to the end of all his Afflictions, and received his Crown. On the 12*th.* of September the former year, Brooks Bishop of Gloucester, came to Oxford, as the Popes Subdelegate: and Martin, and Story, Commissioners from the King and Queen, sate with him in St. Maries, to judge him. When he appeared before them, he payed a low reverence to them that sate in the King and Queens Name: but would give none to Brooks, since he sate by an Authority from the Pope, to which he would pay no respect. Then Brooks made a long Speech, to set forth his Apostacy and Heresie, his Incontinence, and finally his Treason; and exhorted him to repent: and insinuated to him great hopes of being restored to his See upon it. After this, Martin made a Speech of the difference between the Civil and Ecclesiastical Authority.

When they had done, Cranmer first kneeled down, and said the Lord's Prayer; next he repeated the Apostles Creed: then he told them he would never acknowledge the Bishop of Rome's Authority; he owned his Allegiance to the Crown, according to the Oath he had often sworn; and the submitting to the Pope was directly contrary to that: he could not serve two Masters. He said, the Bishops of Rome not only set up Pretensions that were contrary to the Power of Princes, but they had also made Laws contrary to those made by God: instancing it in the Worship of an unknown Tongue, the denying the Chalice to the People, the pretending to dispose of Crowns, and exalting themselves above every Creature, which shewed them not to be the Vicars of Christ, but to be Antichrists, since all these things were manifestly contrary to the Doctrine of Christ, that was delivered in the Gospel. He remembred Brooks, that he had sworn to the King's Supremacy. Brooks said, it was to K. Henry the 8th. and that Cranmer had made him swear it. To which Cranmer replied, that he did him wrong in that; for it was done in his Predecessor Warham's time, who had asserted the King's Supremacy; and it was also sent to be discussed in the Universities, and they had set their Hands and Seals to it; and that Brooks, being then a Doctor, had signed it with the rest: so that all this being done before he came to be Archbishop, it ought not to be called his deed.

After this, Story made another Speech, of the Authority of the Church; magnifying the See of Rome, and enlarging on those Arguments commonly insisted on; and desired Brooks would put Cranmer to make a plain Answer, and cut off all Debates. Then followed a long Discourse between Martin and Cranmer: in which Martin objected, that he had once sworn to the Pope when he was consecrated, but that aspiring to be Archbishop, he had changed his mind in compliance to King Henry; That he had condemned Lambert of Heresie, for denying the Presence of Christ in the Sacrament, and afterwards turned to that himself. To all this Cranmer answered, pretending that never man came more unwillingly 1556. lingly into a Bishoprick than he did to his. That he was so far from having aspired to it, that tho the King had sent one post to him, to come over to be consecrated, he being then in Germany; yet he had delayed his Journey seven weeks, hoping that in all that time the King might have forgot him: That at his Consecration he publickly explained his meaning in what sence he swore to the Pope, so that he did not act deceitfully in that particular: And that when he condemned Lambert, he did then believe the Corporal Presence; which he continued to do, till Dr. Ridley shewed him such Reasons and Authorities as perswaded him to change his mind, and then he was not ashamed to retract his former Opinion. Then they objected his having been twice married, his keeping his Wife secretly in King Henry's time, and openly in King Edward's Reign; his setting out Heretical Books and Articles, and compelling others to subscribe them: his forsaking the Catholick Church, and denying Christ's Presence in the Sacrament of the Altar; and disputing against it so publickly lately at Oxford. He confessed his living in Marriage, and that he thought it was lawful for all Men to marry; and that it was certainly better to do so, than to lie with other mens Wives, as many Priests did: He confessed all the other Articles; only he said, he had never forced any to subscribe.

After this, Brooks made a long Speech to him, with many of the common Arguments concerning the Pope's Power, and the Presence in the Sacrament: to which Cranmer made another large Answer. Then many Witnesses were examined upon the Points they had heard Cranmer defend in the Schools; and in conclusion they cited him to appear before the Pope within eighty days, to answer for all those things which were now objected to him. He said, he would do it most willingly, if the King and Queen would send him: but he could not go, if he were still detained a Prisoner.

After this he was sent back to Prison, where he lay till the 14th. of February this Year: and then Bonner and Thirleby were sent down to degrade him. Bonner desired this Imployment, as a pleasant Revenge on Cranmer, who had before deprived him: but it was forced on the other, who had lived in great friendship with Cranmer formerly, and was a gentle and good natur'd man, but very inconstant and apt to change. They had Cranmer brought before them, and then they caused to read their Commission, which declared him Contumax for not coming to Rome, and required them to degrade him. They clothed him in Pontifical Robes, a Miter and the other Garments, with a Crosier in his hand: but the Robes were made of Canvass, to make him shew more ridiculous in them. Then Bonner made a Speech full of Jeers; This is the Man that despised the Pope, and is now judged by him: This is the Man that pulled down Churches, and is now judged in a Church: This is the Man that contemned the Sacrament, and is now condemned before it: with other such Expressions, at which Thirleby was much offended, and pulled him oft by the Sleeve, desiring him to make an end: and challenged him afterwards, that he had broke the Promise he had made him before, of treating him with respect. And he was observed to weep much all the while: He protested to Cranmer, that it was the most sorrowful Action of his whole Life, and acknowledged the great Love and Friendship that had been between them; and that no Earthly Consideration but the Queens Command, could have induced him to come, and do what they were then about: He ſhed ſo many Tears, that oft he ſtopt, and could not go on in his diſcourſe for the abundance of them. But Cranmer ſaid, his Degradation was no trouble to him at all; he reckoned himſelf as long ago cut off from all dependance and communion with the See Rome; ſo their doing it now with ſo much Pageantry did not much affect him: only he put in an Appeal from the Pope, to the next free General Council: he ſaid, he was cited to Rome, but all the while kept a Priſoner; ſo there was no reaſon to proceed againſt him in his abſence, ſince he was willing to have gone thither and defended his Doctrine: he alſo denied any authority the Pope had over him, or in England: and therefore appealed from his Sentence. But notwithſtanding that, he was degraded, and all that ludicrous Attire was taken, piece after piece, from him, according to the Ceremonies of Degradation, which are in uſe in the Church of Rome. 1556. He is degraded.

But there were new Engines contrived againſt him. Many had been ſent to confer with him, both Engliſh and Spaniſh Divines, to perſwade him to recant: he was put in hopes of Life and Preferment again, and removed out of Priſon to the Dean's Lodgings at Chriſt-Church; where all the Arguments that could be invented, were made uſe of to turn him from his former perſwaſion: And, in concluſion, as St. Peter himſelf had with Curſes denied his Saviour, ſo he who had reſiſted now almoſt three years, was at laſt overcome; and humane infirmity, the fears of Death, and the hopes that were given him, prevailed with him to ſet his Hand to a Paper, renouncing all the Errors of Luther and Zuinglius, acknowledging the Pope's Supremacy, the ſeven Sacraments, the Corporal Preſence in the Euchariſt, Purgatory, Prayer for departed Souls, the Invocation of Saints; to which was added, his being ſorry for his former Errors; and concluded, exhorting all that had been deceived by his Example or Doctrine, to return to the unity of the Church: and proteſting that he had ſigned it willingly, only for the diſcharge of his own Conſcience. He recants.

Fox, and other later Writers from him, have ſaid, that one reaſon of this Compliance, was, that he might have time to finiſh his Anſwer to Gardiner's Book, againſt that which he had written concerning the Sacrament: and Fox has printed the Letter which he avouches to prove this by. But the good Man (it ſeems) read the Letter very careleſly; for Cranmer ſays no ſuch thing in it; but only, that he had appealed to the next General Council, to try if that could procure him a longer delay, in which he might have time to finiſh his Book: and between theſe two, there is a great difference. How long this was ſigned before his Execution, I find it no where marked, for there is no Date put to his Subſcription.

Cranmer's Recantation was preſently printed, and occaſioned almoſt equally great, Inſultings on the one hand, and Dejection on the other. But the Queen was not at all wrought on by it; and was now forced to diſcover that her private Reſentments governed her in this matter; which before ſhe had diſowned. She was reſolved he ſhould be made a Sacrifice, for giving the Judgment of Divorce in her Mothers Marriage; and tho hitherto though ſhe had pretended only Zeal for Religion, yet now when that could be no more alledged, yet ſhe perſiſted in her Reſolution of having him burnt: She ſaid, ſince he had bin the great Promoter 1556. moter of Heresie that had corrupted the whole Nation; that must ſerve his turn, which would be ſufficient in other caſes: It was good for his own Soul, and might do good to others, that he repented; but ſhe ordered the Sentence to be executed. The Writ went out the 24th of February, which will be found in the Collection. Heath took care not only to enrol the Writ, but the Warrant ſent to him for iſſuing it, which is not ordinary. It's like he did it, to leave it on Record to Poſterity, that he did it not in courſe, as he did other Writs, but had a ſpecial Order from the Queen for it. The long time that paſſed between the date of the Writ, and the execution of it, makes it probable that he made the formerly mentioned Recantation, after the Writ was brought down; and that the fears of Death, then before his eyes, did ſo far work on him, that he ſigned the Writing: but when the ſecond Order was ſent down to execute the former, he was dealt with to renew his Subſcription, and then to write the whole over again, which he alſo did, all this time being under ſome ſmall hopes of Life: but conceiving likewiſe ſome jealouſies that they might burn him, he writ ſecretly a Paper containing a ſincere Confeſſion of his Faith, ſuch as flowed from his Conſcience, and not from his weak fears; and being brought out, he carried that along with him. He was carried to St. Maries, and ſet on a place raiſed higher for him to be more conſpicuouſly ſeen. Cole Provoſt of Eaton preached: he ran out in his Sermon on the Mercy and Juſtice of God, which two Attributes do not oppoſe or juſtle out one another: he applied this to Princes that were Gods on Earth, who muſt be juſt, as well as merciful; and therefore they had appointed Cranmer that day to ſuffer: he ſaid it was he that had diſſolved the Marriage between the Queens Father and Mother, had driven out the Pope's Authority, had been the fountain of all the Hereſies in England; and ſince the Biſhop of Rocheſter and Sir Tho. More had ſuffered for the Church, it was meet that others ſhould ſuffer for Hereſie: and as the Duke of Northumberland had ſuffered in More's room, ſo there was no other Clergyman that was equal or fit to be ballanced with Fiſher but he. Then he turned to Cranmer, and magnified his Converſion, which he ſaid was the immediate Hand of God; that none of their Arguments had done it, but the inward working of God's Spirit: He gave him great hopes of Heaven, and aſſured him there ſhould be Dirges and Maſſes ſaid for his Soul, in all the Churches in Oxford.

Coll. Num. 27.

All this while Cranmer expreſſed great inward confuſion, lifting up his Eyes often to Heaven, and then letting them fall downward, as one aſhamed of himſelf; and he often poured out floods of tears. In the end, when Cole bid him declare his Faith; he firſt prayed, with many moving expreſſions of deep remorſe and inward horror: Then he made his Exhortation to the People, Firſt, "Not to love or ſet their hearts on the "things of the World: to obey the King and Queen out of conſcience "to God: to live in mutual Love: and to relieve the Poor according "to their abundance. Then he came to that, on which, he ſaid, all his "paſt Life, and that which was to come, did hang, being now to enter "either into the joys of Heaven, or the pains of Hell. He repeated the "Apoſtles Creed, and declared his belief of the Scriptures; and then "he ſpake to that, which he ſaid troubled his Conſcience, more than any "thing he had ever done in his whole Life: which was, the ſubſcribing "a Paper contrary to the Truth, and againſt his Conſcience, out of the "fear

"fear of Death, and the love of Life: and when he came to the Fire, 1556.
"he was reſolved that Hand that had ſigned it, ſhould burn firſt. He "rejected the Pope as Chriſt's enemy, and Antichriſt; and ſaid, he had
"the ſame belief of the Sacrament, which he had publiſhed in the Book
"he writ about it.

Upon this, there was a wonderful Confuſion in the Aſſembly: Thoſe who hoped to have gained a great Victory that day, ſeeing it turning another way, were in much diſorder: They called to him to diſſemble no more. He ſaid, he had ever loved ſimplicity, and, before that time, had never diſſembled in his whole Life. And going on in his Diſcourſe, with abundance of tears, they pulled him down, and led him away to the Stake, which was ſet in the ſame place where Ridley and Latimer were burnt. All the way the Prieſts upbraided him for his changing: but he was minding another thing.

When he came to the Stake, he firſt prayed, and then undreſſed himſelf: and being tied to it, as the Fire was kindling, he ſtretched forth his Right hand towards the Flame; never moving it, ſave that once he wiped his Face with it, till it was burnt away: which was conſumed before the Fire reached his Body. He expreſſed no diſorder for the pain he was in: ſometimes ſaying, that unworthy Hand! and oft crying out, Lord Jeſus, receive my Spirit. He was ſoon after quite burnt. He ſuffers Martyrdom with great conſtancy of Mind.

But it was no ſmall matter of Aſtoniſhment, to find his Heart entire, and not conſumed among the Aſhes: which tho the Reformed would not carry ſo far, as to make a Miracle of it, and a clear proof that his Heart had continued true, tho his Hand had erred; yet they objected it to the Papiſts, that it was certainly ſuch a thing, that if it had fallen out in any of their Church, they had made it a Miracle.

Thus did Thomas Cranmer end his days, in the ſixty ſeventh year of his Age. He was a Man raiſed of God for great Services; and well fitted for them. He was naturally of a mild and gentle temper, not ſoon heated, nor apt to give his Opinion raſhly of things, or perſons: and yet his gentleneſs, though it oft expoſed him to his Enemies, who took advantages from it to uſe him ill, knowing he would readily forgive them; did not lead him into ſuch a weakneſs of Spirit, as to conſent to every thing that was uppermoſt: for as he ſtood firmly againſt the ſix Articles in King Henry's time, notwithſtanding all his heat for them; ſo he alſo oppoſed the Duke of Somerſet in the matter of the ſale and alienation of the Chantry Lands, and the Duke of Northumberland during his whole Government; and now reſiſted unto Blood: ſo that his meekneſs was already a vertue in him, and not a puſillanimity in his temper. He was a man of great Candor. He never diſſembled his Opinion, nor diſowned his Friend: two rare qualities in that Age, in which there was a continued courſe of diſſimulation, almoſt in the whole Engliſh Clergy and Nation, they going backward and forward, as the Court turned. But this had got him that eſteem with King Henry, that it always preſerv'd him in his days. He knew, what Complaints ſoever were brought againſt him, he would freely tell him the truth: ſo inſtead of taking it from other hands, he began at himſelf. He neither diſowned his eſteem of Queen Anne, nor his friendſhip to Cromwel, and the Duke of Somerſet, in their misfortunes; but owned, he had the ſame thoughts of them in their loweſt Condition that he had in their greateſt State. His Character.

1556. into Truth, added to these a most wonderful diligence, for he drew out of all the Authors that he read, every thing that was remarkable, digesting these Quotations into Common-places. This begat in King Henry an admiration of him: for he had often tried it, to bid him bring the Opinions of the Fathers and Doctors upon several questions; which he commonly did, in two or three days time: This flowed from the copiousness of his Common-place Books. He had a good judgment, but no great quickness of apprehension, nor closeness of Style, which was diffused and unconnected: therefore when any thing was to be penned that required more Nerves, he made use of Ridley. He laid out all his Wealth on the poor, and pious uses: He had Hospitals and Surgeons in his House for the King's Seamen; He gave Pensions to many of those that fled out of Germany into England; and kept up that which is Hospitality indeed at his Table, where great numbers of the honest and poor neighbours were always invited, instead of the Luxury and Extravagance of great Entertainments, which the vanity and excess of the Age we live in, has honoured with the name of Hospitality, to which too many are led by the Authority of Custom to comply too far. He was so humble and affable, that he carried himself in all conditions at the same rate. His last Fall was the only blemish of his Life; but he expiated it, with a sincere repentance, and a patient Martyrdom. He had been the chief advancer of the Reformation in his Life; and God so ordered it, that his death should bear a proportion to the former parts of his life, which was no small Confirmation to all that received his Doctrine, when they heard how constantly he had at last sealed it with his Blood. And though it is not to be fancied that King Henry was a Prophet, yet he discovered such things in Cranmers temper as made him conclude he was to die a Martyr for his Religion: and therefore he ordered him to change his Coat of Arms, and to give Pelicans instead of Crosses, which were formerly the Arms of his Family: intimating withal, that as it is reported of the Pelican, that she gives her Blood to feed her young ones; so he was to give his Blood for the good of the Church. The King's kindness to him subjected him too much to him: for great Obligations do often prove the greatest snares to generous and noble minds. And he was so much over-born by his respects to him, and was so affected with King Henry's Death, that he never after that shaved his Beard, but let it grow to a great length: which I the rather mention, because the Pictures that were afterwards made for him, being taken according to what he was at his Death, differ much from that which I have put in my former Volume. Those who compared modern and ancient Times, found in him so many and excellent qualities, that they did not doubt to compare him to the greatest of the Primitive Bishops; not only to the Chrysostomes, Ambroses, and Austines, but to the Fathers of the first Rate that immediately followed the Apostles, to the Ignatius's, Polycarps, and Cyprians. And it seemed necessary that the Reformation of this Church, which was indeed nothing else but restoring of the Primitive and Apostolical Doctrine, should have been chiefly carried on by a Man so eminent in all Primitive and Apostolical Vertues. And to those who upbraided the Reformed with his Fall, It was answered, That Liberius, whom they so much magnifie, had fallen as foully upon a much slighter Temptation, only out of a desire to reenter to his See, from which he had been banished, and that he persisted much longer in it.

But now I ſhall give account of the reſt that were burnt this year. On the 27*th.* of Jan. Tho. Wirtle a Prieſt, Bartlet Green a Gentleman, Tho. Brown, John Tudſon, and John Went, Three Tradeſmen, Iſabel Foſter, and Joan Warne, having all been preſented becauſe they came not to Church; Articles were put to them, and upon their Anſwers they were all condemned, and burnt in Smithfield at the ſame Stake. And on the 31*ſt.* of that Month, John Lomas, and four Women were burnt at Canterbury. They were preſented, becauſe they came not to Confeſſion; whereupon Articles being given them, they were found guilty of Hereſie, and burnt in one Fire. In the beginning of March two Women were burnt at Ipſwich: Three Tradeſmen were burnt in Saliſbury on the 24*th.* of March. On the 29*th.* of April, Robert Drakes a Prieſt, William Tyms a Deacon, and four Tradeſmen that were ſent out of Eſſex, becauſe they came not to Church, were condemned, and all burnt together in Smithfield. John Hanpole, and Joan Booek, were burnt at Rocheſter on the firſt of April: and on the ſecond John Hallier a Prieſt was burnt in Canterbury. 1556.

Six Tradeſmen were ſent up from Colcheſter: and the Biſhop of London, who had hitherto kept his Priſoners for ſome time to ſee if he could prevail with them, growing weary of that fruitleſs labour, and becoming by many Acts of cruelty leſs ſenſible of thoſe affections which belong to humane Nature, did without any more ado exhibit the Articles to them; and they anſwering in the way he accounted Hereſie, he gave them time to conſider if they would recant, till the Afternoon: but they continuing in the ſame mind, he condemned them, and ſent them back to Colcheſter, where they were all burnt in one Fire.

On the 15*th.* of May, he gave yet a more aſtoniſhing inſtance of his barbarity. Laverock an old Cripple, a man of ſixty eight years old, and Jo. Ap-price a blind man, were upon the like account condemned, and burnt in the ſame Fire at Stratford-le-bow; they comforting one another, that they were now to be freed of their lameneſs and blindneſs. The day after, three Women were burnt in Smithfield: another blind man, with a Tradeſman, were burnt at Gloceſter this Month. On the 21*ſt.* of the Month, three were burnt at Beckles in Suffolk. On the 6*th.* of June four Men were burnt at Lewis in Suſſex. Another was burnt there on the 20*th.* and one was burnt at Leiceſter on the 26*th.* But on the 27*th.* of June, Bonner made an unheard of Execution of thirteen, whereof eleven were Men, and two Women, all burnt in one Fire in Stratford-le-bow. He had condemned in all ſixteen, but, by what interceſſion I do not know, three of them were preſerved by a Warrant from Cardinal Pool. It ſeems Bonner thought it not worth the while, to burn thoſe ſingly, and therefore ſent them in ſuch droves to the Stake: but whether the horror of this Action, or the diſcontent, becauſe the Cardinal had ſaved ſome of them, wrought on him, I know not; the latter being the more likely; he burnt no more till April next Year.

The 30*th.* of June three were burnt at Bury in Suffolk: On the 16*th.* of July three men were burnt at Newberry. But this July there was done in Gernſey an Act of as great inhumanity, as ever was recorded in any Age. A Mother and her two Daughters, were burnt at the ſame Stake; and one of them a married Woman, big with Child, when ſhe was in the Fire, the violence of it burſting her Belly, a Boy fell out into the 1556. Flame, that was snatched out of it by one that was more merciful than the rest: but after they had a little consulted about it, the Infant was thrown in again, and there was literally baptized with Fire. There were many Eye-witnesses of this, who attested it afterwards in Queen Elizabeths time, when the matter was enquired into, and special care was taken to have full and evident Proofs of it. For indeed the Fact was so unnatural, that a man must either be possessed with a very ill opinion of the Actors, or be well satisfied about the number and credibility of the Witnesses, before he could believe it. But Lies and Forgeries are seldom made of Actions done in the Face of the Sun, and before so great an Assembly as was present at this. Therefore complaint being made of it to Queen Elizabeth, the Dean of Gernsey was put in Prison for it; and afterwards, he, and nine more, that were all accessary to it, took out their Pardons. So merciful was the Government then, to pardon an Action of such a monstrous nature, because done with some colour of Law; since, it was said, the Mother was condemned to be burnt, and no exception was made of her Belly. On the 18*th.* of July two Women and one Man were burnt at Greenstead. On the first of August Joan Wast, a blind Woman, was burnt at Darby. On the 8th of September one was burnt at Bristol; and another in the same place on the 25*th* of that Month. On the 24*th.* four were burnt at Mayfield in Sussex. On the 27*th.* a Man and a Woman were burnt at Bristol: And on the 12*th.* of October a man was burnt at Nottingham. And thus ended the burning this Yaar: those that suffered were in all eighty five. All these persons were presented as suspect of Heresie, and were required to answer the Questions that the Bishop put to them; which related to the Corporal Presence in the Sacrament, the necessity of Auricular Confession, or the Sacrifice of the Mass: and upon the Answers they made, were condemned to the Fire: But none of them were accused of any violence committed on the Persons of any Church-man, or of any affront put on their Religion; and all their Sufferings were meerly for their Conscience, which they kept as private as they could: so that it rather appeared in their abstaining from the Communion of a Church which they thought, had corrupted the chief parts of Worship, than in anything they had said or done. It was an unusual and an ungrateful thing to the English Nation, that is apt to compassionate all in misery, to see four, five, six, seven, and once thirteen burning in one Fire: and the spairing neither Sex nor Age, nor Blind nor Lame, but making havock of all equally; and above all, the barbarity of Gernsey, raised that horror in the whole Nation, that there seems ever since that time, such an abhorrence to that Religion to be derived down from Father to Son, that it is no wonder an aversion so deeply rooted, and raised upon such grounds, does upon every new provocation, or jealousie of returning to it, break out in most violent and convulsive Symptoms.

The Reformation spreads for all the Persecution.

But all those Fires did not extinguish the Light of the Reformation, nor abate the love of it. They spread it more, and kindled new heats in Mens minds: so that what they had read of the former Persecutions under the Heathens, seemed to be now revived. This made those who loved the Gospel meet oft together, though the malice of their Enemies obliged them to do it with great caution and secrecy: yet there were sometimes at their Meetings about 200. They were instructed and watched watched over by ſeveral faithful Shepherds, who were willing to hazard their Lives, in feeding this Flock committed to their care. The chief of theſe were Scambler and Bentham, afterwards promoted by Queen Elizabeth to the Sees of Peterborough and Litchfield: Foule, Bernher, and Rough a Scotch-man, that was afterwards condemned, and burnt by Bonner. There was alſo care taken, by their Friends beyond Sea, to ſupply them with good Books; which they ſent over to them for their inſtruction and encouragement. Theſe that fled beyond Sea went at firſt for the moſt part to France, where, though they were well uſed in oppoſition to the Queen, yet they could not have the free exerciſe of their Religion granted them: ſo they retired to Geneva, and Zurick, and Arau, in Switzerland; and to Strasburg and Frankfort, in the upper Germany; and to Emden in the lower. 1556.

The Troubles at Frankfort among the Engliſh there.

At Frankfort an unhappy difference fell in among ſome of them, who had uſed before the Engliſh Liturgy, and did afterwards comply with it, when they were in England, where it had Authority from the Law: yet they thought that being in Forreign Parts they ſhould rather accommodate their Worſhip to thoſe among whom they lived; ſo inſtead of the Engliſh Liturgy, they uſed one near the Geneva and French Forms. Others thought, that when thoſe in England who had compiled their Liturgy, were now confirming what they had done with their Blood; and many more were ſuffering for it; it was an high contempt of them, and their ſufferings, to depart from theſe Forms. This contradiction raiſed that heat, that Dr. Cox, who lived in Strasburg with his Friend Peter Martyr, went thither; and being a Man of great reputation, procured an Order from the Senate, that the Engliſh Forms ſhould only be uſed in their Church. This diſſention, being once raiſed, went further than perhaps it was at firſt intended. For thoſe who at firſt liked the Geneva way better, that, being in Forreign Parts, they might all ſeem to be united in the ſame Forms; now began to quarrel with ſome things in the Engliſh Liturgy: and Knox, being a Man of a hot temper, engaged in this matter very warmly; and got his Friend Calvin to write ſomewhat ſharply of ſome things in the Engliſh Service. This made Knox and his Party leave Frankfort, and go to Geneva. Knox had alſo written indecently of the Emperor, which obliged the Senate of Frankfort to require him to be gone out of their Bounds. There fell in other Conteſts, about the cenſuring of offences; which ſome of the Congregation would not leave in the hands of the Miniſters only, but would have it ſhared among the whole Congregation. Upon theſe matters there aroſe great debates, and many Papers were written on both ſides, to the great grief of Parker and others, who lived privately in England; and to the ſcandal of the Strangers, who were not a little offended to ſee a company of People fly out of their Country for their Conſciences, and in ſtead of ſpending their time in Faſting and Prayer for their perſecuted Brethren at home, to fall into ſuch quarrels about matters which themſelves acknowledged, were not the Subſtantials of Religion, nor Points of Conſcience: in which certainly they began the Breach, who departed from that way of Worſhip, which they acknowledged was both lawful and good: but there followed too much animoſity on both ſides, which were the Seeds of all thoſe differences that have ſince diſtracted this Church.

1556. They who reflected on the Contests that the Novatians raised, both at Rome, and Carthage, in Cyprians time; and the Heats the Donatists brought into the African Churches, soon after the Persecution was over, found somewhat parallel both to these Schisms now during the Persecution, and to those afterwards raised when it was over.

Pool is made Arch-bishop of Canterbury. I now return to the Affairs of England. On the 22*d*. of March, the very day after Cranmer was burnt, Pool was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury by the Arch-bishop of York, the Bishops of London, Worcester, Lincoln, Rochester, and St. Asaph. He had come over only a Cardinal Deacon; and was last Winter made a Priest, and now a Bishop. It seems he had his Conge d'Elire with his Election, and his Bulls from Rome, already dispatched before this time. The Pope did not know with what face to refuse them, being pressed by the Queen on his account, though he wanted only a colour to wreak his revenge on him; to which he gave vent upon the first opportunity that offered it self. It seems Pool thought it indecent to be consecrated as long as Cranmer lived; which his choosing the next day for it, brought him under the suspition of having procured his death: so that the words of Elijah to Ahab concerning Naboth, were applied to him, Thou hast killed and taken possession. On the 28*th*. of that Month he came in State through London, to Bow-Church; where the Bishops of Worcester and Ely, after the former had said Mass, put the Pall about him. This was a Device set up by Pope Paschal the second in the beginning of the twelfth Century, for the engaging of the Arch-bishops to a more immediate dependance on that See: they being after they took the Pall, to act as the Popes Legates born, (as the Phrase was,) of which it was the Ensign. But it was at the first admitted with great contradiction both by the Kings of Sicily, and Poland, the Arch-bishops of Palermo, and Gnesna, being the first to whom they were sent; all men wondring at the novelty of the thing, and of the Oath which the Popes required of them at the delivery of it. This being put on Pool, he went into the Pulpit, and made a cold Sermon, about the beginning, the Use, and the Matter of the Pall, without either Learning or Eloquence. The Subject could admit of no Learning, and for Eloquence, though in his younger days, when he writ against King Henry's Stile was too luxuriant and florid, yet being afterwards sensible of its excess that way, he turned as much to the other Extream, and cutting off all the Ornaments of Speech, he brought his Stile to a flatness that had neither life nor beauty in it.

Some more Religious Houses endowed. All the Business of England this Year, was the raising of Religious Houses. Greenwich was begun with last Year. The Queen also built a House for the Dominicans in Smithfield, and another for the Franciscans: and they being Begging Orders, these Endowments did not cost much. At Sion near Brainford there had been a Religious House of Women of the Order of St. Bridget. That House was among the first that had been dissolved by King Henry the eighth, as having harboured the King's Enemies, and been Complices to the Business of the Maid of Kent. The Queen a-new Founded a Nunnery there. She also Founded a House for the Carthusians at Sheen near Richmond, in a gratitude to that Order for their Suffering upon her Mothers account. From these she went to a greater Foundation, but that which cost her less: for she suppressed the Deanry, and the Cathedral of Westminster; and in September this Year turned turned it into a Monaſtery; and made Feckham, Dean of Pauls, the first Abbot of it. I have not met with her Foundation of it, which perhaps was razed out of the Records in the beginning of Queen Elizabeths Reign; for it is not enrolled among the other Patents of this Year. But on the 23*d.* of September, ſhe gave Warrants for Penſions to be paid to the Prebends of Weſtminſter, till they were otherwiſe provided: and about that time Feckham was declared Abbot; though the ſolemn Inſtallment of him, and fourteen other Monks with him, was not done till the 21*ſt.* of November. 1556.

There had been many Searches and Diſcoveries made, in the former Reign, of great diſorders in theſe Houſes; and at the diſſolution of them many had made Confeſſion of their ill Lives, and groſs Superſtition; all which were laid up and Recorded in the Augmentation Office. There had been alſo in that ſtate of things, which they now called, The late Schiſm, many Profeſſions made by the Biſhops and Abbots, and other Religious Men, of their renouncing the Popes Authority, and acknowledging the Kings Supremacy: therefore it was moved, that all theſe ſhould be gathered together and deſtroyed. So on the 23*d.* of September, there was a Commiſſion granted to Bonner, and Cole, (the new Dean "of Pauls in Feckhams room) and Dr. Martin, to ſearch all Regiſters; "to find out both the Profeſſions made againſt the Pope, and the Scruti- "nies made in Abbies; which, as the Commiſſion that is in the Collection "ſets forth, tended to the ſubverſion of all good Religion and Religious "Houſes: Theſe they were to gather, and carry to the Cardinal, that "they might be diſpoſed of as the Queen ſhould give order. It is not upon Record how they executed this Commiſſion, but the effects of it appear in the great defectiveneſs of the Records, in many things of conſequence, which are razed and loſt. This was a new ſort of Expurgation, by which they intended to leave as few foot-ſteps to Poſterity, as they could, of what had been formerly done. Their care of their own credits led them to endeavour to ſuppreſs the many Declarations themſelves had formerly made, both againſt the See of Rome, the Monaſtick Orders, and many of the old Corruptions, which they had diſclaimed. But many things eſcaped their diligence; as may appear by what I have already collected: and conſidering the pains they were at, in vitiating Regiſters, and deſtroying Records; I hope the Reader will not think it ſtrange, if he meets with many defects in this Work. In this Search, they not only took away what concerned themſelves, but every collateral thing that might inform or direct the following Ages how to imitate thoſe Precedents: and therefore, among other Writings, the Commiſſion that Cromwel had to be Vice-gerent was deſtroyed: but I have ſince that time met with it, in a Copy that was in the Cotton Library, which I have put in the Collection. How far this reſembled the endeavours that the Heathens uſed in the laſt and hotteſt Perſecution, to burn all the Regiſters of the Church, I leave to the Reader. The Abbey of Weſtminſter being thus ſet up, ſome of the Monks of Glaſſenbury, who were yet alive, were put into it. And all the reſt of the old Monks that had been turned out of Glaſſenbury, and who had not married ſince, were invited to return to this Monaſtery. They began to contrive how to raiſe their Abbey again, which was held the Ancienteſt, and was certainly the richeſt in England: and therefore they moved the Queen and the Cardi-

Cardinal, that they might have the House and Site restored and repaired, and they would by Labour and Husbandry maintain themselves; not doubting but the People of the Country would be ready to contribute liberally to their subsistence. The Queen and Cardinal liked the Proposition well; so the Monks wrote to the Lord Hastings, then Lord Chamberlain, to put the Queen in mind of it, and to follow the Business till it were brought to a good Issue; which would be a great Honour to the Memory of Joseph of Arimathea who lay there, whom they did heartily beseech to pray to Christ for good success to his Lordship. This Letter I have put in the Collection copied from the Original. What followed upon it, I cannot find. It is probable, the Monks of other Houses made the like endeavours, and every one of them could find some rare thing belonging to their House, which seemed to make it the more necessary to raise it speedily. These of St. Albans could say, the first Martyr of England lay in their Abbey: those of St. Edmundbury had a King that was Martyred by the Heathen Danes: those of Battel could say, they were Founded for the remembrance of William the Conquerors Victory, from whence the Queen derived her Crown: and those of St. Austins in Canterbury had the Apostle of England laid in their Church. In short, they were all in hopes to be speedily restored. And though they were but few in Number, and to begin upon a small Revenue, yet as soon as the belief of Purgatory was revived, they knew how to set up the old Trade a-new; which they could drive with the greater advantage; since they were to deal with the People by a new Motive, besides the old ones formerly used, that it was Sacriledge to possess the Goods of the Church; of which it had been robbed by their Ancestors. But in this it was necessary to advance slowly: since the Nobility and Gentry were much allarumed at it; and at the last Parliament, many had laid their Hands to their Swords in the House of Commons, and said they would not part with their Estates; but would defend them: yet some that hoped to gain more favour from the Queen, by such compliance, did Found Chantries for Masses for their Souls. In the Records of the last Years of Queen Maries Reign, there are many Warrants granted by her for such Endowments: for though the Statute of Mortmain was repealed; yet for greater security it was thought fit to take out such Licences. This is all I find of our home Affairs this Year.

Collection Number 30.

Forreign Affairs. Forreign Affairs were brought to a quieter state. For by the Mediation of England, a Truce for five Years was concluded between France and Spain: and the new King of Spain was inclined to observe it faithfully; that so he might be well setled in his Kingdoms, before he engaged in War: but the violent Pope broke all this. He was much offended with the Decree made at Ausburg for the liberty of Religion; and with Ferdinand for ordering the Chalice to be given to his Subjects; and chiefly, for his assuming the Title of Emperor without his approbation. Upon this last provocation the Pope sent him word, that he would let him know, to his grief, how he had offended him. He came to talk in so haughty a Stile, as any of all his Predecessors had ever done, that he would change Kingdoms at his pleasure. He boasted that he had made Ireland a Kingdom: that all Princes were under his Feet, (and as he said, that, he used to tread with his Feet against the ground;) and he would allow allow no Prince to be his Companion, nor be too familiar with him: nay, rather than be driven to a mean Action, he would ſet the whole World on fire. But to pretend to do ſomewhat for a Reformation, he appointed a Congregation to gather ſome Rules for the condemning of Simony. Theſe he publiſhed, and ſaid, having now reformed his own Court, he would next reform the Courts of Princes: and becauſe they had complained much of the corruptions of the Clergy, and Court of Rome; he reſolved to turn the matter on them, and ſaid, he would gather all the abuſes that were in their Courts and reform them. But he was much provoked by an Embaſſy that came from Poland, to deſire of him, that they might have the Maſs in their own Tongue, and the Communion in both kinds; that their Prieſts might be allowed to marry, that they might pay Annates no more to Rome, and call a National Council in their own Kingdom. Theſe things put him out of all patience, and with all the bitterneſs he could uſe, he expreſſed how deteſtable they were to him. He then ſaid, he would hold a Council; not that he needed one, for himſelf was above all: but it ſhould never meet in Trent, to which it had been a vain thing to ſend about ſixty Biſhops of the leaſt able, and forty Doctors of the moſt inſufficient, as had been twice done allready: that he would hold it in the Lateran, as many of his Predeceſſors had done: he gave notice of this to the Ambaſſadors of all Princes: he ſaid he did that only in curteſie, not intending to ask their advice or conſent, for he would be obeyed by them all. He intended in this Council to reform them and their Courts, and to diſcharge all Impoſitions which they had laid on the Clergy: and therefore he would call it whether they would or not, and if they ſent no Prelates to it, he would hold it with thoſe of his own Court: and would let the world ſee what the Authority of that See was, when it had a Pope of courage to govern it. 1556.

He breaks the Truce between France and Spain, abſolving the French King from his Oath.

But after all theſe Imperious humors of his, which ſometimes carried him to exceſſes, that ſeemed not much different from madneſs; he was heartily troubled at the Truce between the French and the Spaniards. He hates the Spaniards moſt, becauſe they ſupported the Coloneſi, whom he deſigned to ruine. And therefore he ſent his Nephew into France, with a Sword and Hat which he had Conſecrated, to perſwade the King to break the Truce; offering his aſſiſtance for the Conqueſt of the Kingdom of Naples, to the uſe of one of the younger Sons of France: though it was believed he deſigned it for his own Nephew. He alſo ſent the French King an Abſolution from his Oath that he had ſworn for the maintaining of the Truce, and promiſed to create what Cardinals he pleaſed, that ſo he might be ſure of a Creature of his own to ſucceed in the Popedom. Yet the Pope diſembled his deſign in this, ſo cloſely, that he perſwaded Sir Edward Carn, that was then the Queens Ambaſſador at Rome, that he deſired nothing ſo much as a general Peace: and he hoped, as the Queen had mediated in the Truce, ſhe would continue her endeavours till a perfect Peace were made. He ſaid, he had ſent two Legates to procure it; and ſince he was the common Father of Chriſtendom, God would impute to him, even his ſilence in that matter, if he did not all he could to obtain it. He complained much of the growth of Hereſie in Poland, and in the King of the Romans's Dominions. For the repreſſing of it, he ſaid, he intended to have a General Council: and in order to that it was neceſſary there ſhould be a Peace, ſince a Truce 1556. Truce would not give sufficient encouragement to those who ought to come to the Council. He said, he intended to be present at it himself, and to hold it in the Church of St. John in the Lateran: for he thought Rome, being the Common Country of all the World, was the meetest Place for such an Assembly: and he, being so very old, could go no where out of Rome; therefore he was resolved to hold it there. But he said, he relied chiefly on the assistance of the Queen, whom he called, That Blessed Queen, and his most gracious and loving Daughter: and holding her Letters in his Hand, he said, they were so full of respect and kindness to him, that he would have them read in the Consistory: and mad a Cross over her Subscription. It was no wonder such discourses, with that way of deportment, deceived so honest and plain hearted a Man as Carn was; as it will appear from the Letter that he writ over upon this occasion to the Queen, which I have put in the Collection. But it soon appeared on what design he had sent his Legate to France; for he pressed that King vehemently to break the Truce, and renew the War. To this the French King being perswaded by the Cardinal of Lorain, Duke of Guise, and consented, though all the rest about him dissuaded him from such a dishonourable breach of Faith, or medling more in the War of Italy, which had been always fatal to their People. The Colonesi had been furnished with assistance from Naples; upon which, the Pope had it proposed in the Consistory, that the King of Spain, by giving them assistance, had lost his Territories: and being then assured of assistance from France, he began the War, imprisoning the Cardinals and Prelates of the Spanish Faction; and the Ambassadors of Spain and England; pretending they kept correspondence with the Colonesi that were Traitors. He also sent to raise some Regiments among the Switzers. But when they came, some told him they were all Hereticks, and it would be a reproach for him to use such Souldiers: he understanding they were good Troops, said, He was confident God would convert them, and that he look'd on them as Angels sent by God for the defence of his Person. Upon this breaking out of the Popes, the Duke of Alva, that was then in Naples, being himself much devoted to the Papacy, did very unwillingly engage in the War. He first used all ways to avoid it; and made several Protestations of the indignities that his Master had received, and his unwillingness to enter into a War, with him that should be the Common Father of Christendome. But these being all to no purpose, he fell into Campania, and took all the Places in it, which he declared he held for the next Pope: he might also have taken Rome self, but the Reverence he had for the Papacy restrained him.

Collection Number 31.

This being known in England, was a great grief to the Queen and Cardinal, who saw what advantages those of the Reformation would take from the Popes absolving Princes from the most Sacred Ties of Humane Societies; since the breach of Faith and publick Treaties was a thing abhorred by the most depraved Nations: and when he, who pretended to be the Vicar of Christ who was the Prince of Peace, was kindling a new Flame in Christendom; these things were so scandalous, that they knew they would much obstruct and disorder all their designs. And indeed the Protestants every where were not wanting to improve this all they could. It seemed a strange thing, that in the same Year, a great Conqueror, that had spent his Life in Wars and Affairs, should in the the 56*th* year of his Age retire to a Monaſtery: and that a Biſhop at eighty, who had pretended to ſuch abſtraction from the World that he had formerly quitted a Biſhoprick to retire into a Monaſtery, ſhould now raiſe ſuch a War, and ſet Europe again in a flame. 1556.

In the beginning of the next Year was the Viſitation of the Univerſities. To Cambridge Pool ſent Scot Biſhop of Cheſter, his Italian Friend Ormaneto, with Watſon, and Chriſtopherſon, the two Elect Biſhops of Lincoln, and Chicheſter, (in the rooms of White, removed to Wincheſter; out of which Pool reſerved a Penſion of 1000 l. and of Day that was dead) with ſome others. When they came thither, on the 11*th* of January they put the Churches of St. Maries and St. Michaels under an Interdict; becauſe the Bodies of Bucer, and Fagius, two Hereticks, were laid in them. The Univerſity Orator received them with a Speech, that was divided between an Invective againſt the Hereticks, and a Commendation of the Cardinal, who was then their Chancellor. They went through all the Colledges, and gathered many Heretical Books together, and obſerved the Order uſed in their Chappels. When they came to Clare-Hall, they found no Sacrament; Ormaneto asked the Head, Swinburn, how that came; he anſwered, The Chappel was not yet conſecrated: Then Ormaneto chid him more for officiating ſo long in it; but trying him further, he found he had many Benefices in his Hands; for which he reproved him ſo ſeverely, that the poor Man was ſo confounded that he could anſwer nothing to the other Queſtions he put to him. But Chriſtopherſon himſelf, being Maſter of Trinity Colledge, did not eſcape. Ormaneto found, he had miſ-applied the Revenues of the Houſe, and had made a Leaſe of ſome of their Lands to his Brother-in-law below the value: Ormaneto tore the Leaſe to pieces, and chid him ſo ſharply, that he, fearing it might ſtop his preferment, fell ſick upon it. 1557. The Viſitation of the Univerſities.

Then followed the Pageantry of burning the two Bodies of Bucer, and Fagius. They were cited to appear, or if any would come in their Name, they were required to defend them: ſo after three Citations, the dead Bodies not riſing to ſpeak for themſelves, and none coming to plead for them, (for fear of being ſent after them) the Viſitors thought fit to proceed. On the 26*th* of January the Biſhop of Cheſter made a Speech, ſhewing the earneſtneſs of the Univerſity to have Juſtice done; to which they, the Commiſſioners, though moſt unwilling, were obliged to condeſcend: therefore, having examined many Witneſſes of the Hereſies that Bucer and Fagius had taught, they judged them obſtinate Hereticks; and appointed their Bodies to be taken out of the Holy Ground, and to be delivered to the Secular Power. The Writ being brought from London, on the 6*th* of February their Bodies were taken up, and carried in Coffins, and tied to Stakes, with many of their Books, and other Heretical Writings, and all were burnt together. Pern preached at it; who as he was that Year Vice-Chancellor, ſo he was in the ſame Office four years after this; when by Queen Elizabeths Order, publick Honours were done to the Memories of thoſe two learned Men; and Sermons and Speeches were made in their Praiſe: but Pern had turned ſo oft, and at every one was ſo zealous, that ſuch turnings came to be nicknamed from him. On the Feaſt of Purification, Watſon preached at Cambridge; where to extol the Rites and Proceſſions of the Catholicks, 1557. and their carrying Candles on that day, he said, Joseph and the Blessed Virgin had carried Wax Candles in Procession that day, as the Church had still continued to do from their Example: which was heard not without the laughter of many.

The Cardinal did also send Ormanet, and Brooks Bishop of Gloucester, with some others, to visit the University of Oxford. They went over all the Colledges as they had done at Cambridge; and burnt all the English Bibles, with such other Heretical Books as could be found. Then they made a Process against the Body of Peter Martyrs Wife, that lay buried in one of the Churches: but she being a Forreigner that understood no English, they could not find Witnesses that had heard her utter any Heretical Points; so they gave advertisement of this to the Cardinal, who thereupon writ back, That since it was notoriously known, that she had been a Nun, and had married contrary to her Vow, therefore her Body was to be taken up, and buried in a Dunghill, as a Person dying under Excommunication. This was accordingly done. But her Body was afterwards taken up again in Queen Elizabeths time, and mixed with St. Fridiswides Bones, that she might run the same Fortune with her in all Times coming.

Great Endeavours used to set forward the Persecution most vigorously.

While these things were doing, there was great Complaints made, that the Inferior Magistrates grew every where slack in the searching after and presenting of Hereticks: they could not find in the Counties a sufficient number of Justices of Peace, that would carefully look after it; and in Towns they were generally harboured. Letters were written to some Towns, as Coventry, and Rye, which are entred in the Council-Books, recommending some to be chosen their Majors, who were zealous Catholicks. It it probable that the like Letters might have been written to other Towns; for the Council-Books for this Reign are very imperfect and defective. But all this did not advance their design. The Queen understood that the Numbers of the Hereticks rather increased than abated: so new Councils were to be taken. I find it said, That some advised that Courts of Inquisition, like those in Spain, might be set up in England. In Spain the Inquisitors, who were then all Dominicans, received private Informations; and upon these laid hold on any that were delated or suspected of Heresie; and kept them close in their Prisons till they formed their Processes: and by all the ways of torture they could invent, forced from them Confessions, either against themselves, or others whom they had a mind to draw within their Toils. They had so unlimited a Jurisdiction, that there was no Sanctuary that could secure any from their Warrants; nor could Princes preserve or deliver Men out of their Hands: nor were their Prisoners brought to any publick Trial, but tried in secret: one of the Advocates of the Court, was for Form sake assigned to plead for them: but was always more careful to please the Court, than to save his Client. They proceeded against them, both by Articles, which they were to answer, and upon Presumptions: and it was a rare thing for any to escape out of their Hands, unless they redeemed themselves, either by great Presents, or by the discovery of others. These had been set up first in the County of Tholouse, for the extirpation of the Albigenses; and were afterwards brought into Spain, upon Ferdinand of Arragons driving the Moors out of it, that so, none of those might any longer conceal themselves in that Kingdom; who being being a falſe and crafty ſort of Men, and certainly Enemies to the Government, it ſeemed neceſſary to uſe more than ordinary ſeverity to drive them out. But now thoſe Courts examined Men ſuſpected of Hereſie, as well as of Mahometaniſm; and had indeed effectually preſerved Spain from any change in Religion. This made the preſent Pope earneſt with all the Princes of Chriſtendom, to ſet up ſuch Courts in their Dominions; and Philip was ſo much of the ſame mind, that he reſolved to have them ſet up in Flanders; which gave the firſt Riſe to thoſe Wars, that followed afterwards there, and ended in the loſs of the ſeven Provinces. 1557.

A Deſign to ſet up the Inquiſition in England.

In England they made now in February a good ſtep towards it. For a Commiſſion was given to the Biſhops of London, and Ely, the Lord North, Secretary Bourne, Sir John Mordant, Sir Francis Engleſield, Sir Edward Walgrave, Sir Nicholas Hare, Sir Tho. Pope, Sir Roger Cholmly, Sir Richard Read, Sir Tho. Stradling, Sir Rowland Hall, and Serjeant Raſtall; Cole Dean of Pauls, William Roper, Randulph Cholmley, and William Cook, Tho. Martin, John Story, and John Vaughan, Doctors of the Law: "That ſince many falſe Rumors were publiſhed among the Subjects, and many Heretical Opinions were alſo ſpread among them; "therefore they, or any three of them, were to enquire into thoſe, either by Preſentments by Witneſſes, or any other politick way they could "deviſe: and to ſearch after all Hereſies; the Bringers in, the Sellers, or "Readers, of all Heretical Books: they were to examine, and puniſh, "all misbehaviours, or negligences, in any Church or Chappel; and to "try all Prieſts that did not preach of the Sacrament of the Altar; all "Perſons that did not hear Maſs, or come to their Pariſh-Church to Service, that would not go in Proceſſions, or did not take Holy Bread, "or Holy Water: and if they found any that did obſtinately perſiſt in "ſuch Hereſies, they were to put them into the Hands of their Ordinaries, to be proceeded againſt according to the Laws: giving them full "Power to Proceed, as their Diſcretions and Conſciences ſhould direct "them: and to uſe all ſuch means as they could invent, for the ſearching "of the Premiſſes: empow'ring them alſo to call before them ſuch Witneſſes as they pleaſed, and to force them to make Oath of ſuch things "as might diſcover what they ſought after. This Commiſſion I have put in the Collection. It will ſhew how high they intended to raiſe the Perſecution, when a Power of ſuch a nature, was put into the Hands of any three of a number ſo ſelected. Beſides this, there were many ſubordinate Commiſſions iſſued out. This Commiſſion ſeems to have been granted the former Year, and only renewed now: for in the Rolls of that Year, I have met with many of thoſe ſubaltern Commiſſions, relating to this, as ſuperior to them. And on the eighth of March after this, a Commiſſion was given to the Arch-biſhop of York, the Biſhop Suffragan of Hull, and divers others, to the ſame effect: but with this limitation, that if any thing appeared to them ſo intricate, that they could not determine it, they were to refer it to the Biſhop of London and his Colleagues, who had a larger Commiſſion. So now, all was done that could be deviſed for extirpating of Hereſie, except Courts of Inquiſition had been ſet up; to which, whether this was not a previous ſtep to diſpoſe the Nation to it, the Reader may judge.

1557. Proceedings againſt the Hereticks.

I ſhall next give an account of the Burnings this Year. On the 15th of January ſix Men were burnt in one Fire at Canterbury; and at the ſame time, two were burnt at Wye, and two at Aſhford, that were condemned with the other ſix. Soon after the fore-mentioned Commiſſion, two and twenty were ſent up from Colcheſter to London: yet Bonner, though ſeldom guilty of ſuch gentleneſs, was content to diſcharge them. As they were led through London, the People did openly ſhew their affection to them, above a thouſand following them: Bonner, upon this, writ to the Cardinal, that he found they were obſtinate Hereticks; yet ſince he had been offended with him for his former Proceedings, he would do nothing till he knew his pleaſure. This Letter is to be found in Fox. But the Cardinal ſtopt him; and made ſome deal with the Priſoners to Sign a Paper, of their profeſſing that they believed that Chriſts Body and Blood was in the Sacrament; without any further explanation: and that they did ſubmit to the Catholick Church of Chriſt; and ſhould be faithful Subjects to the King and Queen, and be obedient to their Superiors both Spiritual and Temporal according to their duties. It is plain, this was ſo contrived, that they might have Signed it without either prevaricating or diſſembling their Opinions: for it is not ſaid, "That they were to be "ſubject to the Church of Rome, but to the Church of Chriſt: and "they were to be obedient to their Superiors according to their duties, which was a good reſerve for their Conſciences. I ſtand the longer on this, that it may appear how willing the Cardinal was to accept of any ſhew of ſubmiſſion from them, and to ſtop Bonners rage. Upon this, they were ſet at liberty. But Bonner got three Men and two Women preſented to him in London in January, and after he had allowed them a little more time than he had granted others, they ſtanding ſtill firm to their Faith, were burnt at Smithfield on the 12*th* of April. After that, White, the new Biſhop of Wincheſter, condemned three, who were burnt on the third of May in Southwark; one of theſe, Stephen Gardwick, being of the Dioceſs of Chicheſter, appealed from him to his own Ordinary: whether he expected more favour from him, or did it only to gain time, I know not: but they brought in a Counterfeit, who was pretended to be the Biſhop of Chicheſter, (as Fox has printed it from the account written with the Mans own Hand) and ſo condemned him. On the ſeventh of May, three were burnt at Briſtol. On the 18*th* of June, two Men, and five Women, were burnt at Maidſton: and on the 19*th*, three Men, and four Women, were burnt at Canterbury; fourteen being thus in two days deſtroyed by Thornton and Harpsfield: in which it may ſeem ſtrange, that the Cardinal had leſs influence to ſtop the Proceedings in his own Dioceſs, than in London: but he was now under the Popes diſgrace, as ſhall be afterwards ſhewn. On the 22*d* of June, ſix Men, and four Women, were burnt at Lewis in Suſſex, condemned by White; for Chriſtopherſon, Biſhop Elect of Chicheſter, was not yet conſecrated. On the 13*th* of July two were burnt at Norwich: On the ſecond of Auguſt ten were burnt at Colcheſter, ſix in the Morning, and four in the Afternoon: they were ſome of thoſe who had been formerly diſcharged by the Cardinals Orders; but the Prieſts in the Country complained, that the mercy ſhewed to them had occaſioned great diſorders among them; Hereticks and the Favourers of them growing inſolent upon it; and thoſe who ſearched after them being diſheartned: ſo now,

Bonner

aints being made that they came not to Church, condemned them upon eir Anſwers to the Articles, which he objected to them.

At this time one George Eagle, a Taylor, who uſed to go about from ce to place, and to meet with thoſe who ſtood for the Reformation, ere he prayed and diſcourſed with them about Religion; and from indefatigable diligence was nick-named Trudge-over, was taken near chester, and was condemned of Treaſon for gathering the Queens bjects together; though it was not proved, that he had ever ſtirred em up to Rebellion; but did it only (as himſelf always proteſted) encourage them to continue ſtedfaſt in the Faith: he ſuffered as a aytor. On the fifth of Auguſt one was burnt at Norwich; and on the entieth, a Man and a Woman more, were burnt at Rocheſter: One was o burnt at Litchfield in Auguſt, but the day is not named.

The ſame Month, a Complaint was brought to the Council, of the agiſtrates of Briſtol, that they came ſeldom to the Sermons at the Caedral; ſo that the Dean and Chapter uſed to go to their Houſes in Proſſion, with their Croſs carried before them, and to fetch them from ence: upon which, a Letter was written to them, requiring them to nform themſelves more willingly to the Orders of the Church, to freent the Sermons, and go thither of their own accord. On the 17th.
September three Men, and one Woman, were burnt at Iſlington near ndon: and on the ſame day two Women were burnt at Colcheſter.
n the 20th a Man was burnt at Northampton: and in the ſame Month
e was burnt at Laxefield in Suffolk. On the 23d a Woman was burnt Norwich. There were ſeventeen burnt in the Dioceſs of Chicheſter, out this time: one was a Prieſt, thirteen were Lay-men, and three omen: but the day is not marked. On the 18th of November three re burnt in Smithfield. On the 22d of December John Rough a Scotch- n was burnt, whoſe ſuffering was on this occaſion. On the 12th of cember there was a private Meeting of ſuch as continued to Worſhip od according to the Service ſet out by King Edward, at Iſlington; here he was to have adminiſtred the Sacrament, according to the Order that Book. The new Iuquiſitors had corrupted one of this Con-egation to betray his Brethren; ſo that they were apprehended as they re going to the Communion. But Rough being a Stranger, it was nſidered by the Council whether he ſhould be tryed as a Native. He d a Benefice in York-ſhire in King Edwards days; ſo it was reſolved, d ſignified to the Biſhop of London, that he ſhould be proceeded ainſt as a Subject. Thereupon Bonner objected to him, his condemning e Doctrine of the Church, and ſetting out the Hereſies of Cranmer
d Ridley concerning the Sacrament, and his uſing the Service ſet out King Edward; that he had lived much with thoſe who for their Heſies had fled beyond Sea; that he had ſpoken reproachfully of the Pope d Cardinals, ſaying, That when he was at Rome, he had ſeen a Bull of e Popes that licenſed Stews, and a Cardinal riding openly with his Whore with him: with ſeveral other Articles. The greateſt part of them confeſſed, and thereupon he, with a Woman that was one of the Con-egation, was burnt in Smithfield. And thus ended the Burnings this ear; ſeventy nine in all being burnt.

Theſe

1557. The Lord Stourton hanged for Murder.

Theſe Severities againſt the Hereticks, made the Queen ſhew leſs pity to the Lord Stourton, than perhaps might have been otherwiſe expected. He had been all King Edwards time a moſt zealous Papiſt, and did conſtantly diſſent in Parliament from the Laws then made about Religion. But he had the former Year murdered one Argall and his Son, with whom he had been long at variance: and after he had knock'd them down with Clubs, and cut their Throats, he buried them fifteen Foot under ground, thinking thereby to conceal the Fact: but it breaking out, both he and four of his Servants were taken, and indicted for it. He was found guilty of Felony, and condemned to be hanged with his Servants, in Wiltſhire, where the Murder was committed. On the ſixth of March they were hanged at Salisbury. All the difference that was made in their Deaths, being only thus, That whereas his Servants were hanged in common Halters, one of Silk was beſtowed on their Lord. It ſeemed an indecent thing, when they were proceeding ſo ſeverely againſt Men for their Opinions, to ſpare one that was guilty of ſo foul a Murder, killing both Father and Son at the ſame time. But it is ſtrange, that neither his Quality, nor his former zeal for Popery, could procure a change of the Sentence, from the more infamous way of hanging, to beheading; which had been generally uſed to Perſons of his Quality. It has been ſaid, and it paſſes for a Maxim of Law, That though in Judgments of Treaſon the King can order the Execution to be by cutting off the Head, ſince it being a part of the Sentence, that the Head ſhall be ſevered from the Body, the King may in that Caſe remit all the other parts of the Sentence except that; yet in Felonies the Sentence muſt be executed in the way preſcribed by Law; and that if the King ſhould order beheading in ſtead of hanging, it would be Murder in the Sheriff, and thoſe that execute it: So that in ſuch a Caſe they muſt have a Pardon under the Great Seal for killing a Man unlawfully. But this ſeems to be taken up without good Grounds, and againſt clear Precedents: For in the former Reign the Duke of Somerſet, though condemned for Felony, yet was beheaded. And in the Reign of King Charles the Firſt, the Lord Audley, being likewiſe condemned for Felony, all the Judges delivered their Opinions, that the King might change the Execution from hanging to beheading, which was done, and was not afterwards queſtioned. So it ſeems the hanging the Lord Stourton flowed not from any ſcruple to the Queens Power of doing it lawfully, but that on this occaſion ſhe reſolved to give a publick Demonſtration of her Juſtice and Horror of ſo cruel a Murder; and therefore ſhe left him to the Law, without taking any further care of him. On the laſt of February he was ſent from London, with a Letter to the Sheriff of Wilt-ſhire, to receive his Body and execute the Sentence given againſt him, and his Servants; which was accordingly done, as has been already ſhewn. Upon this, the Papiſts took great advantage to commend the ſtrictneſs and impartiality of the Queens Juſtice; that would not ſpare ſo zealous a Catholick, who was guilty of ſo foul a Murder. It was alſo ſaid, That the killing of Mens Bodies was a much leſs crime, than the killing of Souls, which was done by the Propagators of Hereſie; and therefore if the Queen did thus execute Juſtice on a Friend, for that which was a leſſer degree of Murder, they who were her Enemies, and guilty of higher Crimes, were to look for no mercy. Indeed, as the Poor Proteſtants looked for none, they met with very little; but what the Cardinal ſhewed them: and he was now brought under trouble himſelf, for favouring them too much, it being that which the Pope made uſe of to cover his malice againſt him. 1557.

Now the War had again broken out between France and Spain, and the King ſtudied to engage the Engliſh to his aſſiſtance. The Queen had often complained to the French Court, that the Fugitives, who left her Kingdom, had been well entertained in France. She underſtood that the practices of Wiat, and of her other rebellious Subjects, were encouraged from thence: particularly of Aſhton, who went often between the two Kingdoms, and had made uſe of the Lady Elizabeths Name to raiſe Seditions, as will appear by a Letter, (that is in the Collection) which ſome of the Council writ to one that attended that Princeſs. She was indeed the more ſtrictly kept, and worſe uſed upon that occaſion. But beſides, it ſo happened, that this Year one Stafford had gone into France, and gathered ſome of the Engliſh Fugitives together, and with Money and Ships, that were ſecretly given him by that Court, had come and ſeized on the Caſtle of Scarborough: from whence he publiſhed a Manifeſto againſt the Queen, that by bringing in the Spaniards, ſhe had fallen from her Right to the Kingdom; of which he declared himſelf Protector. The Earl of Weſtmorland took the Caſtle on the laſt of April, and Stafford, with three of his Complices, being taken, ſuffered as Traytors on the 28*th* of May. His coming out of France added much to the Jealouſie, though the French King diſowned that he had given him any aſſiſtance. But Dr. Wotton, who was then Ambaſſador there, reſolved to give the Queen a more certain diſcovery of the Inclinations of the French, that ſo he might engage her in the War, as was deſired by Philip: He therefore cauſed a Nephew of his own to come out of England, whom when he had ſecretly inſtructed, he ordered him to deſire to be admitted to ſpeak with the French King; pretending that he was ſent from ſome that were diſcontented in England, and deſired the French Protection. But the King would not ſee him, till he had firſt ſpoken with the Conſtable. So Wotton was brought to the Conſtable, and Melvill, from whoſe Memoirs I draw this, was called to interpret. The young man firſt offered him the Service of many in England; that, partly upon the account of Religion, partly for the hatred they bore the Spaniards, were ready, if aſſiſted by France, to make ſtirs there. The Conſtable received and anſwered this but coldly; and ſaid, He did not ſee what Service they could do his Maſter in it. Upon which, he replied, They would put Calais into his Hands. The Conſtable not ſuſpecting a Trick, ſtarted at that, and ſhewed great joy at the Propoſition; but deſired to know, how it might be effected. Young Wotton told him, there were a thouſand Proteſtants in it, and gave him a long formal Project of the way of taking it: with which the Conſtable ſeemed pleaſed, and had much diſcourſe with him about it; he promiſed him great Rewards, and gave him directions how to proceed in the Deſign. So the Ambaſſador having found out what he had deſigned to diſcover, ſent his Nephew over to the Queen; who was thereupon ſatisfied, that the French were reſolved to begin with her, if they found an opportunity. Her Husband King Philip finding it was not ſo eaſie by Letters or Meſſages, to draw her into the War, came came over himself about the 20*th* of May, and stayed with her till the beginning of July. In that time he prevailed so far with her and the Council, that she sent over a Herauld with a formal Denunciation of War, who made it at Rhemes, where the King then was, on the seventh of June. Soon after she sent over 8000 Men, under the Command of the Earl of Pembroke, to joyn the Spanish Army, that consisting of near 50000 Men, sate down before St. Quintin. The Constable was sent to raise the Siege, with a great Force, and all the chief Nobility of France. When the two Armies were in view of one another, the Constable intended to draw back his Army; but by a mistake in the way of it, they fell in some disorder. The Spaniards upon that, falling on them, did, with the loss only of fifty of their Men, gain an entire Victory: 2500 were killed on the Place; the whole Army was dispersed, many of the first Quality were killed, the Constable with many others were taken Prisoners. The French King was in such a consternation upon it, that he knew not which way to turn himself. Now all the French cursed the Pope's Counsels, for he had perswaded their King to begin this War, and that with a manifest breach of his Faith. This Action lost the Constable that great reputation, which he had acquired and preserved in a course of much success; and raised the credit of the Duke of Guise, who was now sent for in all haste, to come with his Army out of Italy, for the preservation of his own Country. France indeed was never in greater danger than at that time. For if King Philip had known how to have used his Success, and marched on to Paris, he could have met with no resistance. But he sate down before St. Quintins, which Coligny kept out so long, till the first terror was over, that so great a Victory had raised: and then, as the French took Heart again, so the Spaniards grew less, as well in strength as reputation, and the English finding themselves not well used, returned home into their Country.

The great defeat given the French at St. Quintin.

As soon as the Pope heard, that England had made War upon France, he was not a little inflamed with it: and his wrath was much heightned when he heard of the defeat at St. Quintins; and that the Duke of Guise Army was recalled out of Italy; by which he was exposed to the mercy of the Spaniards. He now said openly, they might see how little Cardinal Pool regarded the Apostolick See, when he suffered the Queen to assist their Enemies, against their Friends. The Pope being thus incens'd against Pool, sought all ways to be revenged of him. At first he made a Decree (in May this Year) for a General Revocation of all Legates and Nuntio's in the King of Spains Dominions; and among these, Cardinal Pool was mentioned with the rest. But Carne, notwithstanding this, went first to the Cardinals, and informed them what a prejudice it would be to their Religion, to recall the Cardinal, while things were yet in so unsetled a state in England. Of this they were all very sensible, and desired him to speak to the Pope about it. So in an Audience he had of him, he desired a Suspension might be made of that Revocation. The Pope pretended he did it in General, in all the Spanish Dominions; yet he promised Carne to propose it to the Congregation of the Inquisition, but he was resolved not to recall it; and said, did not consist with the Majesty of the Place he sate in, to revoke a part of a Decree which he had solemnly given. In the Congregation the Pope endeavoured to have got the Concurrence of the Cardi-but they were unwilling to joyn in it. So he told Carne, that though he would recall no part of his Decree, yet he would give Orders that there ſhould be no Intimation made of it to Cardinal Pool: and that if the Queen writ to him to deſire his Continuance in England, it might be granted. He alſo let fall ſome words to Carne of his willingneſs to make Peace with King Philip; and indeed at that time he was much diſtaſted with the French. Of this Carne advertiſed the King, though he was then ſo much better acquainted with the Popes diſſimulation than formerly, that he did not lay much weight on what he ſaid to him; as will appear by the diſpatch he made upon this occaſion, which is in the Collection. Whether the Queen did upon this write to the Pope or not, I do not know. It is probable ſhe did: for this matter lay aſleep till September; and then the Pope did not only recal Pool, but intended to deſtroy him. He did not know where to find a Perſon to ſet up againſt the Cardinal, ſince Gardiner was dead, and none of the other Biſhops in England were great enough, or ſure enough to him, to be raiſed to ſo high a Dignity. Peito the Franciſcan Friar ſeemed a Man of his own temper, becauſe he had railed againſt King Henry ſo boldly to his face: and he being choſen by the Queen to be her Confeſſor, was looked on as the fitteſt to be advanced. So the Pope wrote for him into England; and when he came to Rome, made him a Cardinal; and ſent over his Bulls, declaring that he recalled Pools Legatine Power, and required him to come to Rome, to anſwer for ſome Accuſations he had received of him, as a favourer of Hereticks. This might have perhaps been grounded on his diſcharging that Year ſo many delated of Hereſie, upon ſo ambiguous a ſubmiſſion as they had made. The Pope alſo wrote to the Queen, that he was to ſend over Cardinal Peito with full power, requiring her to receive him as the Legate of the Apoſtolick See. The Queen called for the Bulls, and according to the way formerly practiſed in England, and ſtill continued in Spain, when Bulls that were unacceptable were ſent over, ſhe ordered them to be laid up without opening them. It has been ſhewn in the former part, how Arch-biſhop Chicheley, when he was ſo proceeded againſt by Pope Martin, appealed to the next General Council; and ſome that deſired to ſee the Form of ſuch Appeals in thoſe Ages, have thought it an Omiſſion in me, that I had not publiſhed his Appeal in the Collection of Records, at the end of that Work: therefore upon this occaſion, I ſhall refer the Reader to it, which he will find in the Collection. But now, Cardinal Pool reſolved to behave himſelf with more ſubmiſſion. For though the Queen had ordered the Popes Breve to him, not to be delivered, yet of himſelf he laid down the Enſigns of his Legatine Power: and ſent Ormaneto, who had the Title of the Popes Datary, and was his Friend and Confident, to give an account of his whole behaviour in England; and to clear him of theſe Imputations of Hereſie. This he did, with ſo much ſubmiſſion, that he mollified the Pope: only he ſaid, that Pool ought not to have conſented to the Queens entring in War with the Enemies of the Holy See. Peito had begun his journey to England: but the Queen ſent him word, not to come over; otherwiſe ſhe would bring him, and all that owned his Authority, within the Premunire. So he ſtopt in his Journey; and dying in April following, enjoyed but a ſhort while his new Dignity; together with the Biſhoprick of Saliſbury, to which the Pope had advanced him,

This Storm against Pool went soon over, by the Peace that was made between Philip and the Pope, of which it will not be unpleasant to give the Relation. The Duke of Guise having carried his Army out of Italy, the Duke of Alva marched towards Rome, and took and spoiled all Places on his way. When he came near Rome, all was in such confusion, that he might have easily taken it; but he made no assault. The Pope called the Cardinals together, and setting out the danger he was in, with many Tears, said, he would undauntedly suffer Martyrdom: which they, who knew that the trouble he was in, flowed only from his restless ambition and fierceness, could scarce hear without laughter. The Duke of Alva was willing to treat. The Pope stood high on the Points of Honour; and would needs keep that entire, though he was forced to yield in the chief matters: he said, rather than lose one jot that was due to him, he would see the whole World ruined; pretending, it was not his own Honour, but Christs, that he sought. In fine, the Duke of Alva was required by him to come to Rome, and on his knees to ask pardon, for invading the Partrimony of the Church; and to receive Absolution for himself, and his Master. He being superstitiously devoted to the Papacy, and having got satisfaction in other things, consented to this. So the Conqueror was brought to ask pardon, and the vain Pope received him, and gave him Absolution, with as much haughtiness and state as if he had been his Prisoner. This was done on the 14th. of September, and the news of it being brought into England on the 6th. of October: Letters were written by the Council to the Lord Major and Aldermen of London, requiring them to come to St. Pauls, where high Mass was to be said, for the Peace now concluded between the Pope and the King, after which, Bonfires were ordered. One of the secret Articles of the Peace, was the restoring Pool to his Legatine Power.

A Peace made between the Pope and the King of Spain.

War being now proclaimed between England and France, the French sent to the Scottish Queen Regent, to engage Scotland in the War with England. Hereupon a Convention of the Estates was called. But in it there were two different Parties. Those of the Clergy liked now the English Interest, as much as they had been formerly jealous of it; and so refused to engage in the War: since they were at Peace with England. They had also a secret dislike to the Regent, for her kindness to the Heretical Lords. On the other hand, those Lords were ready enough to gain the Protection of the Regent, and the Favour of France; and therefore were ready to enter into the War; hoping that thereby they should have their Party made the stronger in Scotland, by the entertainment that the Queen Regent would be obliged to give to such as should fly out of England, for Religion. Yet the greater part of the Convention were against the War. The Queen Regent thought at least to engage the Kingdom in a defensive War, by forcing the English to begin with them. Therefore she sent D'Oisel, who was in chief command, to fortifie Aymouth; which by the last Treaty with England, was to be unfortified. So the Governour of Berwick making Inroads into Scotland for the disturbing of their Works; upon that, D'Oisel began the War and went into England, and besieged Warke Castle. The Scottish Lords upon this, met at Edenburgh, and complained that D'Oisel was engaging them them in a War with England, without their consent; and required him to return back, under pain of being declared an Enemy to the Nation: which he very unwillingly obeyed. But while he lay there, the Duke of Norfolk was sent down with some Troops, to defend the Marches. There was only one Engagement between him and the Kers; but after a long dispute, they were defeated. And many of them taken. The Queen Regent seeing her Authority was so little considered, writ to France, to hasten the Marriage of her Daughter to the Dolphin; for that he being thereupon invested with the Crown of Scotland, the French would become more absolute. Upon this a Message was sent from France to a Convention of Estates that sate in December, to let them know, that the Dolphin was now coming to be of Age, and therefore they desired they would send over some, to treat about the Articles of the Marriage. They sent the Arch-Bishop of Glasgow, the Bishop of Orkney, the Prior of St. Andrews, who afterwards was Earl of Murray, the Earls of Rothes, and Cassils, the Lord Fleeming; and the Provosts of Edenburgh and Mountross; some of every Estate, that in the Name of the three Estates they might conclude that Treaty. 1557.

These Wars comming upon England, when the Queens Treasure was quite exhausted, it was not easie to raise Money for carrying them on. They found such a backwardness in the last Parliament, that they were afraid, the supply from thence would not come easily, or at least, that some favour would be desired for the Hereticks. Therefore they tried first to raise Money by sending Orders under the Privy Seal, for the borrowing of certain Sums. But though the Council writ many Letters, to set on those Methods of getting Money; yet they being without, if not against Law, there was not much got this way: so that after all, it was found necessary to summon a Parliament, to assemble on the 20*th.* of January. In the end of the Year the Queen had Advertisements sent her from the King, that he understood the French had a design on Calais; but she, either for want of Money, or that she thought the place secure in the Winter, did not send these supplies that were necessary; and thus ended the Affairs of England this Year.

In Germany, there was a Conference appointed, to bring matters of Religion to a fuller settlement. Twelve Papists and twelve Protestants were appointed to manage it. Julius Pflugius, that had drawn the Interim, being the chief of the Papists, moved, that they should begin first with condemning the Heresie of Zuinglius. Melancthon, upon that, said it was preposterous to begin with the condemnation of errors, till they had first setled the Doctrines of Religion. Yet that which the Papists expected, followed upon this: for some of the fiercer Lutherans being much set against the Zuinglians, agreed to it. This raised heats among themselves, which made the Conference break up, without bringing things to any issue. Upon this occasion, men could not but see that Artifice of the Roman Church, which has been often used before and since, with too great success. When they cannot bear down those they call Hereticks with open force, their next way is to divide them among themselves, and to engage them into Heats about those lesser matters, in which they differ; hoping that by those animosities their endeavours, which being united, would be dangerous to the common Enemy, may not only be broken, but directed one against another. This is well enough known The Affairs of Germany.

1557. to all the Reformed; and yet many of them are so far from considering it, that upon every new occasion they are made use of to serve the same designs; never reflecting upon the advantages that have been formerly taken from such contentions.

A Persecution of Protestants in France.

In France, the number of the Protestants was now encreased much; and in Paris, in September this Year, there was a Meeting of about 200 of them in St. Germains to receive the Sacrament according to the way of Geneva: which being known to some of their Neighbours, they furnished themselves with Stones to throw at them when they broke up their Meeting. So when it was late, as they went home, Stones were cast at some of them: and the enraged Zealots forced the door, and broke in upon the rest. The men, drawing their Swords, made their way through them, and most of them escaped: but 160 Women, with some few Men, delivered themselves Prisoners to the Kings Officers that came to take them. Upon this there were published all the blackest calumnies that could be devised, of the loose and promiscuous embraces that had been in this Meeting: and so exactly had their Accusers copied from what the Heathens had anciently charged on the Meetings of the Christians, that it was said, they found the Blood of a Child, whom they had Sacrificed and eaten, among them. These things were confidently told at Court, where none durst contradict them, for fear of being judged a favourer of them. But afterwards there was printed an Apology for the Protestants. In it they gloried much, that the same false accusations by which the Heathens had defamed the Primitive Christians, were now cast on them. Those that were taken were proceeded against: Six Men and one Woman were burnt. It had gone further, if there had not come Envoys, both from the German Princes, and the Cantons of Switzerland, to interpose for them: upon which, since the King needed assistance in his Wars, especially from the latter, the Prosecution was let fall. The Pope was much troubled, when he heard that the King would exercise no further severity on the Hereticks: and though himself had hired them in his Wars, yet he said, the Affairs of France could not succeed, as long as their King had so many Hereticks in his Army. That King had also made two Constitutions that gave the Pope great offence: the one, that Marriages made by Sons under thirty, and Daughters under twenty five, without their Fathers consent, should be void; the other was for charging the Ecclesiastical Benefices with a Tax, and requiring all Bishops and Curates to reside on their Benefices. So scandalous a thing was Non-residence then held, that every where the Papists were ashamed of it. Upon which the Pope complained anew, that the King presumed to meddle with the Sacraments, and to tax the Clergy.

1558. Calais is besieged.

The beginning of the next Year was famous for the loss of Calais. The Lord Wentworth had then the Command of it; but the Garrison consisted only of 500 Men, and there were not above 200 of the Townsmen, that could be serviceable in a Siege. The Duke of Guise, having brought his Army out of Piedmont, was now in France, and being desirous, when the Constable was a Prisoner, to do some great Action which might raise him in reputation above the other, who was his only Competitor in France, set his thoughts on Calais, and the Territory about about it. There were two Forts on which the ſecurity of the Town depended. The one Newnambridge, a Mile from it, that commanded the Avenues to it from the Land; from which to the Town there was a way raiſed thorough a Marſh lying on both hands of it. On the other ſide, to the Sea, the Fort of Risbank commanded the Harbour; ſo that the whole ſtrength of the Place, lay in thoſe two Forts. 1558.

On the firſt of January the Duke of Guiſe came and ſate down before it. The Governour having but a ſmall Force within, did not think fit to weaken it by ſending ſuch Supplies as thoſe Forts required; ſo they were taken without any oppoſition. Then the Town being thus ſhut up, the Enemy preſſed it hard, and drew the Water out of its Current, by which the Ditches about the Town and Caſtle were drained; and having prepared devices for their Souldiers to paſs them without ſticking in the Mire, they made the Aſſault; after they had opened a great breach by their Ordnance: and when the Sea was out, others croſſed on that ſide, and ſo carried the Caſtle by Storm; which the Governour had look'd on as impregnable, and ſo had brought his chief Force to the defence of the Town. Seeing the Caſtle thus unexpectedly loſt, he did all he could with his ſmall force to regain it; but being ſtill repulſed, and having loſt 200 of his beſt men, he was forced to render the Place on the 7th. of January. By their Articles, all the Townſmen and Souldiers were to go whither they pleaſed, only he and fifty more were to be Priſoners of War. Thus in one Weeks time, and in Winter, was ſo ſtrong a Town loſt by the Engliſh, that had been for many Ages in their Hands. It was taken 210 years ago by Edward the third after the Battle of Creſſy; and was ſtill called the Key of France, as long as it continued in Engliſh Hands. But now, in a time of War, it was in as ill a condition, as if they had been in the profoundeſt Peace: And though Philip had offered to put men into it, yet the Engliſh, being jealous that thoſe Advertiſements were but Artifices of his, to perſwade them to admit a Spaniſh Garriſon into it, left it in ſo naked a condition, that the Governour could do little to preſerve it. But yet, that it might appear he had not been too careful of himſelf, he was content to agree that he ſhould be a Priſoner of War. And taken.

From this, the Duke of Guiſe went to Guiſnes, commanded by the Lord Gray; whoſe Garriſon conſiſted of about 1100 Men: but the loſs of Calais had much diſheartned them. At the firſt impreſſion the French carried the Town, and the Garriſon retired into the Caſtle: but Gray, breaking out on the Souldiers that were fallen to plundering, did beat them out again, and burnt the Town. The French battered the Caſtle, till they made a breach in the Out-works of it, which they carried, after a long reſiſtance, in which the Engliſh loſt 300. So the Lord Gray was fain to render it; He, and all the Officers, being made Priſoners of War. There was another Caſtle in that little County, Hammes, which lay in ſuch a Mariſh, that was thought inacceſſible: but the Garriſon that was in it, abandoned it, without ſtaying till the Enemy came before them. The French Writers ſpeak more meanly of the reſiſtance made by the Lord Gray, than of that made by the Lord Wentworth: for there went out of Guiſnes about 800 Souldiers, whereas there went not out of Calais above 300. But one of our own Writers magnifies the Lord Gray, and ſpeaks diſhonourably of the Lord Wentworth, adding, which was an Invention Gaiſnes and the reſt of that Territory taken by the French.

1558. vention of his own, that he was attainted for the loſing of Calais. All that Hiſtorians ground for it, is only this, that there was indeed a Mock-citation iſſued out againſt the Lord Wentworth; to which he could not appear, being not freed from his impriſonment by the French all this Reign: but he came over in the beginning of the next, when the Treaty of Peace being on foot, he obtained his liberty, and was tryed by his Peers in the firſt Parliament in Queen Elizabeths Reign, and acquitted. It was, as he alledged for himſelf, his misfortune to be employed in a Place, where he had not ſo much as a fourth part of the Number of Men that was neceſſary to hold out a Siege. But in the declinations of all Governments, when loſſes fall out, they muſt be caſt on thoſe that are entruſted, to excuſe thoſe who are much more guilty, by neglecting to ſupply them as the Service required. Among the Priſoners, one of the chief was Sir Edward Grimſton, the Comptroller of Calais, and a Privy Counſellor: He had often, according to the duty of his Place, given advertiſement of the ill condition the Garriſon was in. But whether thoſe to whom he writ were corrupted by French Money, or whether the low ſtate of the Queens Treaſury made that they were not ſupplied, is not certain. It was intended he ſhould not come over to diſcover that; and therefore he was let lie a Priſoner in the Baſtile; and no care was taken of him or the other Priſoners: The Ranſome ſet on him was ſo high, that having loſt a great eſtate, which he had purchaſed about Calais, he reſolved not to do any further prejudice to his Family by redeeming his liberty at ſuch a rate; and intended either to continue a Priſoner, or make his eſcape. He lay above two years in the Baſtile, and was lodged in the top of it: at the end of that time he procured a File, and ſo cut out one of the Bars of the Window, and having a Rope conveyed to him, he changed Clothes with his Servant, and went down on the Rope, which proving a great deal too ſhort, he leaped a great way, and having done that before the Gates were ſhut, made his eſcape without being diſcovered. But his Beard, which was grown long, made him fear he ſhould be known by it. Yet by a happy Providence he found in the Pockets of his Servants Cloaths a pair of Sciſſars, and going into the Fields, did ſo cut his Beard, that he could not have been known; and having learnt the Art of War in the Company of the Scotch Guard de Mauche, he ſpake that Dialect: So he paſſed as a Scotch Pilgrim; and by that means eſcaped into England. And there he offered himſelf to a Trial, where, after the Evidence was brought, his Innocence did ſo clearly appear, that the Jury were ready to give their Verdict without going from the Bar. So he was acquitted, and lived to a great Age, dying in his 98*th*. Year. He was Great Grand-father to my Noble Patron and Benefactor Sir Hobotle Grimſton, which has made me the more willing to enlarge thus concerning him, to whoſe Heir I owe the chief opportunities and encouragements I have had in compoſing this Work.

Now the Queen had nothing left of all thoſe Dominions that her Anceſtors had once in France, but the Iſles of Jerſey, Gernſey, Alderney, and Sarke. The laſt of theſe, being a naked Place, only inhabited by ſome Hermites; but having the advantage of a Harbour, the French made themſelves Maſters of it. The ſtrength of it conſiſted in the difficulty of the aſcent: the little Fort they had, being acceſſible but in one place, where where two could only go up a-breaſt. So an ingenious Fleming reſolved to beat them out of it: He came thither, and pretending he had a Friend dead in his Ship, offered them a good Preſent, if he might bury him within their Chappel. The French conſented to it, if he would ſuffer himſelf and his Men to be ſo narrowly ſearched, that they might not bring ſo much as a Knife a-ſhoar. This he conſented to; and as he landed with his Coffin, the French-men were to ſend ſome to his Ship to receive the Preſent. So the Coffin being carried into the Chappel, and the French apprehending nothing from unarmed men; the Coffin was opened, which was full of good Arms, and every man furniſhing himſelf they broke out upon the French, and took them all; as their Companions in the Ship did thoſe who went a-board to bring the Preſent. 1558.

And retaken by an Ingenious Stratagem.

The news of the loſs of Calais, filled England with great diſcontent. Thoſe who were otherwiſe diſſatisfied with the conduct of Affairs, took great advantages from it, to diſparage the Government, which the Queen had put into the Hands of Prieſts, who underſtood not War, and were not ſenſible of the Honour of the Nation. It was ſaid, they had drained her Treaſury by the reſtitutions and foundations they got her to make; and being ſenſible how much the Nation hated them, they had ſet the Queen on other ways of raiſing Money than by a Parliament; ſo that never did the Parliament meet, with greater diſorder and trouble, than now. But that loſs affected none ſo deeply as the Queen her ſelf; who was ſo ſenſible of the diſhonour of it, that ſhe was much oppreſſed with melancholly, and was never chearful after it. Thoſe who took on them to make Comments on Divine Providence, expounded this loſs as their affections led them. Thoſe of the Reformation ſaid, it was Gods heavy Judgment upon England, for rejecting the light of his Goſpel, and perſecuting ſuch as ſtill adhered to it. But on the other hand, the Papiſts ſaid, Calais could not proſper, ſince it had been a Receptacle of Hereticks, where the Laws againſt them had never been put in execution. King Philip, as ſoon as he heard of this loſs, wrote over to England, deſiring them to raiſe a great Force with all poſſible haſte, and ſend it over to recover Calais before it was fortified: and he would draw out his Army, and joyn with them; for if they did not retake it before the ſeaſon of working about it came on, it was irrecoverably loſt. Upon which there was a long Conſultation held about it. They found they could not to any purpoſe ſend over under 20000 Men; the Pay of them for five Months would riſe to 170000 l. Garriſons, and an Army againſt the Scots, and ſecuring the Coaſts againſt the French, would come to 150000 l. The ſetting out of a Fleet, and an Army by Sea, would amount to 200000 l. and yet all that would be too little, if the Danes and Swedes, which they were afraid of, ſhould joyn againſt them. There was alſo great want of Ammunition and Ordnance, of which they had loſt vaſt quantities in Calais and Guiſnes. All this would riſe to be above 520000 l. and they doubted much whether the People would endure ſuch Impoſitions, who were now grown ſtubborn, and talked very looſely. So they did not ſee how they could poſſibly enter into any Action this Year. One Reaſon, among the reſt, was ſuggeſted by the Biſhops, they ſaw a War would oblige them to a greater moderation in their Proceedings at home.

Great diſcontents in England.

1558. home: they had not done their Work, which they hoped a little more time would perfect; whereas a ſlack'ning in that, would raiſe the drooping Spirits of thoſe whom they were now purſuing. So they deſired another Year to proſecute them, in which time they hoped ſo to clear the Kingdom of them, that with leſs danger they might engage in a War, the Year after. Nor did they think it woud be eaſie to bring new raiſed men, to the hardſhips of ſo early a Campagne; and they thought the French would certainly work ſo hard in repairing the breaches, that they would be in a good condition to endure a ſtrait and long Siege. All this they wrote over to the King on the firſt of February, as appears from their Letter, which will be found in the Collection.

A Parliament is called. The Parliament was opened on the 20*th.* of January, where the Convocation, to be a good Example to the two Houſes, granted a Subſidy of eight Shillings in the Pound, to be paid in four Years: In the Houſe of Peers, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and the Prior of St. John of Jeruſalem, took their Places according their Writs. Treſham, that had given great aſſiſtance to the Queen upon her firſt coming to the Crown, was now made Prior. But how much was done towards the endowing of that Houſe, which had been formerly among the richeſt of England, I do not know. On the 24*th.* of January the Lords ſent a Meſſage to the Commons, deſiring that the Speaker, with ten or twelve of that Houſe, ſhould meet with a Committee of the Lords; which being granted, the Lords propoſed, that the Commons would conſider of the defence of the Kingdom. What was at firſt demanded, does not appear; but after ſeveral days arguing about it, they agreed to give one Subſidy, a Fifteenth, and a Tenth; and ordered the Speaker to let the Queen know what they had concluded: who ſent them her hearty Thanks for it. Then, Complaints being made of ſome French-men that were not Denizens, it was carried, that they ſhould go out of the Kingdom, and not return during the War. The Abbot of Weſtminſter, finding the Revenues of his Houſe were much impaired, thought, that if the old Priviledges of the Sanctuary were confirmed, it would bring him in a good Revenue from thoſe that fled to it: ſo he preſſed for an Act to confirm it. He brought a great many ancient Grants of the Kings of England, which the Queen had confirmed by her Letters Patents; but they did not prevail with the Houſe, who proceeded no further in it. In this Parliament the Procurers of wilful Murder were denied the Benefit of Clergy; which was carried in the Houſe of Lords by the greater number, as it is in their Journals. The Biſhops did certainly oppoſe it, though none of them entred their diſſent. Sir Ambroſe, and Sir Robert Dudley, two Sons of the late Duke of Northumberland, were reſtored in Blood. The Counteſs of Suſſex's Joynture was taken from her for her living in Adultery ſo publickly, as was formerly mentioned. In the end of the Seſſion a Bill was put in, for the confirming of the Queens Letters Patents: it was deſigned chiefly for confirming the Religious Foundations ſhe had made. As this went through the Houſe of Commons, one Coxley ſaid, He did not approve ſuch a general Confirmation of thoſe ſhe had given, or might give: leſt this might be a colour for her to diſpoſe of the Crown from the right Inheritors. The Houſe was much offended at this, and expreſſed such dislike at the imagination that the Queen would alienate the Crown; that they both shewed their esteem for the Queen, and their resolution to have the Crown descend after her death to her Sister. Coxley was made to withdraw, and voted guilty of great irreverence to the Queen. He asked pardon, and desired it might be imputed to his youth: yet he was kept in the Serjeants Hands, till they had sent to the Queen to desire her to forgive his offence. She sent them word, that at their sute she forgave it; but wished them to examine him, from whence that motion sprung. There is no more entred about it in the Journal, so that it seems to have been let fall. The Parliament was, on the seventh of March, prorogued to the seventh of November. 1558.

Soon after this, the King of Sweden sent a Message secretly to the Lady Elizabeth, who was then at Hatfield, to propose Marriage to her. King Philip had once designed to marry her to the Duke of Savoy, when he was in hope of Children by the Queen: but that hope vanishing, he broke it off, and intended to reserve her for himself. How far she entertained that motion, I do not know: but for this from Sweden, she rejected it, since it came not to her by the Queens direction. But to that it was answered, the King of Sweden would have them begin with her self, judging that fit for him as he was a Gentleman; and her good liking being obtained, he would next, as a King, address himself to the Queen. But she said, as she was to entertain no such Propositions unless the Queen sent them to her; so if she were left to her self, she assured them she would not change her state of Life. Upon this, the Queen sent Sir Tho. Pope to her, in April, to let her know how well she approved of the Answer she had made to them; but they had now delivered their Letters, and made the Proposition to her, in which she desired to know her mind. She thanked the Queen for her favour to her, but bade Pope tell her, that there had been one or two noble Propositions made for her in her Brother King Edwards time; and she had then desired to continue in the state she was in, which of all others pleased her best, and she thought there was no state of Life comparable to it: She had never before heard of that King, and she desired never to hear of that Motion more: She would see his Messenger no more, since he had presumed to come to her without the Queens leave. Then Pope said, he did believe, if the Queen offered her some Honourable Marriage, she would not be averse to it: She answered, What she might do afterwards she did not know; but protested solemnly, that as she was then inclined, if she could have the greatest Prince in Christendom, she would not accept of him; though perhaps the Queen might think, this flowed rather from a Maids modesty, than any setled determination in her. This I take from a Letter Pope wrote about it, which is in the Collection. Yet her Life at this time was, neither so pleasant, nor so well secured, but that, if her aversion to a married state had not been very much rooted in her, it is not unlikely, she would have been glad to be out of the Hands of her unkind Keepers; who grew the more apprehensive of her, the more they observed her Sister to decay: and, as the Bishops did apprehend, 1558. hend, she would overthrow all that they had been building, and cementing with so much Blood; so some of them did not spare to suggest the putting of her out of the way: and now that she is so near the Throne, in the Course of this History, I shall look back through this Reign, to give account of what befel her in it.

She was hardly used all this Reign.

When she was suspected to be accessory to Wiats Conspiracy; the day after his breaking out, the Lord Hastings, Sir Tho. Cornwallis, and Sir Richard Southwell, were sent for her to come to Court. She then lay sick at her House at Ashridge: but that excuse not being accepted, she was forced to go: so being still ill, she came by slow Journeys to the Queen. She was kept shut up in private at Court, from the fourth of March to the 16*th*. and then Gardiner, with nineteen of the Council, came to examine her about Wiats Rebellion. She positively denied she knew any thing of it, or of Sir Peter Carew's designs in the West, which they also objected to her. In conclusion, they told her the Queen had ordered her to be sent to the Tower, till the Matter should be further enquired into; and though she made great Protestations of her Innocence, yet she was carried thither, and led in by the Traitors Gate; all her own Servants being put from her. Three Men, and as many Women of the Queens Servants, were appointed to attend on her; and no Person was suffered to have access to her. Sir John Gage, who was the Lieutenant of the Tower, treated her very severely, kept her closely shut up, without leave to walk either in the Galleries, or on the Leads; nor would he permit her Servants to carry in her Meat to her, but he did that by his own Servants. The other Prisoners were often examined about her, and some were put to the Rack, to try if they could be brought any way to accuse her: but though Wiat had done it, when he hoped to have saved his own Life by so base an Action; yet he afterwards denied that she knew any of their designs: and lest those denials he made at his Examinations might have been suppressed, and his former Depositions be made use of against her, he declared it openly on the Scaffold at his death. After some days close Imprisonment, upon great intercession made by the Lord Chandois, then Constable of the Tower, it was granted that she might sometimes walk in the Queens Rooms, in the presence of the Constable, the Lieutenant and three Women, the Windows being all shut. Then she got leave to walk in a little Garden for some Air; but all the Windows that opened to it were to be kept shut, when she took her Walk: and so jealous were they of her, that a Boy of four years old was severely threatned, and his Father sent for and chid, for his carrying Flowers to her. The Lord Chandois was observed to treat her with too much respect; so he was not any more trusted with the charge of her, which was committed to Sir Hen. Benefield. About the middle of May she was sent, under the Guard of the Lord Williams, and Benefield, to Woodstock. She was so straitly kept, and Benefield was so sullen to her, that she believed they intended to put her privately to death. The Lord Williams treated her nobly at his House on the way, at which Benefield was much disgusted. When she was at Woodstock, she was still kept under Guards, and but seldom allowed to walk in the Gardens, none being suffered to come near her. After many Months Imprisonment, she obtained leave to write to the Queen; Benefield being to see all she wrote. It was believed that some were sent secretly to kill her; but the Orders were given so strictly, that none of them could come near her, without a Special Warrant; and so she escaped at that time. But after King Philip understood the whole Case, he broke all those designs, as was formerly shewn; and prevailed to have her sent for to Court. When she came to Hampton-Court, she was kept still a Prisoner. Many of the Council, Gardiner in particular, dealt often with her, to confess her offences, and submit to the Queens mercy. She said, she had never offended her, not so much as in her thoughts; and she would never betray her own Innocency by such a Confession. One night when it was late, she was sent for by the Queen, before whom she kneeled down, and protested she was, and ever had been, a most faithful Subject to her. The Queen seemed still to suspect her, and wished her to confess her guilt, otherwise she must think, she had been unjustly dealt with: She answered, That she was not to complain, but to bear her burden, only she begged her to conceive a good opinion of her. So they parted fairly, which King Philip had perswaded the Queen to; and being afraid that the sowerness of the Queens temper, might lead her into passion, he was secretly in a corner of the Room, to prevent any further breach, in case she should have been transported into new heats: but there was no occasion given for it. Soon after that, she was discharged of her Guards, and suffered to retire into the Country; but there were always many Spies about her, and she, to avoid all suspition, medled in no sort of business, but gave her self wholly to Study. And thus she passed these five years, under no small fears and apprehensions; which was perhaps a necessary preparation for that high degree to which she was soon after advanced, and which she held in the greatest and longest course of Prosperity and Glory, that ever any of her Sex attained to. 1558.

The Bishops, when the Parliament was sitting, did always intermit their Cruelties: but as soon as it was over, they fell to them afresh. On the 28*th.* of March, Cuthbert Simpson, that was in Deacons Orders, with two others, were burnt in Smithfield. Simpson had been taken with Rough, that suffered the Year before this. He was put to much torture, he lay three hours on the Rack; besides, two other Inventions of Torture were made use of to make him discover all those in London who met with them in their private Assemblies: but he would tell nothing, and shewed such patience, that the Bishops did publickly commend him for it. On the ninth of April a Man was burnt at Hereford: On the 19*th.* of May three Men were burnt at Colchester. At this time, Complaints being made to the Queen, that Books of Heresie, Treason, and Sedition, were either brought in from Forreign Parts, or secretly printed in England, and dispersed among her Subjects; she set out, on the sixth of June, a Proclamation of a strange nature: "That whosoever had "any of these, and did not presently burn them, without reading, The Progress of the Persecution.

1558. "or shewing them to any other Person, they should be esteemed Rebels; and without any further delay, be executed by the Martial "Law. On the 27*th.* of that Month, when seven were to be led out to be burnt in Smithfield, it was proclaimed in the Queens Name, that no Man should pray for them, or speak to them, or say, God help them: which was thought a strain of barbarity beyond all the Examples of former times, to deprive dying Men of the good wishes and prayers of their Friends. But however this might restrain Men from giving outward Signs of their praying for them, it could not bind up their inward and secret Devotions. Those seven had been taken at a Meeting in Islington, with many others; of whom some died in Prison, and six others were burnt at Brainford the 14th. of July. The rest of them were kept by Bonner, who now seemed to have been glutted with the Blood of so many Innocents, and therefore to have put a stop to the effusion of more: yet those that were kept Prisoners by him, did not so entirely escape his fury, but that he disciplined them himself with Rods, till he was weary; and so gave over that odd way of Pastoral Correction, rather to ease himself, than in pity to them whom he whipt. On the tenth of July a Minister was burnt at Norwich: On the second or third of August, a Gentleman was burnt near Winchester: In August four were burnt at Bury; and in November three more were burnt there. On the fourth of November a Man, and a Woman, were burnt at Ipswich: At that time a Woman was burnt at Exeter: and to close up all, on the tenth of November three Men, and two Women, were burnt at Canterbury, which made in all thirty nine this Year. There had been seventy nine burnt the former Year, ninety four the Year before that, and seventy two the first Year of the Persecution: which in all come to 284. But he that writ the Preface to Bishop Ridley's Book De Cœna Domini, who is supposed to be Grindal, afterwards Arch-bishop of Canterbury, says, That in the two first Years of the Queens Persecution there were above eight hundred put to most cruel kinds of death for Religion: by which it seems Fox, on whom I depend in the Numbers I have assigned, has come far short in his account. Besides those that were burnt, many others died in Bonds, of whom there are sixty reckoned. There were also great Numbers of those who were vexed with long and grievous Imprisonment: and though they redeemed their Lives by the renouncing, or rather the dissembling of their Consciences; yet this being but forced from them, they carried with them their old Opinions; and the Wound they gave their Consciences to save their Lives, as it begot in many of them great horrour for what they had done, so it raised in them the most mortal hatred to those who had driven them to such straits: so that if that Religion was hateful before to the Nation, for the Impostures and Scandals that were discovered in the Clergy, and some few Instances of their Cruelty, the repeated Burnings, and other Cruelties, of which now they saw no end, did encrease their aversion to it beyond all expression.

The Method of the Persecutions of this Reign.

At first the Bishops dealt earnestly with those who were brought before them, to recant; and were ready at any time to receive them: the Queens Pardon was also sent to them as they were ready to

to be tied to the Stake, if they would then turn. But now it was 1558.
far otherwiſe. For in the Council-Books there is an Entry made of a Letter, written on the firſt of Auguſt this Year, to Sir Richard Pexall Sheriff of Hampſhire, ſignifying, "That the Queen thought it very "ſtrange, that he had delayed the Execution of the Sentence againſt "one Bembridge, condemned of Hereſie, becauſe he had recanted: "requiring him to execute it out of hand, and if he ſtill continued "in the Catholick Faith, which he outwardly pretended, he was "then to ſuffer ſuch Divines as the Biſhop of Wincheſter ſhould ap- "point, to have acceſs to him for confirming him in the Faith, and "to attend on him at his death, that he might die Gods Servant: "and as ſoon as the Sheriff had thus burnt him, he was to come to "the Council, and anſwer for his preſumption in delaying it ſo long. The Matter of Fact was thus: Bembridge being tied to the Stake, and the Fire taking hold on him, he, through the violence of it, yielded, and cried out, I recant. Upon which, the Sheriff made the Fire be put out; and Bembridge Signed ſuch a Recantation as Doctor Seton, who was near him, writ for him: but for all that, upon this Order of Council, he was burnt; and the Sheriff was put in the Fleet: ſo that now it appeared that it was not ſo much the converſion of thoſe they called Hereticks, as their deſtruction, that the Biſhops deſired: and ſo much were their Inſtruments ſet on theſe Severities, that though they ſaw the Queen declining ſo faſt, that there was no appearance of her living many days; yet the Week before ſhe died, they burnt, as hath been ſaid, five together in one Fire at Canterbury.

There was nothing done in the War with France this Year, but the ſending out a Fleet of 120 Ships, with 7000 Land-men in it, under the Command of the Lord Clinton; who landed at Port Conquet, in the Point of Brittain, where after a ſmall reſiſtance made by the French, he burnt the Town; but the Country being gathered together, the Engliſh were forced to return to their Ships, having loſt above 600 of their Men. The deſign was, to have ſeized on Breſt, and fortified it; which was propoſed by King Philip, who had ſent thirty of his Ships to their aſſiſtance. This the French knowing by ſome of the Priſoners whom they took, went and fortified Breſt, and kept a great Body of Men together, to reſiſt in caſe the Engliſh ſhould make a ſecond impreſſion. But the Lord Clinton, ſeeing he could do nothing, returned, having made a very expenſive and unproſperous attempt. The Engliſh had loſt their Hearts; the Government at home was ſo little acceptable to them, that they were not much concerned to ſupport it; they began to think, Heaven was againſt them. An unhappy Expedition againſt France.

There were many ſtrange accidents at home, that ſtruck terror in them. In July, Thunder broke near Nottingham, with ſuch violence, that it beat down two little Towns, with all the Houſes and Churches in them: the Bells were carried a good way from the Steeples, and the Lead that covered the Churches, was caſt 400 Foot from them, ſtrangely wreathed. The River of Trent, as it is apt upon Deluges of Rain to ſwell and over-run the Country; ſo it broke out this Year with extraordinary violence; many Trees were plucked Strange and unuſual accidents.

1558. up by the Roots, and with it there was such a Wind, that carried several Men and Children a great way, and dashed them against Trees or Houses, so that they died. Hail-stones fell that were fifteen Inches about in other Places: and which was much more terrible, a contagious intermitting Feaver, not unlike the Plague, raged every where: so that three parts of four of the whole Nation were infected with it. So many Priests died of it, that in many Places there were none to be had for the performing of the Offices. Many Bishops died also of it, so that there were many vacancies made by the Hand of Heaven, against Queen Elizabeth came to the Crown: and it spreading most violently in August, there were not Men enough in many Counties, to reap the Harvest: so that much Corn was lost. All these Symptoms concurred to encrease the aversion the People had to the Government; which made the Queen very willing to consent to a Treaty of Peace, that was opened at Cambray in October; to which she sent the Earl of Arundel, the Bishop of Ely, and Dr. Wotton, as her Plenipotentiaries.

A Treaty of Peace between England, France, and Spain.

The occasion of the Peace was from a meeting that the Bishop of Arras had with the Cardinal of Lorrain at Peronne; in which he proposed to him, how much Philip was troubled at the continuance of the War; their Forces being so much engaged in it, that they could make no resistance to the Turk, and the mean while Heresie encreasing and spreading in their own Dominions, while they were so taken up that they could not look carefully to their Affairs at home, but must connive at many things: therefore he pressed the Cardinal to perswade the King of France to an Accommodation. The Cardinal was easily induced to this, since besides his own zeal for Religion, he saw that he might thereby bear down the Constables greatness; whose Friends, chiefly his two Nephews, the Admiral, and Dandelot, who went then among the best Captains in France, were both suspect of being Protestants; upon which, the latter was shortly after put in Prison: so he used all his endeavours to draw the King to consent to it; in which he had the less opposition, since the Court was now filled with his Dependants, and his four Brothers, who had got all the great Officers of France into their Hands: and the Constable, and Admiral being Prisoners, there was none to oppose their Councils. The King thinking, that by the recovery of Calais, and the Places about it, he had gained enough to ballance the loss of St. Quintin, was very willing to hearken to a Treaty: and he was in an ill state to continue the War, being much weakned both by the loss he suffered last Year, and the blow that he received in July last: the Marshal de Thermes being enclosed by the Count of Egmont near Graveling, where the French Army being set on by the Count, and galled with the English Ordnance from their Ships that lay near the Land, was defeated, 5000 killed, the Marshal and the other chief Officers being taken Prisoners. These losses made him sensible, that his Affairs were in so ill a condition, that he could not gain much by the War.

The Battel of Graveling.

The Number of the Protestants growing in France.

The Cardinal was the more earnest to bring on a Peace, because the Protestants did not only encrease in their Numbers, but they came so openly to avow their Religion, that in the publick Walls with-without the Suburbs of St. Germain, they began to ſing Davids Pſalms in French Verſe. The newneſs of the thing amuſed many, the devotion of it wrought on others, the Muſick drew in the reſt; ſo that the Multitudes that uſed to divert themſelves in thoſe Fields, inſtead of their ordinary ſports, did now nothing for many nights, but go about ſinging Pſalms: and that which made it more remarkable was, that the King and Queen of Navarre came and joyned with them. That King, beſides the Honour of a Crowned Head, with the ſmall part of that Kingdom that was yet left in their Hands, was the firſt Prince of the Blood. He was a ſoft and weak Man; but his Queen, in whoſe right he had that Title, was one of the moſt extraordinary Women that any Age hath produced, both for knowledge far above her Sex, for a great judgment in Affairs, an Heroical Greatneſs of Mind, and all other Vertues; joyned to a high meaſure of Devotion, and true Piety: all which, except the laſt, ſhe derived to her Son Henry the Great. When the King of France heard of this Pſalmody, he made an Edict againſt it; and ordered the doers of it to be puniſhed: but the Numbers of them, and the reſpect to thoſe Crowned Heads, made the buſineſs to go no further. 1558.

On the 24*th*. of April was the Dolphin married to the Queen of Scotland. Four Cardinals, Bourbon, Lorrain, Chaſtilion, and Bertrand, with many of the Princes of the Blood, and the other great Men of France, and the Commiſſioners ſent from Scotland, were preſent. But ſcarce any thing adorned it more than the Epithalamium written upon it by Buchanan; which was accounted one of the Perfecteſt Pieces of Latin Poetry. After the Marriage was over, the Scotch Commiſſioners were deſired to offer the Dolphin the Enſigns of the Regality of Scotland, and to acknowledge him their King; but they excuſed themſelves, ſince that was beyond their Commiſſion, which only empow'red them to treat concerning the Articles of the Marriage, and to carry an account back to thoſe that ſent them. Then it was deſired that they would promote the buſineſs at their return to their Country; but ſome of them had expreſſed their averſion to thoſe Propoſitions ſo plainly, that it was believed they were poiſoned by the Brethren of the Houſe of Guiſe. Four of them died in France; the Biſhop of Orkney, and the Earls of Rothes, and Caſſils, and the Lord Fleeming. The Prior of St. Andrews was alſo very ſick; and though he recovered at that time, yet he had never any perfect health after it. When the other four returned into Scotland, a Convention of the Eſtates was called, to conſult about the Propoſitions they brought. The Dolphin marries the Queen of Scotland.

This Aſſembly conſiſts of all thoſe Members that make up a Parliament, who were then, the Biſhops, and Abbots, and Priors, who made the firſt Eſtate; the Noblemen, that were the ſecond Eſtate; and the Deputies from the Towns; one from every Town, only Edenburgh ſends two, were the third Eſtate. Anciently all that held Lands of the Crown, were ſummoned to Parliaments, as well the greater as the leſſer Barons. But in King James the firſt's time, the leſſer Barons, finding it a great charge to attend on ſuch Aſſemblies, deſired to be excuſed from it; and procured an Act of Parliament A Convention of Eſtates in Scotland.

ment exempting them, and giving them power to ſend from every County, two, three, four, or more, to repreſent them: but they afterwards thought this rather a Charge than a Priviledge, and did not uſe it; ſo that now the ſecond Eſtate conſiſted only of the Nobility. But the Gentry finding the prejudice they ſuffered by this, and that the Nobility grew too abſolute, procured, by King James the ſixth's favour, an Act of Parliament reſtoring them to that Right of ſending Deputies, two from every County, except ſome ſmall Counties that ſend only one. But according to the Ancient Law, none has a Vote in the Elections, but thoſe who hold Lands immediately of the Crown, of ſuch a value. The difference between a Parliament, and a Convention of Eſtates, is, that the former muſt be ſummoned forty days before it ſits; and then it meets in State, and makes Laws, which are to be prepared by a Committee of all the Eſtates, called the Lords of the Articles: but a Convention may be called within as few days as are neceſſary, for giving notice to all parts of the Nation to make their Elections: They have no Power of making Laws, being only called for one particular Emergent; which, during the diviſion of the Iſland, was chiefly upon the breaking out of War betwixt the two Nations, and ſo their Power was confined to the giving of Money for the occaſion which then brought them together.

In the Convention now held, after much debate and oppoſition, whether they ſhould conſent to the demand made by the Ambaſſador ſent from France, it was carried, that the Dolphin ſhould be acknowledged their King: great aſſurances being given, that this ſhould be only a bare Title, and that he ſhould pretend to no Power over them. So the Earl of Argile, and the Prior of St. Andrews, who had been the main ſticklers for the French Intereſt, upon the promiſes that the Queen Regent made them, that they ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of their Religion, were appointed to carry the Matrimonial Crown into France. But as they were preparing for their Journey, a great revolution of Affairs fell out in England.

A Seſſion of Parliament in England.

The Parliament met on the fifth of November. On the ſeventh the Queen ſent for the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, and ordered him to open to them the ill condition the Nation was in: for though there was a Treaty begun at Cambray, yet it was neceſſary to put the Kingdom in a poſture of defence, in caſe it ſhould miſcarry. But the Commons were now ſo diſſatisfied, that they could come to no reſolution. So on the 14*th*. day of November the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treaſurer, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Pembroke, the Biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Lincoln, and Carliſle, the Viſcount Mountacute, the Lords Clinton, and Howard, came down to the Houſe of Commons, and ſate in that place of the Houſe, where the Privy-Counſellors uſed to ſit. The Speaker left his Chair, and he, with the Privy-Counſellors that were of the Houſe, came and ſate on low Benches before them. The Lord Chancellor ſhewed the neceſſity of granting a Subſidy, to defend the Nation, both from the French, and the Scots. When he had done, the Lords withdrew; but though the Commons entred, both that, and the two following days, into the debate, they came to no iſſue in their Conſultations.

The

The Queen had never enjoyed her health perfectly, ſince the falſe conception that was formerly ſpoken of; upon which followed the neglect from her Husband, and the deſpair of Iſſue, that encreaſed her Melancholly: and this receiving a great addition from the loſs of Calais, and the other misfortunes of this Year; ſhe, by a long declination of Health, and decay of her Spirits, was now brought ſo low, that it was viſible ſhe had not many days to live: and a Dropſie coming on her, put a concluſion to her unhappy Reign, and unfortunate Life, on the 17*th.* of November, in the 43*d.* Year of her Age, after ſhe had reigned five Years, four Months, and eleven Days. 1558. The Queens ſickneſs. And death.

At the ſame time Cardinal Pool, as if one Star had governed both their Nativities, was alſo dying; and his end being haſtened by the Queens death, he followed her within ſixteen hours, in the 59*th.* Year of his Age. He left his whole eſtate to Aloiſi Prioli a Noble Venetian, with whom he had lived ſix and twenty years in ſo entire a friendſhip, that as nothing could break it off, ſo neither was any thing able to ſeparate them from one anothers company. Prioli, being invited by Pope Julius to come and receive a Cardinals Hat, preferred Pools company before it; and as he had ſupplied him in his neceſſities in Italy, ſo he left his Country now to live with him in England. Pool made him his Executor: But Prioli was of a more Noble temper, than to enrich himſelf by his Friends Wealth; for as he took care to pay all the Legacies he left, ſo he gave away all that remained, reſerving nothing to himſelf but Pools Breviary and Diary. And indeed the Cardinal was not a Man made to raiſe a Fortune, being, by the greatneſs of his Birth, and his excellent Vertues, carried far above ſuch mean deſigns. He was a Learned, Modeſt, Humble, and good natured Man; and had indeed ſuch Qualities, and ſuch a Temper, that if he could have brought the other Biſhops to follow his Meaſures, or the Pope and Queen to approve of them, he might have probably done much to have reduced this Nation to Popery again. But God deſigned better things for it: ſo he gave up the Queen to the Bloody Councils of Gardiner, and the reſt of the Clergy. It was the only thing in which ſhe was not led by the Cardinal. But ſhe imputed his Opinion in that Particular, rather to the ſweetneſs of his Temper, than to his Wiſdom and Experience: and he, ſeeing he could do nothing of what he projected in England, fell into a languiſhing, firſt of his mind, that brought after it a decay of his Health, of which he died. I have dwelt the more copiouſly on his Character, being willing to deny to none, of whom I write, the Praiſes that are due to them: and he being the only Man of that whole Party, of whom I found any reaſon to ſay much good, I was the more willing to enlarge about him, to let the World ſee, how little I am biaſſed in the account I give, by Intereſt or Opinion. So that if I have written ſharply of any others that have been mentioned in this Reign, it was the force of Truth, and my abhorrence of their barbarous Cruelties, that led me to it, more than my being of a contrary Perſwaſion to them. It is certain, that Pool's method, of correcting the manners of the Clergy, and being gentle to the Reformed, would in all appearence have been much more fatal to the Progreſs of the Reformation; that was ſet forward by nothing more, than Cardinal Pool dies. His Character.

1558. by the severities shewed to those that differed from them, and the indulgence of the Bishops to the vices of their own Party. Yet Pa had a vast superstition to the See of Rome; and though his being at the Council of Trent, had opened his Eyes to many things, which he had not observed before; yet he still retained his great submissi-on to that See, and thought it impossible to maintain the Order and Unity of the Church, but by holding Communion with it; which carried him, in opposition to many apprehensions himself had of some Theological Points, still to support the Interests of the Papacy. His neglect of the offer of it, when it was made to him, shewed this flowed from no aspirings of his own, but purely from his judgment: so that what mistakes soever, his Education, and Heats with King Henry, and the disasters of his Family, might have involved him in, it cannot be denied, that he was a Man of as great Probity and Vertue as most of the Age, if not all of that Church, in which he lived.

The Queens Character. For the Queen her self, her Character has appeared so manifestly in her Reign, that I need make no further description of her. She was a Woman of a strict and innocent Life; that allowed her self few of the diversions, with which Courts abound. She was bred to Learning, and understood the Latin Tongue well; but what further knowledge she had, does not appear to me. She was constant at her Devotions, and was as much addicted to the Interests and Humours of the Clergy, as they could have wished her. She had great resentments of her own ill usage in her Fathers and Brothers times; which made her be easily induced to take her revenge, though she coloured it with her zeal against Heresie. She did not much mind any other Affairs, but those of the Church: so that if she could have extirpated Heresie, she seemed to regard all other things very little; and being given up to follow the Dictates of Rome, with a nice scrupulosity of Conscience, it was no wonder she went on in these designs very vigorously. For as the Pope was ever calling on all Princes that were under his obedience, to set up the Courts of Inquisition; so the fourth General Councill of Lateran, to which, with the other General Councils, she payed no less reverence than to the Scriptures, charged Catholick Princes to extirpate all Hereticks out of their Dominions: such as were slack must be required to do it by their Bishops; and if that prevailed not, they were to be excommunicated by them; and if they continued negligent, and under that Censure a year; they were to be deprived by the Pope, and their Dominions to be given to others, who should take more care to extirpate Heresie. The Pope had also in February this Year published a Constitution, to which he had made all the Cardinals set their Hands, confirming all former Decrees and Canons against Hereticks; declaring, that all Prelates, Princes, Kings, and Emperors, that had fallen into Heresie, should be understood to be deprived of their Dominions, without any further Sentence: and that any Catholicks who would take the Forfeiture, should have a good Title to all that they invaded and seized. The Bishops, besides the other Canons binding them to proceed against Hereticks, were, by the Words of the Oath of Obedience which they swore to the Pope at their Consecration, engaged to oppose and persecute the Hereticks with all their might: so that they giving ſevere Counſels, and the Queens following them, flowed mainly from the Principles of their Religion: in which the ſowrneſs of her temper made it the more eaſie to perſwade her to a Compliance to thoſe courſes, to which her inclination led her without any ſuch Motives. To conclude, her death was as little lamented, as any of all our Princes ever was, the Popiſh Clergy being almoſt the only Mourners that were among her own People. 1558.

Thus lived and died Mary Queen of England, by Inheritance, and of Spain by Marriage.

OF THE SETTLEMENT OF THE REFORMATION OF RELIGION,

In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign.

QUEEN Maries Death was conceal'd for ſome hours. What the ſecret Conſultations were upon it is not known; but the Iſſue of them appeared about nine a Clock. Then the Lord Chancellor went to the Houſe of Lords, and firſt imparted to them the News of the Queens Death; which, as it ſtruck the Biſhops with no ſmall fear, ſo thoſe Counſellors who had been ſeven in their advices about her Siſter, did apprehend ſhe might remember it againſt them. Yet they all agreed to proclaim her Queen: and by the Zeal they expreſſed for her coming to the Crown, intended to balance the Errors they had formerly been led to, rather in compliance to the late Queens reſentments, than out of any ill will they bore her ſelf. They ſent for the Houſe of Commons, and the Lord Chancellor ſignified to them the Queens Death; which, he ſaid, would have been a much more ſorrowful loſs to them, if they had not ſuch a Succeſſor, that was the next and indiſputed Heir to the Crown, Elizabeth, of whoſe Right and Title none could make any queſtion; therefore they intended to proclaim her Queen, and deſired their Concurrence. This was Ecchoed with many and long repeated Cries. God ſave Queen Elizabeth. Long and happily may She Reign.

1558. Queen Elizabeth ſucceeds.

The

1558. The Parliament being declared to be dissolved by the late Queen's death, the Lords proclaimed Elizabeth Queen; and went into London, where it was again done by the Lord Major, and received every where with such excessive Joy, that there was no sign of sorrow expressed for the death of Queen Mary, but what the Priests shewed; who, in so publick and universal a Joy, were forced to betake themselves to secret Groans, since they durst not vent them in publick. Never did any before her come to the Throne with so many good Wishes and Acclamations, which the horror of the Cruelties, and the reflection of the Disasters of the former Reign, drew from the People, who now hoped to see better Times.

And proclaimed Queen.

The Queen was then at Hatfield, where having received the news of her Sisters death, and of her being proclaimed Queen, she came from thence to London. On the 19*th*. at Highgate all the Bishops met her, whom she received civilly, except Bonner, on whom she looked as defiled with so much Blood, that she could not think it fit to bestow any mark of her favour on him. She was received into the City, with Throngs much greater than even such Occasions used to draw together, and followed with the loudest shouts of Joy that they could raise. She lay that night at the Duke of Norfolk's House in the Charter-house, and next day went to the Tower. There at her Entry she kneeled down, and offered up thanks to God for that great change in her Condition; that whereas she had been formerly a Prisoner in that Place, every hour in fear of her Life, she was now raised to so high a Dignity. She soon cleared all People's apprehensions as to the hardships she had formerly met with, and shewed she had absolutely forgot from whom she had received them: even Bonfield himself not excepted; who had been the chief Instrument of her Sufferings: But she called him always her Goaler, which though she did in a way of Raillery, yet it was so sharp that he avoided coming any more to the Court.

And comes to London.

She presently dispatched Messengers to all the Princes of Christendom, giving notice of her Sisters death, and her Succession. She writ in particular to King Philip, a large acknowledgment of his kindness to her, to whom she held her self much bound for his interposing so effectually with her Sister for her Preservation. She also sent to Sir Edward Karn, that had been her Sisters Resident at Rome, to give the Pope the news of her Succession. The haughty Pope received it in his ordinary Stile, declaring, "That England was held in Fee of the Apostolick See, that she "could not succeed being Illegitimate, nor could he contradict the Declarations made in that matter by his Predecessors, Clement the seventh "and Paul the third: He said, it was great boldness in her to assume the "Crown without his consent; for which in reason she deserved no favour "at his hands: yet, if she would renounce her Pretensions, and resign "her self wholly to him, he would shew a fatherly affection to her, and "do every thing for her that could consist with the Dignity of the Apo"stolick See. When she heard of this, she was not much concerned at it; for she had written to Karn as she did to her other Ministers, and had renewed his Powers upon her first coming to the Crown, being unwilling in the beginning of her Reign to provoke any Party against her: But hearing how the Pope received this Address, she recalled Karn's Powers and commanded him to come home. The Pope on the other hand quired him not to go out of Rome, but to ſtay and take the care of an Hoſpital over which he ſet him: which it was thought that Karn procured to himſelf, becauſe he was unwilling to return into England, apprehending the change of Religion that might follow, for he was himſelf zealouſly addicted to the See of Rome. 1558.

As ſoon as Philip heard the news, he ordered the Duke of Feria, whom he had ſent over in his Name to comfort the late Queen in her ſickneſs, to Congratulate the new Queen, and in ſecret to propoſe Marriage to her; and to aſſure her he ſhould procure a Diſpenſation from Rome: and at the ſame time he ſent thither to obtain it. But the Queen, though very ſenſible of her Obligation to him, had no mind to the Marriage. It appeared by what hath been ſaid in the former Book, and by the Sequel of her whole Life, that though upon ſome occaſions, when her Affairs required it, ſhe treated about her Marriage, yet ſhe was firmly reſolved never to marry. Beſides this, ſhe ſaw her People were generally averſe to any Forreigner, and particularly to a Spaniard: and ſhe made it the ſteady Maxime of her whole Reign, from which ſhe never departed, to rule in their affections as well as over their Perſons. Nor did ſhe look on the Popes Diſpenſation as a thing of any force to warrant what was otherwiſe forbidden by God: and the Relation between King Philip and her being the Reverſe of that which was between her Father and Queen Katharine, it ſeeming to be equally unlawful for one Man to marry two Siſters, as it was for one Woman to be married to two Brothers, ſhe could not conſent to this Marriage without approving King Henry's with Queen Katharine: and if that were a good Marriage, then ſhe muſt be Illegitimate, as being born of a Marriage which only the unlawfulneſs of that could juſtifie. So Inclination, Intereſt, and Conſcience, all concurred to make her reject King Philip's motion. Yet ſhe did it in terms ſo full of Eſteem and Kindneſs for him, that he ſtill inſiſted in the Propoſition; in which ſhe was not willing to undeceive him ſo entirely, as to put him out of all hopes, while the Treaty of Cambray was in dependence, that ſo ſhe might tie him more cloſely to her Intereſts. King Philip courts her in Marriage.

The French, hearing of Queen Maries Death, and being allarum'd at Philips deſign upon the new Queen, ſent to Rome, to engage the Pope to deny the Diſpenſation, and to make him declare the Queen of Scotland to be the right Heir to the Crown of England, and the pretended Queen to be Illegitimate. The Cardinal of Lorrain prevailed alſo with the French King, to order his Daughter-in-law to aſſume that Title, and to put the Arms of England on all her Furniture. The Queen of Scots pretends to the Crown of England.

But now to return to England, Queen Elizabeth continued to employ ſome of the ſame Counſellors, that had ſerved Queen Mary: namely, Heath the Lord Chancellor, the Marqueſs of Wincheſter Lord Treaſurer, the Earls of Arundel, Shrewsbury, Derby, and Pembroke, the Lords Clinton, and Howard, Sir Thomas Cheyney, Sir William Petre, Sir John Maſon, Sir Richard Sackvile, and Dr. Wotton, Dean of Canterbury and York. Moſt of theſe had complied with all the Changes that had been made in Religion backward and forward ſince the latter end of King Henry's Reign, and were ſo dextrous at it, that they were ſtill employed in every new Revolution. To them, who were all Papiſts, the Queen added, the Marqueſs of Northampton, the Earl of Bedford, Sir Thomas Parre, The Queens Council.

1558. Parre, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Ambrose Cave, Sir Francis Knolles, and Sir William Cecil, whom she made Secretary of State; and soon after she sent for Sir Nicolas Bacon; who were all of the Reformed Religion. She renewed all the Commissions to those formerly intrusted, and ordered, that such as were imprisoned on the account of Religion should be set at liberty. After this, a Man that used to talk pleasantly, said to her, that he came to supplicate in behalf of some Prisoners not yet set at liberty: She asked who they were: he said they were Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, that were still shut up; for the People longed much to see them abroad. She answered him as pleasantly, she would first talk with themselves, and see whether they desired to be set at such liberty as he requested for them.

A Consultation about the change of Religion.

Now the two great things under Consultation were Religion, and Peace. For the former, some were appointed to consider how it was to be Reform'd. Beal, a Clark of the Council, gave advice to Cecil, that the Parliaments under Queen Mary should be declared void; the first being under a force, (as was before related) and the Title of Supream Head being left out of the Summons to the next Parliament before it was taken away by Law: from whence he inferred, that both these were not lawfully held or duly summoned; and this being made out, the Laws of King Edward were still in force: but this was laid aside as too high and violent a way of proceeding, since the annulling of Parliaments, upon little errors in Writs, or some particular disorders, was a Precedent of such consequence that to have proceeded in such a manner, would have unhinged all the Government and security of the Nation. More moderate Courses were thought on. The Queen had been bred up from her Infancy with a hatred of the Papacy, and a Love to the Reformation: But yet as her first Impressions in her Fathers Reign were in favour of such old Rites as he had still retained; so in her own Nature she loved State, and some Magnificence, in Religion, as well as in every thing else: She thought that in her Brothers Reign they had stript it too much of external Ornaments, and had made their Doctrine too narrow in some Points; therefore she intended to have some things explained in more general terms, that so all Parties might be comprehended by them. She inclined to keep up Images in Churches: and to have the manner of Christs Presence in the Sacrament left in some general words; that those who believed the Corporal Presence might not be driven away from the Church by too nice an Explanation of it. Nor did she like the Title of Supream Head; she thought it imported too great a Power, and came too near that Authority which Christ only had over the Church. These were her own private thoughts. She considered, nothing could make her Power great in the World abroad, so much as the uniting all her People together at home: her Fathers and her Brothers Reign had been much distracted by the Rebellions within England, and she had before her Eyes the Instance of the Coldness that the People had expressed to her Sister on all occasions for the maintaining or recovering of the Dominions beyond Sea: Therefore she was very desirous to find such a Temper in which all might agree. She observed that in the Changes formerly made, particularly in renouncing the Papacy, and making some Alterations in Worship, the whole Clergy had concurred, and so she resolved to follow and imitate these by easie steps.

There

There was a long Conſultation had about the Method of the Changes ſhe ſhould make. The ſubſtance of which ſhall be found in the Collection, in a Paper, where, in the way of Queſtion and Anſwer, the whole deſign of it is laid down. This Draught of it was given to Sir William Cecil, and does exactly agree with the account that Cambden gives of it. That Learned and Judicious Man has written the Hiſtory of this Queens Reign, with that Fidelity and Care, in ſo good a Stile, and with ſo much Judgment, that it is without queſtion the beſt part of our Engliſh Hiſtory: but he himſelf often ſays, that he had left many things to thoſe who ſhould undertake the Hiſtory of the Church; therefore in the Account of the beginnings of this Reign, as I ſhall in all things follow him with the credit that is due to ſo extraordinary a Writer, ſo having met with ſome things which he did not know, or thought not neceſſary in ſo ſuccinct a Hiſtory to enlarge on, I ſhall not be afraid to write after him, though the Eſteem he is juſtly in may make it ſeem ſuperfluous to go over theſe matters any more. 1558.

A Method of doing it propoſed. Collection Number 1.

"It ſeemed neceſſary for the Queen to do nothing before a Parliament "were called; for only from that Aſſembly could the Affections of the "People be certainly gathered. The next thing ſhe had to do, was to bal- "lance the dangers that threatned her both from abroad and at home. "The Pope would certainly excommunicate and depoſe her, and ſtir up "all Chriſtian Princes againſt her: The King of France would lay hold "of any opportunity to embroil the Nation; and by the aſſiſtance of "Scotland, and of the Iriſh, might perhaps raiſe troubles in her Dominions. "Thoſe that were in Power in Queen Maries time, and remained firm "to the old Superſtition, would be diſcontented at the Reformation of "Religion: the Biſhops and Clergy would generally oppoſe it: and "ſince there was a neceſſity of demanding Subſidies, they would take "occaſion, by the diſcontent the People would be in on that account, "to inflame them: and thoſe who would be diſſatisfied at the retaining "of ſome of the old Ceremonies, would on the other hand diſparage "the changes that ſhould be made, and call the Religion a Cloak'd "Papiſtry, and ſo alienate many of the moſt zealous from it. To "remedy all theſe things, it was propoſed to make Peace with France, "and to cheriſh thoſe in that Kingdom that deſired the Reformation. "The Courſes and Practiſes of Rome were not much to be feared. In "Scotland thoſe muſt be encouraged who deſired the like change in Re- "ligion; and a little Money among the Heads of the Families in "Ireland, would go a great way. And for thoſe that had born Rule "in Queen Maries time, ways were to be taken to leſſen their credit "throughout England: they were not to be too ſoon truſted or em- "ployed, upon pretence of Turning; but thoſe who were known "to be well affected to Religion, and the Queens Perſon, were to be "ſought after and encouraged. The Biſhops were generally hated by "the Nation: It would be eaſie to draw them within the Statute of "Præmunire, and upon their falling into it, they muſt be kept under "it, till they had renounced the Pope, and conſented to the Alterations that ſhould be made. The Commiſſions of the Peace, and for "the Militia, were to be carefully reviewed, and ſuch Men were to be "put in them, as would be firm to the Queens Intereſts. When the 1558. "Changes should be made, some severe punishments would make the "rest more readily submit. Great care was to be had of the Univer- "sities, and other publick Schools, as Eaton and Winchester, that the "next Generation might be betimes seasoned with the Love and Know- "ledge of Religion. Some learned Men, as Bill, Parker, May, Cox, "Whitehead, Grindall, Pilkington, and Sir Thomas Smith, were to be "ordered to meet and consider of the Book of Service. In the mean "while the People were to be restrained from Innovating without Au- "thority; and the Queen, to give some hope of a Reformation, might "appoint the Communion to be given in both kinds. The Persons "that were thought fit to be trusted with the Secret of these Consul- "tations, were the Marques of Northampton, the Earls of Bedford, and "Pembroke, and the Lord John Gray. The Place that was thought most "convenient for the Divines to meet in, was Sir Thomas Smiths House "in Channon-Row, where an Allowance was to be given for their En- "tertainment.

The forwardness in many to the Reformation.

As soon as the News of the Queens coming to the Crown was known beyond Sea, all those who had fled thither for shelter did re- turn into England: and those who had lived in Corners during the late Persecution, now appeared with no small assurance: and these, having notice of the Queens Intentions, could not contain themselves, but in many Places begun to make Changes, to set up King Edwards Service, to pull down Images, and to affront the Priests. Upon this the Queen, to make some discovery of her own Inclinations, gave order, that the Gospels and Epistles, and the Lords Prayer, the Apo- stles Creed, and the Ten Commandments, should be read in English, and that the Letany should be also used in English: and she forbade the Priests to Elevate the Host at Mass. Having done this, on the 27*th*. of December she set out a Proclamation against all Innovations, requiring her Subjects to use no other Forms of Worship than those she had in her Chappel, till it should be otherwise appointed by the Parliament, which she had summoned to meet on the 23*d*. of January. The Writs were issued out by Bacon, into whose Hands she had delivered the Great Seal. On the fifth of December, she performed her Sisters Funeral Rites with great Magnificence at Westminster. The Bishop of Winchester being appointed to preach the Ser- mon, did so mightily extoll her and her Government, and so se- verely taxed the disorders which he thought the Innovators were guilty of, not without reflections on the Queen, that he was thereupon con- fined to his House till the Parliament met.

Parker designed to be Arch- bishop of Canterbury.

One of the chief things under consultation, was, to provide Men fit to be put into the Sees that were now vacant, or that might fall to be so afterwards, if the Bishops should continue intractable. Those now vacant, were the Sees of Canterbury, Hereford, Bristol, and Bangor: and in the beginning of the next Year the Bishops of Norwich, and Glocester died: so that, as Cambden hath it, there were but fourteen Bishops living when the Parliament met. It was of great importance to find Men able to serve in these Employ- ments, chiefly in the See of Canterbury. For this, Dr. Parker was soon thought on. Whether others had the offer of it before him or not, I cannot tell: but he was writ to by Sir Nicholas Bacon on the ninth of December, to come up to London; and afterwards on the 30*th.* of December, by Sir William Cecil; and again by Sir Nicholas Bacon, on the fourth of January. He underſtood, that it was for ſome high preferment; and being a Man of an humble Temper, diſtruſtful of himſelf, that loved privacy, and was much diſabled by ſickneſs, he declined coming up all he could: he begged he might not be thought of for any publick Imployment, but that ſome Prebend might be aſſigned him, where he might be free both from care and Government; ſince the Infirmities, which he had contracted by his flying about in the Nights in Queen Maries time, had diſabled him from a more publick ſtation. That to which he pretended, ſhews how moderate his deſires were: for he profeſſed, an Imployment of twenty Nobles a year would be more acceptable to him than one of two hundred Pound. He had been Chaplain to Queen Anne Bullen, and had received a ſpecial charge from her, a little before ſhe died, to look well to the Inſtruction of her Daughter in the Principles of the Chriſtian Religion; and now the Queen had a grateful Remembrance of thoſe Services. This, joyned with the high Eſteem that Sir Nicholas Bacon had of him, ſoon made her reſolve to raiſe him to that great Dignity. And ſince ſuch high Preferments are generally, if not greedily ſought after, yet very willingly undertaken by moſt Men; it will be no unfit thing to lay open a modern Precedent, which indeed ſavours more of the Ancient than the latter Times; for then in ſtead of that Ambitus, which has given ſuch offence to the World in the latter Ages, it was ordinary for Men to fly from the offer of great Preferments. Some run away when they underſtood they were to be Ordained, or had been Elected to great Sees, and fled to a Wilderneſs. This ſhewed they had a great Senſe of the care of Souls, and were more apprehenſive of that weighty Charge, than deſirous to raiſe or enrich themſelves or their Families. It hath been ſhewed before, that Cranmer was very unwillingly engaged in the See of Canterbury; and now, he that ſucceeded him in that See with the ſame deſigns, was drawn into it with ſuch unwillingneſs that it was almoſt a whole Year before he could be prevailed upon to accept of it: The account of this will appear in the Series of Letters both written to him, and by him, on that Head; which were communicated to me by the preſent moſt Worthy and moſt Reverend Primate of this Church. I cannot mention him in this place without taking notice, that as in his other great Vertues and Learning he has gone in the ſteps of thoſe moſt eminent Arch-biſhops that went before him; ſo the whole Nation is witneſs how far he was from aſpiring to high Preferment, how he withdrew from all thoſe opportunities that might be ſteps to it, how much he was ſurprized with his unlooked-for advancement, how unwillingly he was raiſed, and how humble and affable he continues in that high Station he is now in: but this is a Subject that I muſt leave for them to enlarge on that ſhall write the Hiſtory of this preſent Age. 1558.

Bacon made Lord Keeper.

In the beginning of the next Year, the Queen having found that Heath Arch-bishop of York, then Lord Chancellor, would not go along with her, as he had done in the Reigns of her Father and Brother; and having therefore taken the Seals from him, and put them into Sir Nicholas Bacons Hand, did now by Patent create him Lord Keeper. Formerly those that were Keepers of the Seal, had no Dignity nor Authority annexed to their Office; they did not hear Causes, nor preside in the House of Lords, but were only to put the Seals to such Writs or Patents as went in course; and so it was only put in the Hands of a Keeper, but for some short Interval. But now Bacon was the first Lord Keeper that had all the Dignity and Authority of the Lord Chancellor conferred on him; and his not being raised to that high Title, perhaps flowed from his own modesty; for as he was one of the most Learned, most Pious, and Wisest Men of the Nation; so he retained in all his greatness a Modesty equal to what the Ancient Greeks and Romans had carried with them to their highest advancement. He was Father to the great Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans, and Lord Chancellor of England, that will be always esteemed one of the greatest Glories of the English Nation.

The Queens Coronation.

The Queen was now to be Crowned; and having gone on the twelfth of January to the Tower, she returned from thence in State on the thirteenth. As she went into her Chariot, she lifted up her "Eyes to Heaven, and blessed God that had preserved her to see "that Joyful Day, and that had saved her as he did his Prophet "Daniel out of the mouth of the Lyons. She acknowledged her "Deliverance was only from him to whom she offered up the "Praise of it. She passed through London in great Triumph: and having observed that her Sister, by the sullenness of her behaviour to the People, had much lost their affections; therefore she always used, as she passed through Crowds, but more especially this day, to look out of her Coach cheerfully on them, and to return the respects they paid her with great sweetness in her Looks; commonly saying, God bless You, my People; which affected them much. But nothing pleased the City more than her behaviour as she went under one of the Triumphal Arches; there was a rich Bible let down to her, as from Heaven, by a Child, representing Truth; She with great Reverence kissed both her Hands, and receiving it, kissed it, and laid it next her Heart; and professed she was better pleased with that Present, than with all the other magnificent ones that had been that day made her by the City: This drew Tears of Joy from the Spectators Eyes. And indeed this Queen had a strange Art of insinuating her self by such ways into the affections of her People. Some said she was too Theatrical in it; but it wrought her end; since by these little things in her deportment she gained more on their affections, than other Princes have been able to do by more real and significant Arts of Grace and Favour. The day following she was Crowned at Westminster by Oglethorp Bishop of Carlisle, all the other Bishops refusing to assist at that Solemnity. He, and the reſt of that Order, perceived that ſhe would change the Religion then eſtabliſhed, and looked on the Alterations ſhe had already made, as Pledges of more to follow; and obſerved by the favour that Cecil and Bacon had with her, that ſhe would return to what had been ſet up by her Brother. They had already turned ſo oft, that they were aſhamed to be turning at every time. Heath, Tonſtall, and Thirleby, had complied in King Edwards time, as well as in King Henry's; and though Thirleby had continued in credit and favour with them till the laſt; yet he had been one of thoſe who had gone to Rome, where he made ſuch publick Profeſſions of his reſpect to the Apoſtolick See; and he had alſo aſſiſted at the degradation and condemnation of Cranmer; ſo that he thought it indecent for him to return to that Way any more: Therefore he with all the reſt reſolved to adhere to what they had ſet up in Queen Maries time. There were two of King Edwards Biſhops yet alive, who were come into England, yet the Queen choſe rather to be conſecrated by a Biſhop actually in Office, and according to the old Rites, which none but Oglethorp could be perſwaded to do. After that, ſhe gave a general Pardon according to the Common Form. 1559.

On the 23*d.* of January, being the day to which the Parliament was ſummoned, it was Prorogued till the 25*th.* and then it was opened with a long Speech of the Lord Bacons, in which he laid "before them the diſtracted Eſtate of the Nation, both in matters "of Religion, and the other Miſeries that the Wars and late Cala"mities had brought upon them: all which he recommended to their "care. For Religion, the Queen deſired they would conſider of it "without heat or partial affection, or uſing any reproachful Term of "Papiſt or Heretick, and that they would avoid the Extreams, of "Idolatry and Superſtition on the one hand, and contempt and irrili"gion on the other; and that they would examine matters without "Sophiſtical Niceties, or too ſubtil Speculations, and endeavour to ſet"tle things ſo as might bring the People to an Uniformity and Cor"dial Agreement in them. As for the ſtate of the Nation, he ſhew"ed the Queens great unwillingneſs to lay new Impoſitions on them, "upon which he run out largely in her commendation, giving them "all aſſurance that there was nothing ſhe would endeavour more ef"fectually than the advancing of their Proſperity, and the preſerving "their affections. He laid open the loſs of Calais, with great refle"ctions on thoſe who had been formerly in the Government; yet "ſpoke of it as a thing which they could not at that time hope to "recover; and laid before them the charge the Government muſt "be at, and the neceſſities the Queen was in; adding in her Name, "that ſhe would deſire no Supply, but what they did freely and "cheerfully offer. The Parliament meets.

One of the firſt things that the Commons conſidered, was, whether the want of the Title of Supream Head, which the Queen had not yet aſſumed, was a Nullity in the Summons for this and other Parliaments in which it had been omitted; but after this had been conſidered ſome days, it was judged to be no nullity; for the annulling 1559. nulling of a Parliament, except it had under a force, or for ſome other error in the Conſtitution, was a thing of dangerous Conſequence.

The Treaty at Cambray. But leaving the Conſultations at Weſtminſter, I ſhall now give an account of the Treaty of Peace at Cambray. That at which things ſtuck moſt, was the rendring of Calais again to the Engliſh, which the French did poſitively refuſe to do. For a great while Philip demanded it with ſo much earneſtneſs, that he declared he would make Peace on no other terms; ſince as he was bound in point of Honour to ſee the Engliſh, who engaged in the War only on his account, reſtored to the condition that they were in at the beginning of it; ſo his Intereſt made him deſire that they might be maſters of that Place, by which, it being ſo near them, they could have the Conveniency of ſending over Forces to give a diverſion to the French at any time thereafter, as their Alliances with him ſhould require. But when Philip ſaw there was no hope of a Marriage with the Queen, and perceived that ſhe was making alterations in Religion, he grew leſs careful of her Intereſts, and ſecretly agreed a Peace with the French. But that he might have ſome colour to excuſe himſelf for abandoning her, he told her Ambaſſador, that the French had offered him full ſatisfaction in all his own concerns, ſo that the Peace was hindered only by the conſideration of Calais; and therefore, unleſs the Engliſh would enter into a League with him for keeping up the War ſix years longer, he muſt ſubmit to the neceſſity of his Affairs. The Queen perceiving that ſhe was to expect no more aſſiſtance from the Spaniard, who was ſo much engaged to the old Superſtition, that he would enter into no firſt League with any whom he accounted an Heretick, was willing to liſten to the Meſſages that were ſent her from France, by the Conſtable and others, inducing her to agree to a Peace. She on the other hand complained that the Queen of Scotland, and her Husband in her Right, had aſſumed the Title and Arms of England: It was anſwered, That was done as the younger Brothers in Germany carried the Title of the great Families from whence they were deſcended; and for Titles, the Queen of England had little Reaſon to quarrel about that, ſince ſhe carried the Title, and gave the Arms of France.

A Peace with France agreed to. The Queen and her Council ſaw it was impoſſible for her to carry on the War with France alone. The laying heavy Impoſitions on her Subjects in the beginning of her Reign, might render her very ungrateful to the Nation, who loved not to be charged with many Subſidies: and when the War ſhould produce nothing but ſome Waſts on the French Coaſts, which was all that could be expected, ſince it was unreaſonable to look for the Recovery of Calais, it might turn all the Joy they were now in at her coming to the Crown into as general a diſcontent. It was the ruine of the Duke of Somerſet, that he had engaged in a War in the beginning of King Edwards Reign, when he was making Changes in Religion at home: therefore it was neceſſary to yield to the neceſſity of the time, eſpecially ſince the loſs of Calais was no reproach on the Queen, but on her Siſter: ſo it was reſolved on, to make a general Peace, that being at quiet with their Neighbours, they might with the leſs danger apply themſelves to the correcting what was amiſs in England, both in Religion, and the Civil Government. At length a Peace was made on theſe Terms, That there ſhould be free Commerce between the Kingdoms of England, France, and Scotland: the French ſhould keep Calais for eight years; and at the end of that time ſhould deliver it to the Engliſh: and if it were not then delivered, they ſhould pay to the Engliſh 500000 Crowns, for which they ſhould give good Security by Merchants that lived in other Parts, and give Hoſtages till the Security were given: but if during theſe years the Queen made War on France, or Scotland, ſhe was to loſe her Right to that Town; or if the French or Scots made War on her, Calais ſhould be preſently reſtored; to which ſhe was ſtill to reſerve her Right: Aymouth in Scotland was to be razed, and a Commiſſion was to be ſent down to ſome of both Kingdoms, to agree all leſſer differences. On theſe Terms a Peace was made, and proclaimed between thoſe Crowns; to which many of the Engliſh, that did not apprehend what the charge of a War for the regaining of Calais would have amounted to, were very averſe; thinking it highly diſhonourable, that they, whoſe Anceſtors had made ſuch Conqueſts in France, ſhould be now beaten out of the only remainder that they had on the Continent; and thus make a Peace by which it was in effect parted with for ever. For all theſe Conditions about reſtoring it were underſtood to be only for palliating ſo Inglorious a buſineſs. But the Reformed caſt the blame of this on the Papiſts; and ſome moved, that all the late Queens Council ſhould be queſtioned for their Miſgovernment in that Particular: for it was thought nothing would make them ſo odious to the Nation, as the charging that on them. They on the other hand did caſt the blame of it on the Lord Wentworth, that had been Governour of Calais, and was now profeſſedly one of the Reformed, and had been very gentle to thoſe of that perſwaſion during his Government. But he put himſelf on a Trial by his Peers, which he underwent on the 22*d.* of April, and there did ſo clear himſelf, that he was by the Judgement of the Peers, acquitted. 1559.

Queen

The Queens Government being thus quieted abroad, ſhe was thereby at more leiſure to do things at home. The firſt Bill that was put into the Houſe of Lords to try their affections and diſpoſition to a Change in the matters of Religion, was that for the Reſtitution of the Tenths and Firſt-Fruits to the Crown. It was agreed to by the Lords on the fourth of February, having been put in the 30*th.* of January, and was the firſt Bill that was read: the Arch-biſhop of York, the Biſhops of London, Worceſter, Landaffe, Litchfield, Exeter, Cheſter, and Carliſle, proteſted againſt it: theſe were all of that Order that were at the Seſſion, except the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Lincoln, Ely, and the Abbot of Weſtminſter, who it ſeems were occaſionally abſent. On the ſixth of February it was ſent down to the Commons, to which they readily agreed; and ſo it had the Royal Aſſent. By it, not only the Tenths and Firſt-Fruits were again reſtored to the Crown, The Proceedings of the Parliament.

They address to the Queen for her marrying.

But the Commons reflecting on the miseries in which they had been lately involved by Queen Maries Marriage, had much debate about an Address to the Queen to induce her to marry. On the fourth of February it was argued in the House of Commons; and on the sixth, the Speaker, with the Privy-Counsellors of the House, and thirty Members more, were sent with their desires to the Queen. "They expressed the affections of the Nation to her, and said, That "if they could hope she might be Immortal they would rest satis- "fied; but that being a vain Imagination, they earnestly besought "her to choose such a Husband as might make the Nation and her "self happy; and by the blessing of God, bring such Issue as might "Reign after her death, which they prayed God might be very late. She said, "She looked on that as an expression both of their "affection and respect, since they had neither limited Time nor "Place. She declared that she had hitherto lived in a single state "with great satisfaction; and had neither entertained some Honou- "rable Propositions which, the Lord Treasurer knew, had been made "to her in her Brothers time, nor had been moved by the fears of "death that she was in, while she was under her Sisters displeasure, "(of which she would say little; for though she knew, or might just- "ly suspect, by whose means it was, yet she would not utter it, nor "would she charge it on the Dead, or cast the burthen of it whol- "ly upon her Sister: But she assured them, if ever she married, she "would make such a Choice as should be to the satisfaction and "good of her People: she did not know what credit she might "yet have with them; but she knew well, she deserved to have it, "for she was resolved never to deceive them: her People were to "her in stead of Children, and she reckoned her self married to them, "by her Coronation: They would not want a Successor when she "died; and for her part, she should be well contented that the Mar- "ble should tell Posterity, HERE LIES A QUEEN THAT "REIGNED SO LONG, AND LIVED AND DIED A "VIRGIN: She took their Address in good part, and desired "them to carry back her hearty thanks for the care the Commons "had of her.

The Queens Answer.

The Journals of the House of Lords are imperfect, so that we find nothing in them of this matter: yet it appears that they likewise had it before them: for the Journals of the House of Commons have it marked, that on the fifteenth of February, there was a Message sent from the Lords, desiring that a Committee of thirty Commoners might meet with twelve Lords to consider what should be the Authority of the Person whom the Queen should marry. The Committee was appointed to treat concerning it; but it seems the Queen desired them to turn to other things that were more pressing: for I find nothing, after this, entred in the Journals of this Parliament concerning it.

On the ninth of February the Lords past a Bill for the Recognizing of the Queens Title to the Crown. It had been considered whether as Queen Mary had procured a former Repeal of her Mothers Divorce, and of the Acts that passed upon it declaring her Illegitimate, the like should be done now. The Lord Keeper said, The Crown purged all defects, and it was needless to look back to a thing which would at least cast a reproach on her Father: the enquiring into such things too anxiously would rather prejudice than advance her Title. So he advised that there should be an act passed in general Words, asserting the lawfulness of her descent, and her Right to the Crown, rather than any special Repeal. Queen Mary and her Council were careless of King Henry's Honour; but it became her rather to conceal than expose his Weakness. This being thought both Wise and Pious Council, the act was conceived in general Words, "That they did assuredly believe and declare, that by "the Laws of God and of the Realm she was their lawful Queen, "and that she was rightly, lineally, and lawfully descended from the "Royal Blood, and that the Crown did without all doubt or am-"biguity belong to her, and the Heirs to be lawfully begotten of "her Body after her; and that they, as representing the Three E-"states of the Realm, did declare and assert her Title, which they "would defend with their Lives and Fortunes. This was thought to be very wise Council: for if they had gone to repeal the Sentence of Divorce which passed upon her Mothers acknowledging a Precontract, they must have set force the forth that was on her when she made that Confession: and that, as it was a great dishonour to her Father, so it would have raised discourses likewise to her Mothers prejudice; which must have rather weakned than strengthened her Title: And, as has been formerly observed, this seems to be the true reason why in all her Reign there was no Apology printed for her Mother. There was another Act passed for the restoring of her in Blood to her Mother, by which she was qualified, as a private Subject, to succeed, either to her Grand-fathers Estate, or to any others by that Blood. 1559. They recognize her Title to the Crown.

But for the matters of Religion, the Commons began; and on the fifteenth of February, brought in a Bill for the English Service, and concerning the Ministers of the Church. On the 21st. a Bill was read for annexing the Supremacy to the Crown again; and on the 17*th*. of March another Bill was brought in, confirming the Laws made about Religion in King Edwards time. And on the 21st. another was brought in, That the Queen should have the Nomination of the Bishops, as it had been in King Edwards time. The Bill for the Supremacy was past by the Lords on the 18*th*. of March; the Archbishop of York, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Viscount Mountacute, and the Bishops of London, Winchester, Worcester, Landaffe, Coventry and Litchfield, Exeter, Chester, and Carlisle, and the Abbot of Westminster, dissenting. But afterwards the Commons annexed many other Bills to it, as that about the Queens making Bishops, not according to the Act made in King Edwards time, but by the old way of Elections, as it was Enacted in the 25*th*. Year of her Fathers Reign, The Acts that were passed concerning Religion.

1559. with several Provisoes; which passed in the House of Lords with the same dissent. By it, "all the Acts past in the Reign of King Henry, "for the abolishing of the Popes Power, are again revived; and the "Acts in Queen Maries time, to the contrary, are repealed. There "was also a Repeal of the Act made by her for proceeding against "Hereticks. They revived the Act made in the first Parliament of "King Edward, against those that spoke irreverently of the Sacra- "ment, and against private Masses, and for Communion in both kinds: "And declared the Authority of Visiting, Correcting, and Reforming "all things in the Church, to be for ever annexed to the Crown, "which the Queen and her Successors might by her Letters Patents "depute to any Persons to exercise in her Name. All Bishops, and "other Ecclesiastical Persons, and all in any Civil Imployment, were "required to swear that they acknowledged the Queen to be the Su- "pream Governour in all Causes as well Ecclesiastical as Temporal with- "in her Dominions; that they renounced all Forreign Power and Ju- "risdiction; and should bear the Queen Faith and true Allegiance: "Whosoever should refuse to swear it, was to forfeit any Office he "had either in Church or State; and to be from thenceforth dis- "bled to hold any Imployment during Life. And if within a Month "after the end of that Session of Parliament, any should, either by "discourse or in writing, set forth the Authority of any Forreign "Power, or do any thing for the advancement of it, they were to "forfeit all their Goods and Chattels: and if they had not Goods "to the value of twenty Pounds, they were to be Imprisoned a "whole year; and for the second offence they were to incur the "Pains of a Præmunire: and the third offence in that kind was made "Treason. To this a Proviso was added, That such Persons as should "be Commissioned by the Queen to Reform and Order Ecclesiasti- "cal Matters, should judge nothing to be Heresie but what had been "already so judged, by the Authority of the Canonical Scriptures, "or by the first four General Councils, or by any other General "Council in which such Doctrines were declared to be Heresies by "the expres and plain Words of Scripture: All other Points, not "so decided, were to be judged by the Parliament with the assent of "the Clergy in their Convocation.

This Act was in many things short of the Authority that King Henry had claimed, and the severity of the Laws he had made. The Title of Supream Head was left out of the Oath: This was done to mitigate the Opposition of the Popish Party; but besides, the Queen her self had a scruple about it, which was put in her Head by one Lever, a famous Preacher among those of the Reformation, of which Sands, afterwards Bishop of Worcester, complained to Parker in a Letter that is in the Collection. There was no other punishment inflicted on those that denied the Queens Supremacy, but the loss of their Goods; and such as refused to take the Oath, did only lose their Imployments; whereas to refuse the Oath in King Henry's time, brought them into a Præmunire, and to deny the Supremacy was Treason. But against this Bill the Bishops made Speeches in the House of Lords. I have seen a Speech of this kind was said to have have been made by Arch-biſhop Heath; but it muſt be forgery put out in his Name: for he is made to ſpeak of the Supremacy as a new and unheard of thing, which he, who had ſworn it ſo oft in King Henry's and King Edwards times, could not have the face to ſay. The reſt of the Biſhops oppoſed it, the rather, becauſe they had lately declared ſo high for the Pope that it had been very indecent for them to have revolted ſo ſoon. The Biſhop of Dureſme came not to this Parliament. There were ſome hopes of gaining him to concur in the Reformation: for in the Warrant the Queen afterwards gave to ſome for Conſecrating the new Biſhops, he is firſt named; and I have ſeen a Letter of Secretary Cecil to Parker, that gives him ſome hope that Tonſtal would joyn with them. He had been offended with the Cruelties of the late Reign; and though the reſentments he had of his ill uſage in the end of King Edwards time, had made him at firſt concur more heartily to the reſtoring of Popery, yet he ſoon fell off, and declared his diſlike of thoſe violent Courſes; and neither did he, nor Heath, bring any in trouble within their Dioceſſes upon the account of Religion; though it is hardly credible that there was no occaſion for their being ſevere, if they had been otherwiſe enclined to it. The Biſhop of Ely was alſo abſent at the paſſing of this Act; for though he would not conſent to it, yet he had done all that was preſcribed by it ſo often before, that it ſeems he thought it more decent to be abſent, than either to conſent to it, or to oppoſe it. 1559.

The Power that was added for the Queens Commiſſionating ſome to Execute her Supremacy, gave the Riſe to that Court, which was Commonly called the High Commiſſion Court; and was to be in the room of a ſingle Perſon, to whom, with the Title of Lord Vice-gerent, King Henry did delegate his Authority. It ſeems, the Clergy-men with whom the Queen conſulted at this time thought this too much to be put in one Mans Hand, and therefore reſolved to have it ſhared to more Perſons, of whom a great many would certainly be Church-men: ſo that they ſhould not be altogether kept under by the hard Hands of the Laity, who having groaned long under the Tyranny of an Eccleſiaſtical Yoke, ſeemed now diſpoſed to revenge themſelves by bringing the Clergy as much under them; for ſo Extreams do commonly riſe from one another. The beginning of the High Commiſſion.

The Popiſh Clergy were now every where beginning to declaim againſt Innovation and Hereſie. Harpsfield had in a Sermon at Canterbury in February, ſtirred the People much to Sedition: and the Members belonging to that Cathedral had openly ſaid, that Religion ſhould not, nor could not be altered. The Council alſo heard that the Prebendaries there had bought up many Arms: ſo a Letter was written to Sir Thomas Smith, to examine that matter. Harpsfield was not put in Priſon, but received only a Rebuke. There came alſo complaints from many other Places of many Seditious Sermons: So the Queen, following the Precedent her Siſter had ſet her, did, in the beginning of March, forbid all Preaching, except by ſuch as had a Licence under the Great Seal. But leſt the Clergy might now in the Convocation ſet out Orders in oppoſition to what the Queen was about to do; ſhe ſent, and required them, under the Pains of a Præmunire, to make no Canons. Yet 1559. Harpsfield, that was Prolocutor, with the rest of the lower House, made an Address to the upper House, to be by them presented to the Queen for the discharge of their Consciences. They reduced the Particulars into five Articles. 1. That Christ was corporally present in the Sacrament. 2. That there was no other Substance there but his Body and Blood. 3. That in the Mass there was a Propitiatory Sacrifice for the Dead and the Living. 4. That St. Peter and his lawful Succession had the Power of feeding and governing the Church. 5. That the Power of treating about Doctrine, the Sacraments, and the Order of Divine Worship, belonged only to the Pastors of the Church. These they had sent to the two Universities, from whence they were returned with the Hands of the greatest part in them to the first four; but it seems they thought it not fit to sign the last: For now the Queen had resolved to have a publick Conference about Religion in the Abby-Church of Westminster.

The Arch-bishop of York was continued still to be of the Council; so the Conference being proposed to him, he, after he had Communicated it to his Brethren, accepted of it, though with some unwillingness. It was appointed that there should be nine of a side, who should confer about these three Points. 1. Whether it was not against the Word of God and the Custom of the Ancient Church, to use a Tongue unknown to the People, in the Common-Prayers and the administration of the Sacraments? 2. Whether every Church had not Authority to appoint, change, and take away, Ceremonies, and Ecclesiastical Rites, so the same were done to edification. 3. Whether it could be proved by the Word of God, that in the Mass there was a Propitiatory Sacrifice for the Dead, and the Living? All was ordered to be done in Writing. The Bishops, as being actually in Office, were to read their Papers first upon the first point, and the Reformed were to read theirs next; and then they were to exchange their Papers, without any discourse concerning them, for the avoiding of jangling. The next day they were to read their Papers upon the second, and after that, upon the third Head: and then they were to answer one anothers Papers. The Nine on both sides were, the Bishops of Winchester, Litchfield, Chester, Carlisle, and Lincoln, and Doctors Cole, Harpsfield, Langdale, and Chedsey, on the Popish side: and Scholate Bishop of Chichester, Cox, Whitehead, Grindal, Horn, Sands, Grindal, Almer, and Jewel, for the Protestants. The last of March was appointed to be the first day of Conference, where the Privy Council was to be present, and the Lord Keeper was to see that they should not depart from the Rules to which they had agreed.

The noise of this drew vast numbers of People to so unusual a sight: it being expected that there should be much fairer dealings now, than had been in the Disputes in Queen Maries time. The whole House of Commons came to hear it, as no doubt the Lords did also, though it is not marked in their Journal. At their meeting, the Bishop of Winchester said their Paper was not quite ready, and pretended they had mistaken the Order: But Dr. Cole should deliver what they had prepared, though it was not yet in that order that they could copy it out. The Secret of this was, the Bishops had in their private Consultations agreed to read their Paper, but not to give those they called Heretics

Co

Copy of it: They could not decently refuſe to give a publick account of their Doctrine, but they were reſolved not to enter into Diſputes with any about it: This ſeemed to be the giving up of the Faith, if they ſhould ſuffer it again to be brought into queſtion: Beſides, they look'd on it as the higheſt Act of Supremacy, for the Queen to appoint ſuch Conferences: for ſhe and her Council would pretend to judge in theſe Points, when they had done diſputing. For theſe Reaſons they would not engage to make any Exchange of Papers. The Lord Keeper took notice that this was contrary to the Order laid down at the Council Board, to which the Arch-biſhop of York had in their Names conſented. But they pretending they had miſtaken the Order, Cole was appointed to deliver their Minds, which he did in a long Diſcourſe, the greateſt part of which he read out of a Book, that will be found in the Collection. For though they refuſed to deliver a Copy of it, yet Parker ſome way procured it, among whoſe Papers I found it. The Subſtance of it was, "That although it might "ſeem that the Scriptures had appointed the Worſhip of God to be "in a known Tongue; yet that might be changed by the Authority "of the Church, which had changed the Sabbath, appointed in the "Scripture, without any Authority from thence. Chriſt waſhed his "Diſciples Feet, and bid them do the like, yet this was not kept up: "Chriſt inſtituted the Sacrament of his Body and Blood after Sup-"per; and yet the Church appointed it to be received faſting: ſo "had the Church alſo given it only in one kind, though Chriſt himſelf "gave it in both: And whereas the Apoſtles, by Authority from the "Holy Ghoſt, commanded all Believers to abſtain from Blood, yet "that was not thought to oblige any now: and though there was a "community of Goods in the Apoſtles times, it was no obligation to "Chriſtians to ſet up that now: ſo that this matter was in the power of "the Church. And ſince the Church of Rome had appointed the "Latin Service to be every where uſed, it was Schiſmatical to ſeparate "from it: for according to Ireneus, all Churches ought to agree with "her, by reaſon of her great Preeminence. Upon which they run out "largely to ſhew the miſchiefs of Schiſm, both in France, Spain, Ger-"many, and in other Countries. And for the Britains and Saxons of "England, their firſt Apoſtles, that converted them to Chriſtianity, were "Men of other Nations, and did never uſe any Service but that of their "Native Language. All the Vulgar Tongues did change much, but the "Latin was ever the ſame: and it was not fit for the Church to be chang-"ing her Service. The Queen of Ethiopia's Eunuch read Iſaiah's Book, "though he underſtood it not; upon which, God ſent Philip to him to "expound it: So the People are to come to their Teachers, to have "thoſe things explained to them which they cannot underſtand of them-"ſelves. There were many Rites in the Jewiſh Religion, the ſignifica-"tion whereof the People underſtood as little then, as the Vulgar do "the Latin now; and yet they were commanded to uſe them. The "People were to uſe their private Prayers in what Tongue they pleaſed, "though the publick Prayers were put up in Latin; and ſuch Prayers "may be for their profit, though they underſtand them not, as abſent "Perſons are the better for the Prayers which they do not hear, much "leſs

Arguments for the Latin Service.

1559. "leſs underſtand. They ſaid, it was not to be thought that the Holy "Ghoſt had ſo long forſaken his Church, and that a few lately riſen up "were to teach all the World. They concluded, that they could bring "many more Authorities; but they, being to defend a Negative, "thought it needleſs, and would refer theſe to the Anſwers they were "to make.

Arguments againſt it. When this was done, the Lord Keeper turned to thoſe of the other ſide, and deſired them to read their Paper. Horn was appointed by them to do it. He began with a ſhort Prayer to God to enlighten their minds, and with a Proteſtation that they were reſolved to follow the Truth according to the Word of God. Then he read his Paper, which will be alſo found in the Collection. "They founded their Aſſertion on "St. Pauls words, who, in the 14*th*. Chapter of his firſt Epiſtle to the "Corinthians, had treated on that Subject of ſet purpoſe; and ſpake in "it, not only of Preaching, but of Praying with the Underſtanding; "and ſaid, that the Unlearned were to ſay Amen at the giving of Thanks. "From that Chapter they argued, that St. Paul commanded that all things "ſhould be done to Edification, which could not be by an unknown Lan- "guage: He alſo charged them that nothing ſhould be ſaid that had an "uncertain ſound; and that, as the ſound of a Trumpet muſt be di- "ſtinct, ſo the People muſt underſtand what is ſaid, that ſo they might "ſay Amen at the giving of Thanks. He alſo required thoſe that ſpake "in a ſtrange Language, and could not get one to interpret, to hold "their peace; ſince it was an abſurd thing for one to be a Barbarian "to others in the Worſhip of God: and though the ſpeaking with ſtrange "Tongues was then an extraordinary Gift of God, yet he ordered that "it ſhould not be uſed where there was no Interpreter. They added, "that theſe things were ſo ſtrictly commanded by St. Paul, that it is plain "they are not indifferent, or within the Power of the Church. In the "Old Teſtament, the Jews had their Worſhip in the Vulgar Tongue, "and yet the new Diſpenſation being more Internal and Spiritual, it was "abſurd that the Worſhip of God ſhould be leſs underſtood by Chri- "ſtians, than it had been by the Jews. The chief end of Worſhip is "according to David, that we may ſhew forth Gods Praiſes, which can- "not be done, if it is in a ſtrange Tongue. Prayer is the offering "up of our deſires to God, which we cannot do, if we underſtand not "the Language they are in. Baptiſme and the Lords Supper are to "contain Declarations of the Death and Reſurrection of Chriſt, which "muſt be underſtood, otherwiſe why are they made? The uſe of Speech "is to make known what one brings forth to another. The moſt Barba- "rous Nations perform their Worſhip in a known Tongue, which ſhews "it to be a Law of Nature. It is plain from Juſtin Martyrs Apology, that "the Worſhip was then in a known Tongue; which appears alſo from all "the Ancient Liturgies: and a long Citation was brought out of St. Baſil, "for the ſinging of Pſalms, duly weighing the Words with much atten- "tion and devotion; which, he ſays, was practiſed in all Nations. They "concluded, wondering how ſuch an abuſe could at firſt creep in, and be "ſtill ſo ſtifly maintained; and why thoſe who would be thought the "Guides and Paſtors of the Church, were ſo unwilling to return to the "Rule of St. Paul, and the Practiſe of the Primitive Times.

There

There was a great ſhout of Applauſe, when they had done. They gave their Paper, ſigned with all their Hands, to the Lord Keeper, to be delivered to the other ſide, as he ſhould think fit. But he kept it till the other ſide ſhould bring him theirs. The Papiſts, upon this, ſaid, they had more to add on that Head, which was thought diſingenuous by thoſe that had heard them profeſs they had nothing to add to what Cole had ſaid. Thus the Meeting broke up for that day, being Saturday; and they were ordered to go forward on Munday, and to prepare what they were to deliver on the other two Heads. The Papiſts, though the could complain of nothing that was done, except the applauſe given to the Paper of the Reformers; yet they ſaw by that, how much more acceptable the other Doctrine was to the People; and therefore reſolved to go no further in that matter. At the next meeting, they deſired that their Anſwer to the Paper read by the Reformed might be firſt heard: To this the Lord Keeper ſaid, That they had delivered their mind the former day, and ſo were not to be heard till they had gone through the other Points; and then they were to return on both ſides to the anſwering of Papers. They ſaid that what Cole had delivered the former day, was Extempore, and of himſelf; but it had not been agreed on by them. This appeared to all the Aſſembly to be very foul dealing; ſo they were required to go on to the ſecond Point. Then they preſſed that the other ſide might begin with their Paper, and they would follow: for they ſaw what an advantage the others had the former day, by being heard laſt. The Lord Keeper ſaid, the Order was that they ſhould be heard firſt, as being Biſhops now in Office. But both Wincheſter, and Lincoln, refuſed to go any further, if the other ſide did not begin. Upon which there followed a long debate; Lincoln ſaying that the firſt Order, which was, that all ſhould be in Latin, was changed; and that they had prepared a Writing in Latin: But in this, not only the Counſellors, among whom ſate the Arch-biſhop of York, but the reſt of his own Party contradicted him. In concluſion, all, except Feckenam, refuſed to read any more Papers: he ſaid, he was willing to have done it, but he could not undertake ſuch a thing alone; and ſo the Meeting broke up. 1559.

The Conference between the Papiſts and Proteſtants breaks up.

But the Biſhops of Wincheſter, and of Lincoln, ſaid, the Doctrine of the Catholick Church was already eſtabliſhed, and ought not to be diſputed; except it were in a Synod of Divines: that it was too great an encouragement to Hereticks, to hear them thus diſcourſe againſt the Faith, before the unlearned Multitude: and that the Queen by ſo doing had incurred the Sentence of Excommunication; and they talked of excommunicating her and her Council. Upon this they were both ſent to the Tower. The Reformed took great advantage from the Iſſue of this Debate, to ſay, their Adverſaries knew that upon a fair hearing the Truth was ſo manifeſtly on their ſide, that they durſt not put it to ſuch hazard. The whole World ſaw that this Diſputation was managed with great Impartiality, and without noiſe or diſorder; far different from what had been in Queen Maries time: ſo they were generally much confirmed in their former belief, by the Papiſts flying the Field. They on the other hand ſaid, they ſaw the rude Multitude were now carried with a Fury againſt them; the Lord Keeper was their profeſſed Enemy; the 1559. the Laity would take on them to judge, after they had heard them; and they perceived they were already determined in their minds; and that this Dispute was only to set off the changes that were to be made with the Pomp of a Victory: and they blamed the Bishops for undertaking it at first, but excused them for breaking it off in time. And the Truth is, the strength of their Cause, in most Points of Controversie, resting on the Authority of the Church of Rome, that was now a thing of so odious a sound, that all Arguments brought from thence, were not like to have any great effect. Upon this whole matter, there was an act of State made, and Signed by many Privy Counsellors, giving an account of all the steps that were made in it, which will be found in the Collection.

Collection Number 5.

This being over, the Parliament was now in a better disposition to pass the Bill for the Uniformity of the Service of the Church. Some of the Reformed Divines were appointed to review King Edwards Liturgy, and to see if in any Particular it was fit to change it. The only considerable Variation was made about the Lords Supper, of which somewhat will appear from the Letter of Sandys to Parker. It was proposed to have the Communion Book so contrived, that it might not exclude the belief of the Corporal Presence: for the chief design of the Queens Council was, to unite the Nation in one Faith; and the greatest part of the Nation continued to believe such a Presence. Therefore it was recommended to the Divines to see that there should be no express definition made against it; that so it might lie as a Speculative Opinion, not determined, in which every Man was left to the Freedom of his own Mind. Hereupon the Rubrick that explained the Reason for kneeling at the Sacrament, That thereby no Adoration is intended to any Corporal Presence of Christs natural Flesh and Blood, because, that is only in Heaven, which had been in King Edwards Liturgy, was now left out. And whereas at the delivery of the Elements in King Edwards first Liturgy, there was to be said, The Body or Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ Preserve thy Body and Soul to Everlasting Life; which words had been left out in his second Liturgy, as favouring the Corporal Presence too much; and in stead of them, these words were ordered to be used in the distribution of that Sacrament, Take and eat this, in remembrance that Christ died for thee, and feed on him in thy Heart by Faith with Thanksgiving; and Drink this in remembrance that Christs Blood was shed for thee, and be thankful. They now joyned both these in one. Some of the Collects were also a little altered: and thus was the Book presented to the House. But for the Book of Ordination, it was not in express terms named in the Act; which gave an occasion afterwards to question the lawfulness of the Ordinations made by that Book. But by this Act the Book that was set out by King Edward, and confirmed by Parliament in the fifth Year of his Reign, was again authorized by Law; and the Repeal of it in Queen Maries time was made void. So the Book of Ordinations being in that Act added to the Book of Common-Prayer, it was now legally in force again; as was afterwards declared in Parliament, upon a Question that was raised about it by Bonner.

The

1559. Debates about the Act of Uniformity.

The Bill that was put in on the 15*th.* of February, concerning the new Service, being laid aside, a new one was framed, and sent up by the Commons on the 18*th.* of April, and debated in the House of Lords: Heath made a long Speech against it, rather Elegant than Learned; "He enlarged much on the several Changes which had been made in "King Edward's time: he said, that both Cranmer and Ridley changed "their Opinions in the matter of Christ's presence: he called Ridley "the most notable learned Man that was of that way. These Changes "he imputed to their departing from the Standard of the Catholick "Church: he complained much of the robbing of Churches, the breaking "of Images, and the Stage-Plays made in mockery of the Catholick Re- "ligion. Upon all these Reasons he was against the Bill. The Bishop of Chester spake also to it: "He said, the Bill was against both Faith and Cha- "rity: that Points once defined were not to be brought again into que- "stion; nor were Acts of Parliament Foundations for a Churches Be- "lief: he enlarged on the Antiquity of their Forms; and said, it was "an insolent thing to pretend that our Fathers had lived in Ignorance. "The Prophets oftentimes directed the Israelites to ask of their Fathers. "Matters of Religion could not be understood by the Laity. It was "of great consequence to have their Faith well grounded. Jeroboam "made Israel to sin, when he set up a new way of Worship: and not "only the Orthodox, but even the Arrian Emperors ordered, that "points of Faith should be examined in Councils. Gallio by the light of "Nature knew that a Civil Judge ought not to meddle with matters of "Religion: In the Service-Book that was then before them, they "had no Sacrifice for their Sins, nor were they to adore Christ in "the Host; and for these reasons he could not agree to it: but if any "thought he spoke this because of his own concern, or pitied him for "what he might suffer by it, he would say in the words of our Saviour "Weep not for me, Weep for your selves.

After him spake Feckham Abbot of Westminster; "He proposed three "Rules by which they should judge of Religion; its Antiquity, its "constancy to it self, and the influence it had on the Civil Government: "he said the old Religion began in the time of King Lucius, according "to Gildas; the Book now proposed, was not used before the two last "years of King Edward: the one was always the same, the other was "changed every second year, as appeared in the point of the Presence "of Christ in the Sacrament: there had been great Order and Obe- "dience in Queen Maries Reign; but now every where great Insolen- "ces were committed by the People, with some very indecent Pro- "phanations of the most holy things: he recommended to them, in "St. Austins words, the adhering to the Catholick Church: the very "name Catholick, which Hereticks had not the confidence to assume, "shewed their Authority. The Consent of the whole Church in all "Ages, with the perpetual Succession of Pastors in St. Peter's Chair, "ought to weigh more with them, than a few new Preachers, who had "distracted both Germany and England of late.

Thus I have given the substance of their Speeches, being all that I have seen of that side. I have seen none at all on the other side; tho it is not probable but some were made in defence of the Service, as well as these were against it. But upon this Occasion I shall set down the 1559. substance of the second Paper, which the Reformed Divines had prepared on the second point, for the Conference about the Authority of every particular Church to change ortake away Ceremonies. I do not put it in the Collection, because I have not that which the Papists prepared in Opposition to it. But the heads of this Paper were as followeth.

Arguments for the Changes made in the Service.

"It is clear by the Epistles which St. Paul writ to the Corinthians "and other Churches, that every Church has Power in it self to order "the Forms of their Worship, and the administration of the Sacraments "among them, so as might best tend to Order, Edification and Peace. The "like power had also the seven Angels of the Churches, to whom St. "John writ. And for the first three Ages, there was no General Meet- "ing of the Church in Synods, but in those times the neighbouring Pa- "stors and Bishops, by mutual advice rather than Authority, ordered "their Affairs: and when Heresies sprung up, they condemned them "without staying for a General Determination of the whole Church. "There were also great differences among them in their Customs, as a- "bout observing Lent and Easter. Ceremonies grew too soon to a great "number. When Errors or Abuses appeared, private Bishops reformed "their own Dioceses: So those who came in the room of Arius Bi- "shops, even when that Heresie was spread over all the East, and the "See of Rome it self was defiled with it, yet reformed their own Churches. "Ambrose finding the custom of Feasting in Churches on the Anniver- "saries of the Martyrs gave occasion to great Scandals, took it away. "Even in Queen Maries time, many of the old Superstitions of Pilgri- "mages and Reliques, which had been abolish'd in King Henry's time, "were not then taken up again: from which they argued, that if some "things might be altered, why not more? So that if there was good "reason to make any Changes, it could not be doubted but that as Hi- "zekiah and Josiah had made by their own power, so the Queen might "make Reformations; which were not so much the setting up of new "things, as the restoring of the state of Religion to what it was anciently; which had been brought in by consent of Parliament and Convo- "cation in King Edward's time. The Rules they offer'd in this Paper about Ceremonies, were, that they should not be made necessary part of Worship; that they should not be too many, nor dumb and vain, nor should be kept up for gain and advantage.

These were the Arguments used on both sides: But the Reformed being superior in number, the Bill passed in the House of Lords; the Archbishop of York, the Marquess of Winchester, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Viscount Mountacute, the Bishops of London, Worcester, Ely, Coventry, Chester, and Carlisle; and the Lords, Morley, Stafford, Dudley, Wharton, Rich, and North, and the Abbot of Westminster dissenting. By this Act the new Book was to take place by St. John Baptist's day.

Another Act passed, that the Queen might reserve to her self the Lands belonging to Bishopricks, as they fell void, giving the full value of them in Impropriated Tithes in lieu of them. To this the Bishops dissented on the 7th. of April, when it passed in the House of Lords. But when this came to the Commons, there was great opposition made to it. Many had observed, that in Edward the 6th's time, under a pretence of giving some Endowments to the Crown, the Courtiers got all the Church Lands divided amongst themselves; so it was believed the us to be made of this, would be the robbing of the Church, without enriching the Crown. After many days Debate, on the 17th. of April, the House divided, and 90 were against it, but 133 were for it, and so it passed. 1559.

On the 5th. of May, another Bill passed with the like opposition. It was for annexing of all Religious Houses to the Crown. After that there followed some private Acts for declaring the deprivation of the Popish Bishops in King Edward's Time to have been good. When they were restored by Queen Mary, the Sentences passed against them, were declared to have been void from the beginning; and so all Leases that were made by Ridley, Poinet, and Hooper, and the Patents granted by the King, of some of their Lands, were annulled. It was particularly remembred in the House of Commons, that Ridley had made the confirming of these Leases his last desire, when he was going to be tied to the Stake. The ground on which the Sentences were declared void, was, because the Parties had appealed, though in the Commission, by vertue of which the Delegates deprived them, they were impowered to proceed notwithstanding any Appeal. To this, not only the Bishops, but the Marques of Winchester, and the Lords, Stafford, Dudley, and North, dissented.

It shews the great Moderation of this Government, that this Marques, notwithstanding his adhering to the Popish Interest in the House of Lords, was still continued Lord Treasurer; which employment he held fourteen Years after this, and died in the 97th. Year of his Age, leaving 103 issued from his own Body behind him. He was the greatest instance of good Fortune and Dexterity, that we find in the English History; who continued Lord Treasurer in three such different Reigns, as King Edward's, Queen Mary's, and Queen Elizabeth's were.

There were a Subsidy, and two Tenths, and two Fifteenths given by the Parliament, with the Tonnage and Poundage, for the Queen's Life; and so on the 8th. of May it was dissolved.

There was three Bills that did not pass in the House of Commons, but upon what account they were laid aside, it does not appear. The one was for the Restoring of the Bishops that had been deprived by Queen Mary. There were but three of these alive, Barlow, Scory, and Coverdale; the first of these had resigned, and the last, being old, had no mind to return to his Bishoprick: So perhaps it was not thought worth the while to make an Act for one Man's sake, especially since there were so many vacant Bishopricks in the Queen's hands, and more were like to fall. The other Bill was, for the restoring of all Persons that were deprived from their Benefices because they were married. This the Queen ordered to be laid aside; of which Sands complained much in his Letter to Parker: But yet the Queen took no notice of the Laws formerly made against their Marriage; and promoted many married Priests, particularly Parker himself. There was no Law now in force against Clergy-mens marrying; for Queen Mary had only repealed the Laws of Edward the 6th. which allowed it, but had made none concerning that Matter: So there was nothing but the Canon Law against it; and that was resolved to be condemned, by continuing that Article of Religion concerning the lawfulness of their Marriage, among those that should be set out. The next Bill, that came to nothing, was a new Act for giving Authority to 32 Persons, to revise the Ecclesiastical Laws, and Bills that were proposed, but not passed.

1559. and digeſt them into a Body; it was laid aſide at the ſecond Reading in the Houſe of Commons, and has ſlept ever ſince.

The Biſhops refuſe the Oath of Supremacy.

When the Parliament was over, the Oath of Supremacy was ſoon after put to the Biſhops and Clergy. They thought, if they could ſtick cloſe to one another in refuſing it, the Queen would be forced to diſpence with them, and would not at one ſtroke turn out all the Biſhops in England. It does not appear how ſoon after the Diſſolution of the Parliament, the Oath was put to them; but it was not long after, for the laſt Collation Bonner gave of any Benefice, was on the 6th. of May this Year. The Oath being offered to Heath, Archbiſhop of York, to Bonner of London, Thirleby of Ely, Bourn of Bath and Wells, Chriſtopherſon of Chicheſter, Bain of Litchfield, White of Wincheſter, and Watſon of Lincoln, Oglethorpe of Carliſle, Turbervile of Exeter, Pool of Peterburgh, Scot of Cheſter, Pates of Worceſter, and Goldwell of St. Aſaph, they did all refuſe to take it: So that only Kitchin Biſhop of Landaf took it. There was ſome hope of Tonſtall; ſo it was not put to him til September, but he being very old, choſe to go out with ſo much Company, more for the decency of the thing, than out of any ſcruple he could have about the Supremacy for which he had formerly writ ſo much. They were upon their refuſal put in Priſon for a little while; but they had all their Liberty ſoon after, except Bonner, White, and Watſon. There were great Complaints made againſt Bonner, that he had, in many things, in the proſecution of thoſe that were preſented for Hereſie, exceeded what the Law allowed; ſo that it was much deſired to have him made an Example. But as the Queen was of her own nature Merciful, ſo the Reformed Divines had learned in the Goſpel, not to render Evil for Evil, nor to ſeek Revenge; and as Nazianzen had of old exhorted the Orthodox, when they had got an Emperor that favoured them, not to retaliate on the Arrians for their former Cruelties: So they thought it was for the honour of their Religion, to give this real demonſtration of the Conformity of their Doctrine, to the Rules of the Goſpel, and of the Primitive Church, by avoiding all Cruelty and Severity, when it looked like Revenge.

Vita Parkeri.

The Queens gentleneſs to them.

All this might have been expected from ſuch a Queen, and ſuch Biſhops. But it ſhewed a great temper in the whole Nation, that ſuch a Man as Bonner had been, was ſuffered to go about in ſafety, and was not made a Sacrifice to the Revenge of thoſe who had loſt their near Friends by his means. Many things were brought againſt him, and White, and ſome other Biſhops; upon which the Queen promiſed to give a Charge to the Viſitors, whom ſhe was to ſend over England, to enquire into theſe things; and after ſhe had heard their Report, ſhe ſaid, ſhe would proceed as ſhe ſaw cauſe: by this means ſhe did not deny juſtice, but gained a little time to take off the Edg that was on Mens Spirits, who had been much provoked by the ill uſage they had met with from them.

Heath was a Man of a generous temper, and ſo was well uſed by the Queen, for as he was ſuffered to live ſecurely at his own Houſe in Surrey, ſo ſhe went thither ſometimes to viſit him. Tonſtall and Thirleby lived in Lambeth with Parker, with great freedom and eaſe; the one was Learned and good natured, the other was a Man of Buſineſs: but too eaſie and flexible. White and Watſon were moroſe ſullen Men; to which their Studies, as well as their Tempers, had diſpoſed them; for they were much given to Scholaſtical Divinity, which inclined Men to be Cinical, to over-value themſelves, and deſpiſe others. Chriſtopherſon was a good Grecian, and had tranſlated Euſebius and the other Church Hiſtorians into Latin, but with as little fidelity, as may be expected from a Man violently addicted to a Party. Bain was learned in the Hebrew, which he had profeſſed at Paris, in the Reign of Francis the Firſt. All theſe choſe to live ſtill in England; only Pates, Scot, and Goldwell, went beyond Sea. After them went the Lord Morley, Sir Francis Englefield, Sir Robert Peckham, Sir Thomas Shelley, and Sir John Gage; who it ſeems, deſired to live where they might have the free exerciſe of their Religion: And ſuch was the Queens gentleneſs, that this was not denied them, tho ſuch favour had not been ſhewed in Queen Maries Reign. Feckham Abbot of Weſtminſter, was a charitable and generous Man, and lived in great eſteem in England. Moſt of the Monks returned to a Secular courſe of Life, but the Nunns went beyond Sea. 1559.

A Viſitation and Injunctions ordered by the Queen.

Now the Queen intended to ſend Injunctions over England, and in the end of June they were prepared. There was great difficulty made about one of them; the Queen ſeemed to think the uſe of Images in Churches, might be a means to ſtir up Devotion, and that at leaſt it would draw all People to frequent them the more: for the great meaſure of her Councils was, to unite the whole Nation into one way of Religion. The Reformed Biſhops and Divines oppoſed this vehemently; they put all their Reaſons in a long Writing which they gave her concerning it; the Preface and Concluſion of which will be found in the Collection. Collection Number 6.

'They proteſted they could not comply with that, which, as it was 'againſt their own Conſciences, ſo it would prove a Snare to the Igno-'rant: they had often preſſed the Queen in that Matter; which, it 'ſeems, ſtuck long with her: They prayed her not to be offended with 'that Liberty they took, thus to lay their Reaſons before her, it being 'a thing which Chriſtian Princes had at all times taken well from their 'Biſhops. They deſired her to commit that Matter to the Deciſion of 'a Synod of Biſhops and Divines, and not to do ſuch a thing meerly 'upon ſome Political Conſiderations; which as it would offend many, 'ſo it would reflect much on the Reign of her moſt Godly Brother, and 'on thoſe who had then removed all Images, and had given their Lives 'afterwards for a Teſtimony to the Truth.

The Queen inclined to retain Images in Churches.

'The ſubſtance of their Reaſons, (which for their length I have not 'put in the Collection) is, That the ſecond Commandment forbids the 'making of any Images, as a reſemblance of God. And Deut. 27. 'there was a Curſe pronounced on thoſe who made an Image, an abomi-'nation to the Lord, and put it in a ſecret place; which they expounded 'of ſome Sacraria in private Houſes: and Deut. 4. among the Cautions 'Moſes gives to the People of Iſrael to beware of Idolatry; this is one, 'that they do not make an Image, for the uſe of theſe does naturally dege-'nerate into Idolatry: The Jews were ſo ſenſible of this after the Capti-'vity, that they would die, rather than ſuffer an Image to be put in their 'Temple. The Book of Wiſdom calls an Image, A Snare for the feet 'of the Ignorant. St. John charged thoſe he writ to, to beware of Idols. 'So Tertullian ſaid, It was not enough to beware of Idolatry towards 'them, but of the very Images themſelves. And as Moſes had charged 'the People not to lay a ſtumbling-block in the way of the Blind; ſo Reaſons brought againſt it.

'it

1559. 'it was a much greater sin to leave such a Trap for the weak Multitude. 'This was not for Edification, since it fed the Superstition of the Weak 'and Ignorant, who would continue in their former dotage upon them, 'and would alienate others from the Publick Worship; so that be- 'tween those that would separate from them if they were continued, 'and the Multitude that would abuse them, the number of those that 'would use them aright, would be very inconsiderable: The outward 'splendor of them would be apt to draw the minds of the Worship- 'pers, if not to direct Idolatry, yet to staring and distraction of 'Thoughts. Both Origen and Arnobius tell us, That the Primitive Chri- 'stians had no Images at all. Ireneus accused the Gnosticks for carrying 'about the Image of Christ. St. Austin commends Varro, for saying 'that the old Romans worshipped God more chastly, without the use 'of any Images. Epiphanius tore a Veil with an Image on it; and Se- 'renus broke Images in Gregory the Great's Time. Valens and Theodo- 'sius, made a Law against the Painting or Graving of the Image of 'Christ: And the use of Images in the Eastern Churches, brought those 'distractions on that Empire, that laid it open to the Invasions of the 'Mahometans.

These reasons prevailed with the Queen, to put it into her Injunctions, to have all Images removed out of the Church.

The Injunctions given by King Edward, at his first coming to the Crown, were all renewed, with very little variation. To these some things were added, of which I shall give account.

The Heads of the Injunctions.

'It was no where declared, neither in the Scriptures, nor by the Pri- 'mitive Church, that Priests might not have Wives; upon which, many 'in King Edward's Time had married. Yet great offence was given by 'the indecent Marriages that some of them then made. To prevent the 'like Scandals for the future, it was ordered, That no Priest or Deacon 'should marry without Allowance from the Bishop of the Diocess, and 'two Justices of the Peace, and the consent of the Womans Parents or 'Friends. All the Clergy were to use Habits, according to their De- 'grees in the Universities; the Queen declaring, that this was not done 'for any Holiness in them, but for Order and Decency. No Man 'might use any Charm, or consult with such as did. All were to resort 'to their own Parish Churches, except for an extraordinary Occasion. 'Inn-Keepers were to sell nothing in the Times of Divine Service. None 'were to keep Images, or other Monuments of Superstition, in their 'Houses. None might Preach, but such as were licensed by their Or- 'dinary. In all Places, they were to examine the Causes, why any 'had been in the late Reign Imprisoned, Famished, or put to Death, 'upon the pretence of Religion; and all Registers were to be searched 'for it. In every Parish the Ordinary was to name three or four dis- 'creet Men, who were to see that all the Parishioners did duly resort on 'Sundays and Holy-days to Church; and those who did it not, and 'upon admonition did not amend, were to be denounced to the Ordi- 'nary. On Wednesdays and Fridays, the Common-Prayer and Litany 'was to be used in all Churches. All slanderous words, as Papist, He- 'retick, Schismatick, or Sacramentary, were to be forborn, under severe 'pains. No Books might be printed without a License from the 'Queen, the Arch-Bishop, the Bishop of London, the Chancellor of

'the

'the Universities, or the Bishop, or Arch-Deacon of the Place where 1559.
'it was printed. All were to kneel at the Prayers, and to shew a Re'verence when the Name of Jesus was pronounced. Then followed
'an Explanation of the Oath of Supremacy, in which the Queen de'clared that she did not pretend to any Authority for the ministring of 'Divine Service in the Church, and that all that she challenged was 'that which had at all times belonged to the Imperial Crown of Eng- 'land; that she had the Soveraignty and Rule over all manner of Per'sons under God, so that no Forreign Power had any Rule over them;
'and if those who had formerly appeared to have Scruples about it, took
'it in that sence, she was well pleased to accept of it, and did acquit
'them of all Penalties in the Act. The next was about Altars and Com'munion-Tables; she ordered, that for preventing of Riots, no Altar
'should be taken down, but by the consent of the Curate and Church-
'Wardens; that a Communion-Table should be made for every Church,
'and that on Sacrament days it should be set in some convenient Place in
'the Chancel; and at other Times should be placed where the Altar had 'stood. The Sacramental Bread was ordered to be round and plain,
'without any Figure on it, but somewhat broader and thicker than the 'Cakes formerly prepared for the Mass. Then the form of bidding
'Prayer was prescribed, with some variation from that in King Edward's
'Time; for whereas to the Thanksgiving for God's Blessings to the 'Church in the Saints departed this Life, a Prayer was added, That they with 'us, and we with them, may have a glorious Resurrection; now those words,
'they with us, as seeming to import a Prayer for the Dead, were left out.

For the Rule about Church-men Marrying, those who reflected on it, said, They complained not of the Law, but as St. Jerom did in the making a Law in his Time, they complained of those that had given occasion for it. Ministers wearing such Apparel as might distinguish them from the Laity, was certainly a means to keep them under great restraint, upon every indecency in their Behaviour, laying them open to the Censures of the People; which could not be, if they were habited so, as that they could not be distinguished from other Men: and humane nature being considered, it seems to be a kind of Temptation to many, when they do but think their disorders will pass unobserved. Bowing at the Name of Jesus, was thought a fit expression of their grateful acknowledging of our Saviour, and an owning of his Divinity: And as standing up at the Creed, or at the Gloria Patri, were solemn expressions of the Faith of Christians; So since Jesus is the Name by which Christ is expressed to be our Saviour, it seemed a decent piece of acknowledging our Faith in him, to shew a Reverence when that was pronounced; not as if there were a peculiar sanctity or vertue in it, but because it was his proper Name, Christ being but an Application added to it. By the Queen's care, to take away all words of Reproach, and to explain the Oath of Supremacy; not only clearing any ambiguity that might be in the words, but allowing Men leave to declare in wat sense they swore it, the moderation of her Government did much appear; in which, instead of inventing new Traps to catch the Weak, which had been practised in other Reigns, all possible care was taken to explain things so, that they might be as comprehensive to all Interests as was possible. They reckoned,

1559. reckoned, if that Age could have been on any terms separated from the Papacy, though with allowance for many other superstitious Conceits, it would once unite them all; and in the next Age they would be so educated, that none of those should any more remain. And indeed this Moderation had all the effect that was designed by it for many Years, in which the Papists came to Church, and to the Sacrament. But afterwards, it being proposed to the King of Spain, then ready to engage in a War with the Queen, upon the account of her supporting of the United Provinces, that he must first divide England at home, and procure from the Pope a Sentence against the Queen, and a condemnation of such Papists as went to the English Service; and that for the maintaining and educating of such Priests as should be his Tools to distract the Kingdom, he was to found Seminaries at Doway, Louain, and St. Omers, from whence they might come over hither, and disorder the Affairs of England: The prosecution of those Counsels rais'd the Popish Party among us, which has ever since distracted this Nation, and has oftner than once put it into most threatning convulsive Motions, such as we feel at this day.

The first high Commission.

After the Injunctions were thus prepared, the Queen gave out Commissions for those who should visit all the Churches of England: in which they lost no time, for the New Book of Service was by Law to take place on St. John Baptist's day; and these Commissions were signed that same day. One of those Commissions, which was for the Arch-Bishoprick and Province of York, is put into the Collection. It was granted to the Earls of Shrewsbury and Derby, and some others, among whom Dr. Sands is one.

Collection Number 7.

The Preamble sets forth, 'That God having set the Queen over the 'Nation, she could not render an account of that Trust, without 'endeavouring to propagate the True Religion with the right 'way of worshipping God in all her Dominions; therefore she in- 'tending to have a General Visitation of her whole Kingdom, impow- 'red them, or any two of them, to examine the true State of all the 'Churches in the Northern Parts; to suspend or deprive such Clergy- 'men as were unworthy, and to put others into their Places, to pro- 'ceed against such as were obstinate, by Imprisonment, Church Cen- 'sure, or any other legal way. They were to reserve Pensions for such 'as would not continue in their Benefices, but quitted them by Resig- 'nation; and to examine the condition of all that were Imprisoned on 'the account of Religion, and to discharge them; and to restore all 'such to their Benefices, as had been unlawfully turned out in the late 'Times.

This was the first High Commission that was given out; that for the Province of Canterbury was, without doubt, of the same nature. The prudence of reserving Pensions for such Priests as were turned out, was much applauded; since thereby they were kept from extream want, which might have set them on to do mischief; and by the Pension which was granted them upon their good Behaviour, they were kept under some awe, which would not have been otherwise. That which was chiefly condemned in these Commissions, was, the Queen's giving the Visitors Authority to proceed by Ecclesiastical Censures, which seemed a great stretch of her Supremacy: but it was thought, that the Queen Queen might do that, as well as the Lay-Chancellors did it in the Ecclesiastical Courts; so that one Abuse was the excuse for another. 1559.

These Visiters having made Report to the Queen of the Obedience given to the Laws and her Injunctions, it was found, that of 9400 Beneficed Men in England, there were no more but fourteen Bishops, six Abbots, twelve Deans, twelve Arch-Deacons, fifteen Heads of Colledges, fifty Prebendaries, and eighty Rectors of Parishes, that had left their Benefices upon the Account of Religion. So compliant were the Papists generally. And indeed the Bishops after this time had the same apprehension of the danger into which Religion was brought, by the juglings of the greatest part of the Clergy, who retained their affections to the old Superstition, that those in King Edward's time had: So that if Queen Elizabeth had not lived so long as she did, till all that Generation was dead, and a new set of Men better educated and principled, were grown up and put in their rooms; and if a Prince of another Religion had succeeded before that time, they had probably turned about again to the old Superstitions as nimbly as they had done before in Queen Mary's days. That which supported the superstitious Party in King Edward's time most, was, that many great Bishops did secretely favour and encourage them: Therefore it was now resolved to look well to the filling of the vacant Sees.

Parker's unwillingness to accept of the Archbishoprick of Canterbury.

It has been said before, that Parker was sent for to London by the Queens Order, and the Archbishoprick of Canterbury was offered him: he was, upon that, cast into such a perplexity of mind, that he was out of measure grieved at it. As soon as he was returned home, he writ a Letter to the Lord-Keeper; which, with all the other Letters that passed in this matter, I have put into the Collection: "He professed he never "had less joy of a Journey to London, and was never more glad to get "from it, than upon his last being there. He said, It was necessary to fill "that See with a Man that was neither Arrogant, Faint-hearted, nor Co- "vetous; an Arrogant Man would perhaps divide from his Brethren in "Doctrine, whereas the whole strength of the Church depended on "their Unity; but if there should be Heart-burnings among them, and "the private quarrels, that had been beyond Sea, should be brought "home, the Peace of the Church would be lost, and the Success of all "their Design would be blasted: and if a faint-hearted man were put "in, it would raise the Spirits of all their Adversaries; A Covetous "Man was good for nothing. He knew his own unfitness both of Body "and Mind so well, that though he should be sorry to offend him, and "Secretary Cecil, whom he honoured above all men in the World, and "more sorry to displease the Queen; yet he must above all things a- "void God's Indignation, and not enter into a Station into which he "knew he could not carry himself so as to answer it either to God, or "the World for his Administration. And if he must go to Prison for his "obstinate untowardness, (with which it seems they had threatned him) "he would suffer it rather with a quiet conscience, than accept of an "Imployment which they could not discharge. He said, he intended by "God's Grace never to be of that Order, neither higher nor lower. "He knew what he was capable of: he was poor, and not able to en- "ter on such a station; he had a Rupture which made him that he could "not stir much; therefore he desired some place in the University,

Collection Number 8.

1559. "where he might wear out his Life tolerably. He knew he could not "answer their Expectation, which made him so importunate not to be "raised so high: He said, he had great apprehensious of Differences like "to fall out among themselves; which would be a pleasant diversion to "those of the Church of Rome: he saw some men were men still, even "after all their teaching in the School of Affliction. He protested he "did not seek his own private gain or ease; he had but two or three "years more of life before him, and did not intend to heap up for his "Children. This he writ the first of March.

The business of the Parliament made this Motion to be laid aside, till that was dissolved; and then on the 17*th.* of May the Lord-Keeper wrote to him concerning it: He told him, that he saw by a Resolution taken that day in the Queens Presence, that it would be very hard for his Friends to get him delivered from that Charge. For his own part, if he knew a man to whom the Characters in his Letter did agree better than to himself, he should be for preferring of such a one; but knowing no such, he must be still for him. On the 19*th.* after that, the Lord Keeper and Secretary Cecil, signed a Letter in the Queens Name, requiring him to come up; and after that, they sent a second Command to him to come to Court, on the 28*th.* of the Month. He came up, but again excused himself. Yet at last, being so often pressed, he writ to the Queen her self, "protesting that extream Necessity forced him to "trouble her, both out of Conscience to God, and regard to her Ser- "vice: he knew his great unworthiness for so high a Function; there- "fore as on his Knees he humbly besought her to discharge him of this "Office, which did require a Man of more Learning, Virtue, and "Experience, then he perfectly knew was in himself. He lamented "his being so meanly qualified, that he could not serve her in that "high Station; but in any other inferiour Office he should be ready to "discharge his Duty to her, in such a Place as was suitable to his infir- "mity. But in the conclusion he submitted himself to her pleasure. In the end he was with great difficulty brought to accept of it. So on the 8*th.* day of July the Conge d'Elire was sent to Canterbury; and upon that, on the 22*d.* of July a Chapter was summoned to meet the first of August; where the Dean and Prebendaries meeting, they, according to a method often used in their Elections, did by a Compromise refer it to the Dean to name whom he pleased: and he naming Doctor Parker, according to the Queens Letter, they all confirmed it, and published their Election, singing Te Deum upon it. On the 9*th.* of September the Great Seal was put to a Warrant for his Consecration, directed to the Bishops of Duresme, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, Landaffe, and to Barlow, and Scory (stiled only Bishops, not being then elected to any Sees) requiring them to Consecrate him. From this it appears, that neither Tonstal, Bourn, nor Pool were at that time turned out: It seems there was some hope of gaining them to obey the Laws, and so to continue in their Sees.

He is Consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury.

This matter was delay'd to the 6*th.* of December. Whether this flow'd from Parker's unwillingness to engage in so high a Station, or from any other secret Reason, I do not know. But then, the three Bishops last named refusing to do it, a new Warrant passed under the Great Seal, to the Bishop of Landiff, Barlow Bishop Elect of Chichester, Scory Bishop Elect

...nted for Richard Chiſwell at the Roſe and Crowne in S.t Pauls Church yard.

Elect of Hereford, Coverdale late Biſhop of Exeter, Hodgkins Biſhop Suffragan of Bedford, John Suffragan of Thetford, and Bale Biſhop of Oſſory; that they, or any four of them, ſhould Conſecrate him. So by virtue of this, on the 9*th.* of December, Barlow, Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkins met at the Church of St. Mary le Bow; where, according to the Cuſtom, the Conge d' Elire, with the Election, and the Royal Aſſent to it, were to be brought before them: and theſe being read, Witneſſes were to be cited to prove the Election lawfully made; and all who would object to it were alſo cited. All theſe things being performed according to Law, and none coming to object againſt the Election, they Confirmed it according to the uſual manner. On the 17*th.* of December Parker was Conſecrated in the Chappel at Lambeth, by Barlow, Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkins, according to the Book of Ordinations made in King Edward's time: Only the Ceremony of putting the Staff in his hands was left out of the Office, in this Reign. He being thus Conſecrated himſelf, did afterwards Conſecrate Biſhops for the other Sees: namely, Grindal Biſhop of London, Cox, that had been King Edward's Almoner, Biſhop of Ely, Horn Biſhop of Wincheſter, Sandys Biſhop of Worceſter, Merick Biſhop of Bangor, Young Biſhop of S. Davids, Bullingham Biſhop of Lincoln, Jewel Biſhop of Salisbury, (the great Ornament of that Age for Learning and Piety) Davis Biſhop of St. Aſaph, Gueſt Biſhop of Rocheſter, Berkley Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Bentham Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, Alley Biſhop of Exeter, and Par Biſhop of Peterborough. Barlow and Scory were put into the Sees of Chicheſter, and Hereford. And ſometime after this, in February 1561. Young was tranſlated from St. Davids to York; there being now no hopes of gaining Heath to continue in it; which it ſeems had been long endeavoured, for it was now two years that that See had been in vacancy. In like manner, after ſo long waiting to ſee if Tonſtal would conform, there being now no more hope of it, in March 1561. Pilkington was made Biſhop of Dureſme. Beſt was afterwards made Biſhop of Carliſle, and Downham Biſhop of Cheſter. 1559.

I have given the more diſtinct Account of theſe Promotions, becauſe of a moſt malicious Slander with which they were aſperſt in after-times. It was not thought on for forty years after this. But then it was forged, and publiſh'd, and ſpread over the World, with great confidence, That Parker himſelf was not legally or truly Conſecrated. The Author of it was ſaid to be one Neale, that had been ſometime one of Bonner's Chaplains. The Contrivance was, that the Biſhop of Landaff being required by Bonner not to Conſecrate Parker, or to give Orders in his Diocеſs, did thereupon refuſe it: Upon that the Biſhops Elect being met in Cheapſide at the Nags-head-Tavern, Neale, that had watch'd them thither, peep'd in through an hole of the Door, and ſaw them in great diſorder, finding the Biſhop of Landaff was intractable. But (as the Tale goes on) Scory bids them all kneel, and he laid the Bible upon every one of their Heads or Shoulders, and ſaid, Take thou Authority to Preach the Word of God ſincerely, and ſo they roſe up all Biſhops. This Tale came ſo late into the World, that Sanders, and all the other Writers in Queen Elizabeths time, had never heard of it: otherwiſe we may be ſure they would not have concealed it. And if the thing had been true, or if Neale had but pretended that he had ſeen any ſuch thing, The Fable of the Nags-head confuted.

1559. there is no reason to think he would have suppressed it. But when it might be presumed that all those persons were dead that had been present at Parker's Consecration, then was the time to invent such a Story; for then it might be hoped that none could contradict it. And who could tell but that some who had seen Bishops go from Bow-Church to dine at that Tavern with their Civilians, as some have done after their Confirmation, might imagine that then was the time of this Nags-head Consecration. If it were boldly said, one or other might think he remembred it. But as it pleased God, there was one then living that remembred the contrary. The old Earl of Nottingham, who had been at the Consecration, declared it was at Lambeth, and described all the Circumstances of it, and satisfied all reasonable men that it was according to the Form of the Church of England. The Registers both of the See of Canterbury, and of the Records of the Crown, do all fully agree with his Relation. For as Parker's Conge d' Elire, with the Queens Assent to his Election, and the Warrant for his Consecration, are all under the Great Seal: So upon the Certificate made by those who Consecrated him, the Temporalties were restored by another Warrant also enrolled; which was to be shewed in the House of Lords when he took his Place there. Besides that the Consecrations of all the other Bishops made by him, shew that he alone was first Consecrated without any other. And above all other Testimonies, the Original Instrument of Archbishop Parker's Consecration lies still among his other Papers in the Library of Corpus Christi Colledge at Cambridge, which I saw and read. It is so manifestly an Original Writing, as any that I ever had in my hands: I have put it in the Collection, for the more full discovery of the Impudence of that Faction. But it served those ends for which it was designed. Weak people hearing it so positively told by their Priests, came to believe it; and I have my self met with many that seemed still to give some credit to it, after all that clear Confutation of it, made by the most Ingenious and Learned Bishop Bramhall, the late Primate of Ireland. Therefore I thought it necessary to be the larger in the Account of this Consecration; and the rather, because of the influence it hath into all the Ordinations that have been since that time derived down in this Church.

Collection Number 9.

Some excepted against the Canonicalness of it, because it was not done by all the Bishops of the Province, and three of the Bishops had no Sees when they did it, and the fourth was only a Suffragan-Bishop. But to all this it was said, That after a Church had been over-run with Heresie, those Rules, which were to be observed in its more setled state, were always superseded; as appears particularly when the Arrian Bishops were turned out of some great Sees, for the Orthodox Bishops did then ordain others to succeed them, without judging themselves bound by the Canons in such Cases. And Bishops that had been rightly Consecrated, could certainly derive their own Character to others, whether they were actually in Sees or not. And a Suffragan-Bishop, being Consecrated in the same manner that other Bishops were, tho he had a limited Jurisdiction, yet was of the same Order with them. All these things were made out with a great deal of Learning by Mason, who upon the publishing of that Fiction, wrote in Vindication of the English Ministry.

Thus

Thus were the Sees filled, the Worſhip Reformed, and the Queens Injunctions ſent over England. Three things remained yet to be done. The firſt was, to ſet out the Doctrine of the Church, as it had been done in King Edward's time. The ſecond was, to Tranſlate the Bible, and publiſh it with ſhort notes. And the third was, To regulate the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. The Biſhops therefore ſet about theſe. And for the firſt, though they could not, by publick Authority, ſet out the Articles of the Church till they met in a Convocation; yet they ſoon after prepared them. And for the preſent, they agreed on a ſhort Profeſſion of their Doctrine, which all Incumbents were obliged to read and publiſh to their People. This will be found in the Collection, copied from it, as it was then printed. 1559. Collection Number 11.

In the Articles made in King Edward's Reign, which I have put in the Collection, the Reader will find on the Margent the differences between thoſe and theſe marked. In the third Article, the explanation of Chriſt's deſcent to Hell was left out. In that about the Scriptures, they now added an enumeration of the Canonical and Apocryphal Books; declaring, that ſome Leſſons were read out of the latter, for the Inſtruction of the People, but not for the confirmation of the Doctrine. About the Authority of the Church, they now added, That the Church had power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and had Authority in Controverſies of Faith; but ſtill ſubordinate to the Scripture.

In the Article about the Lords Supper, there is a great deal left out, for inſtead of that large refutation of the Corporal Preſence, from the impoſſibility of a Bodies being in more places at once; from whence it follows, that ſince Chriſt's Body is in Heaven, the faithful ought not to believe or profeſs a Real or Corporal Preſence of it in the Sacrament. In the new Articles, it is ſaid, That the Body of Chriſt is given and received after a Spiritual manner; and the means by which it is received, is Faith. But in the Original Copy of theſe Articles, which I have ſeen ſubſcribed by the hands of all that ſate in either Houſe of Convocation, there is a further addition made. The Articles were ſubſcribed with that Precaution which was requiſite in a matter of ſuch conſequence; for before the Subſcriptions, there is ſet down the number of the Pages, and of the Lines in every Page of the Book, to which they ſet their hands. M. SS. C. Cor. Chriſt. Cant.

In that Article of the Euchariſt, theſe words are added, Chriſtus in Cœlum aſcendens, corpori ſuo immortalitatem dedit, naturam non abſtulit: Humanæ enim naturæ veritatem, juxta ſcripturas perpetuo retinet, quam in uno & definito loco eſſe, & non in multa vel omnia ſimul loca diffundi, oportet: Quum igitur Chriſtus in Cœlum ſublatus, ibi uſque ad finem Seculi ſit permanſurus, atque inde, non aliunde, (ut loquitur Auguſtinus) venturus ſit ad judicandum vivos & mortuos, non debet quiſquam fidelium, Carnis ejus & Sanguinis realem & corporalem (ut loquuntur) præſentiam in Euchariſtia, vel credere vel profiteri. In Engliſh thus: 'Chriſt, when 'he aſcended into Heaven, made his Body Immortal, but took not from 'it the nature of a Body: For ſtill it retains, according to the Scriptures, the verity of a humane Body; which muſt be always in one 'definite place, and cannot be ſpread into many, or all places at once. Since then Chriſt being carried up to Heaven, is to remain there to the end of the World, and is to come from thence, and from no place 'elſe, An Explanation of Chriſt's Preſence in the Sacrament.

1559. 'else, (as says St. Austin) to judge the Quick and the Dead; None of 'the Faithful ought to believe or profess the real, or (as they call it) 'the corporal Presence of his Flesh and Blood in the Eucharist.

But this in the Original is dasht over with minium; yet so, that it is still legible. The secret of it was this; The Queen and her Council studied, (as hath been already shewn) to unite all into the Communion of the Church: and it was alleadged, that such an expres definition against a Real Presence, might drive from the Church many who were still of that Perswasion; and therefore it was thought to be enough to condemn Transubstantiation, and to say, that Christ was present after a Spiritual manner, and received by Faith; to say more, as it was judged superfluous, so it might occasion Division. Upon this, these words were, by common consent, left out: And in the next Convocation, the Articles were subscribed without them, of which I have also seen the Original.

But 'tis suppressed.

This shews that the Doctrine of the Church, subscribed by the whole Convocation, was at that time contrary to the belief of a Real or Corporal Presence in the Sacrament; only it was not thought necessary or expedient to publish it. Though from this silence, which flowed not from their Opinion, but the Wisdom of that Time, in leaving a Liberty for different Speculations, as to the manner of the Presence; some have since inferred, that the chief Pastors of this Church, did then disapprove of the Definition made in King Edward's Time, and that they were for a Real Presence.

For the Translating of the Bible, it was divided into many Parcels. The Pentateuch was committed to William Alley Bishop of Exeter. The Books from that, to the second of Samuel, were given to Richard Davis, who was made Bishop of St. Davids, when Young was removed to York. All from Samuel, to the second Book of Chronicles, was assigned to Edwin Sandys, then Bishop of Worcester. From thence to the end of Job, to one whose Name is marked A. P. C. The Book of the Psalms was given to Thomas Bentham, Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield. The Proverbs to one who is marked A. P. The Song of Solomon to one marked A. P. E. All from thence to the Lamentations of Jeremy, was given to Robert Horn Bishop of Winchester. Ezekiel and Daniel, to Bentham. From thence to Malachi, to Grindal Bishop of London. The Apocrypha to the Book of Wisdom, was given to Barlow Bishop of Chichester, and the rest of it, to Parkhurst Bishop of Norwich. The Gospels, Acts, and Epistle to the Romans, were given to Richard Cox Bishop of Ely. The Epistles to the Corinthians, to one marked G. G. I know not to whom the rest of the New Testament was assigned. All these Allotments I gather from the Bible it self, as it was afterwards set out by Parker. What Method they followed in this Work, I cannot discover; unless the Rules afterwards given in King James his Time, when the Translation was revived, were copied from what was now done: which Rules, for the curiosity of the thing, I shall put in the Collection, as I copied it from B. Ravis's Paper. They were given with that care that such a matter required. There were many Companies appointed for every parcel of the Scripture, and every one of a Company was to translate the whole Parcel: then they were to compare them together; and when any Company had finished their Part, they were to communicate it to the other Companies. So it is like, that at this Time those several Bishops that had undertaken the Translation, did associate to themselves Companies, with whose assistance they perfected it afterwards; and when it was set out, at the end of every Section, the initial Letters of his Name, that had translated it, were printed, as W. E. E. W. for Will. Exon, and Edwin Wigorn; and so in the rest. In what Year this was first printed, I am not so well assured. For I have not seen the first Impression of it, but I believe it was in the Year 1561, or soon after it; for the Almanack prefixed for the Moveable Feasts, begins with that Year. 1559.

As for the Canons and Rules of the Church Government, they were not so soon prepared. There came out some in the Year 1571. and more in the Year 1597. and a far larger Collection of them in the first Year of King James's Reign. But this Matter has yet wanted its chief force; for Penitentiary Canons have not been set up, and the Government of the Church is not yet brought into the Hands of Church-men. So that in this Point the Reformation of the Church wants some part of its finishing, in the Government and Discipline of it.

Thus did Queen Elizabeth again recover the Reformation of Religion: and it might have been expected, that under such moderate and wise Councils, things should have been carried with that Temper, that this Church should have united in its endeavours to support it self, and become the Bulwark of the Reformation, and the Terror of Rome. But that Blessing was, by the sins of the Nation, the Passions of some, the Interests of others, and the Weakness of the greatest part, in a great measure denied us. The Heats that had been raised beyond Sea, were not quite forgotten; and as some Sparks had been kindled about Clergy-mens Habits in King Edward's Reign; so, though Hooper and Ridley had buried that Difference in their Ashes, it broke out again concerning the Vestments of the Inferior Clergy. Other things were also much contested, Some were for setting up Ecclesiastical Courts in every Parish, for the exercising of Discipline against scandalous Persons; others thought this might degenerate into Faction. These lesser Differences were craftily managed by some who intended to improve them so far, that they might have the Church-Lands divided among them, and they carried their Heats further in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, then one would imagine, that considers the temper of that Government. But since that, still by many Degrees, and many Accidents in the Civil Government, they are now grown to that height; that, though considering the Grounds on which they have been, and still are maintained, they appeared to be of no great force or moment: Yet if the Animosities and Heats that are raised by them, are well examined, there is scarce any probable hopes left of composing those Differences, unless our Lawgivers do vigorously apply themselves to it. The beginnings of the Divisions of this Church.

The Reformation in Scotland.

Having given this Account of the Establishment of the Reformation here in England under Queen Elizabeth: I have, in some sort discharged my self of the Design of my Engagement in this Work: but since the Settlement of Religion in Scotland was made the same Year, I shall next give 1559. give some account of that; which I do with the more assurance, having met with several important things relating to it in Melvil's Memoires, that are in none of the printed Books. When the Treaty began for a Peace between the two Crowns of France and Spain, the secret Reason of making it, was, to root out Heresie, so much was expressed in the Preamble to it, that to extirpate Heresie, to have a General Council called, and the Church fully Reformed, both from Errors and Abuses, those Princes had entred into a firm Peace.

The Cardinal of Lorrain writ to his Sister the Queen, Regent of Scotland; that now, since they were making Peace, they were resolved to purge the World of Heresie. He also writ to the Arch-Bishop of St. Andrews to the same effect. The Queen Regent was much confounded at this. She was now forced to break her Faith with those who had served her Interests hitherto; and to whom she had often promised, that they should not be troubled for their Consciences. The danger was also very great from their Combination, since the Queen of England would certainly assist them; both because the Religion was the same in both Countries; and because, by dividing that Kingdom, she would secure the North of England from the mischief Scotland could do it, if moved and set on to it by France. But the Bishops in Scotland, shutting their Eyes upon all Dangers, resolved by some signal Instance, to strike a Terror into the People.

The Arch-Bishop of St. Andrews, having gathered a meeting of many Bishops, Abbots, and Divines, brought before them one Walter Mill, an old decrepit Priest, who had long given over saying Mass, and had preached in several places of the Country. They had in vain dealt with him to recant; so now he was brought to his Trial. They objected Articles to him, about his asserting the lawfulness of Priests Marriages; denying the seven Sacraments; saying the Mass was Idolatry; denying the Presence of Christs Flesh and Blood in the Sacrament; and condemning the Office of Bishops; speaking against Pilgrimages; and teaching privately in Houses.

Mills Martyrdom.

To these he answered beyond all their Expectation; for he was so old and infirm, that they thought he could say nothing. He said, 'He 'esteemed Marriage a blessed Bond, and free for all men to enter into 'it; and that it was much better for Priests to marry, than to vow 'Chastity and not keep it, as they generally did. He said, He knew 'no Sacraments, but Baptism and the Lords Supper; the rest he left 'them. He said, The Priests sole communicating was, as if a Lord 'should invite many to Dinner, and ring a Bell for them to come; but 'when they came, should turn his back on them, and eat all himself. 'He said, That Christ was only spiritually in the Sacrament; and that 'there was no other Sacrifice, but that which he offered on the Cross. 'He held, That they were Bishops indeed, who did the Work of 'Bishop; and not they who sought only their sensual Pleasures, and 'neither regarded the Word of God, nor their Flocks. He knew 'Pilgrimages had been much abused, and great Uncleanness was com- 'mitted, under the colour of going to them; but there was no ground 'for them in Scripture.

Upon these Answers he was required to recant; but he said, he knew he was to die once, and what they intended to do with him, wiſhed they would do it ſoon. Upon this, he was declared an obſtinate Heretick. But the Country was ſo alienated from them, that they could not find a Man to burn him; and he that had the Juriſdiction in that Regality, refuſed to execute the Sentence. Yet at laſt, one of the Arch-biſhops Servants was gotten to undertake it; but in the whole Town, they could find none that would ſell them a Cord to tie him to the Stake; ſo they were forced to put it off till the next day; and then, ſince none other could be had, the Arch-biſhop ſent the Cords of his own Pavilion for that uſe. When Mill was brought to the Stake, he ſaid, he would not go up of his own accord, becauſe he would not be acceſſary to his own Death; but if they would put their hand to him, they ſhould ſee how chearfully he ſhould do it. That being done, he went up, and ſaid, I will go in to the Altar of God. He exhorted the People to be no more ſeduced by the Lyes of their Prieſts, but to depend upon Chriſt and his Mercy; for whoſe Doctrine, as many Martyrs had offered up their Lives, ſo he bleſſed God that had ſo honoured him to call him to give this Teſtimony, for whoſe Glory he moſt willingly offered up his Life. When the Fire was ſet to him, he called to the People to Pray for him, and continued to cry, Lord have mercy on me, till he could ſpeak no more. 1559.

His Suffering was much reſented by the Inhabitants of St Andrews, who raiſed a great heap of Stones in the place where he was burnt, for a Memorial of it; and though the Prieſts ſcattered them often, they renewed them ſtill, till a Watch was ſet about it. The Nation was much provoked by it.

In all parts of Scotland, and eſpecially in the Towns, and in the Families of the Nobility and Gentry, the Reformation had been received, and ſecretly profeſſed. So they began now to conſult what to do. They had many meetings in ſeveral places; and finding their Intereſt was great over the Kingdom, they entred into Confederacies to maintain the true Religion.

Before the Parliament met laſt Year, they had ſent a Petition to the Queen Regent, 'That the Worſhip of God might be in the Vulgar 'Tongue, and the Communion might be given in both Kinds: That 'there ſhould be great care taken in the Election of Miniſters, that it 'might be according to the Cuſtom of the Primitive Church; and 'that ſcandalous Miniſters might be removed, and more worthy Men 'put in their places.

But the Queen Regent, to keep them in hopes till the Dolphin ſhould be acknowledged King of Scotland, promiſed they ſhould not be hindred to have Prayers in their own Tongue, ſo they would keep no publick Aſſemblies in Edinburgh and Leith.

In the Parliament, they propoſed the abrogating of the Laws for Church-mens proceedings againſt Hereticks; and that none ſhould be condemned of Hereſie, but according to the Word of God; with ſome other Limitations of the Severities againſt them. But the Queen ſtill gave them good hopes; only ſhe ſaid, ſhe could not agree to thoſe things, by reaſon of the oppoſition that would be made by the Spiritual Eſtate: But ſhe ſuffered them to read a Proteſtation in Parliament, declaring their deſires of a Reformation; and that if, upon the denial of it, Abuſes were removed violently, they were not to be blamed, who had begun thus in a modeſt way to Petition for it.

1559. This Year it was become visible that she resolved to proceed to extremities. She ordered all the reformed Preachers to appear at Sterling the 10*th.* of May. When this was done, the Earl of Glencarn went to her in the Name of the rest, and asked her the reason of that way of proceeding. She answered him in passion, 'That maugre them and all 'that would take part with them, the Ministers should be banished Scot-'land, though they preached as soundly as St. Paul did. Upon this he remembred her of the Promises she had often made them: to which she 'answered, 'That the Promises of Princes should be no further strained 'than seem'd convenient to them to perform. Glencarn replied, if she 'would keep no Promises, they would acknowledge her no more, but 'renounce their Obedience to her.

A Revolt began at St. Johnstoun. That very night she heard that in the Town of St. Johnstoun, the People had Sermons openly in their Churches. Upon that she ordered the Lord Ruthven to go and reduce that Town: He answered, he could not govern their Consciences: Upon which, she vowed she would make him and them both repent it. The Ministers were coming from all parts, accompanied with many Gentlemen, to appear on the Day to which they were cited. The Queen hearing that, sent word to them to go home, for she would not proceed in the Citation. Many of them upon that returned to their homes, but others went to St. Johnstoun: Yet upon their not appearing, she made them all be declared Rebels, contrary to her Promise: This made many leave her, and go over to them at St. Johnstoun. The People began there first to break Images; and then they fell into the Houses of the Franciscans and Dominicans, where they found much more Wealth than agreed with their pretended Poverty. They also pulled down a great House of the Carthusians, with so much haste, that within two days there was not one Stone left to shew where it had stood: but yet the Prior was suffered to carry away the Plate. All that was found in these Houses, besides what the Monks carried away, was given to the Poor. The Queen, hearing this, resolved to make that Town an Example, and sent over all the Kingdom to gather the French Souldiers together, with such others as would joyn with her in this Quarrel. But the Earl of Glencarn with incredible haste came to their assistance, with 2500 Men: And there were gathered in all, in and about the Town, 7000 Men. The Queen, seeing it now turned to an open Rebellion, employed the Earl of Argile and the Prior of St. Andrews to treat with them. An Oblivion for what was past was agreed on: The Queen was to come to St. Johnstoun, without her French-men: and the matters of Religion were to be referred to a Parliament. Upon this, she went thither; but carried French-men with her, and put a Garrison in the Town; and proceeded to the Fining of many, and the Banishing of others. Being pressed with her Promise, she said, 'The Promises of 'Princes ought not to be strictly urged, and those were not to be kept 'that were made to Hereticks; she declared that she would take it on 'her Conscience, to kill and undo all that Sect, and make the best excuse she could when it was done. Upon this, all the Nation forsook her: and in many other places they went on to cleanse the Churches and pull down Monasteries.

When the News of this came to the Court of France, it was at first not right rightly understood. The Queen Regent represented it, as if it had been a Design to shake off the French Power; and desired a great Force to reduce them. The King then saw too late, that the Constable had given him good Advice, in diswading the Match with Scotland, and fearing to be intangled in a long chargeable War, he resolved to send one thither to know the true occasion of these Stirs. So the Constable proposed to him the sending of Melvil, by whom he had understood, that the reason of all their disorders was the Queen's breaking her Word to them in the matters of Religion. He carried Melvil to the King, and in his presence gave him Instructions, to go to Scotland, and see what was the true cause of all these disorders; and particularly, how far the Prior of St. Andrews, (afterwards the Earl of Murray,) was engaged in them; and if he, by secret ways, could certainly find there was nothing in it but Religion, that then he should give them Assurances of the free Exercise of it, and press them not to engage any further till he was returned to the French Court, where he was promised to find a great Reward for so important a Service: but he was not to let the Queen Regent understand his business. He found upon his going into Scotland, that it was even as he had formerly heard; that the Queen Regent was now much hated and distasted by them: but that upon an Oblivion of what was passed, and the free Exercise of their Religion for the future, all might be brought to peace and quiet. But before he came back, the King of France was dead, the Constable in disgrace, and the Cardinal of Lorrain governed all: So he lost his Labour and Reward, which ye valued much less, being a generous and vertuous Man, than the Ruine that he saw coming on his Country.

The French King intends to grant liberty of Religion.

But is killed.

The Lords that were now united against the Queen Mother came and took St. Johnstown. From thence they went to Stirling, and Edinburgh: and every where they pulled down Monasteries; all the Country declared on their side; so that the Queen Regent was forced to fly to Dunbar-Castle. The Lords sent to England for Assistance, which the Queen readily granted them. They gave out, that they desired nothing but to have the French driven out, and Religion setled by a Parliament. The Queen Regent seeing all the Country against her, and apprehending that the Queen of England would take advantage from these Stirrs to drive her out of Scotland, was content to agree to a Truce; and to summon a Parliament to meet on the 10*th* of January. But the new King of France sent over Mr. de Croque, with a high threatning Message, that he would spend the whole Revenue of France rather than not be revenged on them that raised these Tumults in Scotland. The Lords answered, that they desired nothing but the liberty of their Religion: and that being obtained, they should be in all other things his most obedient Subjects. The Queen Regent having gotten about 2000 Men from France, fortified Leith; and in many other things broke the Truce. There came over also some Doctors of the Sorbonne to dispute with the Ministers, because they heard the Scotish Clergy were scarce able to defend their own Cause. The Lords gathered again, and seeing the Queen Regent had so often broke her Word to them, they entred into Consultation to deprive her of her Regency. Their Queen was not yet of Age; and in her Minority, they pretended that the Government of the Kingdom belonged to the States: and therefore fore they gathered together many of her Male-administrations, for which they might the more colourably put her out of the Government. The things they charged on her were chiefly these: 'That she had without Law begun a War in the Kingdom, and brought in Strangers to subdue it; had governed without the consent of the Nobility, embased the Coin to maintain her Souldiers; had put Garrisons in free Towns, and had broke all Promises and Terms with them. Thereupon they declared her to have fallen from her Regency, and did suspend her Power, till the next Parliament. So now it was an irreconcileable Breach. The Lords lay first at Edinburgh, and from thence retired afterwards to Sterling: Upon which the French came and possessed themselves of the Town, and set up the Mass again in the Churches. Greater Supplies came over from France under the Command of the Marquess of Elbeuf, one of the Queen Regent's Brothers; who, though most of his Fleet were dispersed, yet brought to Leith 1000 Foot, so that there were now above 4000 French Souldiers in that Town. But what Accession of strength soever the Queen Regent received from these, she lost as much in Scotland; for now almost the whole Country was united against her; and the French were equally heavy to their Friends and Enemies. They marched about by Sterling to waste Fife, where there were some small Engagements between them and the Lords of the Congregation.

The Scots implore the Q. of Englands Aid.

But the Scots, seeing they could not stand before that force that was expected from France the next Spring, sent to Queen Elizabeth to desire her Aid openly; for the secret Supplies of Money and Ammunition, with which she hitherto furnished them, would not now serve the Turn. The Council of England apprehended that it would draw on a War with France: yet they did not fear that much; for that Kingdom was falling into such Factions, that they did not apprehend any great danger from thence till their King was of Age. So the Duke of Norfolk was sent to Berwick, to treat with the Lords of the Congregation; who were now headed by the Duke of Chattelherhault. On the 27th of February they agreed on these Conditions: 'They were to be sure 'Allies to the Queen of England; and to assist her, both in England and 'Ireland, as she should need their help. She was now on the other hand 'to assist them to drive the French out of Scotland: after which they 'were still to continue in their obedience to their Natural Queen. 'This League was to last during their Queen's Marriage to the French 'King, and for a year after: and they were to give the Queen of Eng- 'land Hostages, who were to be changed every six Months.

This being concluded, and the Hostages given, the Lord Grey marched into Scotland with 2000 Horse, and 6000 Foot. Upon that, the Lords sent and offered to the Queen Regent, that if she would send away the French Forces, the English should likewise be sent back, and they would return to their Obedience.

Leith is besieged by the English.

This not being accepted, they drew about Leith to besiege it. In one Sally which the French made, they were beaten back with the loss of 300 men. This made the English more secure, thinking the French would no more come out: but they understanding the ill order that was kept, sallied out again, and killed near 500 of the English. This made them more watchful for the future. So the Siege being formed
